Theseus the tenth King of Athens began likewise to reigne in the beginning of Iair: some writers call him the sonne of Neptune and Æthra: but Plutark in the Storie of his life findes him begotten by Ægeus, of whom the Grecian sea betweene it and Asia the lesse tooke name. For when Minos had mastered the Athenians, so farre as he forst them to pay him seuen of their sonnes euery yeere for tribute, whom hee inclosed within a Labyrinth, to bee deuoured by the monster Minotaur: because belike the sonnes of Taurus, which he begat on Pasiphae the Queene, had the charge of them. Among these seuen Theseus thrust himselfe, not doubting by his valour to deliuer the rest, and to free his Countrie of that slauerie occasioned for the death of Androgeus, Minos his sonne.

And hauing possest himselfe of Ariadnes affection, who was Minos daughter, hee receiued from her a bottome of thred, by which hee conducted himselfe through all the crooked and inextricable turnings of the Labyrinth, made in all like that of the Citie of Crocodiles in Ægypt; by meane whereof hauing slaine Minotaur, hee found a readie way to returne. But whereas his father Ægeus had giuen order, that if hee came backe with victorie and in safetie, hee should vse a white saile in signe thereof, and not that mournefull blacke saile, vnder-which they left the port of Athens. This instruction beeing either forgotten or neglected, Ægeus descrying the shippe of Theseus with a blacke saile, cast himselfe ouer the rockes into the Sea, afterward called of his name Ægeum.

One of the first famous actes of Theseus, was the killing of Scyron, who kept a passage betweene Megara and the Peloponnesian Isthmos, and threw all whom hee mastered into the Sea, from the high rockes. Afterward hee did the like to Cercyon, by wrestling, who vsed by that Arte to kill others. Hee also ridde the Country of Procrustes, who vsed to bend downe the strong limbes of two trees, and fastened by cordes such as hee tooke, part of them to one and part to the other bough, and by their springing backe tare them asunder. So did hee roote out Periphetes and other mischieuous theeues and murtherers. Hee ouerthrew the armie of the Amazons, who after many victories and vastations, entred the Territorie of Athens. Theseus hauing taken their Queene Hyppolita prisoner, begat on her Hippolytus, with whom afterward his mother in law Phædra, falling in loue, and hee refusing to abuse his fathers bed, Phædra perswaded Theseus that his sonne offered to force her: after which it is fained, that Theseus besought Neptune to reuenge this wrong of his sonnes, by some violent death. Neptune taking a time of aduantage, sent out his Sea-Calues, as Hippolytus passed by the sea shore, and so affrighted his horses, as casting the Coach ouer, hee was (by being intangled therein) torne in pieces. Which miserable and vndeserued destinie, when Phædra had heard of, shee strangled herselfe. After which it is fained, that Diana entreated Æsculapius to set Hippolytus his pieces together, and to restore him to life: which done, because hee was chaste, shee led him with her into Italie, to accompanie her in her hunting, and field sports.

It is probable that Hippolytus, when his father sought his life, thinking to escape by Sea, was affronted thereat, and receiued many wounds in forcing his passage and escape; which wounds Æsculapius, to wit, some skilfull Phisician, or Chirurgion healed againe, after which hee past into Italy, where he liued with Diana, that is, the life of a hunter, in which hee most delighted. But of these ancient prophane Stories, Plutarch saith well, that as Cosmographers in their descriptions of the world, where they finde many vast places whereof they know nothing, fill the same with strange beastes, birdes, and fishes, and with Mathematicall lines, so doe the Grecian Historians and Poets imbroder and intermixe the tales of ancient times, with a world of fictions and fabulous discourses. True it is, that Theseus did many great things in imitation of Hercules, whom hee made his patterne, and was the first that gathered the Athenians, from being disperst in thinne and ragged villages: in recompence whereof, and for deuising them lawes to liue vnder, and in order, hee was by the beggerly, mutable, and vngratefull multitude, in the end banished. Some say per Ostracismum, by the Lawe of Lottes, or names written on shelles, which was a deuice of his owne.

Hee stole Helen (as they say) when she was 50. yeeres olde, from Aphidna, which Citie Castor and Pollux ouerturned, when they followed after Theseus to recouer their sister. Eratistratus and Pausanias write that Theseus begat her with child at Argos, where shee erected a Temple to Lucina: but her age makes that tale vnlikely to bee true, and so doth Ouid, Non tamen ex facto fructum tulit ille petitum, &c. The rape Eusebius findes in the first of Iair, who gouerned Israel 22. yeeres, to whom succeeded Iephta or Iepte sixe yeeres, to whom Ibzan who ruled seuen yeeres, and then Habdon eight yeere: in whose time was the fall of Troy. So as, if Theseus had a childe by her in the first of Iair, (at which time we must count her no lesse than fifteene yeere olde, for the women did not commonly beginne so young as they doe now) shee was then at least two and fiftie yeere olde at the destruction of Troy: and when shee was stollen by Paris eight and thirtie: but herein the Chronologers doe not agree. Yet Eusebius and Bunting with Halicarnasseus

In Sicyonia Phæstus the two and twentieth King, reigned eight yeeres, beginning by the common account in the time of Thola. His successours, Adrastus, who reigned foure yeeres, and Polyphides who reigned thirteene, are accounted to the time of Iair, so is also Mnestheus King of Athens, and Atreus, who held a great part of Peloponnesus. §. VII.

Of the warre of Thebes which was in this age.

IN this age was the warre of Thebes, the most ancient that euer Greeke Poet or Historian wrote of: Wherefore the Roman Poet Lucretius, affirming (as the Epicures in this point held truely against the Peripateticks) that the world had a beginning, vrgeth them with this obiection.

——— Si nulla fuit genitalis origo
Rerumq́, & mundi, semperque æterna fuère,
Cur supra bellum Thebanum, & funera Troiæ,
Nòn alias alij quoque res cecinere poetæ?

If all this world had no originall,
But things haue euer beene as now they are:
Before the siege of Thebes or Troyes last fall,
Why did no Poet sing some elder warre?

It is true that in these times Greece was very saluage, the inhabitants being often chaced from place to place, by the captaines of greater Tribes: and no man thinking the ground whereon hee dwelt his owne longer than hee could hold it by strong hand. Wherefore merchandize and other intercourse they vsed little, neither did they plant many trees, or sow more corne than was necessarie for their sustenance. Money they had little or none, for it is thought that the name of money was not heard in Greece, when Homer did write, who measures the valew of gold and brasse by the worth in cattell; saying that the golden armour of Glaucus, was worth 100. beeues, and the copper armour of Diomedes worth nine.

Robberies by land and sea were common and without shame, and to steale horses or kine was the vsuall exercise of their great men. Their townes were not many, whereof those that were walled were very few, and not great. For Mycena the principall Citie in Peloponnesus was a very little thing, and it may well be thought that the rest were proportionable: briefly, Greece was then in her infancie, and though in some small townes of that halfe Ile of Peloponnesus, the inhabitants might haue enioyed quietnesse within their narrow bounds; as likewise did the Athenians becauſe their Country was ſo barren, that none did care to take it from them: yet that the land in generall was very rude, it will eaſily appeare to ſuch as conſider, what Thucydides the greateſt of their Hiſtorians hath written to this effect, in the præface to his Hiſtorie. Wherefore, as in theſe latter times, idle Chroniclers vſe when they want good matter, to fill whole bookes with reports of great froſts, or dry ſummers, and other ſuch things which no man cares to reade, ſo did they who ſpake of Greece in her beginnings, remember onely the great flouds which were in the times of Ogyges, and Deucalion: or elſe rehearſe fables of men changed into birds, of ſtrange monſters, of adulterie committed by their Gods, and the mightie men which they begat, without writing ought that ſauoured of humanitie before the time of the warre of Thebes: the briefe whereof is this.

OEdipus the ſonne of Laius King of Thebes, hauing beene caſt foorth when hee was an infant, becauſe an Oracle foretolde what euill ſhould come to paſſe by him, did afterwards in a narrow paſſage contending for the way, ſlay his owne father, not knowing either then or long after, who hee was. Afterward hee became King of Thebes, by marriage of the Queene Iocaſta, called by Homer Epicaſte: on whom, not knowing her to bee his mother, hee begat two ſonnes, Eteocles and Polynices. But when in proceſſe of time, finding out by good circumſtances, who were his parents, hee vnderſtood the grieuous murther and inceſt hee had committed, he tore out his owne eyes for griefe, and left the Citie. His wife and mother did hang her ſelfe. Some ſay, that OEdipus hauing his eyes pulled out, was expelled Thebes, bitterly curſing his ſonnes, becauſe they ſuffered their father to bee caſt out of the Towne, and ayded him not. Howſoeuer it were, his two Sonnes made this agreement, that the one of them ſhould reigne one yeere, and the other another yeere; and ſo by courſe rule interchangeably. But this appointment was ill obſerued. For when Polynices had after a yeeres Gouernment reſigned the Kingdome to his brother: or (according to others) when Eteocles had reigned the firſt yeere, hee refuſed to giue ouer the rule to Polynices. Hereupon Polynices fled vnto Argos, where Adraſtus the ſonne of Talaus then reigned, vnto whoſe palace comming by night, hee was driuen to ſeeke lodging in an out-houſe, on the backeſide.

Hom. Odyſſ. 11.

There hee met with Tydeus the ſonne of OEneus, who was fled from Calydon: with whom ſtriuing about their lodging, hee fell to blowes. Adraſtus hearing the noyſe, came foorth and tooke vp the quarrell. At which time perceiuing in the ſhield of Tydeus a Bore, in that of Polynices a Lyon, hee remembred an olde Oracle, by which hee was aduiſed to giue his two daughters in marriage, to a Lyon and a Bore: and accordingly hee did beſtow his daughter Argia vpon Tydeus, and Deipyle vpon Polynices, promiſing to reſtore them both to their Countries. To this purpoſe leuying an armie, and aſſembling as many valiant Captaines as hee could draw to follow him, hee was deſirous among others to carrie Amphiaraus the ſonne of Oicleus a great Soothſayer, and a valiant man, along with him. But Amphiaraus, who is ſaid to haue foreſeene all things, knowing well that none of the Captaines ſhould eſcape, ſaue onely Adraſtus, did both vtterly refuſe to bee one in that expedition, and perſwaded others to ſtay at home. Polynices therefore dealt with Eriphyle the wife of Amphiaraus, offering vnto her a very faire bracelet, vpon condition that ſhee ſhould cauſe her husband to aſſiſt him. The Soothſayer knowing what ſhould worke his deſtinie, forbad his wife to take any gift of Polynices. But the bracelet was in her eye ſo precious a iewell, that ſhee could not refuſe it. Therefore whereas a great controuerſie, betweene Amphiaraus and Adraſtus, was by way of compromiſe put vnto the deciſion of Eryphile, either of them being bound by ſolemne oath to ſtand to her appointment: ſhee ordered the matter ſo, as a woman ſhould, that loued a bracelet better than her husband. Hee now finding that it was more eaſie to foreſee than auoide deſtinie, ſought ſuch comfort fort as reuenge might affoord, giuing in charge to his ſonnes, that when they came to full age, they ſhould kill their mother and make ſtrong warre vpon the Thebanes.

Now had Adraſtus aſſembled all his forces, of which, the ſeuen chiefe leaders were, himſelfe, Amphiaraus, Capaneus, and Hippomedon (in ſteade of whom ſome name Mecisteus) all Argiues, with Polynices the Theban, Tydeus the Ætolian, and Parthenopæus the Arcadian ſonne of Meleager and Atalanta. When the armie came to the Nemæan wood, they met a woman whom they deſired to helpe them to ſome water, ſhe hauing a child in her armes, laid it downe, and led the Argiues to a ſpring: but ere ſhee returned, a Serpent had ſlaine the childe. This woman was Hypſipyle the daughter of Thoas the Lemnian, whom ſhee would haue ſaued when the women of the Ile ſlew all the males by conſpiracie, intending to lead an Amazonian life. For ſuch her pietie, the Lemnian wiues did ſell her to Pyrates, and the Pyrates to Lycurgus Lord of the Country about Nemæa, whoſe yong ſonnes Opheltes or Archemorus, ſhe did nurſe, and loſt as is ſhewed before. When vpon the childs death ſhee hid herſelfe for feare of her maſter, Amphiaraus told her ſonnes where they ſhould finde her: and the Argiues did both kill the Serpent which had ſlaine the childe, and in memorie of the chaunce, did inſtitute ſolemne funerall games called Nemæa, wherein Adraſtus wanne the prize with his ſwift horſe Arion, Tydeus with whorlebats, Amphiaraus at running and quoiting, Polynices at wreſtling, Parthenopæus at ſhooting, and one Laodocus in darting. This was the firſt inſtitution of the Nemæan games, which continued after famous in Greece for very many ages. There are, who thinke that they were ordained in honour of one Opheltus, a Lacedemonian. Some ſay by Hercules, when hee had ſlaine the Nemæan Lyon: but the common opinion agrees with that which is here ſet downe.

From Nemæa the Argiues marching onwards, arriued at Citheron, whence Tydeus was by them ſent Embaſſadour to Thebes, to require of Eteocles the performance of Couenants betweene him and Polynices. This meſſage was nothing agreeable to Eteocles, who was throughly reſolued to holde what he had, as long as hee could: which Tydeus perceiuing and intending partly to get honour, partly to trie what mettle was in the Thebans, hee made many challenges, and obtained victorie in all of them, not without much enuie and malice of the people, who laide fiftie men in ambuſh to intercept him at his returne to the armie, of which fiftie hee ſlewe all but one, whom hee ſent backe to the Citie as a reporter and witneſſe of his valour. When the Argiues vnderſtood how reſolued Eteocles was, they preſented themſelues before the Citie, and incamped round about it. Thebes is ſaid to haue had at that time ſeuen gates, which belike ſtoode not farre aſunder, ſeeing that the Argiues (who afterward when they were very farre ſtronger, could ſcarce muſter vp more thouſands then Thebes had gates) did compaſſe the towne. Adraſtus quartered before the gate Homoloides, Capaneus before the Ogygian, Tydeus before Crenis, Amphiaraus at Proëtis, Hippomedon at Anchais, Parthenopæus at Electra, and Polynices at Hypſiſta. In the meane ſeaſon, Eteocles hauing armed his men, and appointed Commaunders vnto them, tooke aduice of Tireſias the Soothſayer, who promiſed victorie to the Thebans, if Menœcius the ſonne of Creon a principall man of the Citie, would vowe himſelfe to bee ſlaine in honour of Mars the God of warre. So full of malice and pride is the Diuell, and ſo enuious at his Creators glorie, that hee not onely challengeth honours due to God alone, as oblations and ſacrifice with all Diuine worſhip, but commaundeth vs to offer our ſelues, and our children vnto him, when hee hath ſufficiently clowded mens vnderſtanding, and bewitched their wils with ignorance and blinde deuotion. And ſuch abominable ſacrifice of men, maides, and children hath hee exacted of the Syrians, Carthaginians, Galles, Germanes, Cyprians, Ægyptians, and of many other, if not of all Nations, when through ignorance or feare they were moſt filled with ſuperſtition. But as they grewe more wiſe, ſo did hee waxe leſſe impudent in cunning, though not lesse malicious in desiring the continuance of such barbarous inhumanitie. For King Diphilus in Cypres without aduice of any Oracle, made the Idoll of that Country rest contented with an Oxe in stead of a man. Tiberius forbad humane sacrifices in Africk, and crucified the Priests in the groues where they had practised them. Hercules taught the Italians to drowne men of hay in stead of the liuing: yet among the saluages in the West Indies these cruell offerings haue been practised of late ages: which as it is a sufficient argument that Satans malice is onely couered and hidden by this subtiltie among ciuill people: so may it serue as a probable Coniecture of the barbarismes then reigning in Greece. For Menœcius, as soone as he vnderstood that his death might purchase victorie to his people, bestowed himselfe (as he thought) vpon Mars, killing himselfe before the gates of the Citie. Then was a battaile fought, wherein the Argiues preuailed so farre at the first, that Capaneus aduancing ladders to the walls, got vp vpon the rampart: whence, when he fell or was cast downe, or (as writers haue it) was stricken downe by Iupiter with a thunder-bolt, the Argiues fled. Many on each part were slaine in this battell, which caused both sides to desire that Eteocles and Polynices might trie out the quarrell in single fight: whereto the two brethren according, slew each other.

Another battel was fought after their death, wherein the sonnes of Astacus behaued themselues very valiantly: Ismarus one of the sonnes slewe Hippomedon which was one of the seuen Princes: Parthenopæus being another of the seuen (who was saide to haue beene so faire that none would hurt him when his face was bare) was slaine by Amphidicus, or as some say, by Periclymenus the sonne of Neptune: and the valiant Tydeus by Menalippus: yet ere Tydeus died, the head of Menalippus was brought vnto him by Amphiaraus, which hee cruely tore open and swallowed vp the braines. Vpon which fact, it is said, that Pallas, who had brought from Iupiter such remedie for his wound, as should haue made him immortall, refused to bestow it vpon him: whereby perhaps was meant that his honour which might haue continued immortall, did perish through the beastly rage that hee shewed at his death.

The hoast of the Argiues being wholly discomfited, Adrastus and Amphiaraus fledde: of whom Amphiaraus is said to haue been swallowed quicke into the earth, neere to the riuer Ismenus, together with his Chariot, and so lost out of mens sight, being peraduenture ouerwhelmed with dead carkasses or drowned in the riuer: and his bodie neuer found nor greatly sought for. Adrastus escaped on his good horse Arion, and came to Athens; where sitting at an Altar called the Altar of Mercie, hee made supplication for their aide to recouer their bodies. For Creon hauing obtained the Gouernment of Thebes, after the death of Eteocles, would not suffer the bodies of the Argiues to be buried: but caused Antigone, the only daughter then liuing of OEdipus, to bee buried quicke, because shee had sought out and buried the bodie of her brother Polynices, contrary to Creons Edict. The Athenians condescending to the request of Adrastus, did send foorth an armie vnder the Conduct of Theseus, which tooke Thebes, and restored the bodies of the Argiues to Sepulture: at which time Euadne the wife of Capaneus, threw herselfe into the funerall fire, and was burnt willingly with her husband. But it little contented the sonnes of those Captaines which were slaine at Thebes, that any lesse reuenge should bee taken of their fathers death, than the ruine of the Citie: wherefore tenne yeeres after hauing leuied forces, Ægialeus the sonne of Adrastus, Diomedes of Tydeus, Promachus of Parthenopæus, Sthenelus of Capaneus, Thersander of Polynices, and Euripylus of Mecisteus, marched thither vnder the conduct of Alcmæon the sonne of Amphiaraus: with whom also went his brother Amphilochus. Apollo promised victorie if Alcmæon were their Captaine, whom afterward by another Oracle he commaunded to kill his owne mother.

When they came to the citie, they were inconntred by Laodamus the son of Eteocles then King of the Thebanes, (for Creon was only Tutor to Laodamas) who though hee did did valiantly in the battaile, and ſlue Ægialeus, yet was he put to the worſt, and driuen to flie, or (according to Apollodorus) ſlain by Alcmæon. After this diſaſter the citizens began to deſire compoſition; but in the meane time they conuayed themſelues with their wiues and children away from thence by night, and ſo began to wander vp and downe, till at length they built the Towne called Eſtiæa. The Argiues, when they perceiued that their enemies had quitted the Towne, entring into it, ſacked it, threw downe the walls, and layd it waſte; howbeit it is reported by ſome that the Towne was ſaued by Thirſander, the ſonne of Polynices, who cauſing the Citizens to returne, did there raigne ouer them. That hee ſaued the Citie from vtter deſtruction, it is very likely, for hee reigned there, and led the Thebanes to the Warre of Troy, which very ſhortly after enſued.

§. VIII.

Of IEPHTA, and how the three hundred yeeres which hee ſpeaketh of, IVD. 11. v. 28. are to bee reconciled with the places, ACT. 13. 20. 1. REG. 6. 1. together with ſome other things touching Chronologie about theſe times.

AFter the death of Iair (neere about whoſe times theſe things happened in Greece, and during whoſe gouernment, and that of Thola, Iſrael liued in peace and in order) they reuolted againe from the law, and ſeruice of God, and became more wicked and Idolatrous than euer. For whereas in the former times they worſhipped Baal and Aſteroth, they now became followers of all the Heathen Nations adioyning, and imbraced the Idolls of the Aramites, of the Zidonians, Moabites and Ammonites: with thoſe of the Philiſtims. And as before it pleaſed God to correct them by the Aramites, by the Amalekites, and Midianites: ſo now he ſcourged them by the Ammonites, and afterward by the Philiſtims. Iud. 10.

The perſecution of the Ammonites laſted 18. yeeres, and ended in the yeere of the World 2820. in which yeere Iephta began. Iud. 11.

Now among the Iſraelites, thoſe of Gilead being moſt oppreſt, becauſe they bordered vpon the Ammonites, they were inforſt to ſeeke Iephta, whom they had formerly deſpiſed and caſt from them, becauſe he was baſe borne; but hee (notwithſtanding thoſe former iniuries) participating more of godly compaſſion, than of deuiliſh hatred and reuenge, was content to leade the Gileadites to the Warre, vpon condition that they ſhould eſtabliſh him their Gouernour after victorie. And when he had diſputed with Ammon for the Land, diſprooued Ammons right, and fortified the title of Iſrael by many arguments, the ſame preuailing nothing, he beganne the warre; and being ſtrengthened by God, ouerthrew them: and did not onely beate them out of the plaines, but forſt them ouer the mountaines of Arabia, euen to Minnith, and Abel of the vineyards, Cities expreſt heretofore in the deſcription of the holy Land. After which victory it is ſaid, that he performed the vaine vow, which hee made, to ſacrifice the firſt liuing creature hee incountred, comming out of his houſe to meete him; which happened to be his owne daughter, and only child, who with all patience ſubmitted her ſelfe, and onely deſired two Moneths time to bewaile her Virginitie on the mountaines of Gilead; becauſe in her the iſſues of her Father ended: but the other opinion that ſhee was not offered, is more probable, which Borrhaus and others proue ſufficiently. Iud. 11. 33. Bor. in Iud.

After theſe things the children of Iſrael, of the Tribe of Ephraim, either enuious of Iephta's victorie, or otherwiſe making way to their future calamitie, and to the moſt grieuous ſlauery that euer Iſrael ſuffered, quarrelled with Iephta, that they were not called to the Warre, as before time they had conteſted with Gideon. Iephta hereupon enforſt to defend himſelfe againſt their fury, in the incounter ſlew of them two and fortie thouſand, which ſo weakened the bodie of the Land, as the Philiſtims had Iud. 12.

had an easie conquest of them all not long after: Iephta, after he had iudged Israel six 2925. yeeres, died: to whom succeeded Ibzan, who ruled seuen yeeres: after him Elon was 2942. their Iudge ten yeeres: in all which time Israel had peace. Eusebius finds not Elon, whom he calleth Adon, for in the Septuagint, approued in his time, this Iudge was omitted.

Now before I goe on with the rest, it shall bee necessary vpon the occasion of Iephta's account of the times Iud. 11. 28. (where he sayes that Israel had then possest the East side of Iordan 300. yeeres) to speake somewhat of the times of the Iudges, and of the differing opinions among the Diuines and Chronologers: there being found three places of Scriptures touching this point seeming repugnant, or disagreeing: the first is in this dispute betweene Iephta and Ammon, for the right and possession of Gilead: the second is that of S. Paul, Act. 13. the third that which is in the first of Kings. Iephta here challengeth the possession of Gilead for 300. yeeres: Saint Paul giueth to the Iudges, as it seemes, from the end of Iosua, to the last of Heli, 450. yeeres. In the first of Kings it is taught, that from the departing of Israel out of Ægypt, to the foundation of Salomons Temple, there were consumed 480. yeeres. To the first Beroaldus findeth Iephta's 300. yeeres to bee but 266. yeeres, to wit, 18. of Iosua, 40. of Othoniel, 80. of Aod and Samgar, 40. of Debora, 40. of Gideon, 3. of Abimelech, 23. of Thola, and 22. of Iair: But Iephta (saith Beroaldus) putteth or proposeth a certaine number, for an vncertaine: Sic vt dicat annum agi propè trecentesimum, ex quo nullus litem ea de re mouerit Israeli; So hee speaketh (saith he) as meaning, that then it was about or wel-nigh the three hundreth yeere, since Israel possessed those Countries, no man making question of their right. Codoman on the contrary findes more yeeres than Iephta named by 65. to wit, 365. whereof 71. were spent in Israels captiuity, at seuerall times, of which (as Codoman thinketh) Iephta forbare to repeate the whole summe or any great part, lest the Ammonite should haue iustly obiected, that 71. of those yeeres, the Israelites were in captiuitie and vassals to their neighbour Princes, and therefore knowing that to name 300. yeeres it was enough for prescription, hee omitted the rest.

Act. 13. 20.
1. King. 6. 1.
Id facit numero certo pro incerto, proposito.

To iustifie this account of 365. yeeres, besides the 71. yeeres of captiuity or affliction, to be added to Beroaldus his 266. he addeth also 28. yeeres more, and so maketh vp the summe of 365. These 28. yeeres hee findeth out thus: 20. yeeres hee giues to the Seniors betweene Iosua and Othoniel: and where Beroaldus alloweth but 18. yeeres to Iosua his gouernment, Codoman accounts that his rule lasted 26. according to Iosephus; whereas S. Augustine and Eusebius giue him 27. Melanchton 32. The trueth is, that this addition of 28. yeeres is farre more doubtfull than the other of 71. But though wee admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of some part of the yeeres of affliction (to wit, 34. yeeres of the 71.) if wee adde them to the 266. yeeres of Beroaldus, which reckoneth none of these, we haue the iust number of 300. yeeres. Neither is it strange that Iephta should leaue out more than halfe of these yeeres of affliction: seeing as it is already said, the Ammonites might except against these 71. yeeres, and say, that during these yeeres, or at least a good part of them, the Israelites had no quiet possession of the Countries in question. Martin Luther is the Authour of a third opinion, making those 300. yeeres remembred by Iephta, to be 306. which odde yeeres, saith hee, Iephta omitteth. But because the yeeres of euery Iudge as they reigned, cannot make vp this number of 306. but doe onely compound 266. therefore doth Luther adde to this number, the whole time which Moses spent in the Deserts of Arabia Petræa; which fortie yeeres of Moses added to the number which Beroaldus findeth of 266. make indeede 306.

But I see nothing in the Text to warrant Luthers iudgement herein: for in the dispute betweene Iephta and Ammon for the Land of Gilead, it is written in the person of Ammon in these words: Because Israel tooke my Land, when they came vp from Ægypt from Arnon vnto Iaboc, &c. now therefore restore those Lands quietly or in peace. So by this place it is plaine that the time is not to bee accounted from Moses departure out of Ægypt: but from the time that the Land was possest. For it is said, Quia cepit Israel terram meam; Because Israel tooke my Land: and therefore the beginning of this account is to bee referred to the time of the taking: which Iephtas answere also confirmeth in these words: When Israel dwelt in Heshbon, and in her Townes, and in Aroer and in her Townes, and in all the Cities that are by the coast of Arnon 300. yeeres: why did yee not then recouer them in that space? so as this place speakes it directly, that Israel had inhabited and dwelt in the Cities of Gilead 300. yeeres: and therefore to account the times from the hopes or intents, that Israel had to possesse it, it seemeth somewhat strained to me; for we doe not vse to reckon the time of our conquests in France, from our Princes intents or purposes, but from their victories and possessions.

Iunius neuertheless likes the opinion of Luther, and sayes, that this time of 300. yeeres hath reference, and is to take beginning from the first of Iephtas narration: when he makes a briefe repetition of Moses whole iourney: to wit, at the sixteenth Verse of the eleuenth Chapter of Iudges, in our translation in these words: But when Israel came vp from Ægypt, &c. and therefore Moses his forty yeeres (as he thinkes) are to be accounted, which make the number of 305. yeeres: and not only the time in which Israel possest Gilead, according to the Text and Iephtas owne words: of which I leaue the iudgement to others; to whom also I leaue to iudge, whether we may not beginne the 480. yeeres, from the deliuerance out of Ægypt to the Temple, euen from the first departure out of Ægypt, and yet finde a more probable reconciliation of S. Pauls and Iephtas account with this reckoning: than any of those that as yet haue been signified. For first, touching Iephtas 300. yeeres of possession of the East side of Iordan, it is to be remembred, that for a good while before the Israelites possessed it, Sehon and Og had dispossessed Moab and Ammon thereof: so that when the Israelites had conquered Sehon and Og, the right of possession which they had, passed to Israel; and so Iephta might say that they had possessed those Countries 300. yeeres, reckoning 266. yeeres of their owne possession, and the rest of the possession of the two Kings Sehon and Og, whose right the Israelites had by the law of conquest.

Iunius in the 11 of Iud. not.

The second place disputed is this of S. Paul, Act. 13. that from the end of Iosua to the beginning of Samuel, there past 450. yeeres. And this place Luther vnderstandeth also besides the letter (as I finde his opinion cited by Functius Krentzhemius, and Beza) for I haue not read his Commentaries. For he accounteth from the death of Moses, to the last yeere of Heli, but 357. yeeres: and this hee doth the better to approue the times from the egression out of Ægypt to the building of the Temple, which in the first King. 6. is said to be 480. yeeres.

Reade the 24. of Iosua, and the 2. Iud. 7. Funct. Chron. fol. 4. Beza in his Annotations vpon the 13. of the Act. v. 20

Now forasmuch as S. Paul (as it seemes) findes 450. yeeres from the death of Iosua, to the last of Heli, and leaues but 30. yeeres for Saul and Samuel, who gouerned 40. for Dauid who ruled 40. and for Salomon who ware the Crowne three whole yeeres ere the foundation of the Temple was laid; therefore Luther takes it, that there was errour in the Scribe, who wrote out this piece of Scripture of S. Paul: to wit, Then afterward hee gaue vnto them Iudges about 450. yeeres, vnto the time of SAMVEL the Prophet: the words than afterward, being cleerely referred to the death or after the death of Iosua, as shall be hereafter proued. But where S. Luke rehearsing the words of S. Paul, wrote 350. yeeres (saith Luther) the Scribe in the transcription being deceiued by the affinitie of those two Greeke wordes, whereof the one signifieth 300. and the other 400. wrote Tetracosiois, for Triacosiois; 400. yeeres, for 300. yeeres; and 450. for 350. This he seeketh to strengthen by many arguments: to which opinion Beza in his great annotations adhereth. A contrary iudgement to this hath Codoman; where Luther and Beza beginne at Moses death, he takes his account from the death of Iosua, and from thence to the beginning of Samuel he makes 430. yeeres: to wit, of the Iudges (not reckoning Sampsons yeeres) 319. and of yeeres of seruitude and affliction vnder strangers 111. The reason why he doth not reckon

Act. 13. 20.

Sampsons

Sampsons 20. yeeres, is because hee thinkes that they were part of the 40. yeeres, in Iud. 13. which the Philistims are said to haue oppressed Israel. For it is plaine that during all
Iud. 15. 11. Samsons time they were Lords ouer Israel. So then of the Iudges, besides thee 111. yeeres of seruitude, Codoman reckoneth (as I haue said) 319. yeeres, which two summes put together make 430. yeeres, and whereas S. Paul nameth 450. yeeres, he finds 20. yeeres to make vp S. Pauls number, to haue been spent after the death of Iosua by the Seniors, before the captiuitie of Cushan, or the election of Othoniel: which 20. yeeres added to 430. make 550. according to S. Paul. To approoue this time of the Elders, hee citeth two places of Scriptures, namely the 24. of Iosua, and the second of Iudges, in each of which places it is written, that Israel serued the Lord all the dayes of IOSVA, and all the dayes of the Elders that ouer-liued IOSVA: so as to these times of the Elders, Codoman giueth 20. yeeres, which make as before 450. according to S. Paul. Neither would it breede any great difficulty in this opinion, if here also the 20. yeeres of the Seniors, betweene Iosua and Othoniel, should be denied. For they which denie these yeeres, and make Othoniels 40. to beginne presently vpon the death of Iosua, as in the beginning of this reckoning they haue 20. yeeres lesse than Codoman, so toward the end of it (when they reckon the yeeres of affliction a-part from the yeeres of the Iudges) in the number of Sampsons yeeres, and of the 40. yeeres of the Philistims oppressing the Israelites, they haue 20. yeeres more than Codoman. For they reckon these 40. yeeres of oppression all of them a-part from Sampsons 20. but Codoman, as is said, makes Sampsons 20. to be the one halfe of the 40. of the Philistims oppressions; so that if the 20. yeeres of the Seniors, be not allowed to Codoman, then he may reckon (as the letter of the Text seemes to inforce) that the Philistims in an Inter-regnum, before Sampson iudged Israel, vexed the Israelites 40. yeeres, besides the 20. while Sampson was their Iudge, and so the reckoning will come to 450. yeeres betweene the end of Iosua, and the beginning of Samuel, though wee admit not of any Inter-regnum of the Seniors, betweene Iosua and Othoniel: For if the times of their affliction be summed, they make 111. yeeres, to which if wee adde the yeeres of the Iudges, which are 339. we haue the iust summe of 450. And this computation either one way or other, may seeme to bee much more probable, than theirs that correct the Text, although we should admit of their correction thereof, and reade with them 350. for 450. For whereas they conceiue that this time of 350. yeeres, is to beginne immediatly, or soone after the death of Moses: certainely the place of S. Paul doth euidently teach the contrarie, though it bee receiued for true that there was vitium scriptoris in the rest. For these be S. Pauls words: And about the time of 40. yeeres, God suffered their manners in the wildernesse: And he destroyed seuen Nations in the Land of Canaan, and diuided their Land to them by lot. Then afterward hee gaue vnto them Iudges about 450. yeeres, vnto the time of SAMVEL the Prophet. So as first in the eighteenth verse he speaketh of Moses and of his yeeres spent in the wildernesse, then in the nineteenth verse hee commeth to the acts of Iosua; which Ios. 14. 1. were that he destroyed seuen Nations in the Land of Canaan, and diuided their Land to them by lot. In the twentieth verse it followeth: Then afterward hee gaue them Iudges about 450. yeeres, &c. and therefore to reckon from the death of Moses, is wide of S. Pauls meaning, so farre as my weake vnderstanding can pierce it. The only inconuenience of any waight in opinion of Codoman touching this place, in the Acts is that it seems irreconciliable with the account, 1. Reg. 6. 11. For if indeede there were spent 450. yeeres betweene the end of Iosua and the beginning of Samuel, certainly there must needes be much more than 480. yeeres betweene the beginning of the Israelites iourneying from Ægypt, and the foundation of the Temple by Salomon. To this difficultie Codoman answereth, that these 480. yeeres, 1. Reg. 6. 1. must beginne to bee reckoned, not in the beginning, but in the ending of their iourneying from Ægypt, which hee makes to be 25. yeeres after the beginning of Othoniels gouernment; from whence if wee cast the yeeres of the Iudges, with the yeeres of seruitude (which summes according to his account, of which we haue already spoken, make 397. yeeres) and so to these yeeres adde the 40. of Samuel, and Saul, and the 40. of Dauid, and the 3. of Salomon, wee shall haue the iust summe of 480. yeeres. Neither is it hard (saith he) that the annus egressionis, 1. Reg. 6. 1. should be vnderstood egressionis non incipientis sed finita, the yeere of their comming out of Ægypt (for so it is in the originall) or the yeere after they came out of Ægypt, may well be vnderstood for the yeere after they were come out thence, that is, after they had ended their wandring from thence. For so wee finde that things which were done 40. yeeres after they had set foote out of Ægypt, are said to haue been done in their going out of Ægypt, as Psal. 114. When Israel came out of Ægypt, Iordan was driuen backe, and Deut. 4. 45. These are the testimonies which MOSES spake when they came out of Ægypt. And thus farre it seemes we may very well agree with Codoman, for the interpretation of the word ab exitu, to be as much as quùm exiuissent, or ab exitu finito: for if Iunius Deut. 4. 45. doe well reade quum exiuissent, for in exitu, as it seemes that herein he doth well, why may not we also, to auoide contradiction in the Scripture, expound ab exitu to be, postquàm exiuissent?

The next point to be cleered, is how their iourneying should be said not to haue had end vntill the 25. yeere after the victory of Othoniel. To this Codoman answereth, that then it had no end till when all the Tribes had obtained their portions, which happened not vntill this time: at which time the Danites at length seated themselues, as it is declared Iud. 18. For doubtlesse to this time the expedition may most conueniently be referred. And thus without any great inconuenience to him appearing doth Codoman reconcile the account of Iephta, and S. Paul, with that in the first of Kings, c. 6. Now whereas it is said that the expedition of the Danites was when there was no King in Israel: to this Codoman answereth, that it is not necessary that we should suppose that Othoniel liued all those 40. yeeres of rest, of which Iud. 3. 11. so that by the 25. yeere after his victory, either he might haue been dead, or at least, as Gideon did, he might haue refused all soueraigntie, and so either way it might truly be said that at this time (to wit, the 25. yeere after Othoniels victorie) there was no King in Israel. This opinion of Codoman, if it were as consonant to other Chronologers grounding their opinions on the plaine Text, where it is indisputable, as it is in it selfe round enough and coherent, might perhaps bee receiued as good: especially considering, that the speeches of S. Paul haue not otherwise found any interpretation, maintaining them as absolutely true, in such manner as they sound, and are set downe. But seeing that he wanteth all helpe of authority, we may iustly suspect the supposition whereupon his opinion is grounded; it being such as the consent of many Authors would hardly suffice to make very probable. For who hath told Codoman, that the conquest of Laish, by the Tribe of Dan, was performed in the fiue and twentieth yeere of Othoniel? Or what other probability hath he than his owne coniecture, to shew that Othoniel did so renounce the office of a Iudge after fiue and twenty yeeres, that it might then be truly sayd there was no King in Israel, but euery man did that which was good in his owne eyes?

Iud. 18. 1.

Now concerning the rehearsall of the Law by Moses, and the stopping of Iordan, they might indeed be properly sayd to haue been, when Israel came out of Ægypt; like as we say that King Edward the first was crowned when he came out of the holy Land, for so all iournies with their accidents commonly take name from the place either whence or whither they tend. But I thinke hee can finde no such phrase of speech in Scripture as limiteth a iourney by an accident, or saith by conuerting the proposition, when Iordan was turning back, Israel came out of Ægypt. Indeed most vnproper it were to giue date vnto actions commenced long after, from an expedition finished long before, namely to say, that King Edward at his arriuall out of Palestina, did winne Scotland, or died at Carlile. How may wee then beleeue that enterprize performed so many yeeres after the diuision of the Land (which followed the conquest at the iourneys end) should be said to haue been at the time of the departure out of Ægypt? Or who will not thinke it most strange, that the most notable account of time, ſeruing as the onely guide for certaine ages in ſacred Chronologie, ſhould not take name and beginning, from that illuſtrious deliuerance out of Ægypt, rehearſed often by God himſelfe among the principall of his benefits to Iſrael, whereof the very day and moneth are recorded in Scripture (as likewiſe are the yeere and moneth wherein it expired) and the forme of the yeere vpon that occaſion changed; but ſhould haue reference to the ſurprizing of a Towne by 600. men, that robbed a Chappell by the way, and ſtole from thence Idols to be their guides, as not going to worke in Gods name? For this accident whereupon Codoman buildeth, hath either no time giuen to it, or a time farre different from that which he ſuppoſeth, and is indeede rather by him placed in ſuch a yeere, becauſe it beſt ſtood with his interpretation ſo to haue it, than for any certainty or likelihood of the thing it ſelfe.

Wherefore we may beſt agree with ſuch as affirme that the Apoſtle Saint Paul did not herein labour to ſet downe the courſe of time exactly (a thing no way concerning his purpoſe) but only to ſhew that God, who had choſen Iſrael to be his people, deliuered them out of bondage, and ruled them by Iudges, and Prophets, vnto the time of Saul, did raiſe vp our Lord Ieſus Chriſt out of the ſeede of Dauid the King, in whoſe ſucceſſion the Crowne was eſtabliſhed, and promiſe made of a Kingdome that ſhould haue no end. Now in rehearſing briefly thus much which tended as a Preface to the declaration following (wherein he ſheweth Chriſt to haue been the true Meſſias) the Apoſtle was ſo farre from labouring to make an exact calculation of times (the Hiſtorie being ſo well knowne and beleeued of the Iewes to whom hee preached) that he ſpake as it were at large of the 40. yeeres conſumed in the wilderneſſe, whereof no man doubted, ſaying that God ſuffered their manners in the wilderneſſe about 40. yeeres. In like maner he proceeded, ſaying, that from the diuiſion of the Land vnto the dayes of Samuel the Prophet, in whoſe time they required to haue a King, there paſſed about 450. yeeres. Neither did he ſtand to tell them, that an hundred and eleuen yeeres of bondage mentioned in this middle while, were by exact computation to be included within the 339. yeeres of the Iudges: for this had beene an impertinent digreſſion from the argument which hee had in hand. Wherefore it is a worke not ſo needfull as laborious, to ſearch out of this place that which the Apoſtle did not here intend to teach, when the ſumme of 480. yeeres is ſo expreſly and purpoſely ſet downe.

Now that the words of S. Paul (if there be no fault in the Copie through errour of ſome Scribe) are not ſo curiouſly to bee examined in matter of Chronologie, but muſt be taken, as hauing reference to the memorie and apprehenſion of the vulgar, it is euident by his aſcribing in the ſame place 40. yeeres to the reigne of Saul: whereas it is manifeſt that thoſe yeeres were diuided betweene Saul and Samuel, yea, that farre the greater part of them were ſpent vnder the gouernment of the Prophet, how ſoeuer they are here included in the reigne of the King. As for thoſe that with ſo much cunning forſake the generall opinion, when it fauoureth not ſuch expoſition as they bring out of a good minde, to helpe where the neede is not ouer-great; I had rather commend their diligence, than follow their example. The words of S. Paul were ſufficiently iuſtified by Beroaldus, as hauing reference to a common opinion among the Scribes in thoſe dayes, that the 111. yeeres of ſeruitude were to be reckoned apart from the 339 yeeres aſcribed to the Iudges; which account the Apoſtle would not in this place ſtand to contradict, but rather choſe to ſpeake as the vulgar, qualifying it with a quaſi, where he ſaith, quaſi quadringentis & quinquaginta annis; As it were foure hundred and fifty yeeres. But Codoman being not thus contented, would needes haue it to be ſo indeede, and therefore diſioynes the members to make the account euen. In ſo doing he daſheth himſelfe againſt a notable Text, whereupon all Authours haue builded (as well they might and ought) that purpoſely and preciſely doth caſt vp the yeeres from the departure out of Ægypt, vnto the building of Solomons Temple, not omitting the very Moneth it ſelfe.

Act. 13.

1. King. 6.

Now (as commonly the firſt apprehenſions are ſtrongeſt) hauing already giuen faith ſaith to his owne interpretation of S. Paul, he thinketh it more needfull to find ſome new expoſition for that which is of it ſelfe moſt plaine, than to examine his owne coniecture vpon a place that is full of controuerſie. Thus by expounding, after a ſtrange methode, that which is manifeſt by that which is obſcure, he loſeth himſelfe in thoſe waies wherein before him neuer man walked. Surely if one ſhould vrge him to giue reaſon of theſe new opinions, he muſt needs anſwere, That Othoniel could not gouerne aboue 25. yeeres, becauſe then was the taking of Laiſh, at which time there was no King in Iſrael; That the Danites muſt needs haue taken Laiſh at that time, becauſe elſe wee could not reckon backwards from the foundation of the Temple to any action that might be termed the comming of Iſrael out of Ægypt, without excluding the yeeres of ſeruitude; And that the yeeres of ſeruitude muſt needs be included, for that otherwiſe he himſelfe ſhould haue ſpent his time vainely, in ſeeking to pleaſure S. Paul with an expoſition. Whether this ground be ſtrong enough to vphold a Paradoxe, I leaue it to the deciſion of any iudicious Reader.

And now to proceede in our ſtorie. To the time of Iephta are referred the death of Hercules, the rape of Helen by Paris, and the prouiſions which her husband Menelaus, raigning then in Sparta, and his brother Agamemnon King of Mycena, made for her recouerie. Others referre this rape of Helen to the fourth yeere of Ibzan: from which time, if the Warre of Troy (as they ſuppoſe) did not begin till the third of Ailon or Elon, yet the Greekes had ſixe yeeres to prepare themſelues: the rule holding not true in this Warre, longa præparatio belli celerem affert victoriam; That a long preparation begets a ſpeedie victorie: for the Greekes conſumed ten yeeres in the attempt: and Troy as it ſeemes was entred, ſackt and burnt in the third yeere of Habdon.

Three yeeres after Troy taken, which was in the ſixt yeere of Habdon, Æneas arriued in Italie. Habdon in the eighth yeere of his rule died, after he had beene the Father of 40. ſonnes and 30. grand-children. And whereas it is ſuppoſed, that the 40. yeeres of Iſraels oppreſſion by the Philiſtims (of which *Iud.*13.*v.*1.) tooke beginning from the ninth yeere of Iair, and ended with the laſt of Habdon: I ſee no great reaſon for that opinion. For Ephraim had had little cauſe of quarrell againſt Iephta, for not calling them to Warre ouer Iordan, if the Philiſtims had held them in ſeruitude in their owne Territories: and if Ephraim could haue brought 42000. armed men into the field, it is not likely that they were then oppreſt: and had it beene true that they were, who will doubt but that they would rather haue fought againſt the Philiſtims with ſo powerfull an Armie for their owne deliuerance, than againſt their owne brethren the Iſraelites? But Ammon being ouerthrowne, it ſeemed at that time, that they feared no other enemie. And therefore theſe 40. yeeres muſt either be ſupplied elſewhere, as in the time of Sampſon and afterward: or elſe they muſt be referred to the inter-regnum betweene the death of Habdon, and the deliuerance of Iſrael by Sampſon, ſuch as it was. *Iud.*12.14.

CHAP. XIIII.

Of the Warre of Troy.

§. I.

Of the Genealogie of the Kings of Troy, with a note touching the ancient Poets how they haue obserued Historicall truth.

THE Warre at Troy with other Stories hereupon depending (becauſe the ruine of this Citie, by moſt Chronologers is found in the time of Habdon, Iudge of Iſrael, whom in the laſt place I haue mentioned) I rather chooſe here to intreate of in one intire narration, beginning with the lineall deſcent of their Princes, than to breake the Storie into pieces by rehearſing a-part in diuers yeeres the diuerſitie of occurrents.

The Hiſtorie of the ancient Kings of Troy is vncertaine, in regard both of their originall, and of their continuance. It is commonly held that Teucer and Dardanus were the two founders of that Kingdome. This is the opinion of Virgil: which if he (as Reineccius thinkes) tooke from Beroſus, it is the more probable: if Annius borrowed it from him, then it reſts vpon the authoritie of Virgil, who ſaith thus:

Thence (if I follow not miſtaken fame)
TEVCER the eldeſt of our grand-ſires came To the Rhœtean ſhores: and raigned there
Ere yet faire Ilion was built, and ere
The Towers of Troy: their dwelling place they ſought
In loweſt vales. Hence CYBELS rites were brought:
Hence Corybantian Cymbales did remoue:
And hence the name of our Idæan groue.

Thus

Thus it seemeth by Virgil, who followed surely good authoritie, that Teucer first gaue name to that Countrie, wherein he reigned ere Troy was built by Dardanus: of which Dardanus in the same booke he speakes thus:

Est locus Hesperiam Graij cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens armis atque vbere glebæ.
OEnotrij coluere viri; nunc fama minores
Italiam dixisse, ducis de nomine gentem.
Hæ nobis propriæ sedes: hinc DARDANVS ortus:
Iasiusq; Pater, genus à quo Principe nostrum.

Hesperia the Grecians call the place:
An ancient fruitfull Land, a warlike race.
OEnotrians held it, now the later progenie
Giues it their Captaines name, and calls it Italie;
This seate belongs to vs, hence DARDANVS,
Hence came the Author of our stocke, Iasius.

Also Aeneid. l. 7.

Atq; equidem memini (fama est obscurior annis)
Aurunces ita ferre senes, hic ortus vt agris
DARDANVS Idæas Phrygiæ penetrauit ad vrbes,
Threiciamq; Samum, quæ nunc Samothracia fertur.
Hinc illum Coryti Tyrrhena ab sede profectum,
Aurea nunc solio stellantis regia cœli
Accipit, &c.

Some old Auruncans, I remember well,
(Though time haue made the fame obscure) would tell
Of DARDANVS, how borne in Italie:
From hence he into Phrygia did flie.
And leauing Tuscaine (where he earst had place)
With Corytus did saile to Samothrace;
But now inthronized he sits on high,
In golden Palace of the starrie skie.

But contrarie to this, and to so many Authors, approuing and confirming it, Reineccius thinkes that these names, Troes, Teucri, and Thraces, are deriued from Tiras or Thiras the sonne of Iaphet: and that the Dardanians, Mysians, and Ascanians, mixt with the Troians, were Germane Nations, descended from Ashkenaz, the sonne of Gomer: of whom the Countrie, Lake, and Riuer of Ascanius in Asia tooke name. That Ashkenaz gaue name to those places and people, it is not vnlikely: neither is it vnlikely, that the Ascanij, Dardani, and many others, did in after-times passe into Europe: that the name of Teucer came of Tiras, the coniecture is somewhat hard. Concerning Teucer, whereas Halicarnassæus makes him an Athenian, I finde none that follow him in the same opinion. Virgil (as is before shewed) reporteth him to bee of Crete, whose authoritie is the more to be regarded, because he had good meanes to finde the truth, which it is probable that he carefully sought, and in this did follow: seeing it no way concerned Augustus (whom other-whiles hee did flatter) whether Teucer were of Crete or no. Reineccius doth rather embrace the opinion of Diodorus, and others, that thinke him a Phrygian, by which report he was the Sonne of Scamander and Ida, Lord of the Countrie, not founder of the Citie; and his Daughter or Neece Batia was the second wife of Dardanus, founder of Troy. Reineccius further thinkes that Atlas raigned in Samothracia, and gaue his Daughter Electra to Corytus, or Coritus: and that these were Parents to Chryse, first wife to Dardanus. Virgil holds otherwise, and the common Tradition of Poets makes Dardanus the sonne of Electra by Iupiter, which Electra was the Daughter of Atlas, and wife to Coritus King of Hetruria, to whom shee bare Iasius. Annius out of his Berosus finds the name of Camboblascon, to whom he giues the addition of Coritus, as a Title of dignitie, making him Father of Dardanus and Iasius; and further telling vs very particularly of the faction betweene these Brethren, which grew to such heate, that finally Dardanus killed his Brother, and thereupon fled into Samothrace. The obscuritie of the historie giues leaue to Annius of saying what he list. I that loue not to vse such liber- 10 tie, will forbeare to determine any thing herein. But if Dardanus were the Sonne of Iupiter, it must haue beene of some elder Iupiter than the Father of those that liued about the Warre of Troy. So it is likewise probable that Atlas the Father of Electra was rather an Italian than an African, which also is the opinion of Boccace. For (as hath often beene said) there were many Iupiters, and many of almost euery name of the Gods; but it was the custome to ascribe to some one the acts of the rest, with all belonging to them. Therefore I will not greatly trouble my selfe with making any narrow search into these fabulous antiquities, but set downe the Pedigree according to the generall fame; allowing to Teucer such Parents as Diodorus giues, because others giue him none, and carrying the line of Dardanus in manner following.

Concerning the beginning and continuance of the Troian Kingdome, with the length of euery Kings raigne, I haue chosen good Authors to be my guides, that in a Historie, whereon depends the most ancient computation of times among the Greekes, I might not follow incertainties, ill cohering with the consent of Writers, and generall passage of things elsewhere done. And first for the destruction of Troy, which was of greater note than any accident befalling that Citie whilest it stood, it is reckoned by Diodorus to be 780. yeeres more ancient than the beginning of the 94th. Olympiad. Whereas therefore 372. did passe betweene the beginning of the Olympiads, and the first yeere of the 94th. it is manifest that the remainder of 780. yeeres, that is, 408. yeeres went betweene the destruction of Troy, and the first institution of those games by Iphitus, if the authoritie of Diodorus bee good proofe, who elsewhere tells vs, that the returne of the Heraclidæ, which was 80. yeeres after the fall of Troy, was 328. yeeres before the first Olympiad.

Heereunto agrees the authoritie of Dionysius Halicarnasseus, who placing the foundation of Rome in the first of the seuenth Olympiad, that is, foure and twentie yeeres after the beginning of those games, accounts it 432. later then the fall of Troy. Solinus in expresse wordes, makes the institution of the Olympiads by Iphitus, whom he calleth Iphiclus, 480. yeeres later then the destruction of Troy. The summe is easily collected by necessarie inference out of diuers other places in the same booke. Hereunto doth Eusebius reckoning exclusiuely agree: and Eratosthenes, (as hee is cited by Clemens Alexandrinus) makes vp out of many particulars, the same totall summe, wanting but one yeere, as reckoning likewise exclusiuely.

The other collections of diuers Writers that are cited by Clemens in the same place, doe neither cohere any way, nor depend vpon any collaterall Historie, by which they may be verified.

The destruction of Troy being in the yeere before the Olympiads foure hundred and eight: wee must seeke the continuance of that from the beginning to the end, out of Eusebius, who leades vs from Dardanus on-wards through the raignes of foure Kings, by the space of two hundred and fiue and twentie yeeres, and after of Priamus, with whom also at length it ended. As for the time which passed vnder Laomedon, wee are faine to doe, as others haue done before vs, and take it vpon trust from Annius his Authours; beleeuing Manetho so much the rather, for that in his accompt of the former Kings raignes, and of Priamus, hee is found to agree with Eusebius, which may giue vs leaue to thinke that Annius hath not heerein corrupted him. But in this point we need not to be very scrupulous: for seeing that no Historie or accompt of time depends vpon the raigne of the former Kings, but onely vpon the ruine of the Citie vnder Priamus, it may suffice that wee are carefull to place that memorable accident in the due yeere.

True it is, that some obiections appearing waightie, may bee alleaged in maintenance of different computations, which with the answeres I purposely omit, as not willing to dispute of those yeeres, wherein the Greekes knew no good forme of a yeere; but rather to make narration of the actions which were memorable, and acknowledged by all Writers, whereof this destruction of Troy was one of the most renowned.

The first enterprise that was vnder-taken by generall consent of all Greece, was the last warre of Troy, which hath beene famous euen to this day, for the numbers of Princes, and valiant Commanders there assembled: the great battailes fought with variable successe: the long indurance of the siege; the destruction of that great Citie; and the many Colonies planted in sundry Countries, as well by the remainder of the Troians, as by the victorious Greekes after their vnfortunate returne. All which things with innumerable circumstances of especiall note, haue beene deliuered vnto posteritie, by the excellent wits of many writers, especially by the Poems of that great Homer, whose verses haue giuen immortalitie to the action, which might else perhaps haue beene buried in obliuion, among other worthy deedes, done both before and since that time. For it is true which Horace saith;

Vixère fortes ante AGAMEMNONA
Multi, sed omnes illachrimabiles
Vrgentur, ignotiq; longa
Nocte: carent quia vate sacro.

Many by valour haue deseru'd renowne
Ere AGAMEMNON: yet lye all oppreſt
Vnder long night, vnwept for, and vnknowne:
For with no sacred Poet were they bleſt.

Yet so it is, that whilest these writers haue with strange fables, or (to speake the best of them) with Allegories farre strained, gone about to inlarge the commendations of those noble vndertakers: they haue both drawne into suspition that great vertue which they sought to adorne, and filled after-ages with almost as much ignorance of the Historie, as admiration of the persons. Wherefore it is expedient that wee seeke for the knowledge of such actions, in Histories; learning their qualities who did menage them, of Poets, in whose workes are both profit & delight: yet small profit to those which are delighted ouermuch; but such as can either interpret their fables, or separate them from the naked trueth, shall finde matter in Poems, not vnworthy to bee regarded of Historians. For those things excepted which are gathered out of Homer, there is very little, and not without much disagreement of Authours, written of this great warre. All writers consent with Homer; that the rape of Helen by Paris the sonne of Priamus, was the cause of taking armes: but how he was heereunto emboldened it is doubtfull.

§. II.

Of the Rape of HELEN: and strength of both sides for the warre.

Herodotus fetcheth the cause of this rape from very farre; saying, That whereas the Phœnicians had rauished Io, and carried her into Ægypt, the Greekes to be reuenged on the Barbarians, did first rauish Europa, whom they brought out of Phœnicia into Creta, and afterward Medea, whom they fetcht from Colchos, denying to restore her to her father, till such time as they might be satisfied for the rape of Io. By these deedes of the Greekes, Paris (as the same Herodotus affirmes) was imboldened to doe the like; not fearing such reuenge as ensued. But all this narration seemes friuolous. For what had the King of Colchos to doe with the iniurie of the Phœnicians? Or how could the Greekes, as in reuenge of Io, pleade any quarrell against him, that neuer had heard the name of Phœnicians? Thucydides a writer of vnquestionable sinceritie, maketh it plaine, that the name of Barbarians was not vsed at all in Homers time, which was long after the warre of Troy; and that the Greekes themselues were not then called all by one name, Hellenes, as afterwards. So that it were vnreasonable to think, that they should haue sought reuenge vpon all Nations, as barbarous, for the iniurie receiued by one: or that all people else should haue esteemed of the Greekes, as of a people opposed to all the world; and that euen then when as the Greekes had not yet one common name among themselues. Others with more probabilitie say, that the rape of Helen was to procure the redeliuery of Hesione, King Priamus his sister, taken formerly by Hercules, and giuen to Telamon. This may haue beene true.

for Telamon (as it seemes) was a cruell man, seeing his owne sonne Teucer durst not come in his sight, after the warre of Troy, but fled into Cypres, onely because his brother Aiax (which Teucer could not remedie) had slaine himselfe. Yet, were it so, that Hesione was ill intreated by Telamon, it was not therefore likely, that Priamus her brother would seeke to take her from her husband, with whom she had liued about thirtie yeeres, and to whom she had borne children which were to succeede in his Dominion. Whereupon I thinke that Paris had no regard, either to the rape of Europa, Medæa, or Hesione: but was meerely incited by Venus, that is, by his lust, to doe that which in those dayes was very common. For not onely Greekes from Barbarians, and Barbarians from Greekes, as Herodotus discourseth, but all people were accustomed to steale women and cattell, if they could by strong hand or power get them; and hauing stollen them, either to sell them away in some farre Countrie, or keepe them to their owne vse. So did Theseus, and Pirythous attempt Proserpina; and so did Theseus (long before Paris) rauish Helen. And these practices, as it appeares in Thucydides, were so common, that none durst inhabite neere vnto the Sea, for feare of pyracie, which was accounted a trade of life no lesse lawfull then merchandise: wherefore Tyndareus the father of Helen, considering the beautie of his daughter, and the rape which Theseus had made, caused all her wooers, who were most of the principall men in Greece, to binde themselues by solemne oath, that if shee were taken from her husband, they should with all their might helpe to recouer her. This done, hee gaue free choyce of a husband to his daughter, who chose Menelaus, brother to Agamemnon. So the cause which drew the Greekes vnto Troy in reuenge of Helens rape, was partly the oath which so many Princes had made vnto her father Tyndareus. Hereunto the great power of Agamemnon was not a little helping; for Agamemnon, besides his great Dominions in Peloponnesus, was Lord of many Ilands: hee was also rich in money, and therefore the Arcadians were well contented to follow his pay, whom hee imbarked for Troy in his owne ships, which were more then any other of the Greeke Princes brought to that expedition.

Thus did all Greece, either as bound by oath, or ledde by the reputation and power of the two brethren, Agamemnon and Menelaus; or desirous to partake of the profit and honour in that great enterprise; take armes against the Troians. The Greekes Fleet was (by Homers account) 1200. sayle, or thereabouts: but the vessels were not great: for it was not then the manner to build shippes with deckes; onely they vsed (as Thucydides saith) small shippes, meete for robbing on the Sea; the least of which carried fiftie men, the greatest 120. euery man (except the Captaines) being both a Marriner and a Souldier. By this proportion it appeares that the Grecian armie consisted of 100000. men, or thereabout. This was the greatest armie that euer was raised out of Greece: and the greatnesse of this armie doth well declare the strength and power of Troy, which tenne whole yeeres did stand out against such forces: yet were the Troians which inhabited the Citie, not the tenth part of this number, as Agamemnon said in the second of Homers Iliades; but their followers and aydes were very many and strong. For all Phrygia, Lycia, Mœsia, and the greatest part of Asia the lesse, tooke part with the Troians. The Amazones also brought them succour. And Rhesus out of Thrace, and Memnon out of Assyria (though some thinke out of Æthiopia) came to their defence.

§. III.

§. III.

Of the Gracians iourney, and Embassage to Troy, and of Helenaes being detained in Ægypt; and of the Sacrificing of Iphigenia.

WHerefore the Greekes vnwilling to come to tryall of armes, if things might bee compounded by treatie, sent Menelaus and Vlisses Embassadours to Troy; who demaunded Helen and the goods were taken with her out of Menelaus his house. What answere the Troians made hereunto it is vncertaine. Herodotus from the report of the Ægyptian Priests makes it very probable, that Helen was taken from Paris before his returne to Troy. The summe of his discourse is this.

Paris in his returne with Helena, being driuen by foule weather vnto the coast of Egypt, was accused for the rape of Helen by some bondmen of his, that had taken Sanctuarie. Proteus then King of Egypt, finding the accusation true by examination, detained Helen, and the goods taken with her, till her husband should require them: dismissing Paris without further punishment, because hee was a stranger. When therefore the Greekes demaunding Helen had answere, that she was in Egypt, they thought themselues deluded, and thereupon made the warre, which ended with the ruine of Troy. But when after the Citie taken, they perceiued indeed she had not beene there, they returned home, sending Menelaus to aske his wife of Proteus. Homer and the whole Nation of Poets (except Eurypides) vary from this Historie, thinking it a matter more magnificent and more gracefull to their Poems, for the retaining of a faire Ladie, than that they endured all by force, because it lay not in their power to redeliuer her. Yet in the fourth of his Odysses, Homer speakes of Menelaus his being in Egypt, before he returned home to Sparta; which voyage it were not easily beleeued, that he made for pleasure: and if he were driuen thither by contrary windes, much more may we thinke that Paris was likely to haue beene driuen thither by foule weather. For Paris immediatly vpon the rape committed, was enforced to fly, taking such windes as hee could get, and rather enduring any storme, than to commit himselfe to any Hauen in the Greeke seas; whereas Menelaus might haue put into any port in Greece, and there haue remained with good entertainment, vntill such time as the winde had come about, and serued for his Nauigation.

One great argument Herodotus brings to confirme the saying of the Ægyptian Priests, which is, that if Helen had beene at Troy, it had beene vtter madnesse for Priamus to see so many miseries befall him, during the warre, and so many of his sonnes slaine for the pleasure of one, who neither was heire to the Kingdome (for Hector was elder) nor equall in vertue to many of the rest. Besides, it may seeme that Lucian spake not more pleasantly than truely, when he said that Helen, at the warre of Troy, was almost as old as Queene Hecuba, considering that she had beene rauished by Theseus the companion of Hercules, who tooke Troy when Priamus was very young; and considering further, that she was sister to Castor and Pollux (she and Pollux being said by some to haue beene twinnes) who sailed with the Argonautes, hauing Telamon the father of Aiax in their companie before the time that Hesione was taken; on whom Telamon begat Aiax, that was a principall Commander in the Troian warre. But whether it were so, that the Troians could not, or would not restore Helen, so it was that the Embassadours returned ill contented, and not very well intreated; for there wanted not some that aduised to haue them slaine. The Greekes hereupon incensed, made all haste towards Troy: at which time Calchas (whom some say to haue beene a runnagate Troian, though no such thing be found in Homer) filled the Captaines and all the Hoste with many troublesome answeres and diuinations. For hee would haue Agamemnons daughter sacrificed to appease

Diana,

Diana, whoſe anger he ſaid withſtood their paſſage. Whether the young Lady were ſacrificed, or whether (as ſome write) the Goddeſſe was contented with a Hinde, it is not needfull heere to be diſputed of. Sure it is, that the malice of the deuill, which awaits for all oportunities, is neuer more importunate, than where mens ignorance is moſt. Calchas alſo told the Greekes, that the taking of Troy was impoſſible, till ſome fatall impediments were remooued: and that till tenne yeeres were paſt, the towne ſhould hold out againſt them. All which notwithſtanding the Greekes proceeded in their enterpriſe, vnder the command of Agamemnon, who was accompanied with his brother Menelaus; Achilles the moſt valiant of all the Greekes, his friend Patroclus, and his Tutor Phœnix; Aiax and Teucer, the ſonnes of Telamon; Idomeneus, and his companion Meriones; Neſtor, and his ſonnes Antilochus, and Thraſymedes; Vliſſes; Mneſtheus the ſonne of Petreus, Captaine of the Athenians: Diomedes the ſonne of Tydeus, a man of ſingular courage; the wiſe and learned Palamedes, Aſcalaphus, and Ialmenus, the ſonnes of Mars, who had ſailed with the Argonauts; Philoctetes alſo the ſonne of Pœan, who had the arrowes of Hercules, without which Calchas ſaid, that the Citie could not be taken; Aiax the ſonne of Oileus, Peneleus, Thoas, Eumelus, Tyſandrus, Euripilus, Athamas, Sthenelus, Tlepolemus the ſonne of Hercules; Podalyrius, and Machaon, the ſonnes of Æſculapius: Epeus, who is ſaide to haue made the wooden horſe, by which the towne was taken, and Proteſilaus, who firſt leapt on ſhore, neglecting the Oracle that threatned death to him that landed firſt.

§. IIII.

Of the Actes of the Gracians at the ſiege.

THeſe, and many other of leſſe note, arriuing at Troy, found ſuch ſharpe entertainment, as might eaſily perſwade them to think that the warre would bee more than one yeeres worke. For in the firſt encounter, they loſt Proteſilaus, whom Hector ſlew, and many other, without any great harme done to the Troians: ſaue onely that by their numbers of men, they wonne ground enough to incampe themſelues in, as appeareth in Thucydides. The principall impediment which the Greekes found, was want of victuals, which grew vpon them by reaſon of their multitude, and the ſmallneſſe of their veſſels, wherein they could not carry neceſſaries for ſuch an armie. Heereupon they were compelled to ſend ſome part of their men, to labour the ground in Cherſoneſſe: others to robbe vpon the Sea for the reliefe of the Campe. Thus was the warre protracted nine whole yeeres, and either nothing done, or if any skirmiſhes were, yet could the towne receiue little loſſe by them, hauing equall numbers to maintaine the field againſt ſuch Greekes as continued the ſiege, and a more ſafe retrait if the enemie got the better.

Wherefore Ouid ſaith, that from the firſt yeere, till the tenth, there was no fighting at all: and Heraclides commends as very credible, the report of Herodicus; That the Greekes did not lye before Troy the firſt nine yeeres: but onely did beate vp and downe the ſeas, exerciſing their men, and inriching themſelues, and ſo by waſting the enemies Country, did blocke vp the towne, vnto which they returned not, vntill the fatall time drew neere when it ſhould be ſubuerted.

This is confirmed by the enquirie which Priamus made, when the Greeke Princes came into the field, the tenth yeere, for he knew none of them; and therefore ſitting vpon an high tower (as Homer tels) he learned their names of Helen: which though it is like to be a fiction, yet could it not at all haue beene ſuppoſed that hee ſhould bee ignorant of them, if they had ſhewed themſelues before the towne ſo many yeeres together. Betweene theſe relations of Thucydides and Herodicus, the difference is not much, the one ſaying that a few of the Greekes remained in the Campe before Troy, whileſt the reſt made purueyance by land and ſea: the other, that the whole whole armie did ſpend the time in waſting the ſea-coaſtes. Neither doe the Poets greatly diſagree from theſe authours: for they make report of many townes and Ilands waſted, and the people carried into Captiuitie; in which actions Achilles was imployed, whom the armie could not well, nor would haue ſpared, if any ſeruice of importance had beene to be performed before the Citie. Howſoeuer it was, this is agreed by generall conſent, that in the beginning of that Summer, in which Troy was taken, great booties were brought into the Campe, and a great peſtilence aroſe among the Greekes: which Homer ſaith that Apollo ſent in reuenge of his Prieſts daughter, whom Agamemnon had refuſed to let goe, for any ranſome: but Heraclides interpreting the place, ſaith that by Apollo was meant the Sunne: who raiſed peſtilent fogges, by which the armie was infected, being lodged in a mooriſh piece of ground. And it might well bee that the campe was ouer-peſtered with thoſe, who had beene abroad, and now were lodged all cloſe together: hauing alſo grounded their ſhips within the fortifications.

About the ſame time aroſe much contention betweene Agamemnon and Achilles about the bootie, whereof Agamemnon, as Generall, hauing firſt choſen for his part a captiue woman, and Achilles in the ſecond place choſen for himſelfe another, then Aiax, Vlyſſes, and ſo the reſt of the Chieftaines in order: When the Soothſayer Calchas had willed that Agamemnons woman ſhould be reſtored to her father, Apollo's Prieſt, that ſo the Peſtilence might ceaſe, then did Agamemnon greatly rage and ſay, that hee alone would not loſe his part of the ſpoile, but would either take that which had beene giuen to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Aiax, or to Vlyſſes. Hereupon Achilles defied him, but was faine to ſuffer all patiently, as not able to hold his Concubine by ſtrong hand, nor to reuenge her loſſe, otherwiſe than by refuſing to fight, or to ſend forth his Companies. But the Greekes incouraged by their Captaines, preſented themſelues before the Citie without him and his troupes.

The Troians were now relieued with great ſuccours, all the neighbour Countries hauing ſent them ayd: partly drawne to that warre by their Commaunders, who aſſiſted Priamus for money, wherewith hee abounded when the warre began (as appeares by his words in Homer) or for loue of himſelfe and his ſonnes, or hope of marriage with ſome of his many and faire daughters; partly alſo (as we may well gueſſe) incited by the wrongs receiued of the Greekes, when they waſted the Countryes adioyning vnto Troy. So that when Hector iſſued out of the towne, hee was little inferiour to his enemies in numbers of men, or qualitie of their Leaders. The principall Captaines in the Troian armie, were Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus and the other ſonnes of Priamus: Æneas, Antenor, and his ſonnes, Polydamas, Sarpedon, Glaucus, Aſius, and the ſonnes of Panthus, beſides Rheſus, who was ſlaine the firſt night of his arriuall, Memnon, Queene Pentheſilea, and others who came towards the end of the warre. Betweene theſe and the Greekes were many battels fought: the greateſt of which were, that at the tombe of King Ilus vpon the plaine; and another at the very trenches of the Campe, wherein Hector brake through the fortifications of the Greekes, and began to fire their ſhips; at which time Aiax, the ſonne of Telamon with his brother Teucer, were in a manner the onely men of note that remaining vnwounded, made head againſt Hector, when the ſtate of the Greekes was almoſt deſperate.

Another battell (for ſo antiquitie calls it) or rather the ſame renewed, was fought by Patroclus, who hauing obtained leaue, drew forth Achilles troopes, relieuing the wearie Greekes with a freſh ſupply. Agamemnon, Diomedes, Vlyſſes, and the reſt of the Princes, though ſore wounded, yet were driuen to put on armour, and with help of Patroclus, repelled the Troians very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was loſt, and his body, with much contention recouered by his friends, was brought backe into the Campe: the armour of Achilles which he had put on, being torne from him by Hector. It was the manner of thoſe warres, hauing ſlaine a man, to ſtrip him and and hale away his bodie, not reſtoring it without ranſome, if he were one of marke. Of the vulgar little reckoning was made: for they fought all on foote, ſlightly armed, and commonly followed the ſucceſſe of their Captaines; who rode not vpon horſes, but in Chariots, drawne by two or three horſes, which were guided by ſome truſtie followers of theirs, which draue vp and downe the field, as they were directed by the Captaines, who by the ſwiftneſſe of their horſes preſenting themſelues where neede required, threw firſt their Iauelins, and then alighting fought on foote, with ſwords and battel-axes, retiring into the rankes of the footmen, or elſe returning to their Chariots when they found cauſe, and ſo began againe with a new dart as they could get it, if their old were loſt, or broken. Their armes defenſiue were helmets, breſt-plates, bootes of braſſe or other metall, and ſhields commonly of leather, plated ouer. The offenſiue were ſwords and battel-axes at hand; and ſtones, arrowes or darts when they fought at any diſtance. The vſe of their Chariots (beſides the ſwiftneſſe) was to keepe them from wearineſſe, whereto the leaders were much ſubiect, becauſe of their armour, which the ſtrongeſt and ſtouteſt ware heauieſt: alſo that from them they might throw their Iauelins downewards, with the more violence. Of which weapon I finde not that any carried more than one or two into the field: wherefore they were often driuen to returne to their Tents for a new one, when the old was gone. Likewiſe of armours they had little change or none; euery man (ſpeaking of the chiefe) carried his owne compleat, of which if any piece were loſt or broken, he was driuen to repaire it with the like if he had any fitting, taken from ſome Captaine whom hee had ſlaine, and ſtripped: or elſe to borrow of them that had by ſuch meanes gotten ſome to ſpare. Whereas therefore Achilles had loſt his armour which Hector (as is ſaid before) had taken from the body of Patroclus, he was faine to await the making of new, ere he could enter the fight: whereof he became very deſirous, that he might reuenge the death of Patroclus his deare friend.

At this time Agamemnon reconciled himſelfe vnto Achilles, not onely reſtoring his concubine Briſeis, but giuing him very great gifts, and excuſing former matters as well as he might. In the next battell Achilles did ſo behaue himſelfe, that he did not onely put the Troians to the worſt, but alſo ſlew the valiant Hector, whom (if Homer may herein be beleeued) hee chaced three times about the walles of Troy. But great queſtion may bee made of Homers truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Hector would ſtay alone without the Citie (as Homer doth report of him) when all the Troians were fled into it: nor that he could leape ouer the riuers of Xanthus and Simois, as he muſt haue done in that flight: nor that the Troians perceiuing Hector in ſuch an extremitie, would haue forborne to open ſome of their gates and let him in. But this is reported onely to grace Achilles, who hauing (by what meanes ſoeuer) ſlaine the noble Hector, did not onely carry away his dead bodie, as the cuſtome then was, but boring holes in his feet, and thruſting leatherne thongs into them, tyed him to his Chariot, and dragged him ſhamefully about the field, ſelling the dead bodie to his father Priamus for a very great ranſome. But his crueltie and couetouſneſſe were not long vnreuenged; for he was ſhortly after ſlaine with an arrow by Paris, as Homer ſayes, in the Scean gate, or as others in the Temple of Apollo, whither he came to haue married Polyxena the daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too farre in loue, hauing ſlaine ſo many of her brethren, and his body was ranſomed (as Lycophron ſaith) at the ſelfe-ſame rate that Hectors was by him ſold for. Not long after this, Penthesilea Queene of the Amazons arriued at Troy; who after ſome proofe giuen of her valour, was ſlaine by Pyrrhus the ſonne of Achilles.

§. V.

Of the taking of Troy, the woodden Horſe, the Booke of DARES and DYCTIS, the Colonies of the reliques of Troy.

FInally after the death of many worthy perſons, on each ſide, the Citie was taken by night, as all writers agree: but whether by the treaſon of Æneas and Antenor; or by a woodden Horſe, as the Poets, and common fame (which followed the Poets) haue deliuered, it is vncertaine. Some write that vpon one of the gates of Troy called Scæa, was the image of a horſe, and that the Greekes entring by that gate, gaue occaſion to the report, that the Citie was taken by an artificiall horſe. It may well bee that with ſome woodden engine, which they called an Horſe, they either did batter the walls, as the Romans in after-times vſed to doe with the Ramme: or ſcaled the walls vpon the ſudden, and ſo tooke the Citie. As for the hiding of men in the hollow bodie of a woodden horſe, it had beene a deſperate aduenture, and ſeruing to no purpoſe. For either the Troians might haue perceiued the deceit, and ſlaine all thoſe Princes of Greece, that were incloſed in it (which alſo by ſuch as maintaine this report they are ſaid to haue thought vpon) or they might haue left it a fewe dayes without the Citie (for it was vnlikely, that they ſhould the very firſt day both conclude vpon the bringing it into the towne, and breake downe their walles vpon the ſuddaine to doe it) by which meanes they who were ſhut into it, muſt haue periſhed for hunger, if they had not by iſſuing foorth vnſeaſonably diſcouered the inuention. Whereas further it is ſaid, that this horſe was built ſo high and great, that it could not bee brought into the towne through any of the gates, and that therefore the Troians were faine to pull downe a part of their wall to make way for it, through which breach the Greekes did afterwards enter: it is heereby manifeſt that the incloſing of ſo many principall men was altogether needeleſſe, conſidering that without their helpe there was way ſufficient for the armie, ſo that the ſurpriſing of any gate by them was now to no purpoſe.

Iohn Baptiſta Gramay in his Hiſtorie of Aſia, diſcourſing of this warre, ſaith that the Greekes did both batter the wall with a woodden engine, and were alſo let into the Citie by Antenor, at the Scæan gate: the townesmen ſleeping and drinking without feare or care, becauſe the fleete of the Gracians had hoiſted ſaile, and was gone the day before to the Ile of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Troians into ſecuritie. That the Citie was betrayed, the bookes of Dares and Dictys muſt proue, which whether we now haue the ſame that were by them written, it may bee ſuſpected; for ſurely they who haue made mention of theſe writers in ancient times, would not, as they did, haue followed the reports of Homer and others quite contradictorie in moſt points to theſe two authors, without once taking notice of the oppoſition, which they hauing ſerued in that warre made againſt the Common report: had it not been that either thoſe bookes were euen in thoſe times thought friuolous; or elſe contained no ſuch repugnancie to the other authours as now is found in them.

Alſo concerning the number of men ſlaine in this warre, which Dares and Dictis ſay to haue beene aboue 600000. on the Troian ſide, and more than 800000. of the Greekes, it is a report meerely fabulous; foraſmuch as the whole fleete of the Greekes was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their armie and deedes as much as hee could, to bee ſomewhat leſſe than 1200. ſaile, and the armie therein tranſported ouer the Greeke ſeas, not much aboue 100000. men according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common faſhion of men to extoll the deeds of their Auncients: for which cauſe both Homer magnified the Captaines of the Greekes, that ſerued in the warre, and Virgil with others were as diligent in commending & extolling the Troians and their Citie, from which the Romans deſcended. Yea the Athenians long after in the warre which Xerxes the Persian King made against all Greece, did not forbeare to vaunt of the great cunning which Menestheus the son of Peteus had shewed, in marshalling the Grecian army before Troy: whereupon, as if it had beene a matter of much consequence, they were so proud, that they refused to yeeld vnto Gelon King of almost all Sicily, the Admiraltie of their Seas, notwithstanding that he promised to bring 200. good fighting ships, and 30000. men for their defence.

The like vanitie possessed many other Cities of Greece, and many Nations in these parts of the world, which haue striuen to bring their descent from some of the Princes, that warred at Troy: all difficulties or vnlikelihoods in such their Pedigree notwithstanding. But those Nations which indeed, or in most probabilitie came of the Troians, were the Albanes in Italy; and from them the Romans, brought into that Countrey by Æneas: the Venetians first seated in Padua, and the Countrie adioyning by Antenor: the Chaonians planted in Epirus by Helenus, the sonne of King Priamus. To which Hellanicus addeth that the posteritie of Hector did resemble such of the Troians as were left, and raigned ouer them about Troy.

§. VI.

Of the distresses and dispersions of the Greekes returning from Troy.

COncerning the Greekes, they tasted as much miserie as they had brought vpon the Troians. For Thucidides notes, that by reason of their long abode at the siege, they found many alterations when they returned: so that many were driuen by their borderers from their ancient seats: many were expelled their Countries by faction: some were slaine anon after their arriuall: others were debarred from the Soueraignetie among their people, by such as had stayed at home. The cause of all which may seeme to haue beene the dispersion of the armie, which weakened much by the calamities of that long warre, was of little force to repell iniuries, being diuided into so many pieces vnder seuerall Commaunders, not very well agreeing. For (besides other quarrels arising vpon the diuision of the bootie, and the like occasions) at the time when they should haue set saile, Agamemnon and his brother fell out, the one being desirous to depart immediatly, the other to stay and performe some sacrifices to Minerua. Hereupon they fell to hot wordes, halfe the fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the rest of them sailing to the Ile of Tenedos; where when they arriued, they could not agree among themselues, but some returned backe to Agamemnon; others were dispersed, each holding his owne course. But the whole Fleet was sore vexed with tempests: for Pallas (as Homer saith) would not bee perswaded in haste.

They who returned safe were Nestor, and Pyrrhus, whom Orestes afterward slew: also Idomeneus, and Philoctetes, who neuertheless, as Virgill tels, were driuen soone after to seeke new seats: Idomeneus among the Salentines, and Philoctetes at Petilia in Italie. Agamemnon likewise returned home, but was foorthwith slaine by his wife and by the adulterer Ægysthus, who for a while after vsurped his Kingdome. Menelaus wandring long vpon the Seas, came into Ægypt, either with Helen, or (as may rather seeme) to fetch her. Vlisses, after ten yeeres, hauing lost all his company, got home in poore estate, with much adoe recouering the mastership of his owne house. All the rest either perished by the way, or were driuen into exile, and faine to seeke out new habitations.

Aiax the sonne Oileus was drowned; Teucer fled into Cyprus; Diomedes to King Daunus, who was Lord of the Iapyges in Apulia; some of the Locrians were driuen into Africke, others into Italie, all the East part whereof was called Magna Graecia, by reason of so many townes which the Greekes were driuen to erect vpon that coast. Finally, it appeares in Homer, that the Grecian Ladies, whose husbands had beene at the warre of Troy, were wont to call it; The place where the Greekes suffered miserie, and the vnluckie Citie not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy and those that warred there: the ouerthrow of which Citie, as hath beene said, happened in the time of Habdon Iudge of Israel, whom Samson after a variance or Interregnum for certaine yeeres succeeded.

CHAP. XV.

Of SAMSON, ELI, and SAMVEL.

§. I.

Of SAMSON.

THE birth and actes of Samson are written at large in the 13. 14. 15. and 16. of Iudges; and therefore I shall not need to make a repetition thereof. But these things I gather out of that Storie. First, that the Angell of God forbad the wife of Manoah the mother of Samson, to drinke wine or strong drinke, or to eate any vncleane meate, after she was conceiued with childe, because those strong liquors hinder the strength, and as it were wither and shrinke the childe in the mothers wombe. Though this were euen the counsell of God himselfe, and deliuered by his Angell, yet it seemeth that many women of this age haue not read, or at least will not beleeue this precept: the most part forbearing nor drinkes, nor meats, how strong or vncleane soeuer, filling themselues with all sorts of wines, and with artificiall drinkes farre more forcible: by reason whereof, so many wretched feeble bodies are borne into the world, and the races of the able and strong men in effect decayed. 2970.

Secondly, it is to be noted, that the Angell of God refused the sacrifice which Manoah would haue offered him, commaunding him to present it vnto the Lord: and therefore those that professe diuination by the helpe of Angels, to whom also they sacrifice, may assuredly know that they are Deuils who accept thereof, and not good Angels, who receiue no worship that is proper to God.

Thirdly, this Samson was twice betrayed by his wiues, to wit, by their importunitie and deceitfull teares: by the first he lost but a part of his goods: by the second his life. Quem nulla vis superare potuit, voluptas euertit; Whom no force could ouermaster, Voluptuousnesse ouerturned.

Fourthly, we may note, that he did not in all deliuer Israel from the oppression of the Philistims; though in some sort hee reuenged, and defended them: for notwithstanding that he had slaine 30. of them in his first attempt, burnt their Corne in haruest time, and giuen them a great ouerthrow instantly vpon it: yet so much did Israel feare the Philistims, as they assembled 3000. men out of Iuda, to besiege Samson in the rocke or mountaine of Etam, vsing these wordes: Knowest not thou that the Philistims are Rulers ouer vs? &c. After which they bound him, and deliuered him vnto the Philistims, for feare of their reuenge; though he was no sooner loosened, but hee gaue them another ouerthrow, and slew 1000. with the iawbone of an Asse.

Lastly, being made blinde, and a prisoner by the treason of his wife, hee was content to end his owne life, to be auenged of his enemies, when he pulled downe the pillars of the house at the feast whereto they sent for Samson, to deride him, till which time he bare his affliction with patience: but it was truely said of Seneca; Patientia sæpe læsa vertitur in furorem, Patience often wounded, is converted into furie: neither is it at any time so much wounded by paine and losse, as by derision and contumelie.

Of ELI and of the Arke taken, and of DAGONS fall, and the sending backe of the Arke.

THe Storie of Eli the Priest, who succeeded Samson, is written in the beginning of Samuel; who foretolde him of the destruction of his house, for the wickednesse of his sonnes, which hee suppressed not, neither did hee punish them according to their deserts: whose sinnes were horrible, both in abusing the Sacrifice, and prophaning and polluting the holy places: though Leui Ben Gerson, to extenuate this filthie offence of forcing the women by the sonnes of Eli, hath a contrarie opinion. In this time therfore it pleased God to cast the Israelites vnder the swords of the Philistims; of whom there perished in the first incounter 4000. and in the second battell 30000. footmen; among whom the sonnes of Eli being slaine, their father (hearing the lamentable successe) by falling from his chaire, brake his necke. Hee was the first that obtained the High-Priesthood of the stocke of Ithamar the sonne of Aaron, before whose time it continued successiuely in the race of Eleazar the eldest brother of Ithamar: for Aaron was the first, Eleazar the second, Phinees the sonne of Eleazar the third, Abisue the sonne of Phinees the fourth, his sonne Bocci the fift, Ozi the sonne of Bocci the sixt, and then Eli, as Iosephus and Lyranus out of diuers Hebrew authours haue conceiued. In the race of Ithamar the Priesthood continued after Eli to the time of Salomon who cast out Abiathar, and established Sadock and Achimaas and their successors. The Arke of God which Israel brought into the field, was in this battell taken by the Philistims. For as Dauid witnesseth, God greatly abhorred Israel, so that hee forsooke the habitation of Shilo: euen the Tabernacle where he dwelt among men, and deliuered his power into captiuitie, &c.

1. Sam. 2. 22.

1. King. 2. 27. and 1. Chron. 6.

Psal. 78.

Now as it pleased God at this time, that the Arke whereby himselfe was represented, should fall into the hands of the Heathen, for the offences of the Priests and people: so did hee permit the Chaldæans to destroy the Temple built by Salomon; the Romans to ouerthrow the second Temple; and the Turkes to ouerthrow the Christian Churches in Asia and Europe. And had not the Israelites put more confidence in the sacrament, or representation which was the Arke, then in God himselfe, they would haue obserued his Lawes, and serued him onely: which whensoeuer they did, they were then victorious. For after the captiuitie they had no Arke at all, nor in the times of the Macchabees: and yet for their pietie it pleased God to make that familie as victorious, as any that garded themselues by the signe in stead of the substance. And that the Arke was not made to the end to be carried into the field as an ensigne; Dauid witnessed when he fled from Absalon. For when the Priests would haue carried the Arke with him; he forbad it, and caused it to be returned into the Citie, vsing these words: If I shall finde fauour in the eyes of the Lord, he will bring me againe: if not, let him doe to me as seemeth good in his eyes.

1. Sam. 5. v. 6.

2. Sam. 15.

The Troians beleeued that while their Palladium or the image of Minerua was kept in Troy, the Citie should neuer bee ouerturned: so did the Christians in the last fatall battell against Saladine carrie into the field, as they were made beleeue, the very Crosse whereon Christ died, and yet they lost the battell, their bodies and the wood. But Chrysostome vpon Saint Matthew (if that bee his worke) giueth a good iudgement, speaking of those that ware a part of Saint Iohns Gospell about their neckes, for an amulet or preseruatiue: Si tibi ea non prosunt in auribus, auribus quemodò proderunt in Cœlo? If thoſe words doe not profit men in their eares, (to wit, the hearing of the Goſpell preached) how ſhould it profit them by hanging it about their neckes? For it was neither the wood of the Arke, nor the wood of the Croſſe, but the reuerence of the Father that gaue the one for a memorie of his Couenant: and the Faith in his Sonne, which ſhed his bloud on the other for redemption, that could or can profit them and vs, either in this life or after it.

The Philiſtims returning with the greateſt victorie and glorie which euer they obtained, carried the Arke of God with them to Azotus, and ſet it vp in the houſe of Dagon their Idoll: but that night the Idoll fell out of his place, from aboue to the ground, and lay vnder the Arke. The morning following they tooke it vp, and ſet it vp, and ſet it againe in his place. And it fell the ſecond time, and the head brake from the bodie, and the hands from the armes, ſhewing that it had nor power, nor vnderſtanding in the preſence of God; for the head fell off, which is the ſeat of reaſon, and knowledge, and the hands (by which wee execute ſtrength) were ſundred from the armes. For God and the Deuill inhabit not in one houſe, nor in one heart. And if this Idoll could not indure the repreſentation of the true God, it is not to bee marualled, that at ſuch time as it pleaſed him to couer his onely begotten with fleſh, and ſent him into the world, that all the Oracles, wherein the Deuill derided and betrayed mortall men, loſt power, ſpeech, and operation at the inſtant. For when that true light which had neuer beginning of brightneſſe, brake through the clouds of a virgins bodie, ſhining vpon the earth which had beene long obſcured by Idolatrie, all thoſe foule and ſtinking vapours vaniſhed. Plutarch rehearſeth a memorable accident in that age concerning the death of the great god Pan, as hee ſtileth him; where (as ignorant of the true cauſe) hee ſearcheth his braines for many reaſons of ſo great an alteration: yet finds he none out but friuolous. For not onely this olde Deuill did then die as he ſuppoſed, but all the reſt, as Apollo, Iupiter, Diana, and the whole rabble became ſpeechleſſe.

Now while the Philiſtims triumphed after this victorie, God ſtrooke them with the grieuous diſeaſe of the Hæmorrhoides of which they periſhed in great numbers. For it is written that the Lord deſtroyed them. It was therefore by generall conſent ordered, that the Arke ſhould be remoued from Azotus to Gath or Geth another of the fiue great Cities of the Philiſtims; to proone, as it ſeemeth, whether this diſeaſe were fallen on them by accident, or by the hand of God immediatly: but when it was brought to Gath and receiued by them, the plague was yet more grieuous and mortall. For the hand of the Lord was againſt this Citie with a very great deſtruction, and hee ſmote the men of the Citie both ſmall and great, &c. And being not yet ſatisfied, they of Gath ſent the Arke to Ekron or Accaron, a third Citie of the Philiſtims: but they alſo felt the ſame ſmart, and cryed out that themſelues and their people ſhould be ſlaine thereby; For there was a deſtruction and death throughout all the Citie. In the end, by the aduice of their Prieſts, the Prince of the Philiſtims did not onely reſolue to returne the Arke, but to offer gifts vnto the God of Iſrael, remembring the plague which had fallen on the Ægyptians, when their hearts were hardened to hold the people of God from their inheritance, and from his ſeruice by ſtrong hand. Wherefore confeſſing the power of the God of Iſrael to bee almightie, and that their owne Idols were ſubiect thereunto, they agreed to offer a ſinne offering, vſing theſe words; So yee ſhall giue glorie to the God of Iſrael, that hee may take his hand from you, and from your gods and from your land. And what can be a more excellent witneſſing, than where an enemie doth approue our cauſe? according to Ariſtotle; Pulchrum eſt teſtimonium, quo noſtra probantur ab hoſtibus. So did Pharao confeſſe the liuing God, when he was plagued in Ægypt: and Nabuchodonoſor, and Darius, when they had ſeene his miracles by Daniel.

1. Sam. 4. v. 9.

c. 6. v. 5.

This counſell therefore of the Prieſts being imbraced, and the golden Hæmorhoides, and the golden Mice prepared, they cauſed two milch kine to bee choſen, ſuch as had not beene yoked, and a new Cart or carriage to bee framed: but they durst not driue or direct it to any place certaine, thereby to make tryall whether it were indeed the hand of God that had strucken them. For if the Arke of God were carryed towards Bethshemesh and into the territorie of Israel: then they should resolue that from God onely came their late destruction. For the Philistims knew that the milch Kine which drew the Arke, could not bee forced from their Calues, but that they would haue followed them whersoeuer; much lesse when they were left to themselues would they trauell a contrary way. For in the darkest night in the world if calues be remoued from their dammes, the kine will follow them through woods, and desarts by the foote, till they finde them. But the kine trauailed directly towards Bethshemesh: and when they came into the fields thereof, to wit, of one Iosua of the same Citie, they stood still there; which when the Princes of the Philistims perceiued, they returned to Ekron: After which, God spared not his owne people the Bethshemites, in that they presumed to looke into the Arke. And because they knew God and his commandements and had beene taught accordingly: hee strooke them more grieuously than he did the Heathen, for there perished of them fifty thousand and seuentie. From hence the Arke was carried to Kirriath-iearim and placed in the house of Abinadab; where it is written that it remained twentie yeere in the charge of Eleazar his sonne, vntill Dauid brought it to Hierusalem.

2. Sam.c.6.and 1. Chron.c.13. a See in this booke ch.12. §.1. in the margent.

Now whereas it is said, that in the meane while the Arke was in Nob, Mispah, and Galgala, it was the Tabernacle, which was at this time seuered from the Arke: or at least, it was for the [a] present occasion brought to these places, and anon returned to Kiriath-iearim.

§. III.

Of SAMVEL, and of his Gouernment.

THese Tragedies ouerpast and ended, Samuel, to whom God appeared while hee was yet a childe, became now Iudge and Gouernour of Israel. Hee was descended of the familie of [b] Chore or Korath. For Leui had three sonnes; Gerson, Cheath, and Merari: Cheath had Amram, and Izaar; of Amram came Moses and Aaron; of Izaar, Chore: and of the familie of Chore, Samuel. His father Eleana a Leuite, was called an Ephrataan, not that the Leuites had any proper inheritance, but because hee was of [c] Mount Ephraim, like as Iesse, Dauids father was called an Ephrataan, because borne at Ephrata, or Bethelem. Hannah his mother being long fruitlesse, obtained him of God by prayers and teares: it being an exceeding shame to the Iewish women, to be called barren in respect of the blessing of God both to Abraham that his seede should multiply, as the Starres of Heauen, and the sands of the Sea, as in the beginning to Adam, Increase and multiply, &c. and in Deuteronomie the seuenth; There shall bee neither male nor female barren among you.

b 1. Chro.6.22.

c Which region was called Ephrata, as appeareth, *Ruth.*1.2. Ephratei ô Bethlehemo Iehuda, the towne Ephratha which is Bethlem in Iuda, Gen. 35.19. from the region of Ephratha, which is in Mount Ephraim, whence *Psal.*132.*v.*6. Ephratha is put for Silo, which was in the tribe of Ephraim.

Samuel was no sooner borne, but that his mother, according to her former vow, dedicated him to God, and his seruice, to which shee deliuered him euen from the dugge. For as the first borne of all that were called Nazarites, might be redeemed till they were fiue yeeres old for fiue sheckles, and betweene fiue yeeres and twentie for twentie sheckles: so was it not required by the Law that any of the race of the Leuites should be called to serue about the Tabernacle, till they were fiue and twentie yeeres old.

Saint Peter reckons in the Actes the Prophets from Samuel, who was the first of the writers of holy Scriptures, to whom vsually this name of a Prophet was giuen, and yet did Moses account himselfe such a one, as in the 18. of Deuteronomie. The Lord thy God will raise vp vnto thee a Prophet like vnto mee, &c. But he is distinguished from those that preceded him, who were called Seers; as, Beforetime in Israel, when a man went to seeke an answere of God, thus hee spake; Come and let vs goe to the Seer: for for hee that is now called a Prophet, was in old time called a Seer. And although it pleased God to appeare by his Angels to Moses, as before to Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob; yet in the time of Eli, there was no manifest vision; not that God had altogether with-drawne his grace from Israel: but as the Chaldean Paraphrast hath it, those reuelations before Samuels time, were more clouded and obscure. The places wherein Samuel iudged were Maspha or Mitspa, seated on a hill in Beniamin neere Iuda: also Gilgal, and Bethel, of which we haue spoken elsewhere. Sam.13. See in this book, c.12.§.1.

The Philistims taking knowledge of the assembly and preparation for Warre at Mispa in the beginning of Samuels gouernment, gathered their Armie and marched towards the Citie: at whose approch the Israelites strucken with feare, and with the memorie of their former slaughters and seruitude, besought Samuel to pray to God for them; who was * then performing his sacrifice when the Philistims were in view. But God being moued with Samuels prayers (as he was by those of Moses, when Israel fought against the Amalekites at their first entrance into Arabia) It pleased him with thunder and tempest to disperse and beate downe the Armie of the Philistims, according to the prophecie of Hanna, Samuels Mother. The Lords aduersaries shall be destroyed, and out of heauen shall be thunder vpon them, &c. Iosephus affirmes, that a part of the Philistims were swallowed with an earth-quake: and that Samuel himselfe led the Israelites in the prosequution of their victory. After which Samuel erected a Monument in memorie of this happie successe, obtained by the miraculous hand of God, which Iosephus called, Lapidem fortem: Samuel, Ebenezer, or the stone of assistance: and then following the opportunitie and aduantage of the victory, the Israelites recouered diuers Cities of their owne formerly lost, and held long in possession of the Philistims, who for a long time after did not offer any inuasion or reuenge. And the better to attend ther purposes, and to withstand any of their attempts: the Israelites made peace with the Amorites, or Canaanites, which lay on their backes, and to the North of them, that they might not be assaulted from diuers parts at once; hauing the Philistims towards the West and Sea-coast, the Canaanite toward the North and East, and the Idumite on the South. The estate beeing thus settled, Samuel for the ease of the people gaue audience and iudgement in diuers places by turnes, as hath been elsewhere said.

* Plutarch reports of Numa the secõd King of Rome, that when as hee was sacrificing it was told him that the enemies approched, he nothing dismaied, answered, Ego autem sacrifico. 1.*Sam.*2.10.

CHAP. XVI.

Of SAVL.

§. I.

Of the deliberation to change the gouernment into a Kingdome.

BVT when age now beganne to ouer-take Samuel, and that hee was not able to vnder-goe the burthen of so carefull a gouernement, hee put off from himselfe the waight of the affaires on his Sonnes, Ioel and Abiiah, who iudged the people at Beersheba, a Citie, the very vtmost towards the South of Iudea. And as the place was inconuenient and farre away, so were themselues no lesse remoued from the iustice and vertue of their Father: For the thirst of couetousnesse, the more it swalloweth, the more it drieth, and desireth, finding taste in nothing but gaine; to recouer which, they set the Law at a price, and sold Iustice and iudgement to the best Chapmen. Which when when the Elders of Israel obserued, and saw that Samuel as a naturall man (though a Prophet) could not so well discerne the errours of his owne, they prayed him to consent to their change of gouernment, and to make them a King, by whom they might be iudged as other Nations were; who might also leade them to the Warre and defend them against their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable successe which followed the rule of Eli his sonnes, when those of Samuel by their first blossomes promised to yeeld fruit no lesse bitter, they saw no way to put the gouernement from out his race, whom they so much reuerenced, but by the choice of a King.

In a cause of so great consequence and alteration, Samuel sought counsaile from God: which surely he did not for the establishing of his owne Sonnes; who being as they were, God would not haue approoued his election. Now as it appeares by the Text, this speach or motion displeasing him, hee vsed his best arguments to dehort them: which when hee perceiued to bee ouer-feeble, hee deliuered vnto them from Gods reuelation, the inconueniences and miseries which should befall them. And yet, all which hee fore-shewed was not intolerable, but such as hath beene borne, and is so still by free consent of the Subiects towards their Princes. For first he makes them know that the King will vse their sonnes in his owne seruice to make them his Horse-men, Chariotters, and Foot-men; which is not onely not grieuous, but by the Vassals of all Kings according to their birth and condition desired: it being very agreeable to subiects of the best qualitie to command for the King in his Warres, and to till the ground no lesse proper and appertaining to those that are thereto bred and brought vp: so are likewise the offices of women-seruants to dresse meate, to bake bread, and the like. But whereas immediatly it is threatned; Hee will take vp your Fields, and your Vineyards, and your best Olive trees, and giue them to his seruants; with other oppressions; this hath giuen, and giues dayly occasion to such as would be ruled by their owne discretion, to affirme that Samuel describeth here vnto them the power of a King, gouerned by his owne affections, and not a King that feareth God. But others vpon further examination construe this Text farre otherwise, as teaching vs what Subiects ought with patience to beare at their Soueraignes hand. The former opinion is grounded first vpon that place of Deuteronomie, where God fore-sheweth this change of gouernment from Iudges to Kings, and after he had forbidden many things vnto the Kings, as many wiues, couetousnesse, and the like: he commandeth that the Kings which were to reigne ouer Israel, should write the Law of Deuteronomie, or cause it to be written: and to shew how greatly the King should honour the Law, he addeth, It shall be with him, and he shall reade therein all the dayes of his life: that hee may learne to feare the Lord his God, and to keepe all the words of this Law, and these ordinances for to doe them: that hee may prolong his daies in his Kingdome, he and his Sonnes. But to take away any other mans field, say they, is contrarie to the lawes of God: in the same booke written. For it is said, That which is iust and right shalt thou follow, that thou mayest liue. Now if it bee not permitted to carrie away grapes more than thou canst eate out of another mans vineyard, but forbidden by God: it is much lesse lawfull to take the vineyard it selfe from the owner, and giue it to another. Neither are the wordes of the Text (say they) such as doe warrant the Kings of Israel, or make it proper vnto them, to take at will any thing from their vassalls. For it is not said that it shall be lawfull for the King, or the King may doe this or that: but it is written, that the King will take your Sonnes: and againe, This shall bee the manner of the King that shall reigne ouer you. God thereby fore-shewing what power seuered from pietie, (because it is accountable to God onely) will doe in the future. And hereof we finde the first example in Achab, who tooke from Naboth both his Vineyard and his life, contrary to the trust which God had put in him, of gouerning well his people. For God commanded, That his people should bee iudged with righteous iudgement. Wherefore, though the King had offered vnto Naboth composition, as a Vineyard of better value, or the worth in money money which he refused: yet because hee was falsly accused, and vniustly condemned (though by colour of law) how grieuously Achab was punished by God, the Scriptures tell vs. Neither was it a plea sufficient for Achab against the all-righteous God, to say that it was done without his consent, and by the Elders of Israel. For God had not then left his people to the Elders, but to the King, who is called a liuing Law, euen as Dauid testifieth of himselfe: Posuisti me in caput gentium: For this of S. Augustine is very true: Simulata innocentia, non est innocentia: simulata æquitas non est æquitas: sed duplicatur peccatum in quo est iniquitas & simulatio; Fained innocence, and fained equitie, are neither the one nor the other: but the fault or offence is there doubled, in which there is both iniquitie and dissimulation. Such in effect is their disputation, who thinke this place to containe the description of a Tyrant. But the arguments on the contrary side, as they are many and forcible, so are they well knowne to all; being excellently handled in that Princely discourse of The true Law of free Monarchies, which Treatise I may not presume to abridge, much lesse here to insert. Only thus much I will say, that if practice doe shew the greatnesse of authoritie, euen the best Kings of Iuda and Israel were not so tied by any lawes, but that they did whatsoeuer they pleased in the greatest things; and commanded some of their owne Princes, and of their owne brethren to be slaine without any triall of law, being sometime by Prophets reprehended, sometime not. For though Dauid confessed his offence for the death of Vriah, yet Salomon killing his elder brother and others, the same was not imputed vnto him as any offence.

That the state of Israel should receiue this change of gouernment, it was not only fore-told by Moses in Deuteronomie, but propheeied of by Iacob in this Scripture: The Scepter shall not depart from Iuda, &c. It was also promised by God to Abraham for a blessing: For it was not onely assured that his issues should in number equall the Starres in heauen, but that Kings should proceede of him: Which state seeing it is framed from the patterne of his sole rule, who is Lord of the Vniuersall; and the excellencie thereof in respect of all other gouernments, hath been by many iudicious men handled and proued, I shall not neede to ouer-paint that which is garnished with better colours already, that I can lay on.

Gen.49. Gen.15. Gen.17.

In the time of the Iudges euery man hath obserued what ciuill Warre Israel had: what outragious slaughters they committed vpon each other: in what miserable seruitude they liued for many yeeres: and when it fared best with them, they did but defend their owne Territories, or recouer some parts thereof formerly lost. The Canaanites dwelt in the best vallies of the Countrie. The Ammonites held much of Gilead ouer Iordan; the Philistims the Sea-coasts; and the Iebusites Hierusalem it selfe, till Dauids time: all which that King did not onely conquer and establish, but hee mastered and subiected all the neighbour Nations, and Kings, and made them his tributaries and vassals. But whether it were for that the Israelites were moued by those reasons, which allure the most of all Nations to liue vnder a Monarch, or whether by this meanes they sought to bee cleered from the sonnes of Samuel, they became deafe to all the perswasions and threats which Samuel vsed, insisting vpon this point that they would haue a King, both to iudge them and defend them: whereunto when Samuel had warrant from God to consent, he sent euery man to his owne Citie and abiding.

§. II.

Of the election of SAVL.

AFter that Samuel had dismissed the assembly at Mizpah, hee forbare the election of a King, till such time as he was therein directed by God: who fore-told him the day before, that hee would present vnto him a man of the Land of Beniamin, whom hee commanded Samuel to anoint. So

Samuel

Samuel went vnto Ramath Sophim, to make a feast for the entertainement of Saul (whom yet hee knew not, but knew the truth of Gods promises) and Saul also hauing wandred diuers dayes to seeke his Fathers Asses, at length by the aduice of his seruant trauailed towards Ramath, to finde out a Seer or Prophet, hoping from him to be told what way to take, to finde his beasts. In which iourney it pleased God (who doth many times order the greatest things by the simplest passages and persons) to elect Saul, who sought an asse, and not a Kingdome: like as formerly it had pleased him to call Moses, while he fed the sheepe of Iethro; and after to make choice of Dauid the yongest of eight sonnes, and by the Scriptures called a little one, who was then keeping of beasts, and changed his sheep-hooke into a Scepter, making him of all other the most victorious King of Iuda and Israel. So Iohn and Iacob were taken from casting their nets, to become fishers of men, and honoured with the titles of Apostles, a dignitie that died not in the graue, as all worldly Honours doe: but permanent and euerlasting in Gods endlesse Kingdome.

1. Sam. 16.

When Samuel was entred into Ramath, he prepared a banquet for the King, whom he expected and staied his arriuall at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God shewed to Samuel, and made him know that it was the same whom hee had foretold him of, that he should rule the people of God. Saul finding Samuel in the gate, but knowing him not, though a Prophet and Iudge of Israel, much lesse knowing the Honour which attended him, asked Samuel in what part of the Citie the Seer dwelt. Samuel answered that himselfe was the man he sought, and prayed Saul to goe before him to the high place, where Samuel setting him according to his degree, aboue all that were inuited, conferred with him afterwards of the affaires of the Kingdome, and of Gods graces to bee bestowed on him, and the morning following anointed him King of Israel.

After this he told him all that should happen him in the way homeward; that two men should incounter him by Rabels Sepulchre, who should tell him that his Asses were found, and that his Fathers cares were changed from the feare of losing his beasts, to doubt the losse of his Sonne; that he should then meete three other men in the plaine of Tabor; then a company of Prophets: and that he should be partaker of Gods spirit, and prophecie with them: and that thereby his condition and disposition should bee changed from the vulgar, into that which became a King elected and fauoured by God.

But the Prophets here spoken of, men indued with spirituall gifts, were not of the first and most reuerenced number, who by diuine reuelation fore-told things to come, reprehended without feare the errours of their Kings, and wrought miracles; of which number were Moses, Iosua, Samuel, and after them Gad, Nathan, Ahias, Elias, Eliseus, Isay, Ieremie, and the rest; for these Prophets, saith S. Chrysostome, Omnia tempora percurrunt, præterita, presentia, & futura: but they were of those of whom S. Paul speaketh of, 1. Cor. 1. 14. who inriched with spirituall gifts, expounded the Scriptures and the Law.

Chrys. in psal. 43

At Mispeth Samuel assembled the people, that hee might present Saul to them, who as yet knew nothing of his election: neither did Saul acquaint his owne Vncle therewith, when he asked him what had past betweene him and Samuel: for either he thought his estate not yet assured, or else that it might bee dangerous for him to reueale it, till he were confirmed by generall consent. When the Tribes were assembled at Mizpeth, the generall opinion is, that hee was chosen by lot. Chimhi thinkes by the answere of Vrim* and Thumim: that is, by the answere of the Priest, wearing that mysteric vpon his brest when he asked counsaile of the Lord. But the casting of lots was not only much vsed among the Iewes, but by many others, if not by all nations. The Land of promise was diuided by lot: God commanded lots to be cast on the two Goates, which should be sacrificed, and which turned off: a figure of Christs suffering, and our deliuerance, for whose garments the Iewes also cast lots. Cicero, Plautus, Pausanias, and others haue remembred diuers sorts of lots,

* The Vrim and Thumim in the ornaments of the High Priest were inserted within the pectorall, which therfore was duplicatum, they were placed in the pectoral ouer against the hart of the High Priest. It is plain that they were not the precious stones nor any thing made by the Artificers. See Exod. c. 38.

vſed by the Romanes, Graecians, and other Nations: as in the diuiſion of grounds or honours; and in things to bee vnder-taken: the two firſt kindes were called diuiſorie; the third, diuinatory; and into one of theſe three all may be reduced: all which kindes howſoeuer they may ſeeme chancefull, are yet ordered and directed by God: as in the Prouerbs: The lot is caſt into the lap, But the whole diſpoſition is of the Lord. And in like ſort fell the Kingdome of Iſrael on Saul, not by chance, but by Gods ordinance, who gaue Samuel former knowledge of his election: from which election Saul with-drew himſelfe in modeſtie, as both Ioſephus conſters it, and as it may bee gathered by his former anſwers to Samuel, when he acknowledged himſelfe the leaſt of the leaſt Tribe. But Samuel inlightened by God, found where Saul was hidden, and brought him among the people, and he was taller than all the reſt by the ſhoulders. And Samuel made them know that he was the choſen King of Iſrael, whereupon all the multitude ſaluted him King, and prayed for him; yet ſome there were that enuied his glory (as in all eſtates there are ſuch) who did not acknowledge him by offering him preſents, as the manner was: of whom Saul, to auoide ſedition, tooke no notice. 1. Sam. 10.

§. III.

Of the eſtabliſhing of SAVL by his firſt victories.

NO ſooner was Saul placed in the Kingdome, but that hee receiued knowledge that Nahas King of the Ammonites prepared to beſiege Iabes Gilead: which Nation ſince the great ouerthrow giuen them by Iephta, neuer durſt attempt any thing vpon the Iſraelites, till the beginning of Saul his rule. And although the Ammonites did alwayes attend vpon the aduantage of time, to recouer thoſe Territories which firſt the Amorite, and then Iſrael diſpoſſeſt them of; which they made the ground of their inuaſion in Iephta's time; yet they neuer perſwaded themſelues of more aduantage than at this preſent. For firſt they knew that there were many of the Iſraelites that did not willingly ſubmit themſelues to this new King: ſecondly, they were remembred that the Philiſtims had not long before ſlaine 34000. of their men of Warre: and beſides had vſed great care and policie that they ſhould haue no Smithes to make them ſwords or ſpeares: neither was it long before that of the Bethſhemeſites and places adioyning, there periſhed by the hand of God more then 50000. and therefore in theſe reſpects, euen occaſion it ſelfe inuited them to inlarge their Dominions vpon their borderers: Iabes Gilead being one of the neereſt. Beſides it may further be coniectured, that the Ammonites were imboldened againſt Iabes Gilead, in reſpect of their weakneſſe: ſince the Iſraelites deſtroyed a great part of them, for not ioyning with them againſt the Beniamites: at which time they did not onely ſlaughter the men and male-children, but tooke from them their yong women, and gaue them to the Beniamites: and therefore they were not likely to haue beene increaſed to any great numbers: and if they had recouered themſelues of this great calamitie, yet the Ammonite might flatter himſelfe with the opinion, that Iſrael hauing for long time been diſarmed by the Philiſtims, was not apt to ſuccour thoſe whom they had ſo deepely wounded and deſtroyed. But contrariwiſe, when the tidings came to Saul of their danger, and that the Ammonites would giue them no other condition to ranſome themſelues, but by pulling out their right eies, by which they ſhould be vtterly diſabled for the Warre, as elſewhere hath been ſpoken: Saul, both to value himſelfe in his firſt yeeres raigne, and becauſe perchance hee was deſcended of one of thoſe 400. Maides taken from the Gileadites, and giuen to the Beniamites, gaue order to aſſemble the forces of Iſrael, hewing a yoke of Oxen into pieces, and ſending them by meſſengers ouer all the coaſts, proteſting thus: That whoſoeuer came not forth after SAVL and after SAMVEL, ſo ſhould his Oxen bee ſerued: threatning the people Iud. 21.

by their goods, and not by their liues at the first. Seuen dayes had Saul to assemble an Armie, by reason that the Gileadites had obtained the respite of these seuen dayes to giue Nahas the Ammonite an answere: who, could they haue obtained any reasonable condition, were contented to haue seuered themselues from Israel, and to become Vassals and Tributaries to the Heathen. In the meane while Saul assembled the forces which repaired vnto him at Bezec, neere Iordan, that he might readily passe the Riuer; which done, he might in one day with a speedy march arriue at Iabes, vnder the Hills of Gilead.

1.*Sam.*11.8. The Armie by Saul led, consisting of three hundred and thirty thousand, hereturned an answere to those of Iabes, that they should assure themselues of succour by the next day at noone. For, as it seemeth, Saul marched away in the latter part of the day, and went on all night; for in the morning watch he surprized the Armie of Nahas the Ammonite. And to the end that he might set on them on all sides, he diuided his force in three parts, putting them to the sword vntill the heate of the day, and the wearinesse of Sauls troupe inforst them to giue ouer the pursuit. Now the Ammonites were become the more careless and secure, in that those of Iabes promised the next morning to render themselues and their Citie to their mercie. After this happie successe the people were so farre in loue with their new King, that they would haue slaine all those Israelites that murmured against his election, had not himselfe forbidden and resisted their resolutions. Such is the condition of worldly men, as they are violent louers of the prosperous, and base Vassals of the time that flourisheth: and as despightfull and cruell without cause against those, whom any misaduenture, or other worldly accident hath throwne downe.

1.*Sam.*11. After the Armie remoued, Samuel summoned the people to meete at Gilgal, where Saul was now a third time acknowledged, and as some Commenters affirme, anointed King: and here Samuel vsed an exhortation to all the assembly, containing precepts, and a rehearsall of his owne Iustice, during the beginning of his gouernment
1.*Sam.*12. to that day. After Saul had now raigned one yeere before hee was established in Gilgal, or Galgala, he strengthened himselfe with a good guard of 3000. chosen men, of which he assigned 1000. to attend on Ionathan his sonne at Gibeah, the Citie of his nativitie: the rest hee kept about his owne person in Micmas; and in the Hill of Bethel.

§. IIII.

Of SAVLS disobedience in his proceedings in the Warres with the Philistims and Amalekites, which caused his finall reiection.

IONATHAN with his small Armie or Regiment that attended him, taking a time of aduantage, surprized a Garrison of Philistims: the same, as some thinke, which Saul past by, when hee came from Rama, where hee was first anointed by Samuel, which they thinke to haue beene Cariath-iearim: because a place where the Philistims had a Garrison, 1.*Sam.*10. is called the Hill of God, which they vnderstand of Cariath-iearim: but Iunius vnderstands this Garrison to haue been at Gebah in Beniamin neere Gibba, where Ionathan abode with his thousand followers. Howsoeuer by this it appeareth that the Philistims held some strong places, both in the times of Samuel, and of Saul, within the Territory of Israel: and now being greatly inraged by this surprize, they 1.*Sam.*13.5. assembled 30000. armed Chariots, and 6000. Horse, where-with they inuaded Iudea, and incamped at Machmas, or Michmas, a Citie of Beniamin, in the direct way from Samaria to Hierusalem, and in the midst of the Land betweene the Sea and Iordan. With this sudden inuasion the Israelites were strucken in so great a feare, as some of them hid themselues in the caues of the mountaines, other fled ouer Iordan into into Gad and Gilead: Saul himſelfe with ſome 2000. men of ordinarie, and many other people, ſtaid at Galgala in Beniamin, not farre from the paſſage of Ioſua when he led Iſrael ouer Iordan. Heere Saul by Samuels appointment was to attend the comming of Samuel ſeuen daies: but when the laſt day was in part ſpent, and that Saul perceiued his forces to diminiſh greatly, he preſumed (as ſome expound the place 1. Sam. 13. 9.) to exerciſe the office which appertained not vnto him, and to offer a burnt offering and a peace offering vnto God, contrarie to the Eccleſiaſticall lawes of the Hebrewes, and Gods Commaundements: others expound the word, obtulit, in this place, by obtulit per Sacerdotem, and ſo make the ſinne of Saul not to haue beene any intruſion into the Prieſts office, but firſt a diſobedience to Gods Commaundement, in not ſtaying according to the appointment 1. Sam. 10. 8. ſecondly a diffidence or miſtruſt in Gods helpe, and too great relying vpon the ſtrength of the people, whoſe departing from him he could not beare patiently; and laſtly a Contempt of the holy Prophet Samuel, and of the helpe which the prayers of ſo godly a man might procure him. But whatſoeuer was his ſinne, notwithſtanding his excuſes, he was by Samuel reprehended moſt ſharply, in termes vnfitting his eſtate, had not extraordinarie warrant beene giuen to Samuel ſo to doe, from God himſelfe, at which time alſo Samuel feared not to let him know, that the Kingdome ſhould be conferred to another (a man after Gods owne heart) both from Saul and his poſteritie. 1. Sam. c. 13. Verſ. 14.

After this Samuel and Saul returned to Gibeah, where Saul, when he had taken view of his armie, found it to conſiſt of 600. men: for the moſt were fled from him and ſcattered, yea and among thoſe that ſtaid, there was not any that had either ſword or ſpeare, but Saul and his ſonne Ionathan only. For the Philiſtims had not left them any Smyth in all Iſrael, that made weapons; beſides, they that came to Saul came haſtily, and left ſuch weapons and armour as they had, behind them in the garriſons: for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul ſhould be able the yeere before, or in ſome part of this very yeere, to ſuccour Iabes Gilead with 300. and thirtie thouſand men, if there had not now beene any yron weapon to defend themſelues withall, ſaue onely in the hand of Saul and Ionathan his ſonne. But howſoeuer, all the reſt of the people were formerly diſarmed by the Philiſtims, and all thoſe crafteſmen carried out of the land that made weapons: there being left vnto the Iſraelites onely files to ſharpen and amend ſuch ſtuffe as ſerued for the Plough, and for nought elſe: yet that they had ſome kinde of armes it is manifeſt, or els they durſt not haue attempted vpon the Philiſtims as they did. And it is not ſaid in the Text that there was not any ſword in all Iſrael, but onely that there was not any found amongſt thoſe 600. ſouldiers which ſtayed with Saul after Samuels departure: and it ſeemeth that when Samuel had publiquely reprehended Saul, that his owne guards forſooke him, hauing but 600. remaining of his 3000. ordinarie ſouldiers, and of all the reſt that repaired vnto him, of which many were fled from him before Samuel arriued. 1. Sam. 13. 7. 1. Sam. 13. 22.

With this ſmall troupe he held himſelfe to his owne Citie of Gibeah, as a place of more ſtrength and better aſſured vnto him, then Gilgal was. Neither is it obſcure how it ſhould come to paſſe that the Philiſtims ſhould thus diſarme the moſt part of the Iſraelites, howſoeuer in the time of Samuel much had bin done againſt them. For the victories of Samuel were not got by ſword or ſpeare, but by thunder from heauen: and when theſe craftſmen were once rooted out of the Cities of Iſrael, no maruaile if they could not in a ſhort peace vnder Samuel bee replanted againe. For this tiranny of the Philiſtims is to be vnderſtood, rather of the precedent times, than vnder Samuel: and yet vnder him it is to bee thought that by their crafts they proceeded in the policie, not ſuffering their artificers to teach the Iſraelites, and ſo euen to the times of Saul kept them from hauing any ſtore of armour. The ſame policie did Nabuchodonoſor vſe after his Conqueſt in Iudæa: Dionyſius in Sicilie; and many other Princes elſe-where in all ages. But theſe loſt weapons in part the Iſraelites might repaire in Gilead, for ouer Iordan the Philiſtims had not inuaded. The reſt of their defences were ſuch as antiquitie vſed, and their preſent neceſſitie miniſtred vnto them; to wit, clubs, bowes, and ſlings. For the Beniamites exceeded in caſting ſtones in ſlings: and that theſe were the naturall weapons, and the firſt of all nations, it is manifeſt; and ſo in the firſt of Chronicles the twelfth Chapter, it is written of thoſe that came to ſuccour Dauid againſt Saul, while he lurked at Siklag, That they were weaponed with bowes, and could vſe the right and the left hand with ſtones; and with a ſling it was, that Dauid himſelfe ſlew the Gyant Goliah.

While the State of Iſrael ſtood in theſe hard termes, the Philiſtims hauing parted their armie into three troupes, that they might ſpoile and deſtroy many parts at once; Ionathan ſtrengthened by God, and followed with his Eſquire onely, ſcaled a mountaine, whereon a companie of Philiſtims were lodged: the reſt of their armie (as may bee gathered by the ſucceſſe) beeing incamped in the plaine adioyning. And though hee were diſcouered before he came to the hill top, and in a kinde of deriſion called vp by his enemies: yet hee ſo behaued himſelfe, as with the aſſiſtance of God hee ſlew twentie of the firſt Philiſtims that hee incountred. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarme, and being ignorant of the cauſe, fled away amazed altogether. In which confuſion, feare, and iealouſie, they ſlaughtered one another in ſtead of enemies: whereupon thoſe Hebrewes which became of their partie, becauſe they feared to be ſpoiled by them, tooke the aduantage of their deſtruction, and ſlew of them in great numbers. And laſtly, Saul himſelfe taking knowledge of the rout and diſorder, together with thoſe Iſraelites that ſhrouded themſelues in mount Ephraim, ſet vpon them and obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) a moſt happie and glorious victorie ouer them. Heere was that prophecie in Deuteronomie fulfilled by Ionathan, That one of thoſe which feared God, ſhould kill a thouſand, and two of them ten thouſand.

1.Sam.14.

This done, the ſmall armie of Iſrael made retrait from the purſuit. And though Saul had bound the people by an oath not to take foode till the euening, yet his ſonne Ionathan being infeebled with extreme labour and emptineſſe, taſted a drop of hony in his paſſage: for which Saul his father would haue put him to death, had not the people deliuered him from his crueltie.

The late miraculous victorie of Saul and Ionathan, ſeemes to haue reduced vnto the Philiſtims remembrance their former ouerthrow likewiſe miraculous in the daies of Samuel; ſo that for ſome ſpace of time they held themſelues quiet. In the meane while Saul being now greatly encouraged, vndertooke by turnes all his bordering enemies; namely, the Moabits, Ammonits, Edomits, and the Arabians of Zobah, againſt all which he preuailed. Hee then aſſembled all the forces hee could make, to wit, 210000. men, and receiuing the commaundement of God by Samuel, hee inuaded Amalec, waſting and deſtroying all that part of Arabia Petræa, and the deſart, belonging to the Amalekits, from Hauilah towards Tigris vnto Shur, which bordereth Ægypt; in which warre he tooke Agag their King priſoner. But whereas he was inſtructed by Samuel to follow this Nation without compaſſion, becauſe they firſt of all other attempted Iſrael, when they left Ægypt in Moſes time: he notwithſtanding did not onely ſpare the life of Agag, but reſerued the beſt of the beaſts and ſpoile of the Countrie, with pretence to offer them in ſacrifice to the liuing God. Therefore did Samuel now a ſecond time make him know, that God would caſt him from his roiall eſtate to which he was raiſed, when he was of baſe condition, and as the Text hath it, little in his owne eyes. And though the offence was great in Saul for not obeying the voice of God by Samuel, had there bin no former precept to that effect: yet ſeeing Saul could not be ignorant how ſeuerely it pleaſed God to inioyne the Iſraelites to reuenge themſelues vpō that Nation, he was in all vnexcuſable. For God had commanded that the Iſraelites ſhould put out the remembrance of AMALEC from vnder heauen. For the crueltie which the predeceſſors of this Agag vſed againſt the Iſraelites, eſpecially on thoſe which were ouerwearied, faint, ſicke, and aged people, was now to be reuenged on him, & his Nation aboue 400. yeeres afterward; and now hee was to pay the debt of bloud, which his forefathers borrowed from the innocent: himselfe hauing also sinned in the same kind, as these words of Samuel witnesse: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse, so shall thy mother be childlesse among other women; at which time Samuel himselfe (after he had bin by many bootlesse intreaties perswaded to stay awhile with Saul) did cut Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal, and soone after he departed to Ramath, and came no more to see SAVL, vntill the day of his death. 1.Sam.15.33.

§. V.

Of the occurrents betweene the reiection of SAVL and his death.

NOw while Samuel mourned for Saul, God commanded him to choose a King for Israel, among the sonnes of Isshai: which Samuel (doubting the violent hand of Saul) feared in a sort to performe, till it pleased God to direct him, how hee might auoid both the suspition, and the danger. And if Samuel knew that it was no way derogating from the prouidence of God, that by his cautious care and wisedome he sought to auoid the inconuenience or dangers of this life, then doe those men mistake the nature of his diuine ordinance, who neglecting the reason that God hath giuen them, doe no otherwise auoid the perills and dangers thereof, than as men stupified in the opinion of fate, or destinie, neglecting either to beg counsaile at Gods hand by prayer, or to exercise that wisedome or fore-sight, where-with God hath inriched the mind of man, for his preseruation. Neither did the all-powerfull God (who made and could destroy the world in an instant) disdaine here to instruct Samuel, to auoid the furie of Saul, by the accustomed cautious waies of the world.

Of the sonnes of Isshai, Samuel by God directed, made choise of Dauid, the yongest, hauing refused Eliab, the first borne: who though he were a man of a comely person and great strength; yet vnto such outward appearance the Lord had no respect. For as it is written, God seeth not as man seeth, &c. but the Lord beholdeth the heart. Hee also refusing the other sixe brethren, made choise of one whom his Father had altogether neglected, and left in the field to attend his flock; for of him the Lord said to SAMVEL, Arise and anoint him, for this is he: which done, Samuel departed & went to Ramath. Neither was it long after this that Saul began to seeke the life of Dauid: in which bloudy mind he continued til he died, ouercome in battaile by the Philistims. 1.Sam.16.

The Philistims hauing well considered (as it seemes) the increase of Saul his power through many victories by him obtained, whilest they had sitten still and forborne to giue impediment vnto his prosperous courses, thought it good to make new trial of their fortune, as iustly fearing that the wrongs which they had done to Israel might be repaied with aduantage, if euer opportunitie should serue their often iniured neighbours against them, as lately it had done against Moab, Ammon, and the rest of their ancient enemies. Now for the qualitie of their Souldiers, and all Warlike prouisions, the Philistims had reason to think themselues equall, if not superiours to Israel. The successe of their former wars had for the most part bin agreeable to their owne wishes; as for late disasters, they might, according to humane wisedome, impute them to second causes, as to a tempest happening by chance, and to a mistaken alarme, whereby their Armie possessed with a needlesse feare had fallen to rout. Hauing therefore mustered their forces and taken the field, encamping so neere to the Armie which King Saul drew forth against them, that they could not easily depart without the triall of a battaile, each part kept their ground of aduantage for a while, not ioyning in grosse, but maintaining some skirmishes, as refusing both of them to passe the valley that lay between their Camps. Iust causes of feare they had on both sides; especially the Philistims, whose late attempts had beene confounded by the angrie hand of God. Vpon this occasion perhaps it was, that they sought to decide the matter by single combat, as willing to try in one mans person, whether any ſtroake from heauen were to be feared. Goliah of Gath a ſtrong Giant, fearing neither God nor man, vndertooke to defie the whole hoſte of Iſrael, prouoking them with deſpightfull words, to appoint a Champion that might fight with him hand to hand, offering condition, that the partie vanquiſhed in Champion, ſhould hold it ſelfe as ouercome in groſſe, and become vaſſall to the other. This gaue occaſion to young Dauid, whom Samuel by Gods appointment had anointed, to make a famous entrance into publike notice of the people. For no man durſt expoſe himſelfe to encounter the great ſtrength of Goliah, vntill Dauid (ſent by his father of an errand to the campe) accepted the combat, and obtained the victorie, without other armes offenſiue or defenſiue than a ſling, wherewith hee ouerthrewe that haughtie Gyant, and after with his owne ſword ſtrooke off his head. Hereupon the Philiſtims, who ſhould haue yeelded themſelues as ſubiects to the Conquerour, according to the couenant on their owne ſide propounded, fled without ſtay; and were purſued and ſlaughtered euen to their owne gates. By this victorie the Philiſtims were not ſo broken, that either any of their townes were loſt, or their people diſcouraged from infeſting the Territories of Iſrael. But Dauid, by whom God had wrought this victorie, fell into the grieuous indignation of his maſter Saul, through the honour purchaſed by his well deſeruing. For after ſuch time as the ſpirit of God departed from Saul and came vpon Dauid, he then became a cruell Tyrant, faithleſſe, and irreligious. Becauſe the high Prieſt Abimelech fed Dauid in his neceſſitie with hallowed bread, and armed him with the ſword of his own conqueſt taken from Goliah; Saul not only by his wicked Edomite Doeg murthered this Abimelech and 85. Prieſts of Nob, but alſo he deſtroyed the Citie, and ſmote with the edge of the ſword both man and woman, both childe and ſuckling, both Oxe and Aſſe, and ſheepe. And he that had compaſſion on Agag the Amalekite, who was an enemy to God and his people, and alſo ſpared and preſerued the beſt of his Cattell, contrarie to the Commaundement and ordinance of God, both by Moſes and Samuel, had not now any mercie in ſtore, for the innocent, for the Lords ſeruants the Prieſts of Iſrael. Yea he would haue ſlaine his owne ſonne Ionathan, for pitying and pleading Dauids innocencie, as alſo once before for taſting the hony, when his fainting for hunger made him forget his fathers vnreaſonable commination. The companions of crueltie are breach of faith towards men, and impietie towards God. The former he ſhewed in denying Dauid his daughter, whom he had promiſed him: and againe in taking her away from him, to whom he had giuen her; alſo in that when as Dauid had twice ſpared his life in the Territory of Ziph, and Saul twice ſworne to do him no hurt, and confeſſed his errours, yet he ſought ſtill to deſtroy him, by all the meanes he could. His impietie towards God he ſhewed, in that he ſought counſell of the witch of Endor, which was the laſt preparatiue for his deſtruction. For whereas when he ſought counſel from God he had beene alwaies victorious: from the Oracle of the Deuil this ſucceſſe followed, that both himſelfe, and his three ſons, with his neereſt and faithfulleſt ſeruants, were all ſlaughtered by the Philiſtims: his bodie with the bodies of his ſonnes (as a ſpectacle of ſhame and diſhonour) were hung ouer the walls of Bethſan: and there had remained till they had found buriall in the bowels of rauenous birds, had not the gratefull Gileadites of Iabes ſtolne their carcaſes thence and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had gouerned Iſrael, together with Samuel 40. yeres, and by himſelfe after Samuel 20. yeeres, according to Cedrenus, Theophilus, and Ioſephus. But yet it ſeemeth to mee, that after the death of Samuel, Saul did not rule very long. For in the beginning of the 25. chapter, it is written that Samuel died: and in the reſt of the ſame chapter the paſſages are written of Dauid, Nabal, and Abigail, after which the death of Saul quickly enſued.

An exceeding valiant man he was, and gaue a faire entrance to all thoſe victories which Dauid afterward obtained, for he had beaten the Ammonites with their neighbouring Nations; cruſht the Syrians, and their adhærents; broken the ſtrength of the Amalekites; and greatly waſted the power and pride of the Philiſtims.

§. VI.

Of such as liued with SAMVEL and SAVL; of HELLEN and HERCVLES, and of their issues: vpon occasion of the DORES, with the HERACLIDAE, entring PELOPONESVS about this time.

IN the second yeere of Samuel, according to Eusebius, was Dauid borne: after Codoman later, and in the ninth yeere: after Bunting in the tenth. For Dauid, saith he, was thirtie yeeres old when he began to reigne: whence it followeth, that he was borne in the tenth of the fortie yeeres, which are giuen to Samuel and Saul. About the eleuenth of Samuel, Æneas Siluius the sonne of Posthumus began his raigne ouer the Latines in Alba, who gouerned that State 31. yeeres. There are who place before him Latinus Siluius, as brother to Posthumus, calling him the fifth from Æneas, and fourth King of Alba, whereof I will not stand to dispute. In the eleuenth of Samuel, Dercilus sate in the Throne of Assyria, being the one and thirtieth King; he ruled that Empire 40. yeeres. In this age of Samuel the Dores obtained Peloponnesus, and at once with the Heraclidæ, who then led and commanded the Nation, possest a great part thereof 328. yeeres before the first Olympiad, according to Diodorus and Eratosthenes. For all Greece was anciently possessed by three Tribes or Kindreds, viz. the Ionians, Dorians, and Æolians: at length it was called Helles, and the people Hellenes, of Hellen, the sonne of Deucalion, Lord of the Countrie of Pthiotis in Thessalie. But before the time of this Hellen, yea and long after, Greece had no name common to all the inhabitants, neither were the people called Hellenes, till such time as partly by trading in all parts of the Land, partly by the plantation of many Colonies, and sundrie great victories obtained, the issues of Hellen had reduced much of the Countrie vnder their obedience, calling themselues generally by one name, and yet euery seuerall Nation after some one of the posteritie of Hellen, who had raigned ouer it. And because this is the furthest antiquitie of Greece, it will not be amisse to recount the Pedigree of her first planters.

Iapetus (as the Poets fable) was the sonne of Heauen and Earth, so accounted, either because the names of his Parents, had in the Greeke tongue such signification: or perhaps for his knowledge in Astronomie and Philosophie.

Iapetus begat Prometheus, and Epimetheus: of whom all men haue read that haue read Poets. Prometheus begat Deucalion: and Epimetheus, Pyrrha. Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha raigned in Thessalie, which then was called Pyrrha (as Cretensis Rhianus affirmeth) of Pyrrha the Queene. In Deucalions time was that great floud, of which we haue spoken elsewhere. Deucalion begat Hellen: whose sonnes were Xuthus, Dorus, and Æolus: of Dorus and Æolus, the Dores and Æolians had name. The Æoles inhabited Bœotia. The Dores hauing first inhabited sundrie parts of Thessalie, did afterward seate themselues about Parnassus, and finally became Lords of the Countries about Lacedæmon: Xuthus the eldest sonne of Hellen, being banished by his bretheren, for hauing diuerted from them to his owne vse some part of their Fathers goods, came to Athens: where marrying the Daughter of King Erictheus, hee begat on her two sonnes, Achæus and Ion. Of these two, Achæus, for a slaughter by him committed, fled into Peloponnesus: and seating himselfe in Laconia, gaue name to that region: from whence (as some write) he afterwards departed; and leuying an Armie, recouered the Kingdome of his Grand-father in Thessalie.

Ion being Generall for the Athenians, when Eumolpus the Thracian inuaded Attica, did obtaine a great victorie, and thereby such loue and honour of the people, that they committed the ordering of their State into his hands. Hee diuided the Citizens into Tribes, appointing euery one to some occupation, or good course of life. When the people multiplied, he planted Colonies in Sycionia, then called Ægialos, or Ægialia: In which Countrie Selinus then raigning, thought it safer to giue his Daughter Helice in marriage to Ion, and make him his Heire, than to contend with him.

him. So Ion married Helice, and built a Towne called by his wiues name in Ægialia, where he and his posteritie raigned long, and (though not obliterating the old name) gaue to that Land the denomination. But in after-times the Dores assisting the Nephewes of Hercules, inuaded Peloponnesus, and ouer-comming the Achæans, possessed Laconia, and all those parts which the Achæi had formerly occupied. Hereupon the Achæi driuen to seeke a new seate, came vnto the Iones, desiring to inhabit Ægialia with them, and alleadging in vaine, that Ion and Achæus had beene brethren. When this request could not be obtained, they sought by force to expell the Ionians, which they performed; but they lost their King Tisamenes, the sonne of Orestes, in that Warre.

Thus were the Iones driuen out of Peloponnesus, and compelled to remoue into Attica, from whence after a while they sailed into Asia, and peopled the Westerne coast thereof, on which they built twelue Cities, inhabited by them, euen to this day, at the least without any vniuersall or memorable transmigration. This expedition of the Iones into Asia hath been mentioned of all which haue written of that Age, and is commonly placed 140. yeeres after the warre of Troy, and 60. yeeres after the descent of the Heraclidæ into Peloponnesus. These Heraclidæ were they of whom the Kings of Sparta issued; which race held that Kingdome about 700. yeeres. Of their Father Hercules many strange things are deliuered vnto vs by the Poets, of which some are like to haue beene true, others perhaps must be allegorically vnderstood. But the most approued Writers thinke that there were many called Hercules, all whose exploits were by the Greekes ascribed to the sonne of Alcmena, who is said to haue performed these twelue great labours.

First, he slew the Nemæan Lyon: secondly, he slew the Serpent Hydra, which had nine heads, whereof one being cut off, two grew in the place: The third was the ouer-taking a very swift Hare: The fourth was the taking of a wild Bore aliue, which hanted mount Erymanthus in Arcadie: The fift was the cleansing of Augias his Oxe-stall in one day, which hee performed by turning the Riuer Alpheus into it: The sixt was the chasing away of the Birds from the Lake Stymphalis: The seuenth was the fetching a Bull from Crete: The eighth was the taking of the Mares which Diomedes King of Thrace fed with humane flesh: The ninth was to fetch a Girdle of the Queene of the Amazons: The three last were, to fetch Gerions Beeues from Gades; the golden Apples of the Hesperides; and Cerberus from hell. The Mythologicall interpretation of these I purposely omit, as both ouer-long to be here set downe, and no lesse perplexed than the labours themselues. For some by Hercules vnderstand Fortitude, Prudence, and Constancie, interpreting the Monsters, Vices. Others make Hercules the Sunne, and his trauailes to be the twelue signes of the Zodiac. There are others who apply his workes historically to their owne conceits; as well assured, that the exposition cannot haue more vnlikelihood, than the fables: That he tooke Elis, Pylus, OEchalia, and other Townes, being assisted by such as either admired his vertues, or were beholding vnto him. Also that he slew many Thebues, and Tyrants, I take to be truly written, without addition of Poeticall vanitie. His trauailes through most parts of the world are, or may seeme, borrowed from Hercules Libycus. But sure it is that many Cities in Greece were greatly bound to him: for that he (bending all his indeuours to the common good) deliuered the Land from much oppression. But after his death no Citie of Greece (Athens excepted) requited the vertue and deserts of Hercules, with constant protection of his children, persequuted by the King Euristheus. This Euristheus was sonne of Sthenelus, and grand-child of Perseus; he raigned in Mycena, the mightiest Citie then in Greece. He it was that imposed those hard taskes vpon Hercules, who was bound to obay him (as Poets report) for expiation of that Murther, which in his madnesse he had committed vpon his owne Children; but as others say, because hee was his Subiect and Seruant: wherefore there are who commend Euristheus for imploying the strength of Hercules to so good a purpose. But it is generally agreed by the best writers, that Hercules was also of the stocke of Perseus, and holden in great iealousie by Eurystheus becausse of his vertue, which appeared more and more in the dangerous seruices, wherein hee was imployed, so that hee grew great in reputation and power through all Greece; and had by many wiues and Concubines aboue threescore children. These children Eurystheus would faine haue got into his power, when Hercules was dead: but they fled vnto Ceyx King of Trachinia, and from him (for he durst not withstand Eurystheus) to Athens. The Athenians not onely gaue them entertainement, but lent them ayd, wherewith they encountred Eurystheus. Iolaus the brothers sonne of Hercules, who had assisted him in many of his trauels, was captaine of the Heraclidæ. It is said of him, that being dead, he obtained leaue of Pluto to liue againe till hee might reuenge the iniuries done by Eurystheus: whom when hee had slaine in battell, hee died againe. It seemes to mee, that whereas he had led Colonies into Sicilie, and aboade there a long time forgotten: he came againe into Greece to assist his cousins, and afterwards returned back. When the Peloponnesians vnderstood that Eurystheus was slaine, they tooke Atreus the sonne of Pelops to their King: for hee was rich, mightie, and fauoured of the people. Against him the Heraclidæ marched vnder Hyllus the sonne of Hercules. But to auoid effusion of bloud, it was agreed, that Hyllus should fight with Echenus King of the Tegeatæ a people of Arcadia, who assisted Atreus, with condition, that if Hyllus were victor, hee should peaceably enioy what hee challenged as his right: otherwise the Heraclidæ should not enter Peloponnesus in 100. yeeres. In that combat Hyllus was slaine, and the Heraclidæ compelled to forbeare their Country, till the third generation: at which time they returned vnder Aristodemus (as the best authoritie shewes, though some haue said, that they came vnder the conduct of his children) and brought with them the Dores, whom they planted in that country, as is before shewed, hauing expelled the Achai, ouer whom the issue of Pelops had raigned after the death of Eurystheus foure generations.

§. VII.

Of HOMER and HESIOD, and many changes in the world, that happened about this age.

ABout this time that excellent learned Poet Homer liued, as many of the best Chronologers affirme. Hee was by race of the Maones, descended (as Functius imagineth) of Berosus his Anamaon, who gaue name to that people. But this Functius imagineth Homer the Poet to haue beene long after these times, rashly framing his Æra according to Archilochus in the tract, or rather fragment de temporibus; and makes seuen more of this name to haue florished in diuers Cities in Greece. Whence, perhaps, sprang the diuersitie of opinions, both of the time and of the natiue Citie of Homer. According to this Archilochus, Functius finds Homer about the time of Manasse King of Iuda, and Numa of Rome. He was called Melesigenes from the place of his birth, and at length Homer, becausse blind men follow a guide, which signification among others, is in the verbe ὁμηρεῖν: for this Homer in his latter time was blind. Clemens Alexandrinus* recites many different opinions touching the question of the time when Homer liued. So also [b] Aulus Gellius, and Tatianus Assyrius in his Oration ad gentes. Paterculus reckons that Homer florished 950. yeeres before the Consulship of Marcus Vinutius: which Mercator casteth vp in the worlds yeere 3046. and after Troy taken, about 260. yeeres: and about 250. yeeres before the building of Rome, making him to haue florished about the time of Iehosaphat King of Iuda. But Clemens Alexandrinus and Tatianus aboue named, mention authours that make him much ancienter. The difference of which authours in this point is not vnworthie the readers consideration, that by this one instance hee may gueesse of the difficultie, and so pardon the errours errours in the computations of ancient time: seeing in such diuersitie of opinions a man may hardly finde out what to follow. For Crates the Grammarian (as Clemens Alexandrinus reports) gaue being to Homer about 80. yeeres after Troy taken, neere the time that the Heraclidæ returned into Peloponnesus: and Eratosthenes* after Troy 100. yeeres. Theopompus 500. yeeres after the armie of Greece sailed into Phrygia for the warre of Troy. Euphorion makes him contemporarie with Gyges, who began to reigne in the 18. Olympiad (which was 45. yeeres after Rome was built) and Sosibius saith, that he was 90. yeeres before the first Olympiad: which hee seekes to proue by the times of Charillus and his sonne Nicander; Philocorus placeth him 180. after Troy: Aristarchus 140. in the time of the seating of the Colonies in Ionia. Apollodorus affirmes that hee liued while Agesilaus gouerned Lacedæmon; and that Lycurgus in his young yeeres, about 100. yeeres after the Ionian plantations, came to visit him, neere 240. yeeres after Troy taken. Herodotus findes Homer florishing 622. yeeres before Xerxes enterprise against the Gracians: which Beroaldus accounteth at 168. yeeres after the Troian warre. Eusebius seemes to make him to haue beene about the time of Ioas King of Iuda 124. yeeres before Rome built: though elswhere in his Chronologie he notes, that some place him in the time of Samuel, and others in the end of Dauid, and others in other ages. In his Euangelicall preparation, where out of Tatianus Assyrius he citeth sundry opinions touching the time when Homer liued, hee reckoneth many other Greeke writers more ancient than Homer; as Linus, Philammon, Epimenides, Phemius, Aristæus, Orpheus, Musæus, Thamyras, Amphion, and others.

* As both Cle. Alex. and Tatian. Assyr. report his opinion rerum Phil. 41. Ros. in disc. temporum. Phil. in comm. in Archilog.

Now whether Homer or Hesiodus were the elder, it is also much disputed. Aulus Gellius reports that Philochorus and Xenophanes affirme, that Homer preceded Hesiod: and on the contrarie, that Luc. Accius the Poet, and Ephorus the Historian make Hesiod of an elder time than Homer. Varro leaues it vncertaine which of these learned fablers was first borne: but he finds that they liued together some certaine yeeres, wherein he confirmes himselfe by an Epigram, written vpon a Treuit, and left by Hesion in Helicon.

Cornelius Nepos reports that they both liued 160. yeeres before Rome built: while the Siluij reigned in Alba, about [a] 140. yeeres after the fall of Troy. [b] Euthimenes findes them both 200. yeeres after Troy taken, in the time of Acastus the sonne of Pelias, King of Thessaly. For my selfe, I am not much troubled when this Poet liued; neither would I offend the Reader with these opinions, but onely to shew the vncertaintie and disagreement of Historians, aswell in this particular, as in all other questions and dispute of time. For the curiositie of this mans age is no lesse ridiculous, than the inquisition why he began his Iliades with the word Menin, as perhaps containing some great mysterie. In derision whereof Lucian fayning himselfe to haue beene in hell, and to haue spoken with Homer, there asked him the cause why he began his booke with that word: who answered, That he began in that sort, because it came in his head so to doe.

About the end of Sauls gouernment, or in the beginning of Dauids time according to Cassiodorus, the Amazones with the Cymmerians inuaded Asia, Latinus Syluius then ruling in Italie. And besides the ouerthrow of that famous State of Troy (which fell 103. yeeres before Dauids time) there were many other changes in the middle part of the world, not onely by reason of those Northerne Nations: but there sprung vp, somewhat neerely together, like Kingdomes into greatnesse not before erected. In Italie, that of the Latines: in the South part of Greece, those of Lacedæmon, Corinth, and the Achei. In Arabia, Syria Soba, and Damascus, the Adads made themselues Princes, of which there were tenne Kings, which began and ended with the King of Israel in effect: and somewhat before these, the State of the Israelites hauing now altered their forme of Gouernment, began to flourish vnder Kings, of which Dauid, in a few yeeres, became master of all those neighbouring Nations, who by interchange of times had subiected the Iudæans, corrupted their religion, and held them vnder in a most abiect, and grieuous slauerie; to wit, the Edumæans, Moabites, Ammonites, Midianites, Ituræans, and the rest of the Arabians, with the Philistims, Iebusites, Geshurites, Machathites, all which acknowledged Dauid for their Soueraigne Lord, and paid him tribute.

CHAP. XVII.

Of DAVID.

Of DAVIDS estate in the time of SAVL.

HE hazards which Dauid ran into while he was yet onely designed King, and liuing as a priuate man, expected the Empire, were very many. The first personall act of fame, was his killing of Goliah in the view of both armies, whereby hee became knowne to Saul, and so highly affected of Ionathan the sonne of Saul, that hee loued him as his owne soule: In so much as when Saul sought to perswade his sonne, that Dauid would assuredly be the ruine of his house, and estate, and offered him violence when he pleaded his cause, Ionathan could neuer be perswaded, neuer forst, nor cuer wearied from the care of Dauids life, and well doing. It was not long after this signall act of Dauids, but that Saul became exceeding iealous of him, though he were become as his houshold seruant, and his Esquire, or armour-bearer. Saul being vexed with an euill spirit, was aduised to procure some cunning Musician to play before him vpon the Harpe; whereby it was thought that hee might finde ease; which came to passe accordingly. He entertained Dauid for this purpose, and began to fauour him, giuing him a place of Commaund among the men of warre. But the iealous tyrant soone waxed wearie of his good affections, and sought to kill Dauid, being thereunto moued onely through enuie of his vertue. This passion first brake forth in the middest of his rauing fit, at which time hee threw a speare at Dauid that was then playing on his Harpe to doe him ease.

Censorinus remembreth one Asclepius a Physician, who practised the curing of the Frenzie, by the like Musick: and tempered thereby those diseases which grew from passion. That Pythagoras did also the like by such a kinde of harmonie, Seneca in his third booke of anger witnesseth. But the madnesse of Saul came from the cause of causes, and was thereby incurable, howsoeuer it sometimes left him, and yeelded vnto that Musicke, which God had ordained to be a meane of more good to the Musician than to the King. cens. 12. & 14

Saul hauing failed in such open attempts, gaue vnto Dauid the Commaundement of 1000. souldiours, to confront the Philistims withall. For hee durst not trust him as before, about his person, fearing his reuenge. Now the better to couer his hatred towards him, hee promised him his daughter Merab to wife: but hauing married her to Adriel, hee gaue to Dauid his younger daughter Michol, but with a condition, to present him with an hundred foreskinnes of the Philistims: hoping rather (in respect of the valour of that Nation, that the Philistims would take Dauids head, than hee their foreskinnes. This hope failing, when as now Dauids victories begat new feares and iealousies in Saul, hee practised with Ionathan, and afterwards with his owne hands attempted his life, but his purposes were still frustrated. After all this hee sought to murther him in his owne house, but Michol his wife deliuered him. So Dauid sought Samuel at Ramah, and being pursued by Saul, fled thence vnto Nob in Beniamin, to Abimelech, then to Achis the Philistim, Prince of Geth: where to obscure himselfe, he was forc't to counterfeit both simplicitie and distraction. But being ill assured among the Philistims, he couered himselfe in the Caue of Adullam: and after conueying such of his kinsfolks as were not fit to follow him into Moab, he hid himselfe in the desarts of Ziph, Maon, and the hilles of Engaddi, where hee cut off the lap of Sauls garments, and spared his life: as he did a second time in the desart of Ziph, after his passage with Nabal and Abigail. After which he repaired to Achis of Geth the second time, and was kindly entertained in regard of the hatred, with which his master Saul was knowne to prosecute him.

Iansen in Psal.

Of Achis Dauid obtained * Siklag in Simeon, pretending to inuade Iudæa: but hee bent his forces another way and strooke the Amalekites, with other enemies of Israel, letting none liue to complaine vpon him. Achis supposing that Dauid had drawne bloud of his owne Nation, thought himselfe assured of him; and therefore preparing to inuade Israel, summoneth Dauid to assist him, who dissembling his intent, seemeth very willing thereto. But the rest of the Philistim Princes knowing his valour, and doubting his disposition, liked not his company, and therefore hee withdrew himselfe to Siklag. At his returne he found the towne burnt, his two wiues with the wiues and children of his people taken by the Amalekites: Hereupon his fellowes mutined, but God gaue him comfort, and assurance to recouer all againe: which he did.

* It seemeth that Simeon neuer obtained Siglag till this time, for it is said in the 1. of Sam. c. 27. v. 6. therefore Siglag pertaineth vnto the King of Iuda vnto this day.

This armie of the Philistims commaunded by Achis, encountred Saul at Gilboa, in which hee and his three sonnes were slaine. The newes with Sauls Crowne and bracelets were brought to Dauid at Siklag, in his returne from being victorious ouer Amalech, by a man of the same Nation, who auowed (though falsly) that himselfe at Sauls requeft had slaine him. Dauid, because hee had accused himselfe, made no scruple to cause him to be slaine at the instant: and the sooner, because the probabilities gaue strong euidence withall. Otherwise it followeth not that euery man ought to bee beleeued of himselfe to his owne preiudice. For it is held in the lawe; Confessio reorum non habenda est pro explorato crimine, nisi approbatio alia instruit religionem cognoscentis. The prisoners confession must not be taken for an euidence of the crime, vnlesse some other proofe informe the conscience of the Iudge. For a man may confesse those things of himselfe, that the Iudge by examination may know to bee impossible. But because it is otherwise determined in the title de custodia reorum l. si confessus, et in cap. de pœnis l. qui sententiam, therfore doth the Glosse reconcile these two places in this sort: Si quis in iudicio sponte de seipso confiteatur, & postea maneat in confessione, id est satis. If any man in iudgement doe confesse of himselfe, of his owne accord, and after doth perseuere in his confession, it is enough. That Dauid greatly bewailed Saul it is not improbable, for death cutteth asunder all competition: and the lamentable end that befell him, being a King, with whom in effect the strength of Israel also fell, could not but stirre vp sorrow, and moue compassion in the heart of Dauid.

2. Sam. 1.
In F. de quæst. l. prim.

The victorie which the Philistims had gotten was so great, that some townes of the Israelites, euen beyond the riuer of Iordan, were abandoned by the inhabitants, and left vnto the enemie, who tooke possession of them without any resistance made. Wherefore it may seeme strange, that a Nation so warlike and ambitious as were the Philistims, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and seeke to make the Conquest entire. Most like it seemes, that the Ciuill warre immediatly breaking out betweene Dauid and the house of Saul, wherein Iuda was diuided from the rest of Israel, gaue them hope of an easie victorie ouer both; and thereby caused sed them to attempt nothing at the present, lest by so doing they should inforce their disagreeing enemies to a necessarie reconciliation; but rather to permit that the one part should consume the other, by which meanes, both the victors, and the vanquished, would become a prey to the violence of such as had beaten them, when their forces were vnited.

§. II.

Of the beginning of DAVIDS reigne, and the warre made by ABNER for ISBOSETH.

After the death of Saul, Abner, who commaunded for Saul in the war, sought to aduance Isboseth (or Ieboſtius according to Iosephus) though hee had no right to the Kingdome of Israel: for Mephiboseth the first sonne of Ionathan liued. Against this Abner, and Isboseth, Dauid made a defensiue warre, till Abner past Iordan, and entred the border of Iuda; at which time he sent Ioab with such forces as he had, to resist Abner: Isboseth remaining in Gilead, and Dauid in Hebron. The armies encountred each other neere Gibeon, where it seemeth, that Abner made the offer to trie the quarrell by the hands of a few; like to that Combat betweene the Lacedæmonians, and the Argiues, remembred by Herodotus, 300. being chosen of each Nation, of which number three persons were onely left vnslaine. The like triall by a farre lesse number was performed by the Horatij and Curiatij for the Romanes and Latines. The same challenge Goliah the Philistim made, whom Dauid slew: a custome very ancient. Edward the third offered the like triall in his owne person to the French King; and Francis the French King to Charles the Emperour. There were twelue chosen of each part, in this warre of Dauid with the house of Saul, to wit, so many of Beniamin, and as many of Iuda: whose force and valour was so equall, as there suruiued not any one to challenge the victorie. But the quarrell staid not here: for the armie of Iuda prest Abner in grosse, and brake him. Three hundreth and sixtie men of Abners companions were slaine, and but twentie of Iuda; whereof Asahel the brother of Ioab was one: who when he would needs pursue Abner, and by Abners perswasions could not be moued to quit him, he was forced to turne vpon him, wounding him to death, with the stroake of his speare. For though Asahel were an excellent footman, and as it is written in the Text, as light as a wild Roe, and as Iosephus reporteth, contended not onely with men, but with horses; and hoped to haue gotten great fame, if he could haue mastered Abner (who as Asahel perswaded himselfe, had by being ouerthrowne and flying away lost his courage) yet here it fell out true; That the race is not to the swift. 2. Sam. 2. Eccles.

That this ciuill warre lasted two yeeres, wee finde it written in the second of Samuel the second Chapter; though in the beginning of the third it is againe made probable, that this contention dured longer; and therefore the matter resteth still in dispute, and some of the Rabbines conceiue that Isboseth had then reigned two yeeres, when this was written, the warre as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the partie of Isboseth after this, and till such time as there grew iealousie betweene him and Isboseth for Sauls concubine: neither did the death of Isboseth instantly follow; but how long after the murther of Abner it happened, the same doth not certainly appeare. Vers. 10.

§. III.

§. III.

Of the death of ABNER slaine by IOAB, and of ISBOSETH by RECHAB and BAANAH.

2. Sam. 3. 27. ABner, reconciled to Dauid, was anon by Ioab murdered; for Ioab could not endure a companion in Dauids fauour, and in the commandement of his forces, by which hee was growne so powerfull, as Dauid forbare to call him to account; for thus much hee confesseth of himselfe: 2. Sam. 3. 39. I am this day weake, and these men the sonnes of ZERVIAH bee too hard for mee. In this sort Dauid complained after Abners death; and to make it cleare that hee hated this fact of Ioab, hee followed him with this publike imprecation; Vers. 29. Let the bloud fall on the head of IOAB, and on all his fathers house: and let them be subiect to vlcers, to the leprosie, to lamenesse, to the sword, and to pouertie, &c. For could any thing haue withstood the ordinance of God, this murther committed by Ioab might greatly haue indangered Dauids estate, Abner being the mouth and trust of all the rest of the Tribes, not yet reconciled. This mischaunce therefore Dauid openly bewailed, so that all Israel perceiued him to bee innocent of that fact. The place which Abner held, being Generall of the men of warre, was of such importance, that the Kings themselues were faine to giue them great respect, as hath bene alreadie shewed more at large. This office Ioab held in the armie of Iuda, & thought himselfe worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtaine the whole Kingdome. For hee was neere to Dauid in kinred, and had beene partaker of all his aduersitie; wherefore hee did not thinke it meete, that an old enemie should in reward of new benefits, be made his partner. Indeed he was by nature so ielous of his dignitie and place, that hee afterward slew Amasa his owne kinsman, and the Kings, vpon the same quarrell, taking it in high disdaine to see him ioyned with himselfe as captaine of the hoste of Iuda; much lesse could hee brooke a superiour, and such a one as had slaine his brother, and beene beaten himselfe in battell. But howsoeuer Ioab did hate or despise Abner, Dauid esteemed highly of him as of a Prince, and a great man in Israel, excusing the ouersight by which he might seeme to haue perished, by affirming that hee died not like a foole, nor a man vanquished, 2. Sam. 3. Vers. 34. But as a man falleth before wicked men, so (said hee) diddest thou fall. And certainly it is no errour of wit, nor want of valour and vertue in him whom a stronger hand destroyeth vnawares, or whom subtiltie in free trust bringeth to confusion. For all vnder the Sunne are subiect to worldly miseries and misaduentures. Howsoeuer Isboseth meant to haue dealt with Abner, yet when he heard of his death, hee despaired greatly of his estate, and with him all Israel were possest with great feare: insomuch as two of Isboseths owne Captaines, Rechab and Baanah, murthered Isboseth, 2. Sam. 4. and presenting his head to Dauid, receiued the same reward that the Amalekite lately did, for pretending to haue slaine Saul. Isboseth being dead, all the Elders of Israel repaired to Dauid at Hebron, where he was the third and last time anointed by generall consent.

§. IIII.

Of the flourishing time of DAVIDS Kingdome, the taking of Ierusalem, with two ouerthrowes giuen to the Philistims, and the conduction of the Arke to the Citie of DAVID.

WHen Dauid was now established in the Kingdome, his first enterprise was vpon the Iebusites, who in derision of his force, and confident in the strength of the place (as is thought) manned their walles with the 2. Sam. 5. blinde and lame of their Citie; which Dauid soone after entred: all their other forces notwithstanding. For hauing mastered the fort of Zion (which was afterward the Citie of Dauid) hee became Lord of Hieruſalem, without any great danger, expelling thence the Iebuſites, who had held it from the foundation, to the times of Moſes and Ioſua, and after them almoſt 400. yeeres. There are who expound this place otherwiſe: Except thou take away the blinde and the lame, thou ſhalt not come in hither. For ſome thinke that it was meant by the Idols of the Iebuſites: others, that it had reference to the Couenant made long before with Iſaac, and Iacob: the one blinde by nature and age, the other made lame by wreſtling with the Angell, and that therefore till thoſe (that is, till that Couenant) be broken, Dauid ought not to moleſt them. But for my ſelfe I take it with Ioſephus, that they armed their wals with certaine impotent people at firſt, in ſcorne of Dauids attempt. For they that had held their Citie about 400. yeeres againſt all the children of Iſrael, Ioſua, the Iudges, and Saul, did not doubt but to defend it alſo againſt Dauid.

Zion

When he had now poſſeſt himſelfe of the very heart and Center of the Kingdom, and receiued congratulatorie Embaſſadours & preſents from Hiram King of Tyre: he entertained diuers other concubines & married moe wiues, by whom he had ten ſons in Ieruſalem, and by his former wiues he had ſix in Hebron where he reigned 7. yeeres.

The Philiſtims hearing that Dauid was now anointed king, as well of Iuda as of Iſrael, they thought to try him in the beginning, before hee was fully warme in his ſeat. And being encountred by Dauid at two ſeuerall times in the Valley of Rephaim, or of the Giants, they were at both times ouerthrowne. After which hee called the place Baalperazim. 2. Sam. 5.

Then Dauid aſſembled 30000. choice Iſraelites to conduct the Arke of God from the houſe of Abinadab in Gibea, to the Citie of Dauid, which buſineſſe was interrupted by the death of Vzzah the ſonne of Aminadab, whom the Lord ſlewe for preſuming to touch the Arke, though it were with intent to ſtay it from taking harme, when it was ſhaken. But after three yeeres it was with great ſolemnitie brought into the Citie with ſacrifices, muſicke, dances, and all ſignes of ioyfulneſſe, in which Dauid himſelfe gladly bare a part. Hereupon Michol derided him for dancing before the Arke, and afterward told him in ſcorne, That hee was vncouered as a foole in the eyes of the maidens his ſeruants; namely that hee forgat his regall dignitie both in apparrell and behauiour; and mixed himſelfe among the baſe multitude, dancing as fooles doe in the wayes and ſtreetes: not that ſhee diſliked Dauids behauiour (as I take it) though ſhe made it the colour of her deriſion. But rather the aboundant griefe, which this ſpectacle ſtirred vp, beholding, the glorie of her huſband to whom ſhee was deliuered laſtly by force, and remembring the miſerable end of her father and brethren, out of whoſe ruines ſhe conceiued that the ſonne of Iſhai had built this his greatneſſe, together with the many new wiues and concubines imbraced ſince his poſſeſſion of Ieruſalem, made her breake out in thoſe deſpitefull tearmes, for which ſhe remained barren to her death.

This done, Dauid conſulted with the Prophet Nathan for the building of the Temple or houſe of God: but was forbidden it, becauſe he was a man of warre, and had ſhed bloud. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all deteſt homicide; hauing threatned, not in vaine, that hee would require the bloud of man, at the hand of man and beaſt. The warres which Dauid had made were iuſt, and the bloud therein ſhed was of the enemies of God, and his Church: yet for this cauſe it was not permitted that his hands ſhould lay the foundation of that holy Temple. Hereby it appeares how greatly thoſe Princes deceiue themſelues, who thinke by bloudſhed and terrour of their warres, to make themſelues in greatnes like to the Almightie, which is a damnable pride; not caring to imitate his mercie and goodneſſe, or ſeeke the bleſſedneſſe promiſed by our Sauiour vnto the peacemakers. 1. Chron. 22. v. 3.

Now although it was not pleaſing to the Lord to accept a Temple of Dauids founding, yet was his religious intent ſo well accepted, that hereupon hee receiued both a confirmation of the Kingdom to him and his heirs, and that happie promiſe of the euerlaſting throne, that ſhould be eſtabliſhed in his ſeede.

§. V.

The ouerthrow of the Philistims and Moabites.

2. Sam. 8. v. 1. SOone after this Dauid ouerthrew the Philistims, which made them altogether powerlesse, and vnable to make any inuasion vpon Israel in haste. For it is written, Accepit frænum Amgaris è manu Philisthæorum; which place our English Geneua conuerts in these words, And DAVID tooke the bridle of bondage out of the hand of the Philistims. The Latine of Iunius giueth another and a better sense; for by that bridle of Amgar was meant the strong Citie of Gath, or Geth, and so the Geneua hath it in the marginall note. This Citie of Gath was the same which was afterward Dio-Cæsaria, set on the frontier of Palæstina at the entrance into Iudæa and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and thereinto their retrait in all their inuasions, which being taken by Dauid and demolished, there was left no such frontier towne of equall strength to the Philistims on that part. The hill whereon Geth or Gath stood, the Hebrewes cal Amma, whereof and of the word Gar is made Amgar, of which Plinie in his first booke, and thirteenth Chap. This exposition is made plaine and confirmed in the first of Chro. the 18.

Iunius in 8. c. of the second of Sam.

There was no nation bordering the Iewes that so greatly afflicted them as the Philistims did, who before the time of Saul, (to the end they might not sharpen any weapon against them) did not leaue one Smith in al their Cities & villages of that kinde, but inforst them to come downe into their territorie, for all iron worke whatsoeuer they needed; so as the Israelites till this time of Dauid were seldome free from paying tribute to the Philistims.

1. Sam. 13.

After this he gaue them foure other ouerthrowes: but the war of the Moabites and Arabians came betweene. In the first of which he was indangered by Ishbi-benob, the head of whose speare weighed 300. shickles of brasse, which make nine pound three quarters of our poizes: at which time Abishai succoured Dauid and slew the Philistim, whereupon the Councellors and Captaines of Dauid (lest the light of Israel might by his losse be quenched) vowed that he should not thencefoorth hazard himself in any battaile. The second and third incounter and ouerthrow of the Philistims was at Gob a place neere Gesar, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better assured of the Philistims by the taking of Geth, hee inuaded Moab, from whom notwithstanding in his aduersitie hee sought succour and left his parents with him in trust. But whether it were the same King or no it is not knowne.

2. Sam. 21. v. 17.

The Rabines faine that Moab slew those kinsfolkes of Dauid, which liued vnder his protection in Sauls time, but questionlesse Dauid well knew how that Nation had bin alwayes enemies to Israel, and tooke all the occasions to vexe them that were offered. And he also remembred that in the 23. of Deuter. God commaunded Israel not to seeke the peace or prosperitie of the Moabites, which Dauid well obserued, for he destroyed two parts of all the people, leauing a third to till the ground. This victorie obtained, he led his armie by the border of Ammon towards Syria Zobah, the region of Adadezer the sonne of Rehob King thereof. The place is set downe in the description of the holy Land: to which I referre the Reader.

§. VI.

The warre which DAVID made vpon the Syrians.

IT is written in the Text: DAVID smote also HADADEZER &c. as hee went to recouer his border at the riuer Euphrates. Now whether the words (as hee went to recouer his border) be referred to Dauid or Hadadezer it is not agreed vpon. Iunius thinkes that the article (he) hath relation to Dauid, who finding Toha oppresst by Hadadezer, ouerthrew threw the one and ſuccoured the other. But the ancient and moſt receiued opinion, that this recouerie hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if Dauid had intended any ſuch enterprize towards Euphrates, hee was in farre better caſe to haue proceeded after his victorie than before: ſeeing that (Adadezer being taken) he had now left no enemie on his backe, either to purſue him, to take victuals and ſupplies from him, or to ſtop the paſſages of the mountaines vpon him at his returne.

Againe, ſeeing Dauid was either to paſſe through a part of Arabia the deſart, or by the plains of Palmyrena, his armie conſiſting of footmen, for the moſt, if not all: Hee had now both horſe and chariots good ſtore to carry his prouiſions through thoſe vncultiued places, by which he was to haue marched before he could haue reached Euphrates or any part thereof. But we find that Dauid returned to Hieruſalem, after hee had twice ouerthrowne the Syrian armie, not bending his courſe towards the riuer Euphrates, but ſeeking to eſtabliſh his purchaſes alreadie made. Whereby it may appeare, that it was the Syrian, and not King Dauid, that was going to inlarge his border, as afore is ſaid.

The king of Syria Damaſcena, and of Damaſcus, wherof that region is ſo called, hearing that Adadezer was ouerthrowne by the Iſraelites, fearing his owne eſtate, & the loſſe of his owne country which adioyned to Syria Zobah of Hadadezer, ſent for an army of Aramites or Syrians to his ſuccour: but theſe, as it appeareth, came too late for Adadezer, and too ſoone for themſelues: for there periſhed of thoſe ſupplies 22000. This king of Damaſcus, Ioſephus (out of Nicholaus an ancient Hiſtorian) calleth Adad, who was alſo of the ſame name & family as all thoſe other Adads were: which now began to grow vp in greatneſſe, and ſo continued for ten deſcents, till they were extinguiſhed by the Aſſyrians, as is ſhewed heretofore. Dauid hauing now reduced Damaſcus vnder his obedience, left a garriſon therin, as he did in Edom: hauing alſo ſackt the adioyning cities of Betah, and Berati, belonging to Adadezer, of which Cities Ptolomy calleth Betah, Tauba: and Berathi he nameth Barathena. Tohu or Thoi whoſe country of Hamath ioyned to Adadezer (as in the deſcription of the Holy land the reader may perceiue) ſent his ſon Ioram to congratulate this ſucceſſe of Dauid: partly becauſe he had warre with Adadezer, and partly becauſe he feared Dauid now victorious. He alſo preſented Dauid with veſſels of gold, ſiluer, and braſſe, all which together with the golden ſhields of the Aramites, and the beſt of all the ſpoils of other Nations, Dauid dedicated vnto God at his returne. Iunius tranſlated the words (clypeos aureos) by vmbones, as if all the parts of the targets were not of gold but the boſſes only. The Septuagint call them bracelets: Aquila, golden chaines. But becauſe Roboam made ſhields of braſſe in place of theſe of Adadezer, at ſuch time as Shiſak the Ægyptian ſackt the Temple of Hieruſalem, it may be gathered thereby, that thoſe of Adadezer were golden ſhelds. 2.*Sam.*8.

This done, Dauid ſent Embaſſadours to Hanum King of the Ammonites to congratulate his eſtabliſhment in his fathers Kingdome: for Dauid in the time of his affliction vnder Saul, had beene relieued by Nahaſh, the father of Hanum. But this Ammonite being ill aduiſed, and ouer-icalous of his eſtate, vſed Dauids meſſengers ſo barbarouſly, and contemptuouſly (by curtailing their beardes, and their garments) as he thereby drew a warre vpon himſelfe, which neither his owne ſtrength, nor all the aydes purchaſed could put off, or ſuſtaine. For notwithſtanding that hee had waged three and thirtie thouſand Souldiers of the Amalekites, and their confederates; to wit, of the vaſſalles of Adadezer twentie thouſand, and of Maachah and Iſhtob thirteene thouſand (for which hee diſburſed a thouſand talents of ſiluer) yet all theſe great armies together with the ſtrength of the Ammonites, were by Ioab and his brother Abiſhai eaſily broken and put to ruine: and that without any great loſſe or ſlaughter at that time. And it is written that when the Aramites fled, the Ammonites alſo retraited into their Cities, the one holding themſelues within the walles, the other in their deſarts adioyning, till Ioab was returned to Hieruſalem. 2.*Sam.*1.

2.*Sam.*10.

Hadadezer hearing that Ioab had dismissed his armie, assembled his forces againe, and sent for all the companies that he could leuie out of Mesopotamia, who vnder the command of Shobach passed Euphrates, and incamped at Helam, on the South side thereof. Dauid hearing of this new preparation, assembled all the ablest men of Israel, and marched towards the Syrian armie in Palmyrena, not yet entred into Arabia; to wit, at Helam, a place no lesse distant from Damascus, towards the Northeast, than Hierusalem was towards the Southwest. Now Dauid (speaking humanely) might with the more confidence goe on towards Euphrates (which was the farthest-off iourney that euer he made) because he was now Lord of Damascus, which lay in the mid-way. He also possest himselfe of Thadmor* or Palmyrena, which Salomon afterward strongly fortified, and this Citie was but one dayes iourney from Helam, and the riuer Euphrates. So had he two safe retraites, the one to Thadmor, and the next from thence to Damascus. In this incounter between Dauid and the Syrians, they lost 40000 horsemen, and 700. chariots, together with Shobach Generall of their armie. The Chronicles call these 40000. Souldiers footmen, and so Iunius conuerts it, and so is it very probable. For the armie of Israel consisting of footemen, could hardly haue slaughtered 40000. horsemen, except they quitted their horse and fought on foote. So are the chariots taken in this battell, numbred at 7000. in the first of Chron. the 9. in which number, as I conceiue, all the Souldiers that serued in them with the conductors are included: so as there died of the Syrians in this warre against Dauid, before he forc't them to tribute; 100000. footmen, besides all their horsemen and waggoners, and besides all those that Ioab slew, when they fled at the first encounter, together with the Ammonites before Rabba. Notwithstanding all which, the Adads in following ages gathered strength againe, and afflicted the Kings of Iuda often: but the Kings of Israel they impouerished euen to the last end of that State.

* See c. 18. §. 2.

Dauid hauing now beaten the Arabians and Mesopotamians from the partie and confederacie of Ammon: He sent out Ioab the Lieutenant of his armies to forradge and destroy their territorie, and to besiege Rabbah, afterward Philadelphia, which after a while the Israelites mastered and possest. The Kings crowne which weighed a talent of gold, garnished with precious stones, Dauid set on his owne head, and carried away with him the rest of the riches and spoile of the Citie. And though Dauid stayed at Hierusalem, following the warre of Vriah his wife, till such time as the Citie was brought to extremitie, and readie to be entred: yet Ioab in honour of Dauid forbare the last assault, and entrance thereof, till his masters arriuall. To the people he vsed extreme rigour (if wee may so call it being exercised against heathen Idolaters) for some of them he tare with harrowes, some he sawed asunder, others he cast into burning kils, in which he baked tile and bricke.

§. VII.

Of DAVIDS troubles in his reigne, and of his forces.

BVt as victorie begetteth securitie, and our present worldly felicitie a forgetfulnesse of our former miseries, and many times of God himselfe the giuer of all goodnesse: so did these changes, in the fortune and state of this good King, change also the zealous care which formerly hee had to please God in the precise obseruation of his Lawes and Commaundements. For hauing now no dangerous apparant enemie (against whom hee was wont to aske counsaile from the Lord) hee beganne to be aduised by his owne humane affections and vaine desires. For hee was not only satisfied to take Vriahs wife from him, and to vse her by stealth: but hee imbrodered his adultery with Vriahs slaughter, giuing order to his trustie seruant

Ioab

Ioab to marshall him in the front or point of those Israelites, which gaue an assault vpon the suburbes of Rabba, when there was not as yet any possibilitie of preuailing. And, that which could no lesse displease God than the rest, he was content that many others of his best seruants and Souldiers should perish together with Vriah, hoping thereby to couer his particular ill intent against him. After which he began by degrees to fall from the highest of happinesse; and his dayes then to come were filled with ioyes and woes interchangeable, his trodden-downe sorrowes began againe to spring; and those perils which he had pulled vp by the rootes (as he hoped) gaue him an after-haruest of many cares and discontentments. And if it had pleased God to take the witnesse of Dauids owne mouth against him, as Dauid himselfe did against the Amalekite, which pretended to haue slaine Saul, he had then appeared as worthy of reprehension as the other was of the death he suffered. For when Nathan the Prophet propounded vnto him his owne errour, in the person of another, to wit, of him that tooke the poore mans sheepe that had none else, the bereauer being Lord of many: He then vowed it to the liuing Lord, that such a one should die the death. And hereof, although it pleased God to pardon Dauid, for his life, which remission the Prophet Nathan pronounced: yet he deliuered him Gods iustice together with his mercie in the tenour following; Now therefore the sword shall neuer depart from thy house, &c. Because thou hast taken his wife to be thy wife, and hast slaine VRIAH with the sword of the children of Ammon. Soone after this Dauid lost the childe of adulterie which he begot on Bersheba. Secondly, his owne sonne Amnon being in loue with his halfe sister Thamar, by the aduice of his Cousin german the sonne of Shimeah Dauids brother, possest her by force: which when he had performed, he thrust her from him in a careless and despightfull manner. Two yeeres after which foule and incestuous act, Absalom caused him to be murthered, at the feast of his sheep-shearing; not perchance in reuenge of Thamars rauishment alone: but hauing it in his heart to vsurpe the Kingdome; in which, because he could not in any sort be assured of Amnon, hee thought his affaire greatly aduanced by his destruction. So the one brother hauing rauished his owne sister, and then despised her; the other after a long dissembled malice, first, made his owne brother drunken, and then slaughtered him; which done he fled away, and liued vnder the sauegard of Talmai King of Gessur, neere Damascus, who was his grandfather by the mother, but a heathen King. Thirdly, when Absalom by the inuention of Ioab, (but chiefly because of the great affection of Dauid towards his sonne) was brought againe: first to the Kings fauour, and then to his presence: He began instantly to practise against Dauid his father, seeking by the pretence of common iustice, and by lowly and familiar manner to all men, and by detracting from his fathers equitie, to win vnto himselfe a popular reputation. Here began the great affliction, threatned by the Lord as a punishment of Dauids sinne.

1.*Sam.*11.15.
2.*Sam.*12. *vers.*9 and 10.
2.*Sam.*17.
2.*Sam.*14.

The company which Absalom gathered at the first were but 200. men: which he carried with him from Hierusalem to Hebron; pretending, though impiously, the performance of a vow to God. There when Achitophel repaired vnto him, and many troopes of people from all places, he proclaimed himselfe King, and was by the people (whose hearts God had turned from their lawfull Prince) accepted so readily, that Dauid doubting to be set vpon on the suddaine, durst not trust himselfe in his owne Citie of Hierusalem, nor in any other walled towne for feare of surprise: but incamped in the fields, & desarts with some 600. of his gards, and few else. The priests he left in Hierusalem with the Arke of God, from whom he desired to be aduertised of those things that chanced, to whom he directed Hushai his trustie friend, and seruant, praying him to make himselfe in all his outward actions and councels of Absaloms partie and confederacie, thereby the better to discouer vnto him the purposes of Achitophel, a reuolted Counsailor, whose practices he greatly doubted. And now when treason was in fashion, Ziba also sought to betray his master Mephiboseth the sonne of Ionathan: And Shimei of the house of Saul (the fire of whose hatred Dauids prosperitie had smothered, but his aduersitie illightened) holding himselfe vpon the aduantage of a mountaine side, cast stones at 2.*Sam.*16. Dauid, and most despightfully cursed him to his face: but Dauid attending no priuate reuenges, forbadde Abishai to pursue him for the present, yet left him among others in the rolle of his reuenge, to his sonne Salomon. Absalom being now possest of Hierusalem, was aduised by Achitophel to vse his fathers concubines in some such publique place, as all Israel might assure themselues, that hee was irreconciliable to his father: whereof being perswaded, they would then resoluedly adhere to Absalom and his cause, without feare of being giuen vp vpon a reconciliation betweene

2.*Sam.*17. them. This saluage and impious (though craftie counsaile) Achitophel indeed vrged for his owne respect, as fearing that this rebellion might take end to his destruction; who most of all other inflamed Absalom against his father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly foretold Dauid: I will raise vp euill against thee out of thine owne house, and will take thy wiues before thine eyes, and giue them vnto thy neighbour, and hee shall lye with thy wiues in the sight of the Sunne: for thou diddest it secretly, but I will doe this thing before all Israel, and before the Sunne. Hee also gaue aduice to Absalom, that himselfe with an armie of 12000. men might bee imployed at the in-
2.*Sam.*17.v.14. stant for the suprizing of Dauid, which had willingly beene imbraced by Absalom, had not Hushai Dauids faithfull seruant giuen counter-aduice, and swayed it: perswading Absalom, that it was fitter and more safe for him with all the strength of Israel, to pursue his father, then by such a troope, which Dauids valour and those of his attendants might either indanger or resist. This delay in Absalom, and aduantage of time gained by Dauid, was indeed, after God, the losse of the one and deliuerie of
2.*Sam.*17.23. the other. Whereupon Achitophel rightly fearing (by the occasion fore-shewed) the successe which followed, disposed of his owne estate, and then forsooke both the partie and the care of Absalom, and of his owne life.

Dauid being aduertised of this enterprize against him, marched away all night, and past Iordan, possessing himselfe of Mahanaim in the tribe of Gad: the same wherein Isboseth himselfe in the warre against Dauid after Sauls death seated himselfe. To which place there repayred vnto him Shobi, the sonne of Nahash the Ammonite, whom Dauid loued, the same which Iosephus calleth Shiphar. And though it bee greatly disputed, what this Shobi was, yet the most generall and probable opinion makes him a second brother to Hanum, whom Dauid for his fathers sake established in the Kingdome, after Hanums ouerthrow. In thankfulnesse whereof hee relieued Dauid in this his extremitie. There came also to Dauids assistance Machir of Lodabar, Gardian in former times to Mephiboseth, and among others Barzillai the Gileadite, who willingly fed Dauid and all his companie.

In the meane time both the King and Absalom prepared to fight; Absalom made Amasa Commaunder of the armie of Israel, the same place which Ioab held with Dauid; an office next the King himselfe, like vnto that of the Maiors of the Palace aunciently in Fraunce. Dauid, perswaded by his companie, stayed in Mahanaim, and disposed the forces hee had to Ioab, Abishai, and Ittai, giuing them charge in the hearing of all that issued out of the port of Mahanaim, that they should spare the life of Absalom. But Ioab, besides that he was very cruell by nature, remembred that Absalom had lately disposed of his Gouernement to Amasa, and therefore the victo-15 rie being obtained, and newes brought him that Absalom hung by the haire of his 16 head on a tree, when he could not perswade the messenger to returne and kill him,
2.*Sam.*18.14. hee himselfe with his owne seruants dispatcht him. It appeared also by the sequell
2.*Sam.*18. that Ioab affected Adonijah whom hee afterward acknowledged, Dauid yet liuing; and fearing the disposition of Absalom, he imbraced the present aduantage offered.

Hereof, together with newes of the victorie, when knowledge was brought to Dauid, he mourned and sorrowed, not onely as a man that had lost a sonne, but as one that had outliued all his worldly ioyes, and seene euery delight of life interred. For hee so hid himselfe from his people, as those which hoped for honour and reward ward after ſo great a victory, couered themſelues alſo in the Citie, as if they had committed the greateſt offences, and had rather deſerued death than recompence. Whereupon Ioab preſenting himſelfe before Dauid, perſwaded him to diſſemble his ſorrow for the preſent, and to ſhew himſelfe to the Armie. For firſt he told him that he had diſcountenanced his faithfull ſeruants, who had that day preſerued his life; inferring that nothing could be more dangerous to a King, than not onely to not acknowledge ſo great a loue and conſtancie in his people, who being but few in number, did yet reſoluedly expoſe themſelues to great perils for his ſake: but on the contrary grieue and lament at their good ſucceſſe. For, no doubt, they might all haue bought their peace of Abſalom at an eaſie rate. Secondly, hee vrged that it was generally beleeued, that he loued his enemies and hated his friends, and that he witneſſed by this his mourning, that he had not any reſpect of his Princes, and others his faithfull ſeruants, but would more haue ioyed if they had all periſhed, and Abſalom liued, than in the victorie by their faithfulneſſe and approued valour gotten.

Laſtly, he vſed this preualent argument, that if the King came not out and ſhewed himſelfe publikely to his men of warre, that they would all that very night abandon him, and returne: concluding with this fearefull threatning: And that will bee worſe vnto thee than all the euill that fell on thee from thy youth hitherto. 2.*Sam.*19. By theſe ouer-bold and arrogant ſpeeches (though perchance vttered with a good intent) Ioab raiſed Dauid from his bed of ſorrow, and brought him to the gates of the Citie among the people, whom he aſſured of his loue and affection, eſpecially Amaſa, who commanded the Armie of Abſalom, to whom he promiſed the office of Lieutenantſhip; the ſame which Abſalom had giuen him, and which Ioab now enioyed. For Dauid doubted, that if Amaſa were not ſatisfied, hee might draw from him a great part of the ſtrength of Iſrael, now vnder his commandement.

This done, the King marched towards Iordan homeward, where in his paſſage he pardoned Shimei, who had lately reuiled him to his face; but this remiſſion was but externall, as appeared afterward. 2.*Sam.*19.23. He alſo accepted of Mephiboſheth his excuſe, whom Ziba had formerly falſly accuſed and betrayed.

He alſo intreated Barzillai the Gileadite, his late liberall Oaſt, to follow him to Ieruſalem, that he might reward his ſeruice done him; who excuſing himſelfe by his age, appointed his ſonne Chimham to attend the King. 2.*Sam.*19.38.

At Gilgal on this ſide Iordan, all the Tribes aſſembled, and after ſome contention which of them ought to haue moſt intereſt in Dauid, the Armie brake, and Dauid returned to Ieruſalem. But Sheba the ſonne of Bichri, a Beniamite, of the faction of the houſe of Saul, finding ſome diſcontentment among the Iſraelites, withdrew them from Dauid, as from a ſtranger in whom they had no intereſt, and it ſeemeth that many of the people of the out Tribes, and in effect of all but Iuda, bare ſtill a good affection to the iſſues of their firſt King. Dauid imployed his reconciled Captaine Amaſa, to giue him contentment, and to witneſſe his truſt, as alſo becauſe hee conceiued that Amaſa had intereſt in thoſe reuolts of Iſrael more than Ioab had. He receiued commandement from Dauid to aſſemble the Armie within three dayes, which he foreſlowed: but being onward on his way, Abiſhai, Ioabs brother, was ſent after him, with Dauids guard and beſt Souldiers, whom alſo Ioab accompanied: and ouertaking Amaſa neere Gibeon, pretending to imbrace him, gaue him a wound, whereof he fell dead, being no leſſe iealous of Amaſa than hee was of Abner, whom he murdered in the ſame manner, and out of the ſame impatient ambition. 2.Sam 20.10. This done, he purſued Sheba, and finding him incloſed in Abel, aſſaulted the Citie with that furie, that the Citizens by the perſwaſions of a wiſe woman there inhabiting, cut off Sheba his head, and flung it to Ioab ouer the walls: which done, hee retraited his Armie to Ieruſalem, and commanded, as before, all the hoſte of Iſrael. 2.*Sam.*20.22.

The next act of Dauids, was the deliuerie of Sauls ſonnes or kinſmen to the Gibeonites, whom thoſe Citizens hung vp in reuenge of their Fathers crueltie. Dauid had know-knowledge from the Oracle of God, that a famine which had continued on the land three yeeres, came by reason of Saul and his house; to wit, for the slaughter of the Gibeonites: and therefore he willingly yeelded to giue them this satisfaction, both because he had warrant from God himselfe, as also if wee may iudge humanely, to rid himselfe of Sauls line, by whom hee and his might, as well in the present as in the future, be greatly molested and endangered; onely he spared Mephibosheth the sonne of Ionathan, both for the loue hee bare to his father, as for his oath and vow to God.

2.Sam.21. Now where it is written in the Text; The King tooke the two sonnes of RISPAH, whom she bare vnto SAVL, and the fiue sonnes of MICHOL the daughter of SAVL, whom shee bare to ADRIEL, and deliuered them to the Gibeonites:

Iunius calls this Michol the sister of her that was Dauids wife, she whom Saul married to Phaltiel; but Michol here named had Adriel to her husband: the same which is named Merab in the first of Samuel the eighteenth, who was first promised to Dauid, when he slue Goliah in the valley of Raphaim: and because it is written that Michol loued Dauid, which perchance Merab did not, whether Dauid had any humane respect in the deliuerie of her children, it is onely knowne to God.

Now whereas the Geneua nameth Michol for Merab the wife of Adriel: the better translation were out of the Hebrew word here vsed, hauing an eclipsis or defect, and signifieth, as I am informed, one of the same kinred, as in the 19. verse of the same 21. Chapter it is said of Goliah whose speare was weighty as a weauers beame, when as by the same Eclipsis it must be vnderstood by the brother of Goliah: Goliah himselfe being formerly slaine.

As by the death of Sauls children God secured the house of Dauid, leauing no head vnto rebellion; so did hee strengthen both the King and Nation against forraine enemies, by the valour of many braue Commaunders, the like of whom, for number and qualitie, that people of Israel is not knowne to haue had at any time before or after. Thirtie Captaines of thousands there were, all men of marke, and great reputation in warre. Ouer these were sixe Coronels, whose valour was so extraordinary, that it might be well held as miraculous. These Coronels had some difference of place and honour, which seemeth to haue been giuen vpon meere consideration of their vertue. For Abishai the brother of Ioab, who in the warre against the Ammonites and Aramites was Lieutenant, and commanded halfe the armie, could not attaine to the honour of the first ranke, but was faine to rest contented with being principall of the three Coronels of the second order, notwithstanding his neerenesse in bloud vnto the King, the flourishing estate of his owne house, and his well approued seruices. All these Coronels and Captaines, with the Companies belonging to them, may seeme to haue been such as were continually retained, or at the least kept in readinesse for any occasion, considering that the numbers which were mustered and drawne out, if need required into the field, very farre exceeded thirtie thousand, yea, or thirtie times as many. They were most of them such as had followed the King in Sauls time, and been hardened with his aduersities. Others there were very many, and principall men in their seuerall Tribes, that repaired vnto him after the death of Saul; but these Captaines and Coronels, (who with Ioab, that was Generall of all the Kings forces, make vp the number of 37.) were the especiall men of warre, and reckoned as Dauids Worthies. The long reigne of Dauid, as it is knowne to haue consumed many of these excellent men of warre, so may it probably be gessed to haue wasted the most of those whose deaths wee finde no-where mentioned. For the sonnes of Zeruia, who had been too hard for Dauid, were worne away, and onely Ioab left in the beginning of Salomon, who wanted his brother Abishai to stand by his side in his last extremitie.

By the actions forepassed in the time of Dauid, it is gathered that hee had reigned now 33. yeeres, or thereabout; when the posteritie of Saul was rooted out, so that hee hee enioyed about seuen yeeres of entire quiet and securitie, wherein it pleased God to remoue all impediments that might haue troubled the succession of Salomon in his Fathers throne. In this time also Dauid hauing established all things in Iuda and Israel, and the borders thereof, hee againe displeased God by numbring the people, as in ostentation of his power: in which he employed Ioab, with other Captaines of his armie, who after nine moneths and twenty dayes trauell, returned with the account and register of all the people, able and fit to beare Armes, and they amounted to the number of thirteene hundred thousand, besides Leui and Beniamin, whereof in Iuda and the Cities thereof fiue hundred thousand, and in Israel eight hundred thousand. 2.*Sam.*24. 1.*Chron.c.*21.

For this, when by the Prophet Gad hee was offered from God the choice of three punishments, whereof he might submit himselfe to which he pleased; to wit, seuen yeeres famine; three moneths warre, wherein hee should be vnprosperous in all attempts, and bee chaced by his enemies; or a generall pestilence to last three dayes: Dauid made choice to bow himselfe vnder the hand of God onely, and left himselfe subiect to that cruell disease, which hath no compassion or respect of persons, of which there perished seuentie thousand. And hereby he hath taught all that liue, that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of men; whereof he giueth vs this diuine reason; For his mercies are great. 2.*Sam.*14.

§. VIII.

Of the last acts of DAVID; ADONIAHS faction; the reuenge vpon IOAB and SHIMEI.

LAstly, when hee grew weake and feeble, and past the acts and knowledge of women, hee was yet aduised to lie in the armes of a yong and well complexioned maiden, to keepe him warme. In this his weake estate of bodie, when he was in a manner bed-rid, Adonijah his eldest sonne (Amnon and Absalom being now dead) hauing drawne vnto his partie that inuincible, renowmed and feared Ioab, with Abiathar the Priest, beganne manifestly to prepare for his establishment in the Kingdome after his father. For being the eldest now liuing of Dauids sonnes, and a man of a goodly personage, Salomon yet yong, and borne of a mother formerly attainted with adultery, for which her name was omitted by S. Matthew (as Beda, Hugo, Thomas, and others suppose) hee presumed to carrie the matter without resistance. Hereof when Dauid had knowledge by Bersabe the mother of Salomon, who did put him in minde of his faithfull promise, that Salomon her sonne should reigne after him (Nathan the Prophet affirming the same thing vnto the King, and seconding her report of Adonijahs presumption) the King calling vnto him Zadoc the Priest, Nathan the Prophet, and Benaiah the Captaine of his guard, gaue charge and commission to anoint Salomon, and to set him on the Mule whereon himselfe vsed to ride in his greatest state: which done, Salomon attended, and strongly guarded by the ordinarie and choice men of warre, the Cherethites and Pelethites, shewed himselfe to the people. Those tidings being reported to Adonijah, he presently abandoned his assistants, and for the safety of his life he held by the hornes of the Altar, whom for the present Salomon pardoned. After this, Dauid had remaining two especiall cares, whereof he was desirous to discharge his thoughts; the one concerning the peace of the land, which might be disturbed by some rebellion against Salomon; the other concerning the building of the Temple, which he sought by all meanes to aduance, and make the businesse publique. To bring these intentions to good effect, he summoned a Parliament, consisting of all the Princes of Israel, the Princes of the seuerall Tribes, all the Captaines and Officers, with all the mighty, and men of power; who repaired vnto Ierusalem. 1.Kings 1. *Chron.c.*28.*v.*1.

In

In this assembly the King stood vp, and signified his purpose of building the Temple, shewing how the Lord had approued the motion. Herein he tooke occasion to lay open his owne title to the Crowne, shewing that the Kingdome was by Gods ordinance due to the Tribe of Iuda (as Iacob in his blessing prophetically bequeathed it) and that God himselfe was pleased to make choice of him among all his fathers sonnes. In like manner he said that God himselfe had appointed Salomon by name to be his successor: whereupon he earnestly charged both the people and his sonne, to conforme themselues vnto all that God had commanded, and particularly to goe forward in this worke of the Lords house, which Salomon was chosen to build. Then produced he the patterne of the worke according to the forme which God himselfe had appointed; and so laying open his owne preparations, he exhorted all others to a voluntary contribution.

1.*Chron.*29.9.

The Kings proposition was so well approoued by the Princes and people, that whereas hee himselfe had giuen three thousand talents of gold, and seuen thousand of siluer, they added vnto it seuen thousand of gold, and tenne thousand of siluer, besides brasse, iron and iewels, heartily reioycing in the aduancement of so religious a worke. This businesse being well dispatched, a solemne feast with great sacrifice was made, at which time Salomon was againe anointed King, and receiued fealtie of all the Princes and people of the Land, and of all the Princes his brethren, the sonnes of King Dauid. Salomon being thus established King, his Father Dauid finding himselfe euen in the hands of death, first exhorted his sonne to exercise the same courage and strength of minde, which himselfe had done in all his attempts, and to the end that a happy end might follow the beginning of all his enterprizes, he vttered these mightie wordes; Take heede to the charge of the Lord thy God, to walke in his wayes, and keepe his statutes and his commaundements, and his iudgements, and his testimonies, as it is written in the Law of MOSES, &c. to the performance of which God fastened the succession, and prosperitie of his issues. For this done (sayth God himselfe) Thou shalt not want one of thy posteritie to sit vpon the Throne of Israel.

1.*Kin.*2.3.

1.*Kin.*1.20.

Secondly, hee aduised him concerning Ioab, who out of doubt had serued Dauid from the first assault of Ierusalem to the last of his warres, with incomparable valour and fidelitie, sauing that hee fastened himselfe to Adonijah (his master yet liuing) and thereby vexed him in his feeble age. But as God hath neuer left cruelty vnreuenged, so was it his will that Ioab should drinke of the same cuppe, whereof hee had enforced other men to taste, and suffer the same violence which himselfe had vniustly strooken others withall, qui gladio percutit, gladio peribit: for he had bereaued Abner and Amasa of their liues, hauing against the one the pretence onely of his brothers slaughter, whom Abner had slaine in the time of warre, and could not auoid him: against the other but a meere iealousie of his growing great in the fauour of Dauid. And though Ioab assured himselfe that Abner and Amasa being dead, there was none left either to equall him or supplant him, yet God (deriding the policies of wicked men) raised vp Benhaiah the sonne of Iehoiadah, to pull him from the Sanctuary, and to cut him in pieces. For Dauid giueth this cause to Salomon against Ioab, that he slue the Captaines of the hoste of Israel, and shed bloud of battell in peace; and to this apparant and iust cause, it is not improbable but that Dauid remembred the ill affection of Ioab towards Salomon, which Ioab made manifest by the vntimely setting vp of Adonijah, Dauid yet liuing. Some other offence Ioab had committed against Dauid, of which in these words he put his sonne Salomon in mind; Thou knowest also what IOAB the sonne of SERVIAH did to mee, &c. Now whether this were meant by the killing of Absalom, contrary to the Kings desire, or by the proud words vsed to him when hee mourned in Mahanaim for Absalom; or whether it were the publishing of Dauids letter vnto him for the killing of Vriah, thereby to disgrace Salomon as descended of such a mother, the Scriptures are silent. True it is, that those great men of warre doe oftentimes behaue themselues exceeding ding insolently towards their Princes, both in respect of their seruice done, as also because they flatter themselues with an opinion, that either their masters cannot misse them, or that they dare not offend them. But this kinde of pride hath ouerthrowne many a worthie man otherwise deseruing great honour and respect.

Hee also gaue order to Salomon, to ridde himselfe of Shimei, who not long before had cast stones at Dauid, and cursed him to his face. And albeit by reason of his oath and promise Dauid spared Shimei all the time himselfe liued, yet being dust and in the graue, he slue him by the hand of Salomon his Sonne. Hence it seemeth that King Henrie the seuenth of England had his patterne, when he gaue order to Henrie the eight to execute Pool as soone as himselfe was buried, hauing made promise to the King of Spaine when hee deliuered Pool vnto him, that while he liued he would neuer put him to death, nor suffer violent hands to be laid vpon him. 1. King. 2.

And yet did not the execution of Ioab yeeld vnto Salomon any such great profite or assurance as hee hoped for. For he found a yong Adad of Idumæa, and Rezin of Damascus to vexe him: who, as the Scriptures witnesse, were emboldened to enterprize vpon Salomon, hearing that Dauid slept with his fathers, and that Ioab the Captaine of the host was dead. Now when Dauid had reigned in all fortie yeeres, to wit, in Hebron seuen yeeres, and in Ierusalem three and thirtie, he died. 1. King. 11.

For his person, he was of small stature, but exceeding strong. For his internal gifts and graces he so farre exceeded all other men, as putting his humane frailtie apart, he was said by God himselfe to be a man according to his owne heart. The Psalmes which he wrote witnesse his pietie, and his excellent learning: of whom Hierome to Paulinus: DAVID SIMONIDES noster, PINDARVS & ALCÆVS, FLACCVS, quoque CATVLLVS, & SERENVS, Christum lyra personat, & in decachordo Psalterio ab inferis suscitat resurgentem; DAVID (saith hee) our SIMONIDES, PINDARVS, ALCÆVS, HORACE, CATVLLVS and SERENVS, he playeth Christ on his harpe, and on a ten stringed Psalter hee raiseth him vp rising from the dead. And being both a King and a Prophet, hee foretelleth Christ more lightsomely and liuely than all the rest.

The booke of the Psalmes, saith Glycas, was diuided, ordered and distinguished by Ezekias: but whether all the Psalmes were written by Dauid, it is diuersly disputed. For Athanasius, Cyprian, Lyranus, and others conceiue diuers Authors, answering the titles of the seuerall Psalmes, as Moses, Salomon, and the rest hereafter named, and that onely 73. Psalmes were composed by Dauid himselfe, namely, those which are intituled ipsius Dauid. For the 50. and the 72. with the ten that follow, are bestowed on Asaph the sonne of Barachia, eleuen other on the sonnes of Korah, and eleuen are ascribed to Moses, to wit, the 89. and the ten following, and so they are intituled in the old Hebrew Copies, though the vulgar and Septuagint (three excepted) stile them otherwise. The supposed nine Authors of these Psalmes which Dauid wrote not. Sixt: Senensis nameth as followeth; Salomon, Moses, (whom Aben Ezra, contrarie to Hierome, maketh one of Dauids singers) Asaph, Ethan-Eziachi, Eman-Ezraita, Idithum, and the three sonnes of Chore. But S. Chrysostome makes Dauid the sole Authour of all the Psalmes, and so doth S. Augustine, reasoning in this manner: Although (saith he) some there are that ascribe those Psalmes onely to Dauid, which are ouer-written ipsius Dauid, and the rest intituled ipsi Dauid, to others, this opinion (saith he) Voce Euangelica saluatoris ipsius refutatur, vbi ait quòd ipse DAVID in spiritu Christum dixerit esse suum Dominum, quoniam Psalmus 109. sic incipit, Dixit Dominus Domino meo, Sede à dextris meis, &c. The voyce of the Gospel refutes this opinion, where it saith, that Dauid himselfe in the spirit called Christ his Lord, because the 109. Psalme beginnes thus: The Lord said vnto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, &c. Lastly, his testimonies are vsed both by Christ and the Apostles, and he was as a paterne to all the Kings and Princes that succeeded him. *Athan. in Synop. His Storie and all his particular actions, were written by the Prophets, Samuel, Nathan and Gad, as it is in the first of Chron. 29. ver. 19. For the seuerall parts of the bookes bookes of Samuel which intreat chiefly of Dauid, were as it seemes written by these three holy men.

C.17.§.6.7. In his annales translated out of Greeke into Latin by Ioannes Leunclaius.

Constantine Manasses hath an opinion, that the Troians during the time of the siege, sought for succour from Dauid, and that he stayed neuter in that warre. But it seemeth that Manasses did miscast the time twixt Dauid and the Troian warre. For it is generally receiued that Troy fell betweene the times of Abdon and Samson Iudges of Israel, about the worlds yeere 2848. and Dauid died in the yeere 2991.

Of the treasures of DAVID and SALOMON.

Vers.14. HIs treasures were exceeding great. For it is written in the 22. of the first of Chronicles, that he left Salomon for the building of the Temple a hundred thousand talents of Gold, and a thousand thousand talents of siluer, and of brasse and yron passing all weight, which is more then any King of the world possest besides himselfe, and his son to whom he left it. For it amounteth to three thousand three hundred thirtie and three cartload and a third of a cartload of siluer, allowing two thousand weight of siluer or sixe thousand pound sterling to euery cartload, besides threescore and seuenteene millions of French Crownes, or of our money twenty three millions and a thousand pound: a matter, but for the testimonie of the Scriptures, exceeding all beleefe. For that any riches were left him it doth not appeare; seeing that the Iudges had not any treasure, nor any soueraigne power to make leuies: but when they went to the warres, they were followed by such voluntaries as the seuerall tribes by turnes gaue them: seeing also that Saul who was of a meane Parentage, and perpetually vexed and inuaded by the Philistims, could not in all likelihood gather great riches (if any at all) his Territories beeing exceeding narrow, and thereof the better part possest by his enemies.

Therefore it were not amisse to consider how Dauid within the space of not very many yeeres, might amasse vp such mighty treasures. For though parsimonie bee it selfe a great reuenue, yet needs there must haue been some other great meanes. It seemes that hee made the vttermost profit of all that hee had, that was profitable. Eusebius in his ninth booke and last Chapter de præparatione Euangelica, citeth the words of Eupolemus, who reporteth that Dauid, among other preparations for the Temple, built a nauie in Melanis (or as Villalpandus corrects it, Achanis) a Citie of Arabia, and from thence sent men to digge for gold in the Iland Vrphe, which Ortelius thinkes, was Ophir, though Eupolemus in his place of Eusebius (erring perhaps in this circumstance) saith that this Iland is in the red Sea; from whence, saith this Eupolemus, they brought gold into Iury. Pineda lib.4. de rebus Salomonis c.1. thinkes that Dauid did this way also inrich himselfe, and citeth this testimony of Eupolemus: and yet certainely Dauid had many other wayes to gather great riches. Much Land doubtlesse hee gained by conquest, from the Canaanites and Philistims, besides those fruitfull valleys neere Iordan in Trachonitis and Basan, and the best of Syria, and other Countries bordering the Israelites. These demaines belike he kept in his own hands, and with his infinite number of captiues, which he tooke in his warres, which were not able to redeeme themselues, husbanded those grounds for his greatest aduantage. For it is written, 1. Chron. 17. that Iehonathan was ouer his treasures in the field, in the villages, in the Cities, in the townes; that Ezri was ouer the labourers, that tilled his ground; Simei ouer the vineyards; and Sabdi ouer the store of the wine; Baal Hanan ouer the olive trees, and Ioash ouer the store of the oyle, also that hee had herdmen that had charge ouer his cattell, both in the high Lands, and in the plaines, ouer his sheepe, camels, and asses. And this custome of enriching themselues by husbandry and Cattell, the ancient Kings euery where held, both before and and after Dauids time. For wee reade of Pharao, that hee spake to Ioseph to appoint Gen.47.

some of his brethren or of their seruants, to be Rulers ouer his cattell. We reade of 2.Chron.26.
Vzzia, that he loued husbandrie, had much cattell, and plough-men, and dressers of Vines: likewise we reade it in all Greeke Poets, that the wealth of the ancient Kings did especially consist in their Heards and flocks, whereof it were needlesse to cite Augeas and Admetus or any other for examples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning Dauid it is not vnlikely, but that those captiues which were not imploied in husbandrie, were many of them vsed by him in all sorts of gainefull professions, as the ancient Romans in like manner vsed their slaues.

To these profits (besides the tributes and impositions which doubtlesse were great, and besides the innumerable presents which yeerely were brought him, or extraordinarily sent him, by Iehu and others) wee may adde the great spoiles which hee found in the Cities and Countries which he conquered: also the head money which was gathered per legem capitationis; By the law of capitation or head money, euery man rich or poore paying halfe a sickle of the Sanctuarie, which is about as much as fourteene pence, and so in all it amounted to a wondrous summe in that Kingdome: wherein one thousand thousand fiue hundred and seuentie thousand fighting men 1.Chron.21.
were numbred by Ioab. Now although this Law of capitation be thought by some very learned not to haue beene perpetuall (which opinion of theirs neuertheless they confesse is against the Hebrew expositions) yet Dauid vpon this occasion is not vnlikely to haue put it in practize. And by these meanes might he be able to leaue those huge treasures to Salomon. Yet it may seeme that of this great masse of gold and siluer left by Dauid, the least part was his owne in priuate, and so will it appeare the lesse wonderfull that he left so much. Of his owne liberalitie we finde, that he gaue to the building of the Temple three thousand talents of gold, and seuen thousand talents of siluer, a great summe: but holding a very small proportion to the other. Wherefore we are to consider, that the treasures of the Sanctuarie it selfe were exceeding great, as needs they must haue been, hauing receiued continuall encrease, without any losse or diminution euer since the time of Moses and Iosuah. The reuennues of the Sanctuarie (besides all manner of tithes and oblations, which defraied the daily expences, and maintayned the Priest and Leuites) were partly raised out of the head money before mentioned; partly out of the spoiles gotten in warre. For all the bootie was diuided into two parts, whereof the Souldiers had one, and Numb.31.27.
the People which remayned at home, had the other halfe; whereby all the Countrie receiued benefit of the victorie, yet so, that the Souldiers had a farre greater proportion than the rest, as being fewer, and therefore receiuing more for euery single share.

Out of this purchase was deducted the Lords tribute, which was one in fiftie, of that which the people receiued, and one in fiue hundred, of that which was giuen to the Souldiers; namely one hundred and one thousand part of the whole bootie. So in the spoile of Midian, thirtie two thousand women being taken, the armie had sixteene thousand of them for slaues, and the Congregation had other sixteene thou- Numb.31.40.
sand; but out of the sixteene thousand giuen to the Armie, were exempted two and thirtie for the Lords tribute. Out of the peoples number were taken three hundred and twentie. By this meanes, the lesser that the Armie was which had exposed it selfe to danger, the greater profit had euery Souldier; but when it consisted of many hands, they who remayning at home were faine to vndergoe more than ordinarie trauaile in domesticall affaires, did receiue by so much the greater portion. But the Lords tribute was alwaies certaine, yea many times it was increased, either by some especiall commandement, as when all the gold, and siluer, and other metalls found in Iericho, were consecrated vnto God; or by thankfulnesse of the Rulers and Ios.6.19.
People, as when after the victorie obtayned against the Midianites without the losse of one man, all Iewells, Braclets, Eare-rings, and the like, were offered vp, as vol- Numb.31.50.
untarie presents.

Now howsoeuer the Israelites were many times oppressed, and troden downe by other Nations, yet were not these treasures robbed or spoiled; for the enemies neuer gat possession of the Tabernacle that was in Shilo. Wherefore it cannot otherwise be, than that the wealth of the Sanctuarie must haue beene exceeding great; as contayning aboue one hundreth part of all the money and other goods found by the Israelites in the whole Land of Canaan; and of all that was purchased by so many victories, as they obtayned against the bordering Nations. For that this treasurie was not defrauded of the due portion, it is euident; seeing that before the time of Dauid and his Lieutenant Ioab, it is recorded that Saul and Abner, and before them Samuel, had vsed to dedicate of the spoyles obtayned in warre, to maintayne the house of the Lord: the like whereof may be well presumed of the former Iudges and Captaines in other Ages. Certaine it is, that the Conquest of Dauid brought into the Land far greater abundance of riches, than any former victories had purchased, those of Iosua perhaps excepted: but these vast summes of an hundred thousand Talents of siluer, may seeme rather to haue beene made vp, by the addition of his winnings and liberalitie, to the treasures laid vp in many former Ages, than to haue beene the meere fruits of his owne industrie.

1. Chron. c. 26. v. 27. & 28.

Now concerning the riches of Salomon, it is more manifest how he gathered them, for he receiued of yeerely reuennues with his tributes sixe hundred sixtie sixe Talents of gold, besides the Customes of Spices. He had also sixe rich Returnes from the East India, which greatly increased his store. For his ships performed that voyage euery three yeeres, and he began that trade in the two and twentieth yeere of his raigne, and ruled fortie yeeres. Besides this, all Iudæa and Israel were now mastered to his hands; all the Arabians his borderers, the Syrians of Zobah, of Damascena, of Palmyra, of Iturea; all of Idumæa, Moab, and Ammon, paid him tribute; as likewise did the Hittites, who with the Perizzites, Heuites, Iebusites, and other races of the Cananites, were not as yet extinguished, though subjected.

A Talent of gold is 770. french crowns. 1. King. 10. 14.

1. King. c. 9. v. 20 & c. 10. v. 29.

Into this flourishing estate was the Kingdome of Israel reduced by Dauid, who after fortie yeeres raigne, and seuentie yeeres of life, dyed in a good age, full of dayes, riches, and honour, and was buried in the Citie of Dauid. It is written by Iosephus that there was hid in Dauids Tombe a maruailous quantitie of treasures, in so much as Hyrcanus (who first of the Chasmanæi, or race of the Maccabees, called himselfe King) one thousand and three hundred yeeres after, drew thence three thousand Talents, to rid himselfe of Antiochus then besieging Ierusalem, and afterward Herod opening another Cell, had also an exceeding masse of gold and siluer therein. And it was an ancient custome to burie treasure with the dead. So the Peruvians and other Americans did the like, which being discouered by the Spaniards, they inriched themselues by nothing so much in their first Conquest. That Salomon did burie so much treasure in his fathers graue, it would hardly be beleeued, in regard of the great exactions with which he was faine to burthen the people, notwithstanding all the riches which he got otherwise, or which were left vnto him: were it not withall considered that his want of monie grew from such magnificent imployments. Particularly of the Sepulcher of Dauid the Scriptures haue no mention, but onely the Sepulchers of the Kings of Iuda, as of an honourable place of buriall. Yet the Monuments of those Kings, as (by Relation of the Duke of Vlika) they remayned within these thirtie yeeres, and are like to remaine still, are able to make any report credible, of the cost bestowed vpon them.

Of the Philiſtims, whom DAVID abſolutely maſtered: and of ſundry other contemporaries with DAVID.

OF the Philiſtims, whoſe pride Dauid was the firſt that abſolutely maſtered, in this concluſion of Dauids time ſomewhat heere may bee ſpoken.

They deſcended of Caſloim, who, according to Iſydor and Ioſephus, was one of the ſonnes of Miſraim, and was ſurnamed Philiſtim, as Eſau was ſurnamed Edom, and Iacob Iſrael. There were of them fiue Cities of pettie principalities; namely, Azotus, or Aſdod, Gaza or Aczaph, Aſcalon, Geth or Gath, and Accaron. It ſeemeth that Caſloim was the firſt founder of this nation, becauſe of his kindred on either hand, the Canaanites and the Ægyptians. Iſid. l. 9. 19. Ioſ. l. 1 ant. 17. 1. Sam. 6.

The firſt King of theſe Philiſtims, which the Scriptures haue named, was that Abimelech which loued Sara, Abrahams wife. Gen. 20.

The ſecond Abimelech liued at once with Iſaac, to whom Iſaac repaired in the time of famine, Abimelech then reſiding at Gerar in the border of Idumæa, which Abimelech fancied Iſaac his wife: as his father had done Sara. Gen. 26.

After Abimelech the ſecond, the Philiſtims Kings are not remembred in the Scriptures, till Dauids time: perhaps the gouernment was turned into Ariſtocraticall. For they are afterwards named Princes of the Philiſtims, howſoeuer Achis be named king of Gath, the ſame to whom Dauid fled, and who againe gaue him Siklag to inhabit in Sauls time. Iud. 16. 1. Sam. 18. 29. 1. Sam. 21. 11. 1. King. 2.

After him wee read of another Achis who liued with Salomon, to whom Semei trauailed to fetch back his fugitiue ſeruant, what time the ſeeking of his ſeruant was the loſſe of his life. Ieremie the Prophet ſpeaketh of the Kings of Paleſtin or Philiſtim. Amos nameth the King of Aſcalon: Zacharias, a King of Gaza. The reſt of the warres of the Philiſtims are remembred in the Catalogue of the Iudges, of Saul and Dauid, and therefore I ſhall not neede to collect the particulars in this place.

There liued at once with Dauid, the third of the Siluij King of Alba, called Latinus Siluius, who is ſaid to haue ruled that part of Italy fiftie yeeres. And about his fourteenth yeere Codrus the laſt King of the Athenians died, to whom ſucceeded the firſt Prince of thoſe, who being called after Medon, Medontidæ, without regall name gouerned Athens during their life.

The reaſons which moued the Athenians to change their gouernment, were not drawne from any inconuenience found in the rule of Soueraignetie, but in honour of Codrus onely. For when the Græcians of Doris, a region betweene Phocis and the mountaine of Oeta, ſought counſaile from the Oracle, for their ſucceſſe in the warres againſt the Athenians, it was anſwered, that then vndoubtedly they ſhould preuaile and become Lords of that State, when they could obtaine any victorie againſt the Nation, and yet preſerue the Athenian King liuing. Codrus by ſome intelligence being informed of this anſwere, withdrew himſelfe from his owne forces, and putting on the habit of a common ſouldier, entred the Campe of the Dorians, and killing the firſt hee encountred, was himſelfe forthwith cut in pieces.

Eupales the 31. King of Aſſyria, which others account but the 30. began to rule that Empire, about the 13. yeere of Dauid, and held it 38. yeeres.

Neere the ſame time began Ixion the ſecond King of the Heraclidæ, the ſonne of Euryſthenes in Corinth; and Agis the ſecond of the Heraclidæ in Lacedæmon: in honour of which Agis, his ſucceſſours were called Agidæ, for many yeeres after. He reſtored the Laconians to their former libertie: hee ouercame the Citizens of Helos in Laconia, who had refused to pay him tribute: hee condemned them and theirs to perpetuall slauerie; wherof it came, that all the Messenians, whom at length they brought into the like bondage, were after called Helotes.

In like sort from the Sclaui came the word Slaue. For when that Nation issuing out of Sarmatia, now called Russia, had seised vpon the countrie of Illyria and made it their owne by Conqueſt, their victorie pleased them so highly, that thereupon they called themselues by a new name, Slaues, which is in their language glorious. But in after-times (that warmer Climate hauing thawed their northerne hardines, and not ripened their wits) when they were troden down, and made seruants to their neighbours; the Italians which kept many of them in bondage, began to call all their bondmen Slaues, vsing the word as a name of reproch: in which sense it is now currant through many countries.

Other Chronologers make this Agis, the third King of Sparta, and somewhat later, about the 23. yeere of Dauid, and say, that Acheſtratus was the fourth King of this race, the same whom Eusebius calls Labotes, and sets him in the thirteenth yeere of Salomon.

Euseb. in Chron.

In the tenth yeere of Acheſtratus, Androclus the third sonne of Codrus assisted by the Ionies, built Ephesus in Caria, who after the adioyning of the Ile of Samos to his territorie, was slaine by the Carians whose countrie he vsurped. He was buried (saith Pausanias) in one of the gates of Ephesus called Magnetes, his armed Statua being set ouer him. Strabo reports that after Androclus had subdued the Ionians (the next prouince to Ephesus on the sea coast of Asia the lesse) he inlarged his Dominions vpon the Æoles, which ioyneth to Ionia: and that his posteritie gouerned the Cities of Ephesus and Erythræ by the name of Basilidæ in Strabo his owne time. Of the expedition of the Ionies how they came hither out of Peloponesus, I haue * spoken alreadie vpon occasion of the returne of the Heraclidæ into Peloponesus, wherein with the Dores, they expelled the Achæi, and inhabited their places in that land: though this of the Ionies succeeded that of the Heraclidæ 100. yeeres.

The Citie of Ephesus became exceeding famous: first, for the temple of Diana therein built: which had in length 425. foote, and 220. in bredth, sustained with 127. pillars of marble, of 70. foote high: whereof 27. were most curiously grauen, and all the rest of choice marble polisht, the worke being first set out by Ctesiphon of Gnossos. Secondly, it became renowned by being one of the first that receiued the Christian faith, of which Timothie was Bishop; to whom, and to the Ephesians, Saint Paul wrote his Epistles so intituled. The other Citie possest by Androclus in Æolis was also vniuersally spoken of by reason of Sibylla, surnamed Erythræa: who liued seuen hundred and fourtie yeeres before Christ borne. Saint Augustine auoweth that a Romane Proconsul shewed him in an ancient Greeke coppie certaine verses of this Propheteſse: which began (as Saint Augustine changed them into Latine) in these wordes: Iesus Christus Dei filius saluator. Iesus Christ sonne of God the Sauiour.

About the time that Ioab besieged Rabba in Moab, Vaphres beganne to gouerne in Egypt, the same that was father in Law to Salomon, whose Epistles to Salomon, and his to Vaphres, are remembred by Eusebius out of Polemon. In the 21. of Dauid, was the Citie of Magnesia in Asia the lesse founded, the same which is seated vpon the riuer Mœander, where Scipio gaue the great ouerthrow to Antiochus. In this territorie are the best Horses of the lesser Asia bred, whereof Lucan:

About the same time Cuma in Campania was built by the inhabitants of Chalcis in Eubœa, according to Seruius, with whom Strabo ioyneth the Cumæans of Æolis, saying, that to the one of these people the gouernment was giuen, with condition that the other should giue name to the Citie. Of this Cuma was Ephorus the famous scholler of Isocrates.

Euse-

Euſebius and Caſſiodor finde the building of Carthage at this time, to wit, in the 31. yeere of Dauid, but much miſtaken. For the father of Dido was Metinus the ſonne of Badezor brother to Iezabel, who married Achab King of Iſrael; and betweene the death of Dauid, and the firſt of Achab, there were waſted about 95. yeeres.

In this time alſo Acaſtus liued, the ſecond of the Athenian Princes after Codrus, of which there were thirteene in deſcent before the State changed into a Magiſtracie of tenne yeeres. Some writers make it probable that the Æolians led by Graus, the grand nephew of Oreſtes, poſſeſt the Citie and Iſland of Lesbos about this time. In the 32. yeere of Dauid, Hiram began to reigne in Tyre, according to Ioſephus, who ſaith, that in his twelfth yeere Salomon began the worke of the Temple. But it is a familiar errour in Ioſephus, to miſreckon times, which in this point hee doth ſo ſtrangely, as if hee knew not how at all to caſt any accompt. For it is manifeſt that Hiram ſent meſſengers, and Cedars to Dauid, ſoone after his taking of Ieruſalem, which was in the very beginning of Dauids reigne ouer Iſrael, when as yet hee had reigned onely ſeuen yeeres in Hebron, ouer the houſe of Iuda. Wherefore it muſt needs be that Hiram had reigned aboue 30. yeeres before Salomon; vnleſſe more credit ſhould be giuen to thoſe Tyrian records which are cited by Ioſephus, than to the plaine words of Scripture contradicting them. For that it was the ſame Hiram which liued both with Dauid and with Salomon, the Scriptures make it plainely manifeſt.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of SALOMON.

§ I.

Of the eſtabliſhing of SALOMON: of birthright, and of the cauſe of ADONIAHS death, and of SALOMONS wiſedome.

SALOMON, who was brought vp vnder the Prophet Nathan, began to reigne ouer Iuda and Iſrael, in the yeere of the world 2991. Hee was called Salomon by the appointment of God: hee was alſo called Iediddia, or Theophilus, by Nathan, becauſe the Lord loued him.

Hiram King of Tyre, after Salomons anointing, diſpatched Embaſſadours toward him, congratulating his eſtabliſhment: a cuſtome betweene Princes very ancient. Whence we reade that Dauid did in like ſort ſalute Hanum King of the Ammonites, after his obtaining the Kingdome. 2. Sam. 10.

The beginning of Salomon was in bloud, though his reigne were peaceable. For ſoone after Dauids death, hee cauſed his brother Adonijah to bee ſlaine by Benaiah the ſonne of Iehoiada, taking occaſion from Adonijah his deſiring by Berſheba, that the young maid Abiſhag (which lay in Dauids boſome in his latter dayes, to keepe him warme) might be giuen to him. Whatſoeuer he pretended, it was enough that Adonijah was his elder brother, and ſought the kingdome contrary to the will of Dauid, whom God inclined towards Salomon. And yet it is ſaid that a word is enough to the wise, and he that sees but the claw, may know whether it bee a lyon or no: so it may seeme that to the quick-sighted wisdome of Salomon, this motion of Adonijahs, was a demonstration of a new treason. For they which had beene concubines to a King, might not after bee touched but by a King: whence Achitophel wished Absalon to take his Fathers Concubines as a part of the Royaltie. And Dauid after that wrong, determining to touch them no more, did not giue them to any other, but shut them vp, and they remained widowed vntill their death. And this it seems was the depth of Isbosheths quarrell against Abner, for hauing his Fathers Concubine. And some signification of this custome may seeme too in the words of God by Nathan to Dauid; I haue giuen thee thy masters house, and thy masters wiues. And in the words of Saul, vpbraiding Ionathan, that he had chosen Dauid to the shame of the nakednesse of his Mother. Hereunto perhaps was some reference in this purpose of Adonijah, to marrie with her that was alwaies present with Dauid in his latter daies, and who belike knew all that was past, for the conueying of the Kingdome to Salomon. There might be diuers farther occasions, as either that hee would learne such things by her as might be for the aduantage of his ambition, or that he would perswade her to forge some strange tale about Dauids last Testament, or any thing else that might preiudice the title of Salomon.

2.Sam.16.21.
2.Sam.20.3.
1.Sam.20.30.

As for the right of an elder brother which Adonijah pretended, though generally it agreed both with the law of Nations, and with the customes of the Iewes: yet the Kings of the Iewes were so absolute, as they did therein, and in all else what they pleased. Some examples also they had (though not of Kings) which taught them to vse this paternall authoritie in transferring the birthright to a younger sonne: namely, of Iacobs disheriting Reuben, and giuing the birthright (which was twice as much as any portion of the other brethren) to Ioseph: of whom hee made two tribes. And that it was generally acknowledged that this power was in Dauid, it appeares by the words of Bersabe and Nathan to Dauid, and of Ionathan to Adonijah. For as for popular election, that it was necessarie to confirme, or that the refusall of the people had authoritie to frustrate the elder brothers right to the Kingdome, it now here appeares in the stories of the Iewes. It is said indeed that the people made Saul King at Gilgal: that is, they acknowledged and established him. For that he was King long before no man can doubt. In like manner elswhere the phrase of chusing or making their King, is to bee expounded: as where in the prohibition, that they should not make themselues a King, it is said, Thou shalt make him King whom the Lord shall chuse.

But to proceed with the acts of Salomon: at the same time that he put Adonijah to death, he rid himselfe also of Ioab, and three yeeres after of Shimei, as Dauid had aduised him: he displaced also the Priest Abiathar, who tooke part with Adonijah against him: but in respect of his office, and that he followed Dauid in all his afflictions, and because hee had borne the Arke of God before his Father, he spared his life. And thus being established in his Kingdome, hee tooke the daughter of Vaphres King of Ægypt to Wife: for so Eusebius out of Eupolemus calls him. Hee offered a thousand Sacrifices at Gibeon, where God appearing vnto him in a dreame, bade him aske what he would at his hands; SALOMON chooseth wisdome, which pleased God. And God said vnto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thy selfe long life, neither hast thou asked riches for thy selfe, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies, behold, I haue done according to thy words: by which wee may informe our selues what desires are most pleasing to God, and what not. For the coueting after long life, in respect of our selues, cannot but proceede of selfe-loue, which is the roote of all impietie: the desire of priuate riches is an affection of couetousnesse which God abhorreth; to affect reuenge, is as much as to take the sword out of Gods hand, & to distrust his Iustice. And in that it pleased God to make Salomon know that it liked him, that he had not asked the life of his enemies, it could not but put him in mind of his brothers slaughter, for which he had not any warrant either from Dauid, or from the Law of God. But becauſe Salomon deſired wiſedome onely, which taught him both to obey God, and to rule men, it pleaſed God to giue him withall that which he deſired not. And I haue alſo giuen thee (ſaith God) that which thou haſt not asked, both riches and honour. This gift of wiſedome our Commentators ſtretch to almoſt all kinds of learning: but that it comprehended the knowledge of the nature of plants and liuing creatures the Scripture teſtifieth, though no doubt the chiefe excellencie of Salomons wiſedome, was in the knowledge of gouerning his kingdome: whence, as it were for an example of his wiſedome, the Scripture telleth how ſoone he iudged the controuerſie betweene the two harlots. 1. King. 4. 33. 1. King. 3. 9.

§. II.

Of SALOMONS buildings and glorie.

HE then entred into league with Hiram King of Tyre, from whom hee had much of his materials, for the Kings Palace and the Temple of God: for the building whereof he had receiued a double charge, one from his father Dauid, and another from God. For like as it is written of Dauid, that He called SALOMON his ſonne, and charged him to build a houſe for the Lord God of Iſrael: ſo doth Toſtatus giue the force of a diuine precept to theſe words, Behold; a ſonne is borne vnto thee, &c. Hee ſhall build an houſe for my name. 1. Chron. 22. 6. Toſt. 9. 26. in 1. Chron.

Hee began the worke of the Temple, in the beginning of the fourth yeere of his reigne, at which time alſo hee prepared his fleete at Eſiongaber to trade for gold in the Eaſt Indies, that nothing might be wanting to ſupplie the charge of ſo great a worke. For that the Temple was in building, while his fleetes were paſſing to and fro it is manifeſt. For the pillars of the Temple were made of the Almaggim trees brought from Ophir. Of this moſt glorious building, of all the particulars (whereof the forme and example was giuen by God himſelfe) many learned men haue written, as Salmeron, Montanus, Ribera, Barradas, Azorius, Villalpandus, Pineda, and others, to whom I referre the Reader. 1. King. 6. 1. Chron. 28. 19.

For the cutting and ſquaring of the Cedars which ſerued that building, Salomon employed thirtie thouſand Carpenters, tenne thouſand euery moneth by courſe: he alſo vſed eightie thouſand Maſons in the mountaine, and ſeuentie thouſand labourers that bare burdens, which it is conceiued, he ſelected out of the Proſelites, beſides three thouſand three hundred maſters of his worke, ſo as he paid and imployed in all one hundred eightie three thouſand and three hundred men, in which number the Zidonians which were more skilfull in hewing timber than the Iſraelites, may (as I thinke) be included. For Hiram cauſed his ſeruants to bring downe the Cedars and Firres from Libanon to the ſea, and thence ſent them in raffes to Ioppe, or the next port to Hieruſalem. For in the ſecond of Chronicles the ſecond Chapter, it is plaine that all but the thirtie thouſand Carpenters, and the ouerſeers, were ſtrangers, and as it ſeemeth the vaſſals of Hiram, and of Vaphres King of Egypt. In recompence of all this timber and ſtone, Salomon gaue Hiram twentie thouſand meaſures of wheate, and twentie meaſures of pure oyle yeerely. Euſebius out of Eupolemus in the ninth booke of his preparation the laſt Chapter, hath left vs a Copie of Salomons Letter to Suron (which was the ſame as Huram or Hiram) King of Tyre in theſe words: 1. King. 5. 1. King. 5. 9. 1. King. 5. 11.

King

KIng SALOMON to King SVRON, of Tyre, Sydon, and Phœnicia King, and my fathers friend, sendeth greeting; You may vnderstand that I haue receiued of the great God of my father DAVID, the Kingdome: and when my father commaunded mee to build a Temple to God which created heauen and earth, hee commaunded also that I should write to you. I write therefore to you, and beseech you, that you would bee pleased to send mee Artificers and Carpenters to build the Temple of God.

To which the King Suron made this answere.

SVRON, Tyri, Sydonis, & Phœniciæ rex, SALOMONI regi salutem. Lectis literis gratias egi Deo, qui tibi regnum patris tradidit: & quoniam scribis fabros ministrosq; ad condendum Templum esse tibi mittendos, misi ad te millia hominum octoginta, & Architectum Tyrium hominem ex matre Iudæa, virum in rebus architecturæ mirabilem. Curabis igitur vt necessarijs non egeant, & Templo Dei condito ad nos redeant.

SVRON of Tyre, Sidon and Phœnicia King, to King SALOMON greeting: when I read your letters, I gaue God thankes, who hath installed you in your fathers Kingdome. And because you write, that carpenters and workemen may be sent to build Gods Temple, I haue sent vnto you foure score thousand men, and a Master-builder a Tyrian, borne of a Iewish woman, a man admirable in building. You will be carefull that all necessaries be prouided for them, and when the Temple of God is built, that they come home to vs.

Ioſ. Ant. l. 8. c. 2.

The Copies of these letters were extant in Iosephus time as himselfe affirmeth, and to be seene, saith he, Tam in nostris quàm in Tyriorum annalibus, as well in our owne as in the Tyrian annals. But he deliuereth them somewhat in different tearmes, as the Reader may finde in his Antiquities. But were this intercourse betweene Salomon and Hiram either by message or by writing, it is somewhat otherwise deliuered in the Scriptures, than either Eupolemus or Iosephus set it downe, but so, that in substance there is little difference betweene the one and the other.

1. King. 5. from the 1. v. to the 9.

The like letter in effect Salomon is said to haue written to Vaphres King of Ægypt, and was answered as from Hiram.

But whereas some Commentors vpon Salomon finde that Hiram King of Tyre, and Vaphres King of Ægypt, gaue Salomon the title of Rex magnus, and cite Eupolemon in Eusebius, I doe not finde any such addition of magnus in Eusebius in the last chapter of that ninth booke; neither is it in Iosephus in the eight booke and second chapter of the Iewes antiquities: it being a vaine title vsed by some of the Assyrian and Persian Kings, and vsed likewise by the Parthians, and many other after them, insomuch as in latter times it grew common, and was vsurped by meane persons in respect of the great Hermes the first, which was honoured by that name for his noble qualities, as much or more than for his mightinesse.

After the finishing and dedication of the Temple and house of the Lord, Salomon fortified Ierusalem with a treble wall, and repaired Hazor which had beene the ancient Metropolis of the Canaanites, before Iosuahs time: so did he Gaza of the Philistims: he built Bethoron, Gerar and the Millo or munition of Hierusalem. For Pharaoh (as it seemeth in fauour of Salomon) came vp into the edge of Ephraim, and tooke Gerar, which the Canaanites yet held, and put them to the sword, and burnt their Citie. The place and territorie he gaue Salomons wife for a dowrie. And it is probable that because Salomon was then busied in his magnificent buildings, and could not attend the warre, that he entreated his father in law to rid him of those neighbours, which Pharaoh performed. But he thereby taught the Ægyptians to visite those partes againe before they were sent for; and in his sonne Rehoboams time Sheshack this mans successor did sacke Ierusalem it selfe.

Ioſ. ant. l. 8. c. 2.

Salomon also built Megiddo in Manasse, on this side Iordan; and Balah in Dan: also Thadmor, which may be either Ptolomies Thamoron in the desart of Iuda (or as Iosephus phus thinkes Palmyra in the desart of Syria, which Palmyra because it stood on the vtmost border of Salomons dominion to the northeast of Libanus, and was of Dauids conquest when he wan Damascus; it may seeme that Salomon therefore bestowed thereon the most cost, and fortified it with the best arte that that age had. Iosephus calls this place Thadamora, by which name (saith hee) giuen by Salomon, the Syrians as yet call it. Hierom in his booke of Hebrew places calls it Thermeth. In after-times, when it was rebuilt by Adrian the Emperour, it was honoured with his name, and called Adrianopolis. In respect of this great charge of building Salomon raised tribute through all his Dominions, besides an hundred and twentie talents of gold receiued from Hirams seruants, Salomon offered Hiram twentie towns in or neere the vpper Galilee, but because they stood in an vnfruitfull and marish ground, Hiram refused them, and thereof was the territorie called Chabul.

Ioseph. l. 8. ant. c. 2.

These townes, as it is supposed, lay in Galilee of the Gentiles, Non quod gentes ibi habitarent: sed quia sub ditione regis gentilis erat, Not that it was possest by Gentiles (saith Nauclerus) but because it was vnder the rule of a King that was a Gentile. Howsoeuer it were, it is true that Salomon in his 21. yeere fortified those places, which Hiram refused. Further, he made a iourney into Syria Zobah, and established his tributes; the first and last warre (if in that expedition he were driuen to fight) that hee made in person in all his life. He then visited the border of all his Dominions, passing from Thadmor to the North of Palmyrena, and so to the Desarts of Idumæa, from whence hee visited Eziongaber and Eloth, the vttermost place of the South of all his territories, bordering to the red sea: which Cities I haue described in the Storie of Moses.

§. III.

Of SALOMONS sending to Ophir, and of some seeming contradictions about SALOMONS riches, and of PINEDAES conceipt of two strange passages about Africke.

HEre Salomon prepared his Fleet of Ships for India, with whom Hiram ioyned in that voyage, and furnished him with Mariners and Pilots, the Tyrians being of all other the most expert sea-men. From this part of Arabia, which at this time belonged to Edom, and was conquered by Dauid, did the Fleet passe on to the East India, which was not farre off, namely to Ophir, one of the Islands of the Moluccas, a place exceeding rich in gold: witnesse the Spaniards, who notwithstanding all the aboundance which they gather in Peru, doe yet plant in those Islands of the East at Manilia, and recouer a great quantitie from thence, and with lesse labour than they doe in any one part of Peru, or new Spaine.

The returne which was made by these Ships amounted to foure hundred and twentie talents, but in the second of Chronicles the eight, it is written foure hundred and fiftie talents: whereof thirtie talents went in expence for the charge of the fleet, and wages of men, and foure hundred and twentie talents, which makes fiue and twentie hundred and twentie thousand Crownes came cleere. And thus must those two places be reconciled. As for the place 1. Reg. 10. 14. which speaketh of sixe hundred sixtie and six talents of gold, that summe, as I take it, is of other receipts of Salomons which were yeerely, and which came to him besides these profits from Ophir.

My opinion of the land of Ophir, that it is not Peru in America (as diuers haue thought) but a countrey in the East Indies; with some reason why at those times they could not make more speedie returne to Ierusalem from the East Indies then in three yeeres; and that Tharsis in Scripture is diuers times taken for the Ocean, hath beene alreadie declared in the first booke.

c. 8. § 9. 10. 15. Lib. 4. de rebus Salomonis c. 6. & 15.

Onely

Onely it remaineth that I should speake somewhat of Pineda his strange conceits, who being a Spaniard of Bætica, would faine haue Gades or Calis-malis, in old times called Tartessus, which is the South west corner of that Prouince, to be the Tharsis from whence Salomon fetcht his gold; for no other reason, as it seemes, but for loue of his owne countrie, and because of some affinitie of sound betweene Tharsis and Tartessus: For whereas it may seeme strange that it should be three yeere ere they, that tooke ship in the red sea, should returne from the East Indies to Ierusalem, this hath been in part answered alreadie. And further the intelligent may conceiue of sundry lets, in the digging and refining of the metall, and in their other trafficke, and in their land-carriages betweene Ierusalem and the red sea, and perhaps also elswhere: so that wee haue no neede to make Salomons men to goe many thousand miles out of their way to Gades, round about all Affrick, that so they might be long a comming home.

For the direct way to Gades (which if Salomon and the Israelites knew not, the Tyrians which went with them, could not haue beene ignorant of) was along the Mediterran sea, and so (besides many wonderfull inconueniences and terrible nauigation in rounding Africa) they should haue escaped the troublesome land-carriage betweene Ierusalem and the red sea through drie, desart, and thoeuish Countries: and within 30. mile of Ierusalem at Ioppe, or some other hauen in Salomons owne Countrie, haue laden and vnladen their ships.

But this direct course they could not hold (saith Pineda) because the huge Island of Atlantis in largenesse greater than all Affrick and Asia being swallowed vp in the Atlantik Ocean hindred Salomons ships from passing through the straits of Gibraltar: for this he alleadgeth Plato in Timæo. But that this calamitie happened about Salomons time, or that thereby the Straights of Gades were filled with mud and made vnpassable, that there could be no comming to Gades by the Mediterran sea: or that this indraught where the sea runneth most violently, and most easily scowreth his channell, should be filled with mud, and not also the great Ocean in like manner, where this huge Island is supposed to haue stoode: or that Salomons ships being in the red sea, should neglect the golden mines of the East Indies (which were infinitly better and neerer to the red sea, than any in Spain) to seeke gold at Cadyz by the way of compassing Affrica, it is most ridiculous to imagine. For the Spaniard himselfe that hath also the rich Peru in the West, fortifieth in the East Indies, and inhabites some part thereof, as in Manilia, finding in those parts no lesse quantitie of gold (the small territorie which he there possesseth considered) than in Peru.

De rebus Sal. l. 4. c. 12. 11. As it appeares he tooke ship at Iapho or Ioppe. c. 1. v. 3.

The same Pineda hath another strange passage round about all Africa, which elswhere he dreames of: supposing whereas Ionas sailing to Tharsis the Citie of Cilicia, was cast out in the Mediterran sea, and taken vp there by a Whale, that this Whale in three dayes swimming aboue twelue thousand English miles, along the Mediterran seas, and so through the streights of Gades, and along all the huge seas round about Africa, cast vp Ionas vpon the shore of the red sea, that so hee might haue perhaps some sixe miles the shorter (though much the worse) way to Niniuie. This conceipt hee grounds onely vpon the ambiguitie of the word Suph, which oftentimes is an Epitheton of the red sea (as if wee should call it mare algosum, the sea full of weeds) for the red sea. But in Ionas 2. 5. it is generally taken in the proper signification for weeds, and not as Pineda would haue it, who in this place against his owne rule (which elsewhere he giueth vs) supposeth strange miracles without any neede. For this long voyage of the Whale finished in three daies, is a greater miracle, than the very preseruation of Ionas in the bellie of the Whale: and therefore seeing there is no necessitie of this miracle, we send it backe vnto him, keeping his owne rule which in this place he forgets; Miracula non sunt multiplicanda. And againe, Non sunt miracula gratis danda, nec pro arbitrio noua fingenda, Miracles are not to be multiplied without necessitie, nor deliuered without cause, nor fained at pleasure. Therefore to leaue this man in his dreames, which (were he not otherwise very learned and iudicious) might bee thought vnworthie the mentioning. But to proceede with our Storie of Salomon.

The Queene of Sabaes comming from farre to Salomon, (as it ſeemes from Arabia fœlix, and not as ſome thinke from Æthiopia) and her rich preſents, and Salomons reciprocall magnificence, and his reſoluing of her difficult queſtions, thoſe are ſet downe at large in the text. But herein Ioſephus is greatly miſtaken, who calls this Queene of Saba Nicaules, the ſucceſſour (ſaith hee out of Herodotus) of thoſe thirtie and eight Ægyptian Kings which ſucceeded Mineus the founder of Memphis; adding that after this Ægyptian, and the father in Law of Salomon, the name of Pharaoh was left off in Ægypt. For as it is elſewhere proued that the Queene was of Arabia, not of Ægypt and Æthiopia; ſo were there other Pharaohs after the father in Law of Salomon. Yea, aboue three hundred yeeres after Salomon, Pharao Necho ſlew Ioſias King of Iuda. Ioſ. ant. 8. 1. 2. 2. King. c. 23. & 2. Chron. c. 25. Iere. c. 46. v. 2.

It is alſo written of Salomon, that hee kept in garriſons fourteene thouſand Chariots, and twelue thouſand horſemen, that he ſpent in Court euery day thirtie meaſures of fine flower, threeſcore meaſures of wheat, one hundred ſheepe, beſides ſtags and fallow deare, bugles and fowle; foure thouſand ſtals of horſes he had for his chariots and other vſes, and for the twelue thouſand horſemen of his guard. For, the ten thouſand ſtals in the firſt of Kings the fourth, are to be taken but for ſo many horſes, whence in the ſecond of Chronicles the ninth, it is written but foure thouſand ſtals or teemes, and in euery teeme ten horſes, as Iunius and the Geneua vnderſtand it. He was ſaid to be wiſer than any man, yea than were Ethan the Ezrahite, than Heman, Chalcal, or than Darda, to which Iunius addeth a fift, to wit, Ezrak. For the Geneua maketh Ethan an Ezrahite by Nation. Ioſephus writes them Athan, Æman, Chalceus and Donan the ſonnes of Hemon. Hee ſpake three thouſand Prouerbes, and his ſongs were one thouſand and fiue, whereof either the moſt part periſhed in the Captiuitie of Babylon, or elſe becauſe many actes of Salomons were written and kept among the publique Records of Ciuill cauſes and not Eccleſiaſticall, therefore they were not thought neceſſarie to bee inſerted into Gods booke. 1. King. 4. 31.

§. IIII.

Of the fall of SALOMON, and how long he liued.

NOw as hee had plentie of all other things, ſo had he no ſcarcitie of women. For beſides his ſeuen hundred Wiues, hee kept three hundred Concubines, and (forgetting that God had commaunded that none of his people ſhould accompanie the daughters of Idolators) hee tooke Wiues out of Ægypt, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Zidon and Heth: and when hee fell a doting, his Wiues turned his heart after other Gods, as Aſteroth of the Zidonians, Milcom or Molech of the Ammonites, and Chemoſh of Moab.

Theſe things God puniſhed by Adad of Idumæa, Rezin of Damaſcus, and by Ieroboam his owne ſeruant, and one of the maſters of his workes, who by the ordinance of God tare from his ſonne Roboam, ten of the twelue parts of all the territorie hee had. Deus dum in peccatores animaduertit, aliorum peccatis vtitur, quæ ipſe non fecit. God in puniſhing ſinners, vſeth the ſinnes of others, which hee himſelfe wrought not. P. Mart. in reg.

In the reigne of Salomon (as in times of long peace) were few memorable actions by him performed, excepting his buildings with other workes of magnificence and that great Indian voyage alreadie mentioned. Fourtie yeeres hee reigned: how many he liued, it is not written, and muſt therefore bee found onely by coniecture. The moſt likelie way to gueſſe at the truth in this caſe, is by conſidering the actions of Dauid before and after Salomons birth, whereby wee may best make estimation of the yeeres which they consumed, and consequently learne the true, or most likely yeere of his natiuitie. Seuen yeeres Dauid reigned in Hebron: in his eighth yeere hee tooke Ierusalem, and warred with the Philistims, who also troubled him the yeere following. The bringing home of the Arke seemes to haue beene in the tenth yeere

1. Kings.7.v.1. of Dauid, and his intention to build the Temple in the yeere ensuing, at which time he had sufficient leysure, liuing in rest. After this he had warres with the Philistims, Moabites, Aramites and Edomites, which must needs haue held him fiue yeeres, considered that the Aramites of Damasco raised warre against him, after such time as he had beaten Hadadezer; and that in euery of these warres he had the entire
2. Sam.8.11.v.1. victorie. Neither is it likely that these seruices occupied any longer time, because in those dayes and places there were no wintering campes in vse, but at conuenient seasons of the yeere Kings went forth to warre, dispatching all with violence, rather than with temporizing; as maintaining their armies, partly vpon the spoyle of the enemies countrie, partly vpon the priuate prouision which euery souldier made for himselfe. The 17. yeere of Dauid, in which he tooke Mephiboseth the sonne of
1. Sam.c.17.v. 17. & 18. Ionathan into his Court, appeareth to haue passed away in quiet; and the yeere following to haue begun the warre with Ammon; but somewhat late in the end of Summer perhaps, it came to triall of a battaile (for Ioab after the victorie, returned immediatly to Ierusalem) the causes and preparations for that warre haue taken vp all the Summer. Dauids personall expedition against the Aramites wherein hee brought all the tributaries of Hadadezer vnder his owne allegiance, appeares manifestly to haue beene the next yeeres worke, wherein he did cut off all meanes of succour from the Ammonites; all Syria, Moab and Idumæa being now at his owne deuotion. By this reckoning it must haue beene the 20. yeere of Dauids reigne, and about the fiftieth of his life, in which he sent forth Ioab to besiege Rabba, and finished the warre of Ammon: wherein also fell out the matter of Vriahs wife. So one halfe of Dauids reigne was very prosperous: in the other halfe he felt great sorrow by the expectation, execution, and sad remembrance of that heauie iudgement laid vpon him by God for his foule and bloudie offence.

Now very manifest it is, that in the yeere after the death of that childe which was begotten in adulterie, Salomon was borne, who must needs therefore haue beene nineteene yeeres old or thereabout, when hee began to reigne at the decease of his father, as being begotten in the 21. yeere of his fathers reigne, who reigned in all fortie.

This account hath also good coherence with the following times of Dauid, as may be collected out of ensuing actions: for two yeeres passed ere Absalom slew his brother Ammon; three yeeres ere his father pardoned him; and two yeeres more ere he came into the Kings presence. After this he prepared horses and men, and laid the foundation of his rebellion, which seemes to haue beene one yeeres worke. So the rebellion it selfe with all that happened thereupon, as the Commotion made by Sheba, the death of Amasa and the rest, may well seeme to haue beene in the 30. yeere of Dauids reigne.

Whether the three yeeres of famine should be reckoned apart from the last yeeres of warre with the Philistims, or confounded with them, it were more hard than needfull to coniecture. Plaine enough it is, that in the tenne remaining yeeres of Dauid there was time sufficient, and to spare, both for three yeeres of famine, for foure yeeres of warre, and for numbring the people, with the pestilence ensuing; as also for his owne last infirmitie, and disposing of the Kingdome. Yet indeed it seemes that the warre with the Philistims, was but one yeeres worke, and ended in three or foure fights, of which the two or three former were at Gob or Nob neere vnto Gezer, and the last at Gath. This warre the Philistims vndertooke, as it seemeth, vpon confidence gathered out of the tumults in Israel, and perhaps emboldened by Dauids old age, for hee fainted now in the battaile, and was afterwardes hindered by his men from expoſing himſelfe vnto danger any more. So Dauid had ſixe or ſeuen yeeres of reſt, in which time it is likely, that many of his great men of Warre died (being of his owne age) whereby the ſtirring ſpirit of Adoniiah found little ſuccour in the broken partie of Ioab the ſonne of Zeruia.

At this time it might both truly be ſaid by Dauid to Salomon, Thou art a wiſe man, and by Salomon to God, I am but a yong child; for nineteene yeeres of age might well agree with either of theſe two ſpeeches. 1. Kings. 2. v. 9. & 3. v. 7.

Neuertheleſſe there are ſome that gather out of Salomons profeſſing himſelfe a child, that he was but eleuen yeeres old when he beganne to raigne. Of theſe Rabbi Salomon ſeemes the firſt Authour, whom other of great learning and iudgement haue herein followed: grounding themſelues perhaps vpon that which is ſaide of Abſolons rebellion, that it was after fortie yeeres, which they vnderſtand as yeeres of Dauids raigne. But whereas Rehoboam the ſonne of Salomon was 41. yeeres old when hee beganne to raigne, it would follow hereby that his Father had begotten him, being himſelfe but a child of nine or ten yeeres old; the difference betweene their ages being no greater, if Salomon (who raigned fortie yeeres) were but eleuen yeeres old when his raigne began. To auoide this inconuenience, Ioſephus allowes 80. yeeres of raigne to Salomon; a report ſo diſagreeing with the Scriptures, that it needes no confutation. Some indeede haue in fauour of this opinion conſtrued the wordes of Ioſephus, as if they included all the yeeres of Salomons life. But by ſuch reckoning hee ſhould haue beene 40. yeeres old at his Fathers death; and conſequently ſhould haue beene borne long before his Father had wonne Ieruſalem; which is a manifeſt vntruth. Wherefore the 40. yeares remembred in Abſolons rebellion, may either ſeeme to haue reference to the ſpace betweene Dauids firſt anointment, and the trouble which God brought vpon him for his wickedneſſe, or perhaps be read (according to Ioſephus, Theodoret, and the Latine tranſlation) foure yeeres; which paſſed betweene the returne of Abſolon to Ieruſalem, and his breaking out. 2. Sam. 15. 7.

§. V.

Of SALOMONS writings.

THere remaine of Salomons workes, the Prouerbs, the Preacher, and the Song of Salomon. In the firſt he teacheth good life and correcteth manners, in the ſecond, the vanitie of humane nature, in the third hee ſingeth as it were the Epithalamion of Chriſt and his Church. For the Booke intituled The wiſedome of Salomon, (which ſome giue vnto Salomon, and ſome make the elder Philo the Author thereof) Hierome and many others of the beſt learned make vs thinke it was not Salomon that wrote it. Stylus libri ſapientiæ (ſaith HIEROME) qui SALOMONIS inſcribitur, Græcum redolet eloquentium; The ſtile of the booke of wiſedome, which is aſcribed to SALOMON, ſauoureth of the Gracian eloquence; and of the ſame opinion was S. Auguſtine, and yet hee confeſſeth in the nineteenth Booke and twentieth Chapter of the Citie of God, that the Author of that Booke hath a direct fore-telling of the Paſſion of Chriſt in theſe wordes: Circumueniamus iuſtum quoniam inſuauis eſt nobis, &c. Let vs circumuent the righteous, for he is vnpleaſing to vs, he is contrarie to our doings, he checketh vs for offending againſt the Law, he makes his boaſt to haue the knowledge of God, and he calleth himſelfe the Sonne of the Lord, &c. and ſo doth the courſe of all the following wordes point directly at Chriſt. The Bookes of Eccleſiaſtes, Prouerbs, and Cantica Canticorum, Rabbi Moſes Kimchi aſcribeth to Iſay the Prophet. Suidas and Cedrenus report that Salomon wrote of the remedies of all diſeaſes, and graued the ſame on the ſides of the Porch of the Temple, which they ſay Ezechias pulled downe, becauſe the people neglecting helpe from God by prayer, repaired thither for their recoueries.

Hier. ad Cromatium. Sap. 2. S. Sen. fol. 62. Reinecc. in Iul. Hiſt.

Of Salomons bookes of Inuocations and Inchantments to cure diseases, and expell euill spirits, Iosephus hath written at large, though as I conceiue, rather out of his owne inuention, or from some vncertaine report, than truely.

He also speaketh of one Eliazarus, who by the roote in Salomons ring dispossest diuers persons of euill spirits in the presence of Vespasian, and many others, which I will not stand to examine.

Certainly so strange an example of humane frailty hath neuer been read of as this King: who hauing receiued wisedome from God himselfe, in honour of whom, and for his onely seruice, hee built the first and most glorious Temple of the world: he that was made King of Israel and Iudea, not by the law of Nature, but by the loue of God, and became the wisest, richest, and happiest of all Kings, did in the end, by the perswasion of a few weake and wretched Idolatrous Women, forget and forsake the Lord of all the world, and the giuer of all goodnesse, of which he was more liberall to this King, than to any that euer the world had. Of whom Siracides writeth in this manner: SALOMON raigned in a peaceable time and was glorious, for God made all quiet round about, that hee might build a house to his name, and prepare the Sanctuarie for euer; How wise wast thou in thy youth, and wast filled with vnderstanding, as with a flood! Thy minde couered the whole earth, and hath filled it with graue and darke sentences. Thy name went abroad in the Iles, and for thy peace thou wast beloued, &c. but thus he concludeth: Thou didst bow thy loynes to Women, and wast ouer-come by thy body, thou didst staine thine honour, and hast defiled thy posteritie, and hast brought wrath vpon thy children, and felt sorrow for thy folly. cap. 27.

§. VI.

Of the Contemporaries of SALOMON.

HEere the beginning of Salomons raigne, Agelaus the third of the Heraclidæ in Corinth; Labotes in Lacedæmon; and soone after Syluius Alba the fourth of the Syluij, swayed those Kingdomes: Laosthenes then gouerning Assyria: Agastus and Archippus the second and third Princes after Codrus ruling the Athenians.

In the sixe and twentieth of Salomons raigne Hiram of Tyre died, to whom Baliastrus succeeded, and raigned seuenteene yeeres, after Mercators account, who reckons the time of his rule by the age of his sonnes. Iosephus giues him fewer yeeres. Theophilus Antiochenus against Autolicus findes Bozorius the next after Hiram, if there bee not some Kings omitted beweene the death of Hiram, and the raigne of Bozorius.

Ant. lib. 3.

Vaphres being dead, about the twentieth of Salomon, Sesac or Shisak (as our English Geneua termes him) beganne to gouerne in Ægypt, being the same with him whom Diodorus calleth Sosachis; Iosephus, Susac; Cedrenus, Susesinus; Eusebius in the columne of the Ægyptian Kings Smendes, and in that of the Hebrewes Susac. Iosephus in the eight of his Antiquities reproueth it as an errour in Herodotus, that hee ascribeth the acts of Susac to Sesostris, which perchance Herodotus might haue done by comparison, accounting Sesac another Sesostris, for the great things hee did.

Of the great acts and vertues of King Sesostris I haue spoken already in the storie of the Ægyptian Princes: only in this hee was reproued, that hee caused foure of his captiue Kings to draw his Caroch, when hee was disposed to bee seene, and to ride in trumph: one of which foure, saith Eutropius, at such time as Sesostris was carried out to take the aire, cast his head continually backe vpon the two fore-most wheeles next him; which Sesostris perceiuing, asked him what hee found worthy the admiration in that motion? to whom the captiue King answered, that in those hee beheld the instabilitie of all worldly things; for that both the loweſt part of the wheele was ſuddainly carried about, and became the higheſt, and the vpmoſt part was as ſuddainly turned downe-ward and vnder all: which when Seſoſtris had iudiciouſly weighed, he diſmiſſed thoſe Princes, and all other from the like ſeruitude in the future. Of this Seſoſtris, and that he could not be taken for Seſac, I haue ſpoken at large in that part of the Ægyptian Kings preceding. Hiſt. Miſcel. l. 17

CHAP. XIX.

Of SALOMONS Succeſſors vntill the end of IEHOSAPHAT.

§. I.

Of REHOBOAM his beginnings: the defection of the ten Tribes, and IEROBOAMS Idolatrie.

REHOBOAM the Sonne of Salomon by Nahama an Ammoniteſſe, now fortie yeeres olde, ſucceeded his Father Salomon, and was anointed at Sichem, where the ten Tribes of Iſrael were aſſembled: who attended a while the returne of Ieroboam as yet in Ægypt, ſince hee fled thither fearing Salomon. After his arriuall the people preſented a Petition to Rehoboam, to bee eaſed of thoſe great Tributes laid on them by his Father. Sic enim firmius ei fore Imperium, ſi amari mallet quàm metui; So ſhould his Empire (ſaith IOSEPHVS) be more aſſured, if hee deſired rather to bee beloued than feared: whereof hee tooke three dayes to deliberate before his anſwere, of whom therefore it could not be ſaid as of Dauid, that he was wiſer than all his Teachers. For as of himſelfe hee knew not how to reſolue, ſo had hee not the iudgement to diſcerne of counſells, which is the very teſt of wiſedome in Princes, and in all men elſe. But notwithſtanding that he had conſulted with thoſe graue and aduiſed men, that ſerued his Father, who perſwaded him by all meanes to ſatisfie the multitude: he was tranſported by his familiars and fauourites, not only to continue on the backs of his ſubiects thoſe burdens which greatly cruſht them; but (vaunting falſly of greatneſſe exceeding his Fathers) he threatned in ſharpe, or rather in terrible termes, to lay yet heauier, and more vnſupportable loades on them. But as it appeared by the ſucceſſe, thoſe yonger aduiſors greatly miſtooke the nature of ſeueritie, which without the temper of clemencie is no other than crueltie it ſelfe: they alſo were ignorant that it ought to be vſed for the helpe, and not for the harme of ſubiects. For, what is the ſtrength of a King left by his people? and what cordes or fetters haue euer laſted long, but thoſe which haue beene twiſted and forged by loue only? His witleſſe paraſites could well iudge of the Kings diſpoſition: and being well learned therein, though ignorant in all things elſe, it ſufficed and inabled them ſufficiently for the places they held. But this anſwere of Rehoboam did not a little aduance Ieroboams deſignes. For being fore-told by the Prophet Achiah of his future aduancement, theſe the Kings threats (changing the peoples loue into furie) confirmed and gaue courage to his hopes. For he was no ſooner arriued, than elected King of Iſrael: the people crying out, What portion haue wee in Dauid? we haue no in-inheritance in the Sonne of Ishai. Now though themselues, euen all the Tribes of 2.Sam.c.5.1. Israel, had consented to Dauids anointing at Hebron the second time, acknowledgeing that they were his bones and his flesh: yet now after the manner of rebells, they forgat both the bonds of nature, and their dutie to God, and, as all alienated resolued hearts doe, they serued themselues for the present with impudent excuses. And now ouer-late, and after time, Rehoboam sent Adoram, one of the Taxers of the people, a man most hatefull to all his Subiects, to pacifie them: whom they instantly beat to death with stones. Whereupon the King affrighted, got him from

1.King.12.21. Sichem with all speede, and recouered Ierusalem, where preparing to inuade Israel, with an hundred and foure-score thousand chosen men, Shemai in the person of God commanding to the contrarie, all was stayed for the present. In the meane time Ieroboam the new King fortified Sechem on this side, and Penuel on the other side of Iordan; and fearing that the Vnion and exercise of one Religion would also ioyne the peoples hearts againe to the House of Dauid; and hauing in all likelihood also promised the Ægyptians to follow their Idolatrie: hee set vp two Calues of gold for the Children of Israel to worship, impiously perswading them that those were the Gods, or at least by these hee represented those Gods, which deliuered them out of Ægypt: and refusing the seruice of the Leuites, hee made Priests fit for such Gods. It must needes be that by banishing the Leuites which serued Dauid and Salomon through all Israel, Ieroboam greatly inriched himselfe: as taking into his hands all those Cities which were giuen them by Moses and Iosua, for as it is written, The Leuites left their suburbs, and their possession, and came to Iuda, &c. This irreligious policie of Ieroboam (which was the foundation of an Idolatrie that neuer could be rooted out, vntill Israel for it was rooted out of the Land) was by prophecie and miracles impugned sufficiently when it first beganne; but the affections maintaining it, were so strong, that neither Prophecie nor Miracle could make
1.King.13.v.4. them yeeld. Ieroboam could not bee moued now by the authoritie of Ahia, who from the Lord had first promised vnto him the Kingdome; nor by the withering of his owne hand as hee stretched it ouer the Altar, which also claue a-sunder, according to the signe, which the man of God had giuen by the commandement of
V.5. V.6. God, who againe recouered and cured him of that defect; yet hee continued as obstinate an Idolater as before, for hee held it the safest course in policie to proceede as he had begunne. This impious inuention of Ieroboam, who forsooke God, and the Religion of his forefathers, by God and his Ministers taught them, was by a moderne Historian compared with the policies of late Ages, obseruing well the practice of his Nation, being an Italian borne. Sic qui hodiè (saith hee) politici vocantur, & propria commoda, præsentesq; vtilitates sibi tanquàm vltimum finem constituunt, causam quam vocant status in capite omnium ponunt: pro ipsa tuenda, promouenda, conseruanda, amplianda, nihil non faciendum putant. Si iniuria proximo irroganda, si iustitiæ honestatisq; leges subuertendæ, si religio ipsa pessundanda, si denique omnia iura diuina, & humana violanda, nihil intentatum, nihil per fas nefasq; relinquendum censent, cuncta ruant, omnia pereant, nihil adipsos, modò id, quod è re sua esse sibi persuadent, obtineant, ac si nullus sit qui talia curet, castigareue possit Deus; So they who are now called Politicians, propounding to themselues, as their vtmost end and scope, their owne commoditie and present profit; are wont to alleage the case of state forsooth, as the principall point to bee regarded: for the good of the state, for aduancing, preseruing, or encreasing of the state, they thinke that they may doe any thing. If they meane to oppresse their neighbour, to ouerturne all lawes of iustice and honestie, if religion it selfe must goe to wracke, yea if all rights of God and Man must be violated, they will trie all courses, be it right, be it wrong, they will doe any thing; let all goe to ruine, what care they, so long as they may haue what they would; as who should say, there were no God that would offer to meddle in such matters, or had power to correct them.

Indeed this allegation of raggione del stato, did serue as well to vp-hold, as at the first it had done to bring in this vile Idolatrie of the ten Tribes. Vpon this ground

Amazia

Amazia the Prieſt of Bethel, counſailed the Prophet Amos, not to prophecie at Bethel; For (ſaid he) it is the Kings Court. Vpon this ground euen Iehu that had maſſacred the Prieſts of Baal, in zeale for the Lord, yet would not in any wiſe depart from that politique ſinne of Ieroboam the ſonne of Nebat, which made Iſrael to ſinne. It was reaſon of ſtate that perſwaded the laſt famous French King Henrie the fourth to change his Religion, yet the Proteſtants whom hee forſooke, obeyed him, but ſome of the Papiſts whom hee followed, murdered him. So ſtrongly doth the painted vizzor of wiſe proceeding delude euen thoſe that know the foule face of impietie lurking vnder it, and behold the wretched endes that haue euer followed it; where-10 of Iehu and all the Kings of Iſrael had, and were themſelues very great examples.

§. II.

Of REHOBOAM his impietie; for which hee was puniſhed by SESAC: of his end and Contemporaries.

WHile Ieroboam was occupied in ſetting vp his new Religion, Reboboam on the other ſide, hauing now little hope to recouer the Prouinces loſt, ſtrengthened the principall places remaining with all endeuour: for hee fortified and victualled fifteene Cities of Iudah and Beniamin: 2. Chron. 11.
20 not that hee feared Ieroboam alone, but the Ægyptians, to whom Ieroboam had not onely faſtned himſelfe, but withall inuited them to inuade Iudæa: laying perchance before them the incountable riches of Dauid and Salomon, which might now eaſily bee had, ſeeing ten of the twelue Tribes were reuolted, and become enemies to the Iudæans. So as by thoſe two wayes (of late yeeres often troden) to wit, change of Religion, and inuitation of forraine force, Ieroboam hoped to ſettle himſelfe in the ſeate of Iſrael, whom yet the powerfull God for his Idolatrie in a few yeeres after rooted out, with all his. Reboboam alſo, hauing as hee thought, by fortifying diuers places, aſſured his eſtate, forſooke the Law of the liuing God, 1. Kings 14.13.

And therefore in the fifth yeere of his raigne, Seſac or Shiſhac before ſpoken of, being now King of Ægypt, and with whom as well Adad of Idumæa, as Ieroboam, were familiar, and his inſtruments, entred Iudæa with twelue thouſand Chariots, and 2. Chron. 12.3.

The Cuſites were of Petræa, and of the Deſart Arabia, which afterward followed Zerah againſt Aſa King of Iuda. The Succæans ac- 2. Chron. 12.

With this great and powerfull Armie, Seſac inuaded Iudæa, and (beſides many other ſtrong Cities) wanne Ieruſalem it ſelfe; of which, and of the Temple, and

From this time forward the Kings of Ægypt claimed the soueraigntie of Iudæa, and held the Iewes as their Tributaries: Sesac, as it seemes, rendring vp to Rehoboam his places on that condition. So much may bee gathered out of the wordes of God, where promising the deliuerance of Iuda after their humiliation, hee doth notwithstanding leaue them vnder the yoke of Ægypt, in these wordes: Neuertheless, they (to wit, the Indæans) shall be his seruants, that is, the seruants of SESAC.

After this ouerthrow and dishonour, Rehoboam raigned twelue yeeres, and his losses receiued by Sesac notwithstanding, hee continued the warre against Ieroboam all his life time. After his death Ieroboam gouerned Israel foure yeeres.

Rehoboam liued 58. yeeres, and raigned 17. his storie was written at large by Shemeiah and Hiddon the Prophets, but the same perished with that of Nathan & the rest.

With Rehoboam, Archippus, and Tersippus, the third and fourth Archontes or Gouernours for life after Codrus, gouerned in Athens. Abdastrartus, or Abstrartus, in Tyre. Doristhus the fift of the Heraclidæ in Sparta, according to Eusebius (others make him the sixth) and Priminas the fourth in Corinth. Ouer the Latines reigned Syluius Alba, and Syluius Atys, the fourth and fifth of the Syluij.

Euseb. chron.

About the 12. of Rehoboam, Abdastrartus King of Tyre was murthered by his Nurses sons, or foster brethren, the elder of which vsurped the Kingdom twelue yeeres.

Towards his latter times Periciades, or Pyrithiades, beganne to gouerne Assyria, the 34. King thereof: and not long after Astartus, the sonne of Baleastartus recouered the Kingdome of Tyre from the Vsurpers.

§. III.

Of the great battaile betweene IEROBOAM and ABIA, with a Corolarie of the examples of Gods iudgements.

ABIAH the Sonne of Rehoboam, inherited his Fathers Kingdome, and his vices. Hee raised an Armie of foure hundred thousand, with which hee inuaded Ieroboam, who encountred him with a double number of eight hundred thousand, both Armies ioyned neere to the Mount Ephraim, where Ieroboam was vtterly ouerthrowne, and the strength of Israel broken; for there fell of that side fiue hundred thousand, the greatest ouerthrow that euer was giuen or receiued of those Nations. Abijah being now master of the field, recouered Bethel, Ieshanah, and Ephron, soone after which discomfiture, Ieroboam died: who reigned in all 22. yeeres. Abijah, the better to strengthen himselfe, entred into league with Hesion, the third of the Adads of Syria; as may bee gathered out of the 2. of Chron. he reigned but three yeeres, and then died: the particulars of his acts were written by Iddo the Propher, as some part of his Fathers were.

2. Chron. 16. 23.

Heere wee see how it pleased God to punish the sinnes of Salomon in his Sonne Rehoboam: first, by an Idolator and a Traitor: and then by the successor of that Ægyptian, whose daughter Salomon had married, thereby the better to assure his estate, which while he serued God, was by God assured against all and the greatest neighbouring Kings, and when hee forsooke him, it was torne asunder by his meanest Vassals; Not that the Father wanted strength to defend him from the Ægyptian Sesac. For the sonne Abijah was able to leuie foure hundred thousand men, and with the same number he ouerthrew eight hundred thousand Israelites, and slew of them fiue hundred thousand, God giuing spirit, courage, and inuention, when, and where it pleaseth him. And as in those times the causes were expresst, why it pleased God to punish both Kings and their People: the same being both before, and at the instant deliuered by Prophets; so the same iust God, who liueth and gouerneth all things for euer, doeth in these our times giue victorie, courage, and discourage, raise, and throw downe Kings, Estates, Cities, and Nations, for the same offences which were committed of old, and are committed in in the preſent: for which reaſon, in theſe and other the afflictions of Iſrael, alwayes the cauſes are ſet downe, that they might bee as precedents to ſucceeding ages. They were puniſhed with famine in Dauids time for three yeeres, For Saul and his bloudie houſe, &c. And Dauid towards his latter end ſuffred all ſorts of afflictions, and ſorrowes in effect, for Vriah. Salomon had tenne tribes of twelue torne from his ſonne for his idolatrie. Reboboam was ſpoyled of his riches and honour by Seſac of Ægypt, becauſe the people of Iuda made images, high places, and groues, &c. And becauſe they ſuffered Sodomites in the land. Ieroboam was puniſhed in himſelfe & his poſteritie, for the golden Calues that he erected. Ioram had all his ſonnes ſlaine by the Philiſtims, and his very bowels torne out of his bodie by an excoriating flix, for murthering his brethren. Ahab and Iezebel were ſlaine, the bloud of the one, the bodie of the other eaten with dogs: for the falſe accuſing and killing of Naboth. So alſo hath God puniſhed the ſame and the like ſinnes in all after-times, and in theſe our dayes by the ſame famine, plagues, warre, loſſe, vexation, death, ſickneſſe, and calamities, howſoeuer the wiſe men of the world raiſe theſe effects no higher than to ſecond cauſes, and ſuch other accidents; which, as being next their eyes and eares, ſeeme to them to worke euery alteration that happeneth.

Of ASA and his Contemporaries.

TO Abijah ſucceeded Aſa, who enioyed peace for his firſt ten yeeres, in which time hee eſtabliſhed the Church of God, breaking downe the altars dedicated to ſtrange gods, with their images, cutting downe their groues, and taking away their high places. Hee alſo ſpared not his owne mother, who was an Idolatreſſe, but depoſing her from her regencie, brake her Idoll, ſtampt it, and burnt it. Hee alſo fortified many Cities, and other places, prouiding (as prouident Kings doe) for the troubles of war in the leaſure of peace. For not long after hee was inuaded by Zerah, who then commanded all the Arabians bordering Iudæa, and with ſuch a multitude entred the territorie of Aſa, as (for any thing that I haue read) were neuer aſſembled of that Nation, either before or ſince. For it is written, that there came againſt the Iudeans Zerah of Aethiopia, with an hoſte of tenne hundred thouſand, and three hundred Chariots, which Aſa encountred with an armie of fiue hundred and foure-ſcore thouſand, leuied out of thoſe two tribes of Iuda and Beniamin, which obeyed him, and with which hee ouerthrew this fearefull multitude, and had the ſpoyle both of their Cities and Campe.

2. Chron. 14. 9.

That this Zerah was not an Æthiopian, I haue *proued alreadie, & were it but the length betweene Æthiopia and Iudæa, & the ſtrong flouriſhing Regions of Egypt interiacent (who would not ſuffer a million of ſtrangers to paſſe through them) it were ſufficient to make it appear how fooliſh the opinion is, that theſe inuaders were Æthiopians. But in that the Scriptures acknowledge that Gerar was belonging to Zerah, and the Cities thereabouts were ſpoyled by the Iudeans, in following their victorie, as places belonging to Zerah, and that all men know that Gerar ſtandeth vpon the torrent of Beſor, which Dauid paſt ouer when he ſurprized the Amalekites or Arabians; this prooueth ſufficiently, that Zerah was leader of the Arabians, and that Gerar was a frontier towne, ſtanding on the vttermoſt South-border of all Iudea, from all parts of Æthiopia ſixe hundred miles. Alſo the ſpoyles which Aſa tooke, as the cattell, Camels, and ſheepe, whereof hee ſacrificed fiue thouſand, ſhew them to bee Arabians adioyning, and not far off, and not vnknowne Æthiopians. And if it be obiected that theſe deſart countries can hardly yeeld a million of men fit for the wars, I anſwere, that it is as like that Arabia Petræa, and the Deſart which compaſſe two parts of the holy Land, ſhould yeeld ten hundred thouſand, as that two tribes of the the twelue, should arme fiue hundred and foure score thousand. Besides, it answereth to the promise of God to Abraham, that these nations should exceed in number; for God spake it of Israel, that hee would make him fruitfull, and multiply him exceedingly, that he should beget twelue Princes, &c.

Baasha a king of Israel began to reigne in the third of Asa, and fearing the greatnesse of Asa after his great victorie, entertained Benhadad King of Syria, of the race of Adadezer, to ioyne with him against Asa; and to the end to blocke him vp, hee fortified Rama, which lieth in the way from Ierusalem towardes Samaria.

This warre began according to the letter of the Scriptures in the 36. yeere of Asa his reigne: but because in the first of Kings the 16. it is said that Baasha died in the 26. yeere of Asa; therefore could not Baasha begin this warre in the 35. of Asa his reigne, but in the 35. yeere of the diuision of Iuda and Israel: for so many yeeres it was from the first of Rehoboam, who reigned 17. yeeres, to the 16. of Asa. It may seeme strange, that Asa being able to bring into the field an Armie of fiue hundred and foure score thousand good Souldiers, did not easily driue away Baasha, and defeat him of his purposes, the victories of Abia against Ieroboam, and of Asa himselfe against Zerah, being yet fresh in minde, which might well haue emboldened the men of Iuda, and as much disheartened the enemies. Questionlesse there were some important Circumstances, omitted in the text, which caused Asa to fight at this time with money. It may be that the imployment of so many hundred thousands of hands, in the late seruice against Zerah, had caused many mens priuate businesses to lie vndispatched, whereby the people being now intentiue to the culture of their lands and other trades, might be vnwilling to stirre against the Israelites, choosing rather to winke at apparant inconuenience, which the building of Rama would bring vpon them in after-times. Such backwardnesse of the people might haue deterred Asa from aduenturing himselfe with the least part of his forces, and committing the successe into the hands of God. Howsoeuer it were, hee tooke the treasures remaining in the Temple, with which hee waged Benhadad the Syrian against Baasha, whose imployments Benhadad readily accepted, and brake off confederacie with Baasha. For the Israelites were his borderers, and next neighbours, whom neither himselfe (after his inuasion) nor his successors after him euer gaue ouer, till they had made themselues masters of that Kingdome. So Benhadad being now entred into Nephthalim, without resistance, he spoyled diuers principall Cities thereof, and inforced Baasha to quit Rama, and to leaue the same to Asa, with all the materials which he had brought thither, to fortifie the same: which done, Benhadad, who loued neither partie, being loden with the spoiles of Israel, and the treasures of Iuda, returned to Damascus. After this, when Hanani the Prophet reprehended Asa, in that hee now relyed on the strength of Syria, and did not rest himselfe on the fauour and assistance of God, hee not onely caused Hanani to bee imprisoned, but hee began to burden and oppresse his people, and was therefore strooken with the grieuous paines of the gout in his feete, wherewith after he had beene two yeeres continually tormented, hee gaue vp the ghost when he had reigned 41. yeeres.

Euseb. in Chron.

§. V.

§. V.

Of the great alteration falling out in the ten Tribes during the raigne of ASA.

IN the raigne of Aſa, the Kingdome of Iſrael felt great and violent commotions, which might haue reduced the ten Tribes vnto their former allegeance to the houſe of Dauid, if the wiſedome of God had not otherwiſe determined. The wickednesſe of Ieroboam had in his latter dayes, the ſentence of heauie vengeance layd vpon it, by the mouth of Ahia, the ſame Prophet which had foretold the diuiſion of Iſrael, for the ſinne of Salomon, and his raigne ouer the ten Tribes. One ſonne Ieroboam had among others, in whom onely God found ſo much pietie, as (though it ſufficed not to with-hold his wrath from that Family) it procured vnto him a peaceable end; an honourable teſtimony of the peoples loue, by their generall mourning and lamentation at his death, and (wherein he was moſt happie) the fauourable approbation of God himſelfe.

After the loſſe of this good ſonne, the vngodly father was ſoone taken aẅay: a miſerable creature, ſo conſcious of his vile vnthankefulneſſe to God, that hee durſt not ſuffer his owne name to be vſed in conſulting with an holy Prophet, aſſured of the ruine hanging ouer him and his, yea, of Gods extreme hatred; yet forbearing to deſtroy thoſe accurſed Idoles that wrought his confuſion. So loth hee was to forſake his worldly wiſedome, when the world was ready to forſake him, and all belonging to him, his hatefull memory excepted.

Nadab the ſonne of Ieroboam, raigned in the ſecond and third yeeres of Aſa, which are reckoned as two yeeres, though indeede his fathers laſt yeere of two and twentie did runne along (how farre is vncertaine) with the ſecond of Aſa, whoſe third yeere was the firſt of Baaſha, ſo that perhaps this Nadab inioyed not his Kingdome one whole yeere. He did not alter his fathers courſes, neither did God alter his ſentence. It ſeemes that he little feared the iudgements denounced againſt his fathers houſe: for as a Prince that was ſecure of his owne eſtate, hee armed all Iſrael againſt the Philiſtims, and beſieged one of their Townes. There (whether it were ſo, that the people were offended with his ill ſucceſſe, and recalled to minde their grieuous loſſe of fiue hundred thouſand vnder Ieroboam, counting it an vnluckie familie to the Nation; or whether by ſome particular indiſcretion, hee exaſperated them) ſlaine hee was by Baaſha, whom the Armie did willingly accept for King in his ſtead. Baaſha was no ſooner proclaimed King, than he began to take order with the houſe of Ieroboam, that none of them might moleſt him, putting all of them, without mercie, to the ſword. That he did this for priuate reſpects, and not in regard of Gods will to haue it ſo, it is euident by his continuing in the ſame forme of Idolatrie which Ieroboam had begunne. Wherefore hee receiued the ſame ſentence from God that had been layd vpon Ieroboam; which was executed vpon him alſo in the ſame ſort. Hee beganne to infeſt Aſa, by fortifying Ramah; but was diuerted from thence by the Syrian Benhadad, who did waſte his Countrey, deſtroying all the Land of Nephthalim. Foure and twentie yeeres hee reigned: and then dying, left the Crowne to Ela his ſonne; who enioyed it, as Nadab the ſonne of Ieroboam had done, two yeeres currant, perhaps not one compleat. 1. King. 15. 25.

Ela was as much an idolater as his father: and withall a riotous perſon. Hee ſent an Armie againſt Gibbethon, the ſame Towne of the Philiſtims, before which Nadab the ſonne of Ieroboam periſhed; but he ſate at home the whileſt, feaſting and drinking with his Minions, whereby hee gaue ſuch aduantage againſt himſelfe, as was not neglected. Zimri, an ambitious man, remaining with the King at Tirza, finding his Maſter ſo diſſolute, and his behauiour ſo contemptible, conceiued hope of the like fortune as Baaſha had found, by doing as Baaſha had done. Wherefore he did ſet vpon on Ela in his drunkennesse, and slue him. Presently vpon which fact, he stiled himselfe King of Israel: and began his raigne with massacring all the house of Baasha; extending his crueltie not onely to his children, and kinsfolke, but vnto all his friends in Tirza. These newes were quickly blowne to the Campe at Gibbethon, where they were not welcommed according to Zimri his expectation. For the Souldiers in stead of proclaiming him King, proclaimed him Traitour: and being led by Omri, whom they saluted King, they (quitting the siege of Gibbethon) presented themselues before Tirza; which in short space they may seeme to haue forced. Zimri wanting strength to defend the Citie, not courage to keepe himselfe from falling aliue into his enemies hands, did set fire on the Palace, consuming it and himselfe together to ashes. Seuen dayes he is said to haue raigned: accounting (as is most likely) to the time that Omri was proclaimed in the Campe. For Zimri was also an idolater, Walking in the way of IEROBOAM; and therfore is likely to haue had more time wherin to declare himselfe, than the raigne of seuen dayes, and those consumed partly in murthering the friends of Baasha, partly in seeking to haue defended his owne life. After the death of Ela, there arose another King to oppose the faction of Omri; wherby it may seeme, that Zimri had made his party strong, as being able to set vp a new head, who doubtlesse would neuer haue appeared, if there had not been ready to his hand, some strength, not vnlikely to resist and vanquish the Armie which maintained Omri. How long this Tibni, the new Competitor of Omri, held out, I doe not finde; onely it appeares that his side was decayed, and so he died, leauing no other Successor than his concurrent.

§. VI.

A coniecture of the causes hindering the reunion of Israel with Iuda, which might haue been effected by these troubles.

ANy man that shall consider the state of Israel in those times, may iustly wonder how it came to passe, that either the whole Nation, wearied with the calamities already suffered vnder these vnfortunate Princes, and with the present ciuill warres, did not returne to their ancient Kings, and reunite themselues with the mighty Tribes of Iuda and Beniamin; or that Zimri and Tibni, with their oppressed factions, did not call in Asa, but rather chose the one to endure a desperate necessitie of yeelding, or burning himselfe, the other to languish away, a man forsaken: than to haue recourse vnto a remedie, so sure, so ready, and so honourable. To say that God was pleased to haue it so, were a true, but an idle answere (for his secret will is the cause of all things) vnlesse it could be prooued, that he had forbidden Asa to deale in that businesse, as he forbade Rehoboam to force the rebellious people to obedience. That the restraint laid by God vpon Rehoboam, did only binde his hands from attempting the suppression of that present insurrection, it appeares by the Warre continued betweene Israel and Iuda, so many yeeres following: wherein Abia so farre preuailed, that he wanne a great battaile, and recouered some Townes belonging to the other Tribes, which he annexed to his owne Dominion. Wherefore we may boldly looke into the second causes, mouing the People and Leaders of the ten Tribes, to suffer any thing vnder new vpstarts, rather than to cast their eyes vpon that Royall house of Dauid, from which the succession of fiue Kings in lineall descent, had taken away all imputation, that might formerly haue been layd vpon the meane beginnings thereof: To thinke that Omri had preuented his Competitors, in making peace with Asa, were a coniecture more bold than probable. For Omri was not onely an Idolater, but did worse than all that were before him, which as it might serue alone to proue, that Asa, being a godly King, would not adhere to him, so the course which hee professed to take at the very first, of reuenging the massacre committed vpon

the familie and friends of Baaſha, (Aſa his mortall enemie) giues manifeſt reaſon, why Zimri, who had wrought that great execution, ſhould more iuſtly than he, haue expected the friendſhip of Iuda in that quarrell. Wherefore, in ſearching out the reaſon of this backwardneſſe in the ten tribes (which was ſuch that they may ſeeme to haue neuer thought vpon the matter) to ſubmit themſelues to their true Princes; it were not amiſſe to examine the cauſes, mouing the people to reuenge the death of Ela, an idle drunkard, rather than of Nadab the ſonne of Ieroboam, who followed the warres in perſon, as a man of ſpirit and courage. Surely it is apparant, that the very firſt defection of the ten Tribes, was (if wee looke vpon humane reaſon) occaſioned by deſire of breaking that heauie yoke of bondage wherewith Salomon had galled their neckes. Their deſire was to haue a King that ſhould not oppreſſe them; not to haue no King at all. And therefore when the arrogant folly of Rehoboam had cauſed them to renounce him, they did immediatly chooſe Ieroboam in his ſtead, as a man likely to affoord that libertie vnto them, for which hee had contended in their behalfe. Neither were they (as it ſeemes) herein altogether deceiued. For his affectation of popularitie appeares in his building of decayed townes, and in the inſtitution of his new deuiſed idolatry; where hee tolde the people, that it was too much for them, to trauaile ſo farre as to Ieruſalem. But whether it were ſo, that his moderation, being voluntarie, began to ceaſe, towards the latter end of his reigne, and in the reigne of his ſonne, when long time of poſſeſſion had confirmed his title, which at the firſt was onely good by courteſie of the people: or whether the people (as often happens in ſuch caſes) were more offended by ſome prerogatiues of a King that he ſtill retained in his owne hands, than pleaſed with his remiſſion of other burdens: it is cleerely apparant, that the whole armie of all Iſrael ioyned with Baaſha, taking in good part the death of Nadab, and eradication of Ieroboams houſe.

Now the reigne of Baaſha himſelfe, was (for ought that remaineth in writing of it) euery way vnfortunate; his labour and coſt at Rama was caſt away; the other ſide of his Kingdome harried by the Syrians; neither did hee winne that one towne of Gibbethon from the Philiſtims, but left that buſineſſe to his ſonne, who likewiſe appeares an vnprofitable ſluggard. Wherefore it muſt needes be, that the fauour of the people toward the houſe of Baaſha grew from his good forme of Ciuill gouernment, which happily he reduced to a more temperate method than Ieroboam euer meant to doe. And ſurely hee that ſhall take paines to looke into thoſe examples, which are extant of the different courſes, held by the Kings of Iſrael and Iuda, in adminiſtration of iuſtice, will finde it moſt probable, that vpon this ground it was that the ten Tribes continued ſo auerſe from the line of Dauid; as to thinke all aduerſitie more tolerable, than the weightie Scepter of that houſe. For the death of Ioab and Shimei was indeed by them deſerued; yet in that they ſuffered it without forme of iudgement, they ſuffered like vnto men innocent. The death of Adonijah was both without iudgement, and without any crime obiected, other than the Kings icalouſie: out of which by the ſame rule of arbitrarie iuſtice (vnder which it may be ſuppoſed that many were caſt away) he would haue ſlaine Ieroboam (if hee could haue caught him) before hee had yet committed any offence, as appeares by his confident returne out of Ægypt, like one that was knowne to haue enduted wrong, hauing not offered any.

The like and much more barbarous execution, to wit, without law, Iehoram did vpon his brethren, and vpon ſundry of his greateſt men; as alſo Ioaſh did ſo put to death Zachariah, the ſonne of Iehoiada, who had made him King, euen in the court of the houſe of the Lord: and MANASSES did ſhed innocent bloud exceeding much, till he repleniſhed Ieruſalem from corner to corner: and this was imputed to him as another fault; beſides his ſinne, wherewith hee made Iuda to ſinne. Contrariwiſe, among the kings of Iſrael wee finde no monument of ſuch arbitrarie proceeding, vnleſſe perhaps the words of Iehoram the ſonne of Ahab (which were but words) may bee taken for an inſtance,

2. Chro. 24. 21.

2. King. 21. 16.

2.King.6.31. instance, when hee said, God doe so to mee, and more also, if the head of ELISHA the sonne of SHAPHAT shall stand on him this day: whereby it is not plaine whether he meant to kill him without more adoe, or to haue him condemned as a false prophet, that had made them hold out against the Aramites, till they were faine to eate their owne children, which he thought a sufficient argument to proue, that it was not Gods purpose to deliuer them. The death of Naboth sheweth rather the libertie which the Israelites enioyed, than any peremptorie execution of the Kings will. For Naboth did not feare to stand vpon his owne right, though Ahab were euen sicke for anger, neither was hee for that cause put to death, as vpon commaundement, but made away by conspiracie, the matter being handled after a iudiciall forme, which might giue satisfaction to the people, ignorant of the deuice, though to God it could not.

The murther of the Prophets is continually ascribed to Iezabel, an impudent woman, and not vnto the King her husband. Neither is it certaine, that there was no Law made whereby their liues were taken from them; but certaine it is, that the people, being idolaters, were both pleased with their death, and laboured in the execution. So that the doings of the Kings of Iuda (such as are registred) prooue them to haue vsed a more absolute manner of commaund, than the Kings of the tenne Tribes. Neither doe their sufferings witnesse the contrary. For of those which reigned ouer Iuda, from the diuision of the Kingdome, to the captiuity of the ten tribes, three were slaine by the people, and two were denied a place of buriall amongst their ancestors. Yea, the death of Ahazia and his brethren, slaine by Iehu, with the destruction of all the Royall seed by Athalia, did not (for ought that we can reade) stirre vp in the people any such thirst of reuenge, as might by the suddennesse and vniformitie testifie the affection to be generall, and proceeding from a louing remembrance of their Princes; vnlesse we should thinke that the death of Athalia, after seuen yeeres reigne, were occasioned rather by the memory of her ill purchasing, than by the present sence of her tyrannicall abusing the gouernement, whereon shee had seised. On the other side, such of the Kings of Israel as perished by treason (which were seuen of the twentie) were all slaine by conspiracie of the great men, who aspired by treason to the Crowne: the people beeing so farre from embruing their hands in the bloud of their Soueraignes, that (after Nadab) they did neuer forbeare to reuenge the death of their Kings, when it lay in their power; nor approoue the good successe of treason, vnlesse feare compelled them. So that the death of two Kings, being throughly reuenged vpon other two, namely the death of Ela and Zacharia, vpon Zimri and Shallum, who traiterously got and vsurped, for a little while, their places; onely three of the seuen remaine, whose endes how the people tooke, it may be doubtfull. Though indeede it is precisely said of the slaughter, committed on Ahabs children by Iehu, that the people durst not fight with him that did it, 2.King.10.4. because they were exceedingly afraid: and the same feare might be in them at the death of Peka, whose history (as others of that time) is cursorily passed ouer. The like may be pronounced, and more absolutely, of the Kings of England, that neuer any of them perished by furie of the people, but by treason of such as did succeed them, neither was there any motiue vrging so forcibly the death of King Edward and King Richard when they were in prison, as feare lest the people should stirre in their quarrell. And certainely (howsoeuer all that the law cals treason, be interpreted, as tending finally to the Kings destruction) in those treasonable insurrections of the vulgar, which haue here most preuailed, the furie of the multitude hath quenched it selfe with the bloud of some great Officers; no such rebellions, howsoeuer wicked and barbarous otherwise, thirsting after the ruine of their naturall Soueraigne, but rather forbearing the aduantages gotten vpon his Royall person: which if any man impute vnto grose ignorance, another may more charitably, and I thinke, more truely, ascribe to a reuerent affection. Wherefore that fable of Briareus, who, beeing loosened by Pallas, did with his hundred hands giue assistance to Iupiter, when all the rest of the Gods conspired against him, is very fitly expounded by Sir Francis Bacon, as signifying, that Monarches neede not to feare any courbing of their absoluteneſſe by mightie ſubiects, as long as by wiſedome they keepe the hearts of the people, who will bee ſure to come in on their ſide. Though indeede the Storie might very well haue borne the ſame interpretation, as it is rehearſed by Homer, who tels vs that Pallas was one of the conſpiracie, and that Thetis alone did marre all their practice, by looſening Briareus. For a good forme of gouernment ſufficeth by it ſelfe to retaine the people, not onely without aſſiſtance of a laborious Wit, but euen against all deuices of the greateſt and ſhrewdeſt politicians: euery Sheriſe and Conſtable, being ſooner able to arme the multitude, in the Kings behalfe, than any ouer-weening Rebell how mightie ſoeuer, can againſt him.

This declaration of the peoples loue, being ſeldome found in Iuda, makes it very likely, that the rule it ſelfe of gouernment there was ſuch, as neither gaue occaſion of contentment vnto the ſubiects, nor of confidence in their good affection, to the Kings. Vpon which reaſons it may ſeeme that the multitude was kept vſually diſarmed. For otherwiſe it would haue beene almoſt impoſſible, that Athalia the ſiſter of Ahab, a ſtranger to the royall bloud of Iuda, ſhould by the onely authoritie of a Queene mother haue deſtroyed all the ſeede of Dauid, and vſurped the Kingdome very neere ſeuen yeeres without finding any reſiſtance. Yea when Iehoiada the high Prieſt had agreed with the Captaines and principall men of the land to ſet vp Ioaſh their lawfull King, whereunto the whole nation were generally well affected; hee was faine to giue to theſe Captaines and their men, the ſpeares and the ſhields that were King DAVIDS, and were in the houſe of the Lord. But we neede not enter into ſuch particulars. Queſtionleſſe, the Tribes which thought obedience to their Princes to be a part of their dutie toward God, would endure much more with patience, than they which had Kings of their owne choice or admiſſion, holding the Crowne by a more vncertaine tenure.

And this, in my opinion, was the reaſon, why the tenne tribes did neuer ſeeke to returne to their ancient Lords: but after the deſtruction of their ſixe firſt Kings, which died in the reigne of Aſa, admitted a ſeuenth of a new family, rather than they would conſubiect themſelues, with thoſe of Iuda and Beniamin, vnder a more honourable, but more heauie yoke.

So, Aſa hauing ſeene the death of ſeuen kings of Iſrael, died himſelfe after one and fourtie yeeres reigne, leauing Iehoſaphat his ſonne to deale with Ahab the ſon of Omri, who was the eight King ouer the tenne tribes.

Of IEHOSAPHAT and his contemporaries.

IEHOSAPHAT, who ſucceeded Aſa, was a Prince religious and happie; hee deſtroyed all the Groues, Altars, and high places dedicated to idolatrie, and ſent ſearchers to all places and people wanting inſtruction; hee recouered the Tribute due vnto him by the Arabians and Philiſtims: from the one hee had ſiluer, from the other ſheepe and goates to the number of fifteene thouſand and foure hundred. The numbers of his men of warre were more than admirable: for it is written that Adnah had the commaund of three hundred thouſand, Iehohanam of two hundred and foureſcore thouſand, and Amaſia of two hundred thouſand; alſo that hee had, beſides theſe, in Beniamin of thoſe that bare ſhields, which wee call Targetiers, and of Archers vnder Eliada 2. Chron. 17.

two hundred thousand, and vnder the commaundement of Iehozabad a hundred and foureſcore thouſand: which numbred together, make eleuen hundred and ſixtie thouſand, all which are ſaide to haue waited vpon the King, beſides his garriſons.

That Iuda and Beniamin, a territorie not much exceeding the Countie of Kent, 2. Sam. 24. ſhould muſter eleuen hundred and ſixtie thouſand fighting men, it is very ſtrange, and the number farre greater than it was found vpon any other view. Ioab in Dauids time found fiue hundred thouſand: Rehoboam found but an hundred and foure-ſcore thouſand: Abia foure hundred and eight thouſand: Aſa fiue hundred and foure-ſcore thouſand: Amaziah inrolled all that could beare armes, and they amounted to three hundred thouſand: Vzziah three hundred and ſeuen thouſand and fiue hundred. Surely, whereas it is written that when newes was brought to Iehoſaphat that Moab and Ammon were entred his territorie to the Weſt of Iordan, and that their numbers were many, hee feared (to wit) the multitude, it is not likely that hee would haue feared euen the armie of Xerxes, if hee could haue brought into the field eleuen hundred and three-ſcore thouſand fighting men, leauing all his ſtrong Cities manned. I am therefore of opinion (referring my ſelfe to better iudgement) that theſe numbers ſpecified in the ſecond of Chronicles the ſeuenteenth, diſtributed to ſeuerall leaders, were not all at one time, but that the three hundred thouſand vnder Adnah, and the two hundred and foure-ſcore thouſand vnder Iehohanam, were afterward commaunded and muſtered by Amaſiah, Eliada, and Iehoſabad: for the groſſe and totall is not in that place ſet downe, as it was vnder the other Kings formerly named. Againe as the aydes which Iehoſaphat brought to Ahab did not ſhew that he was a Prince of extraordinarie power, ſo the Moabites and Ammonites which hee feared could neuer make the one halfe of thoſe numbers, which hee that commaunded leaſt among Iehoſhaphats leaders had vnder him.

This mightie Prince notwithſtanding his greatneſſe, yet he ioyned in friendſhip with Ahab King of Iſrael, who had married that wicked woman Iezabel. Him Ioſaphat viſited at Samaria, and cauſed his ſonne Ioram to marrie Athalia, this Achabs daughter.

Ahab perſwaded Ioſaphat to aſſiſt him in the warre againſt the Syrians, who held the Citie of Ramoth Gilead from him, and called together foure hundred of his Prophets, or Baalites to foretell the ſucceſſe: who promiſed him victorie. But Iehoſaphat beleeued nothing at all in thoſe diuiners, but reſolued firſt of all to conferre with ſome one Prophet of the Lord God of Iſrael. Hereupon Achab made anſwere that hee had one called Michaiah, but hee hated that Prophet, becauſe hee alwayes foretolde of euill, and neuer of any good towards him. Yet ſent for Michaiah was to the King but by the way the meſſenger prayed him to conſent with the reſt of the Prophets: and to promiſe victorie vnto them as they did. But Michaiah ſpake the truth, and repeated his viſion to both Kings, which was that God asked who ſhall perſwade AHAB, that hee may goe vp and fall at Ramoth Gilead? to whom a ſpirit that ſtood before the Lord anſwered, that hee would enter into his prophets, and bee in them a falſe ſpirit to delude. For as it is ſaid by Chriſt: Non enim vos eſtis qui loquimini, ſed ſpiritus patris veſtri loquitur in vobis: It is not you that ſpeake, but the ſpirit of your father ſpeakes in you: ſo in a contrarie kinde did the deuill in the prophets of Baal, or Satan, incourage Achab to his deſtruction. And as P. Martir vpon this place well obſerueth, theſe euill ſpirits are the miniſters of Gods vengeance, and are vſed as the hangmen and tormentors, which Princes ſometime imploy. For as it pleaſeth God by his good Angels, to ſaue and deliuer from deſtruction, of which the Scriptures haue many examples: ſo on the contrarie, it is by the euill that he puniſheth and deſtroyeth, both which are ſaid to performe the will of their Creator, licet non eodem animo. Eccleſiaſticus remembreth a ſecond ſort of malignant natures, but they are euery-where viſible. There are ſpi-rits, saith he, created for vengeance, which in their rigour lay on sure strokes. In the time of destruction they shew foorth their power, and accomplish the wrath of him that made them.

Now Michaias having by this his reuelation greatly displeased the King, and the Prophets whose spirit hee discouered, was strooken by Zidkiah one of Baals prophets, and by Achab himselfe committed to prison: where he appointed him to be reserued and fed with bread of affliction till he returned in peace. But Michaiah, not fearing to reply, answered, If thou returne in peace, the Lord hath not spoken by me. Neuertheless Achab went on in that warre, and was wounded to death. Iehosaphat returned to Ierusalem, where he was reprehended by Iehu the Prophet for assisting an idolatrous Prince, and one that hated God. 2. Chron. 18.

After this the Aramites or Damascens, ioyned with the Moabites, Ammonites and Idumæans to inuade Iudea: who passe Iordan and encampe at Engaddi, and when Iehosaphat gathered his armie, the Prophet Iahaziel foretolde him of the victorie, which should bee obtained without any bloud-shed of his part: and so when Iehosaphat approached, this assembly of nations, the Ammonites and Moabites, disagreeing with the Idumæans, and quarrelling for some causes among themselues, those of Ammon and Moab set vpon the Idumæans, and brake them vtterly: which done they also inuaded each other; in which broile Iehosaphat arriuing tooke the spoile of them all without any losse of his part, as it was foretold and promised by God. 2. Chron. 10.

Notwithstanding this victorie, Iehosaphat forgetting that hee was formerly reprehended for assisting an Idolatrous King, did notwithstanding ioyne with Ochazias, the sonne of Achab, in preparing a Fleet to send to Ophir, hoping of the like returne which Salomon had: but as Eliezor the Prophet foretold him, his shippes perished and were broken in the port of Ezion Gaber, and so that enterprize was ouerthrowne. 2. Chron. 20.

Yet hee taketh part with Ieboram the brother of Ochazias, against the Moabites, with which Kings of Iuda and Israel the Edomites ioyne their forces, not forgetting, it seemes, that the Moabites, assisted by the Ammonites, had not long before destroyed their armie.

The Moabites, subiects to Dauid and Salomon, forsaking the Kings of Iuda, gaue themselues for vassals to Ieroboam, and so they continued to his successors till the death of Achab: but Iehosaphat, notwithstanding the Idolatrie of his Colleague, yet as it seemeth, he was drawne into this warre both to bee auenged of the Moabites for their defection from Iuda to Israel, as also because they had lately ioyned themselues with the Syrians against Iosaphat, and thirdly, to punish their double rebellion who first forsooke Iuda and now Israel.

Both Kings resolued to passe by the way of Idumæa, thereby the better to assure that nation, for wee finde that both Moab, Ammon and Edom were all in the field together at Engaddi against Iehosaphat: But whether they had then declared themselues against Iehosaphat, it is not certaine, for in the 2. of Chronicles. 11. vers. 8. it is written that in the time of Ieboram, the sonne of Iehosaphat, Edom rebelled, and therefore it seemeth to mee that the Edomites, when they were slaine by Moab and Ammon, not finding themselues satisfied in such conditions as they required, offered to turne from them, and to ioyne themselues with the armie of Iuda. For that they were numbred among the enemies of Iosaphat, it is plaine in the 2. of Chron. the 20. and as plaine c. 2. v. 8. that they were not declared, nor had made them a King, till Iehosaphats death. Now in the passage of these Kings towards Moab, whether it were by the extraordinarie heat of the yeere, or whether the Idumæans hauing a purpose to rebell, misled the armie of Iuda and Israel with intent to infeeble them for want of water; true it is, that they suffered the same, if not a greater thirst than the armies of Crassus and M. Antonius did in their Parthian expeditions; and had, in all likelihood, vtterly perished, had not Elisha taught them to cut trenches whereinto the water sprang, by which not onely Iehosaphat and his armie, but Iehoram King of Israel an Idolator was relieued: the great mercie and goodnesse of God, hauing euer beene prone to saue the euill for the good, whereas hee neuer destroyed the good for the euill.

CHAP. XX.

Of IEHORAM the sonne of IEHOSAPHAT, and AHAZIA.

§. I.

That IEHORAM was made King sundry times.

IEHORAM the sonne of Iehosaphat King of Iuda began to reigne at thirtie two yeeres of age, and liued vntill hee was fourtie yeeres olde, being eight yeeres a King: but of these eight yeeres, which Iehoram is saide to haue reigned, foure are to bee reckoned in the life of his father, who going to the Syrian warre with Ahab,

1. Kin. 22. v. 51. left this Iehoram King in his stead, as Ahab did his sonne Ahazia. This appeares by the seuerall beginnings, which are giuen in Scripture to the two Iehorams kings of Israel and Iuda, and to Ahazia the eldest sonne of Ahab. For Ahazia is saide to haue begun his reigne, in the seuenteenth yeere of Iehosaphat. Iehoram the brother of Ahazia succeeded him in

2. Kin. 1. 17. the second yeere of IEHORAM the sonne of IEHOSAPHAT King of Iuda, that is, in the next yeere after that Iehoram of Iuda was designed king by his father; it being (as

2. Kin. 3. v. 1. and 9. wee finde elsewhere) the eighteenth yeere of IEHOSAPHAT himselfe, who went with the Israelite against Moab. Heereby it appeares that the full power and execution of the royall office was retained still by Iehosaphat, who gouerned absolutely by himselfe, not communicating the rule with his sonne. But in the fift yeere of IE-

2. Kin. 8. 16. HORAM King of Israel, which was the two and twentieth of Iehosaphat, the olde King tooke vnto him, as partner in the Gouernement, this his eldest sonne, who was at that time thirtie two yeeres olde, his Father being fiftie seuen. Now for-

1. Kin. 22. 42. asmuch as IEHOSAPHAT reigned twentie fiue yeeres, it is euident that his sonne did not reigne alone till the eighth of Ioram King of Israel. The like regard is to bee had had in accounting the times of other Kings of Iuda and Israel, who did not alwayes reigne precisely so long as the bare letter of the text may seeme at first to affirme: but their yeeres were sometimes compleat, sometimes onely current, sometimes confounded with the yeeres of their successors or foregoers, and must therefore be found by comparing their times with the yeeres of those others, with whom they did begin and end.

It were perhaps a thing lesse needfull than curious, to enquire into the reasons mooving Iehosaphat either to assume vnto him his sonne as partner in the Kingdome, whilest he was able himselfe to command both in peace and in warre, the like hauing neuer beene done by any of his progenitors, or hauing once (in the seuenteenth of his reigne) vouchsafed vnto him that honour, to resume it vnto himselfe, or at least-wise to deferre the confirmation of it, vntill foure or fiue yeeres were passed. Yet forasmuch as to enter into the examination of these passages, may be a meane to find some light, whereby we may more cleerely discouer the causes of much extraordinary businesse ensuing, I hold it not amisse to make such coniecture, as the circumstances of the Storie briefly handled in the Scriptures may seeme to approoue.

Wee are therefore to consider, that this King Iehosaphat was the first of Rehoboams issue that euer entred into any streight league with the Kings of the ten Tribes. All that reigned in Iuda before him, had with much labour and long warre, tired themselues in vaine, making small profit of the greatest aduantages that could be wished. Wherefore Iehosaphat thought it the wisest way, to make a league offensiue and defensiue betweene Israel and Iuda, whereby each might enioy their owne in quiet.

This confederacie made by a religious King, with one that did hate the Lord, could not long prosper, as not issuing from the true roote and fountaine of all wisedome; yet as a piece of sound policie, doubtlesse it wanted not faire pretences of much common good thereby likely to arise, with mutuall fortification of both those kingdomes, against the vncircumcised nations their ancient enemies. This apparant benefit, being so inestimable a iewell, that it might not easily be lost, but continue as hereditarie from father to sonne, it was thought a very good course to haue it confirmed by some sure bond of affinitie, and thereupon was Athalia the daughter of Omri and sister of Ahab King of Israel, giuen in marriage to Iehoram, who was sonne and heire apparant to the King of Iuda. This Ladie was of a masculine spirit, and had learned so much of Queene Iezabel her brothers wife, that she durst vndertake, and could throughly perform a great deale more in Ierusalem, than the other knew how to compasse in Samaria. Shee was indeede a fire-brand, ordained by God to consume a great part of the noblest houses in Iuda, and perhaps of those men or their children, whose worldly wisedome, regardlesse of Gods pleasure, had brought her in.

2. Chro. 19. v. 2. and 3.

The first fruits of this great league, was the Syrian warre at Ramoth Gilead, wherein Iuda and Israel did aduenture equally, but the profit of the victorie should haue redounded wholly to Ahab: as godly Princes very seldome thriue by matching with Idolators, but rather serue the turnes of those false friends, who being ill affected to God himselfe, cannot be well affected to his seruants. Before their setting foorth Ahab designed, as King, his sonne Ahazia; not so much perhaps in regard of the vncertaine euents of warre (for none of his predecessors had euer done the like vpon the like occasions) nor as fearing the threatnings of the Prophet Micaia (for he despised them) as inuiting Iehosaphat by his owne example, to take the same course, wherein he preuailed.

§. II.

Probable coniectures of the motiues inducing the old King IEHOSAPHAT to change his purpose often, in making his sonne IEHORAM King.

MAny argumentsdoe very strongly proone Iehoram to haue beene wholy ouer-ruled by his wife; especially for his forsaking the religion of his godly Ancestors, and following the abominable superstitions of the house of Achab.

That she was a woman of intolerable pride, and abhorring to liue a priuate life, the whole course of her actions witnesseth at large. Much vaine matter shee was able to produce, whereby to make her husband thinke that his brethren and kindred were but meane and vnworthy persons in comparison of him, and of his children, which were begotten vpon the daughter and sister of two great Kings, not vpon base women and meere subiects. The Court of Ahab, and his famous victories obtained against the Syrian Benhadad, were matter sufficient to make an insolent man thinke highly of himselfe, as being allied so honorably; who could otherwise haue found in his heart well enough, to despise all his brethren, as being the eldest, and heire apparent to the Crowne, whereof alreadie he had, in a manner, the possession.

How soone his vices brake out, or how long hee dissembled them and his idolatrous religion, it cannot certainely be knowne. Like enough it is, that some smoke, out of the hidden fire, did very soone make his fathers eyes to water; who thereupon caused the young man to know himselfe better, by making him fall backe into ranke among his yonger brethren. And surely the doings of Iehosaphat about the same time, argue no small distemper of the whole country, through the misgouernment of his vngodly sonne. For the good old King was faine to make his progresse round about the land, reclaiming the people vnto the seruice of God, and appointing Iudges throughout all the strong Cities of Iuda Citie by Citie. This had beene a needlesse labour, if the religion taught and strongly maintained by Asa, and by himselfe, had not suffered alteration, and the course of Iustice beene peruerted, by the power of such as had borne authoritie. But the necessitie that then was of reformation, appeares by the charge which the King did giue to the Iudges; and by his commission giuen to one of the priestes in spirituall causes, and to the steward of his house in temporall matters, to be generall ouerseers.

2.Chron.19.v.4. 5,&c.

This was not till after the death of Ahazia the sonne of Ahab; but how long after it is vncertaine. For Iehoram the brother of Ahazia beganne his reigne (as hath beene alreadie noted) in the eighteenth of Iehosaphat, which was then accounted the second of Iehoram, Iehosaphats sonne, though afterward this Iehoram of Iuda had another first and second yeere, euen in his fathers time, before hee reigned alone; as the best Chronologers and expositors of the holy text agree. So hee continued in priuate estate, vntill the two and twentieth of his fathers reigne, at which time, though the occasions inducing his restitution to former dignitie are not set downe, yet wee may not thinke, that motiues thereto, appearing substantiall, were wanting. Iehoram of Israel held the same correspondencie with Iehosaphat that his father had done; and made vse of it. Hee drewe the Iudæan into the warre of Moab, at which time it might well bee, that the young Prince of Iuda was againe ordained King by his father, as in the Syrian expedition hee had beene. Or if wee ought rather to thinke, that the preparations for the enterprize against Moab did not occupie so much time, as from the eighteenth of Iehosaphat, in which yeere that nation rebelled against Israel, vnto his two and twentieth; yet the dailie negotiations betweene the two Kings of Iuda and Israel, and the affinitie betweene them contracted in the person of Iehoram, might might offer ſome good occaſions thereunto. Neither is it certaine how the behauiour of the yonger ſonnes, in their elder brothers diſgrace, might cauſe their Father to put him in poſſeſſion for feare of tumult after his death; or the deepe diſſimulation of Iehoram himſelfe might winne the good opinion both of his Father and Brethren; it being a thing vſuall in miſchieuous fell natures, to be as abiect and ſeruile in time of aduerſitie, as inſolent and bloudy vpon aduantage. This is manifeſt, that being repoſſeſſed of his former eſtate, hee demeaned himſelfe in ſuch wiſe towards his brethren, as cauſed their Father to enable them, not onely with ſtore of ſiluer, and of gold, and of precious things, (which kinde of liberality other Kings doubtleſſe had vſed vnto their yonger ſonnes) but with the cuſtody of ſtrong Cities in Iuda, to aſſure them, if it might haue been by vnwonted means, againſt vnwonted perils. 2.Chron.21.3.

§. III.

The doings of IEHORAM when he reigned alone; and the rebellion of Edom and Libna.

BVt all this prouidence auailed nothing; for an higher prouidence had otherwiſe determined of the ſequele. When once the good old man, their Father, was dead, the yonger ſonnes of Iehoſaphat found ſtrong Cities, a weake defence, againſt the power of him to whom the Citizens were obedient. If they came in vpon the ſummons of the King their brother, then had hee them without more adoe; if they ſtood vpon their guard, then were they Traitors, and ſo vnable to hold out againſt him, who beſides his owne power, was able to bring the forces of the Iſraelitiſh Kingdome againſt them, ſo that the apparant likelyhood of their finall ouerthrow, ſufficed to make all forſake them in the very beginning. Howſoeuer it was, they were all taken and ſlain, and with them for company many great men of the Land; ſuch belike, as either had taken their part, when the Tyrant ſought their liues, or had been appointed Rulers of the Countrie, when Iehoram was depoſed from his Gouernment; in which Office they, without forbearing to doe iuſtice, could hardly auoide the doing of many things, derogatory to their yong Maſter, which if he would now call treaſon, ſaying that he was then King, who durſt ſay the contrary?

After this, Iehoram tooke vpon him, as being now Lord alone, to make innouations in Religion: wherein he was not contented as other Idolatrous Princes, to giue way and ſafe conduct vnto Superſtition and Idolatrie, nor to prouoke and encourage the people to that ſinne, whereto it is wonderfull that they were ſo much addicted, hauing ſuch knowledge of God, and of his deteſting that aboue all other ſinnes; but he vſed compulſion, and was (if not the very firſt) the firſt that is regiſtred, to haue ſet vp Irreligion by force.

Whileſt he was thus buſied at home, in doing what hee liſted, the Edomites his Tributaries rebelled againſt him abroad; and hauing hitherto, ſince Dauids time, been gouerned by a Viceroy, did now make vnto themſelues a King. Againſt theſe Iehoram in perſon made an expedition, taking along with him his Princes, and all his Chariots, with which hee obtained victory in the field, compelling the Rebels to flie into their places of aduantage, whereof he forced no one, but went away contented with the honour that hee had gotten in beating and killing ſome of thoſe whom hee ſhould haue ſubdued, and kept his ſeruants. Now began the prophecie of Iſaac to take effect, wherein hee fore-told, that Eſau in proceſſe of time ſhould breake the yoke of Iacob. For after this the Edomites could neuer be reclaimed by any of the Kings of Iuda, but held their owne ſo well, that when, after many ciuill and forraine warres, the Iewes by ſundry Nations had beene brought low; Antipater the Edomite, with Herod his Sonne, and others of that race following them, became came Lords of the Iewes, in the decrepit age of Israel, and raigned as Kings, euen in Ierusalem it selfe.

The freedome of the Edomites, though purchased somewhat dearly, encouraged Libna, a great Citie within Iuda, which in the time of Iosua had a peculiar King, to rebell against Iehoram, and set it selfe at libertie. Libna stood in the confines of Beniamin and of Dan, farre from the assistance of any bordering enemies to Iuda, and therefore so vnlikely it was to haue maintained it selfe in libertie, that it may seeme strange how it could escape from vtter destruction, or at the least from some terrible vengeance, most likely to haue been taken, by their powerfull, cruell, and throughly incensed Lord. The Israelite held such good intelligence at that time with Iuda, that he would not haue accepted the Towne, had it offered it selfe vnto him: neither doe we reade that it sought how to cast it selfe into a new subiection, but continued a free estate. The rebellion of it against Iehoram, was, Because he had forsaken the Lord God of his Fathers; which I take to haue not onely beene the first and remote cause, but euen the next and immediate reason, moouing the inhabitants to doe as they did: for it was a Towne of the Leuites: who must needs be driuen into great extremities, when a religion contrary to Gods Law, had not onely some allowance to countenance it by the King, but compulsiue authority to force vnto it all that were vnwilling. As for the vse of the Temple at Ierusalem (which being deuout men they might feare to lose by this rebellion) it was neuer denied to those of the ten reuolted Tribes by any of the Religious Kings, who rather inuited the Israelites thither, and gaue them kinde entertainement: vnder Idolaters they must haue beene without it whether they liued free or in subiection. Yet it seemes that priuate reasons were not wanting, which might moue them rather to doe than to suffer that which was vnwarrantable. For in the generall visitation before remembred, wherein Iehoshaphat reformed his Kingdome, the good old King appointing new Gouernours, and giuing them especiall charge to doe iustice without respect of persons, vsed these wordes, The Leuites shall bee Officers before you; Bee of good courage, and doe it, and the Lord shall be with the good. By these phrases, it seemes, that hee encouraged them against the more powerfull, than iust proceedings of his sonne; whom if the Leuites did (according to the trust reposed in them) neglect in discharging their dueties, likely it is that he meant to be euen with them, and make them now to feele, as many Princes of the Land had done, his heauie indignation. How it happened that Libna was not hereupon destroyed, yea, that it was not (for ought that wee can reade) so much as beseiged or molested, may iustly seeme very strange. And the more strange it is in regard of the mighty Armies which Iehoshaphat was able to raise, being sufficient to haue ouer-whelmed any one Towne, and buried it vnder the earth, which they might in one moneth haue cast into it with shouells, by ordinary approches.

2. Chron. 21. 10.

2. Chron. 30.

But it seemes that of these great numbers which his Father could haue leuied, there were not many whom Iehoram could well trust; and therefore perhaps hee thought it an easier losse, to let one Towne goe, then to put weapons into their handes, who were more likely to follow the example of Libna, than to punish it. So desperate is the condition of Tyrants, who thinking it a greater happinesse to be feared, than to be loued; are faine themselues to stand in feare of those, by whom they might haue been dreadfull vnto others.

§. IIII.

Of the miseries falling vpon IEHORAM, and of his death.

THese afflictions not sufficing to make any impression of Gods displeasure in the minde of the wicked Prince; a Prophecie in writing was deliuered vnto him, which threatned both his people, his children, his wiues, and his owne body. Hereby likewise it appeares that hee was a cruell Persecutor of Gods seruants; in as much as the Prophets durst not reproue him to his face, as they had done many of his Predecessors, both good and euill Kings, but were faine to denounce Gods iudgements against him by letters, keeping themselues close and farre from him. This Epistle is saide to haue beene sent vnto him from Elias the Prophet. But Elias was translated, and Elizeus prophecied in his stead before this time, euen in the dayes of Iehosaphat. Wherefore it may be that Elias left this prophecie in writing behinde him, or that (as some coniecture) the errour of one letter in writing, was the occasion that wee reade Elias for Elizeus. Indeede any thing may rather bee beleeued than the Tradition held by some of the Iewish Rabbins, that Elias from heauen did send this Epistle; a tale somewhat like to the fable of our Ladies letters, deuised by Erasmus, or of the Verse that was sent from heauen to S. Giles.

2. Chron. 21. 12.

2. King. 2. and 3. v. 11.

But whosoeuer was the Author of this threatning Epistle, the accomplishment of the prophecie was as terrible, as the sentence. For the Philistims and Arabians brake into Iudæa, and tooke the Kings house, wherein they found all, or many of his children, and wiues, all which they slew, or carried away, with great part of his goods. These Philistims had not presumed since the time of Dauid, to make any offensiue warre till now; for they were by him almost consumed, and had lost the best of their Townes, maintaining themselues in the rest of their small Territorie, by defensiue armes, to which they were constrained at Gibbethon by the Israelites. The Arabians were likely to haue beene then as they are now, a naked people, all horsemen, and ill appointed; their Countrie affording no other furniture, than such as might make them fitter to robbe and spoile in the open fields, than to offend strong Cities such as were thicke set in Iuda. True it is that in ages long after following, they conquered all the South parts of the world then knowne, in a very short space of time, destroying some, and building other some very stately Cities. But it must be considered; that this was when they had learned of the Romanes the Art of Warre; and that the prouisions which they found, together with the Arts which they learned, in one subdued Prouince, did make them able and skilfull in pursuing their conquest, and going onward into Regions farre remoued from them. At this day hauing lost in effect all that they had gotten, such of them as liue in Arabia it selfe are good horsemen, but ill appointed, very dangerous to passengets, but vnable to deale with good Souldiers, as riding starke naked, and rather trusting in the swiftnes of their horses, than in any other meanes of resistance, where they are well opposed. And such, or little better, may they seeme to haue beene, that spoiled Iudæa in the time of Iehoram. For their Countrie was alwayes barraine and desert, wanting manuall Arts whereby to supply the naturalls with furniture: neither are these bands named as chiefe in that action, but rather adherents of the Philistims. Out of this we may inferre, that one halfe, yea or one quarter of the numbers found in the least muster of Iuda and Beniamin vnder Iehosaphat (wherein were inrolled three hundred and eightie thousand fighting men) had beene enough to haue driuen away farre greater forces than these enemies are likely to haue brought into the field, had not the people beene vnable to deale with them, for lacke of weapons, which were now kept from them by their Princes ielousie, as in Sauls time by the policie of the Philistims.

It may seeme that the house of the King which these inuaders tooke, was not his his Palace in Ierusalem, but rather some other house of his abroad in the Countrie, where his wiues and children at that time lay for their recreation: because we reade not that they did sacke the Citie, or spoyle the Temple, which would haue inuited them as a more commodious bootie, had they got possession thereof. Yet perhaps they tooke Ierusalem it selfe by surprize, the people being disarmed, and the Kings guards too weake to keepe them out; yet had not the courage to hold it, because it was so large and populous; and therefore hauing done what spoyle they could, with-drew themselues with such purchase as they were able safely to conueigh away.

The slaughter committed by Iehu vpon the two and fortie brethren of Ahazia, or (as they are called elsewhere) so many of his brothers Sonnes, and the cruell massacre wherein all the Royall seede perished (onely Ioas excepted) vnder the tyrannie of Athalia, following within two yeeres after this inuasion of the Philistims, and Arabians, make it seeme probable, that the sonnes of Iehoram were not all slaine at once, but that rather the first murther beganne in his owne time, and was seconded by many other heauie blowes, wherewith his house was incessantly striken, vntill it was in a manner quite hewed downe.

After these calamities, the hand of God was extended against the bodie of this wicked King, smiting him with a grieuous disease in his bowels, which left him not vntill his guts fell out, and his wretched soule departed from his miserable carcasse. The people of the Land, as they had small cause of comfort in his life, so had they not the good manners to pretend sorrow for his death; wherefore he was denied a place of buriall among his Ancestors the Kings of Iuda, though his owne sonne succeeded him in the Kingdome, who was guided by the same spirits that had beene his Fathers euill Angels. Athalia had other matters to trouble her head, than the pompous enterring of a dead husband. Shee was thinking how to prouide for the future, to maintaine her owne greatnesse, to retaine her fauourites in their authoritie, and to place about her Sonne such Counsellours, of the house of AHAB, as were fittest for her turne. Wherefore shee thought it vnseasonable to make much a-doe about a thing of nothing, and offend the peoples eyes, with a stately funerall of a man by them detested: but rather chose to let the blame of things passed bee layd vpon the dead, than to procure an ill opinion of her selfe and hers, which it now did concerne her to auoide. Such is the quality of wicked Instigators, hauing made greedie vse of bad imployments, to charge, not only with his owne vices, but with their faults also, the man whose euill inclinations their sinister counsailes haue made worse, when once hee is gone, and can profit them no longer. The death of Iehoram fell out indeede in a busie time; when his friend and cousin the Israelite, who had the same name, was entangled in a difficult warre against the Aramite; and therefore could haue had no better leisure to helpe Athalia, in setting of things according to her owne minde, than he had (perhaps through the same hinderance) to helpe her husband, when he was distressed by the Philistims. Yea rather hee needed and craued the assistance of the men of Iuda, for the taking in of Ramoth Gilead, where they had not sped so well the last time, that they should willingly runne thither againe, vnlesse they were very fairely intreated.

2. Chron. 22. 4.

The acts of this wicked man I haue thought good to handle the more particularly (pursuing the examination of all occurrences, as farre as the circumstances remembred in holy Scripture, would guide me by their directions) to the end that it might more plainely appeare, how the corrupted affections of men, impugning the reuealed will of God, accomplish neuertheless his hidden purpose, and without miraculous meanes, confound themselues in the seeming-wise deuices of their owne folly: as likewise to the end that all men might learne, to submit their iudgements to the ordinance of God, rather than to thinke, that they may safely dispense with his commandements, and follow the prudent conceits which worldly wisedome dictateth vnto them. For in such kinde of vnhappie subtilties, it is manifest that

Athalia

Athalia was able to furnish both her Husband and her Sonne, but the issue of them partly hath appeared alreadie, and partly will appeare, in that which immediately followeth.

§. V.

Of the raigne of AHAZIA, and his businesse with the King of Israel.

OCHAZIAS, or Ahazia, the sonne of Iehoram and Athalia, beganne his raigne ouer Iuda in the twelfth yeere of Iehoram, the sonne of Ahab King of Israel, and raigned but that one yeere. Touching his age, it is a point of more difficultie than importance to know it; yet hath it bred much disputation, whereof I see no more probable conclusion, than that of Torniellus, alleaging the Edition of the Septuagint at Rome, Anno Domini 1588. which saith that hee was twentie yeeres old in the beginning of his Kingdome, and the Annotations thereupon, which cite other Copies, that giue him two yeeres more. Like enough hee is to haue beene yong: for hee was gouerned by his Mother, and her Ministers, who gaue him counsaile by which hee perished. In matter of Religion he altered none of his Fathers courses. In matter of State, he likewise vp-held the league made with the house of Ahab. Hee was much busied in doing little, and that with ill successe. He accompanied his Cousin the Israelite against Ramoth Gilead, which they wanne, but not without blowes: for the Aramites fought so well, that the King of Israel was faine to aduenture his owne person, which scaped not vnwounded. The Towne being wonne was manned strongly, in expectation of some attempt likely to bee made by Hazael king of Aram: which done, Iehoram King of Israel with-drew himselfe to the Citie of Izreel, where with more quiet hee might attend the curing of his woundes; and Ahazia returned to Ierusalem. It seemes that hee was but newly come home (for hee raigned in all scantly one yeere, whereof the former expedition, with the preparations for it, had taken vp a great part) when hee made a new iourney, as it were for good manners sake, to visit the King of Israel, who lay sore of his woundes. Belike Athalia was brewing some new plots, which his presence would haue hindred, and therefore sought euery occasion to thrust him abroad: for otherwise it was but a vaine piece of worke so to leaue his kingdome, hauing no other businesse than by way of complement to goe see one whom hee had seene yesterday. Certaine it is that the Lord had resolued at this time to put in execution that heauie iudgement, which hee had laid by the mouth of Elias the Prophet vpon the house of Ahab. And heereunto at this time had hee disposed not onely the concurrence of all other things, which in mans eyes might seeme to haue beene accidentall; but the very thoughts and affections of such persons, as intended nothing lesse than the fulfilling of his high pleasure. Of these Athalia doubtlesse was one; whose mischieuous purposes it will shortly bee needfull for explanation of some difficulties arising, that wee diligently consider and examine.

§. VI.

How AHAZIA perished with the house of AHAB: and how that Familie was destroyed by IEHV.

THe whole Armie of Israel, with all the principall Captaines lying in Ramoth Gilead, a Disciple of Elizeus the Prophet came in among the Captaines that were sitting together, who calling out from among them Iehu, a principall man, tooke him apart, and anointed him King ouer Israel, rehearsing vnto him the prophecie of Elias against the house of Ahab, Ahab, and letting him vnderstand that it was the pleasure of God to make him executioner of that sentence. The fashion of the Messenger was such as bred in the Captaines a desire to know his errand, which Iehu thought meete to let them know, as doubting whether they had ouer-heard all the talke or no. When hee had acquainted them with the whole matter, they made no delay, but foorth-with proclaimed him King. For the prophecie of Elias was well knowne among them, neither durst any one oppose himselfe against him, that was by God ordained to performe it.

Iehu, who had vpon the sudden this great honour throwne vpon him, was not slow to put himselfe in possession of it, but vsed the first heate of their affections who ioyned with him, in setting on foote the businesse which neerely concerned him; and was not to be fore-slowed, being no more his owne than Gods.

The first care taken was that no newes of the reuolt might bee carried to Izreel, whereby the King might haue had warning either to fight or flee: this being foreseene, hee marched swiftly away, to take the Court while it was yet secure. King Iehoram was now so well recouered of his wounds, that hee could endure to ride abroad, for which cause it seemes that there was much feasting, and ioy made, especially by Queene Iezabel, who kept her state so well, that the brethren of Ahazia comming thither at this time, did make it as well their errand to salute the Queene, as to visit the King.

Certaine it is, that since the rebellion of Moab against Israel, the house of Ahab did neuer so much flourish as at this time. Seuenty Princes of the bloud Royall there were that liued in Samaria; Iehoram the sonne of Queene Iezabel had wonne Ramoth Gilead, which his Father had attempted in vaine, with losse of his life; and he wonne it by valiant fight, wherein he receiued wounds, of which the danger was now past, but the honour likely to continue. The amitie was so great betweene Israel and Iuda, that it might suffice to daunt all their common enemies, leauing no hope of successe, to any rebellious enterprizer: so that now the prophecie of Elias might be forgotten; or no otherwise remembred, than as an vnlikely tale by them that beheld the maiesticall face of the Court, wherein so great a friend as the King of Iuda was entertained, and fortie Princes of his bloud expected.

In the midst of this securitie, whilest these great Estates were (perhaps) either consulting about prosequution of their intents, first against the Aramites, and then against Moab, Edom, and other rebells and enemies: or else were triumphing in ioy of that which was already well atchieued, and the Queene Mother dressing her selfe in the brauest manner to come downe amongst them; tidings were brought in, that the watchman had from a Tower discouered a company comming. These newes were not very troublesome: for the Armie that lay in Ramoth Gilead, to bee readie against all attempts of the Aramites, was likely enough to bee discharged vpon some notice taken that the enemie would not, or could not stirre. Onely the King sent out an Horse-man to know what the matter was, and to bring him word. The messenger comming to Iehu, and asking whether all were well, was retained by him, who intended to giue the King as little warning as might bee. The seeming negligence of this fellow in not returning with an answere, might argue the matter to bee of small importance: yet the King to bee satisfied, sent out another that should bring him word how all went; and he was likewise detained by Iehu. These dumbe showes bred some suspicion in Iehoram, whom the watchmen certified of all that happened. And now the company drew so neere, that they might, though not perfectly, be discerned, and notice taken of Iehu himselfe by the furious manner of his marching. Wherefore the King that was loth to discouer any weaknesse, caused his Chariot to be made ready, and issued forth with Ahazia King of Iuda in his company, whose presence added maiestie to his traine, when strength to resist, or expedition to flee had been more needfull. This could not be done so hastily, but that Iehu was come euen to the Townes end, and there they met each other in the field field of Naboth. Iehoram beganne to ſalute Iehu with termes of peace, but receiuing a bitter anſwere, his heart failed him, ſo that crying out vpon the treaſon to his fellow King, he turned away to haue fled. But Iehu ſoone ouertooke him with an arrow, where-with he ſtrooke him dead, and threw his carkaſſe into that field, which, purchaſed with the bloud of the right full owner, was to bee watered with bloud of the vniuſt poſſeſſour. Neither did Ahazia eſcape ſo well, but that he was arreſted by a wound, which held him till death did ſeize vpon him.

The Kings Palace was ioyning to the wall, by the gate of the Citie, where Iezabel might ſoone be aduertiſed of this calamitie, if ſhee did not with her owne eyes behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for mercie, whoſe iudgement, pronounced againſt her long before, had ouer-taken her, when ſhee leaſt expected it. But ſhee, full of indignation, and proud thoughts, made her ſelfe readie in all haſte, and painted her face; hoping with her ſtately and imperious lookes to daunt the Traitour, or at the leaſt to vtter ſome Apophthegme, that ſhould expreſſe her braue ſpirit, and brand him with ſuch a reproach as might make him odious for euer. Little did ſhee thinke vpon the hungrie dogs, that were ordained to deuoure her, whoſe paunches the ſtibium, with which ſhee beſmeared her eyes, would more offend, than the ſcolding language where-with ſhee armed her tongue, could trouble the eares of him that had her in his power. As Iehu drew neere, ſhe opened her window, and looking out vpon him, beganne to put him in minde of Zimri, that had not long inioyned the fruits of his treaſon, and murther of the King his Maſter. This was in meere humane valuation ſtoutly ſpoken, but was indeede a part of miſerable folly, as are all things, howſoeuer laudable, if they haue an ill relation to God the Lord of all. Her owne Eunuches that ſtood by and heard her, were not affected ſo much as with any compaſſion of her fortune; much leſſe was her enemie daunted with her proud ſpirit. When Iehu ſaw that ſhee did vſe the little remainder of her life in ſeeking to vexe him; hee made her preſently to vnderſtand her owne eſtate, by deedes and not by words. He onely called to her ſeruants to know which of them would be of his ſide, and ſoone found them readie to offer their ſeruice, before the very face of their proud Ladie. Hereupon he commanded them to caſt her downe head-long: which immediately they performed without all regard of her greatneſſe and eſtate, wherein ſhee had a few houres before ſhined ſo glorioufly in the eyes of men; of men that conſidered not the iudgements of God that had beene denounced againſt her.

So periſhed this accurſed woman by the rude hands of her owne ſeruants, at the commandement of her greateſt enemie, that was yeſterday her ſubiect, but now her Lord: and ſhee periſhed miſerably ſtruggling in vaine with baſe groomes, who contumelioufly did hale and thruſt her, whileſt her inſulting enemie ſate on horſe-back, adding indignitie to her griefe by ſcornefull beholding the ſhamefull manner of her fall, and trampling her bodie vnder foote. Her dead carcaſſe that was left without the walls was deuoured by dogges, and her very memorie was odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her Idolatrie, murther, and oppreſſion, with ſlow, but ſure paiment, and full intereſt.

Ahazia King of Iuda fleeing a-pace from Iehu, was ouer-taken by the way where he lurked; and receiuing his deadly wound in the Kingdome of Samaria, was ſuffered to get him gone (which he did in all haſte) and ſeeke his buriall in his owne kingdome: and this fauour hee obtained for his grand-fathers ſake, not for his fathers, nor his owne. He died at Megiddo, and was thence carried to Ieruſalem, where hee was enterred with his Anceſtors, hauing raigned about one yeere.

CHAP. XXI.

Of ATHALIA, and whose Sonne he was that succeeded vnto her.

§. I.

Of ATHALIA her vsurping the Kingdome, and what pretences shee might forge.

2. Chron. 22. 9.

AFTER the death of Ahazia, it is saide that his house was not able to retaine the Kingdome: which note, and the proceedings of Athalia vpon the death of her Sonne, haue giuen occasion to diuers opinions concerning the Pedigree of Ioas, who raigned shortly after. For Athalia being thus dispoiled of her Sonne, vnder whose name shee had ruled at her pleasure, did forth-with lay hold vpon all the Princes of the bloud, and slew them, that so she might occupie the Royall Throne her selfe, and raigne as Queene, rather than liue a Subiect. Shee had before-hand put into great place, and made Counsailours vnto her sonne, such as were fittest for her purpose, and readie at all times to execute her will: that shee kept a strong guard about her it is very likely; and as likely it is that the great execution done by Iehoram, vpon the Princes, and many of the Nobilitie, had made the people tame, and fearefull to stirre, what soeuer they saw or heard.

Yet ambition, how violent soeuer it bee, is seldome or neuer so shameleſſe as to refuse the commoditie of goodly pretenses offering themselues; but rather scrapes together all that will any way serue to colour her proceedings. Wherefore it were not absurd for vs to thinke, that Athalia, when shee saw the Princes of the Royall bloud, all of them in a manner, slaine by her husband, and afterwards his owne children destroyed by the Philistims, began euen then to play her owne game, reducing by artificiall practice, into faire likelihoods, those possibilities where-with her husbands bad fortune had presented her. Not without great show of reason, either by her owne mouth, or by some trustie creature of hers, might shee giue him to vnderstand, how needfull it were to take the best order whileſt as yet hee might, for feare of the worst that might happen. If the issue of Dauid, which now remained onely in his Familie, should by any accident faile (as wofull experience had alreadie shewed what might after come to passe) the people of Iuda were not vnlikely to choose a King of some new stocke, a popular seditious man peraduenture, one that to countenance his owne vnworthinesse, would not care what aspersions hee laide vpon that Royall house, which was fallen downe. And who could assure him, that some ambitious spirit, fore-seeing what might be gotten thereby, did not alreadie contriue the destruction of him, and all his seede? Wherefore it were the wisest way to designe by his authoritie, not onely his Successour, but also the reuersioner, and so to prouide, that the Crowne might neuer be subiect to any rifeling, but remaine in the disposition of them that loued him best, if the worst that might bee feared comming to passe, his owne posteritie could not retaine it.

Such perswasions being vrged, and earnestly followed, by the importunate sollicitation of her that gouerned his affections, were able to make the iealous Tyrant thinke thinke that the only way to fruſtrate all deuices of ſuch as gaped after a change, was to make her Heire the laſt and yongeſt of his houſe, whom it moſt concerned, as being the Queene-Mother, to vp-hold the firſt and eldeſt.

If Athalia tooke no ſuch courſe as this in her huſbands times, yet might ſhee doe it in her Sonnes. For Ahazia (beſides that he was wholly ruled by his Mother) was not likely to take much care for the ſecuritie of his halfe-brethren, or their children; as accounting his Fathers other wiues, in reſpect of his owne high borne-Mother, little better than Concubines, and their children baſely begotten. But if this miſchieuous woman forgate her ſelfe ſo farre in her wicked policie, that ſhee loſt all opportunitie which the weakeneſſe of her huſband and ſonne did afford, of procuring to her ſelfe ſome ſeeming Title; yet could ſhee afterwards faine ſome ſuch matter, as boldly ſhee might: being ſure that none would aske to ſee her euidence, for feare of being ſent to learne the certaintie of her ſonne or huſband in another world. But I rather thinke that ſhee tooke order for her affaires beforehand. For though ſhee had no reaſon to ſuſpect or feare the ſuddaine death of her ſonne, yet it was the wiſeſt way to prouide betimes againſt all that might happen, whileſt her huſbands iſſue by other women was yong and vnable to reſiſt. We plainly find that the Brethren or Nephewes of Ahazia, to the number of two and fortie, were ſent to the Court of Iſrael, only to ſalute the children of the King, and the children of the Queene. The ſlender occaſion of which long iourney, conſidered together with the qualitie of theſe perſons (being in effect all the ſtocke of Iehoram that could be growne to any ſtrength) makes it very ſuſpitious that their entertainement in Iezabels houſe would only haue beene more formall, but little differing in ſubſtance, from that which they found at the hand of Iehu. Hee that lookes into the courſes held both before and after by theſe two Queenes, will finde cauſe enough to thinke no leſſe. Of ſuch as haue aſpired vnto Lordſhips not belonging to them, and thruſt out the right Heires by pretence of Teſtaments, that had no other validitie than the ſword of ſuch as claimed by them could giue, Hiſtories of late, yea of many Ages, afford plentifull examples: and the rule of Salomon is true: Is there any thing whereof one may ſay, Behold, this is new? it hath been alreadie in the old time that was before vs. Eccleſ. 1. 10.

That a King might ſhead his brothers bloud, was proued by Salomon vpon Adonias; that he might aliene the Crowne from his naturall Heires, Dauid had giuen proofe: but theſe had good ground of their doings. They which follow examples that pleaſe them, will neglect the reaſons of thoſe examples, if they pleaſe them not, and reſt contented with the practice, as more willingly ſhewing what they may doe, than acknowledging why Salomon ſlew his brother that had begunne one rebellion, and was entring into another. IEHORAM ſlew all his brethren, which were better than hee: DAVID purchaſed the Kingdome, and might the more freely diſpoſe of it, yet he diſpoſed of it as the Lord appointed; if Iehoram, who had loſt much and gotten nothing, thought that hee might aliene the remainder at his pleaſure; or if Ahazia ſought to cut off the ſucceſſion of his brethren, or of their iſſue: either of theſe was to be anſwered with the wordes which Iehoiada the Prieſt vſed afterwards, in declaring the title of IOASH: Behold, the Kings ſonne muſt raigne; as the Lord hath ſaid of the ſonnes of DAVID. Wherefore though I hold it very probable, that Athalia did pretend ſome title, whatſoeuer it might bee, to the Crowne of Iuda; yet is it moſt certaine that ſhee had thereunto no right at all, but onely got it by treachery, murder, and open violence; and ſo ſhee held it ſixe whole yeeres, and a part of the ſeuenth, in good ſeeming-ſecuritie. 2. Chro. 21. v. 13.

§. II.

How IEHV spent his time in Israel, so that he could not molest ATHALIA.

IN all this time Iehu did neuer goe about to disturbe her; which in reason hee was likely to desire, being an enemie to her whole House. But hee was occupied at the first in establishing himselfe, rooting out the posteritie of Ahab, and reforming somewhat in Religion: afterwards in warres against the Aramite, wherein hee was so farre ouercharged, that hardly hee could retaine his owne, much lesse attempt vpon others. Of the line of Ahab there were seuentie liuing in Samaria, out of which number Iehu by letter aduised the Citizens to set vp some one as King, and to prepare themselues to fight in his defence. Hereby might they gather how confident hee was, which they well vnderstood to proceede from greater power about him, than they could gather to resist him. Wherefore they tooke example by the two Kings whom hee had slaine, and being exceedingly afraid of him, they offered him their seruice, wherein they so readily shewed themselues obedient, that in lesse than one dayes warning, they sent him the heads of all those Princes, as they were inioyned by a second letter from him. After this hee surprized all the Priests of Baal by a subtiltie, faining a great sacrifice to their god, by which meanes he drew them altogether into one Temple, where he slew them; and in the same zeale to God vtterly demolished all the monuments of that impietie.

Concerning the Idolatrie deuised by Ieroboam, no King of Israel had euer greater reason than Iehu to destroy it. For he needed not to feare lest the people should be allured vnto the house of Dauid; it was (in appearance) quite rooted vp, and the Crowne of Iuda in the possession of a cruell Tyrannesse: he had receiued his kingdome by the vnexpected grace of God; and further, in regard of his zeale expressed in destroying Baal out of Israel, hee was promised, notwithstanding his following the sinne of Ieroboam, that the Kingdome should remaine in his Familie, to the fourth Generation. But all this would not serue; he would needs helpe to piece out Gods prouidence with his owne circumspection; doing therein like a foolish greedie gamester, who by stealing a needelesse Card to assure himselfe of winning a stake, forfeits his whole rest. He had questionlesse displeased many, by that which he did against Baal; and many more he should offend by taking from them the vse of a superstition, so long practized as was that Idolatrie of Ieroboam. Yet all these, how many soeuer they were, had neuer once thought vpon making him King, if God, whom, to retaine them, hee now forsooke, had not giuen him the Crowne, when more difficulties appeared in the way of getting it, than could at any time after be found in the meanes of holding it.

This ingratitude of Iehu drew terrible vengeance of God vpon Israel, whereof Hazael King of Damascus was the Executioner. The crueltie of this barbarous Prince we may finde in the prophecie of Elizeus, who fore-told it, saying: Their strong Cities shalt thou set on fire, and their young men shalt thou slay with the sword, and shalt dash their Infants against the stones, and rent in pieces their women with child. So did not onely the wickednesse of Ahab cause the ruine of his whole house, but the obstinate Idolatrie of the people bring a lamentable miserie vpon all the Land. For the furie of Hazaels victorie was not quenched with the destruction of a few Townes, nor wearied with one inuasion; but he smote them in all the coasts of Israel, and wasted all the Countrie beyond the Riuer of Iordan. Notwithstanding all these calamities, it seemes that the people repented not of their Idolatrie; (For in those dayes the Lord beganne to loath Israel,) but rather it is likely, that they bemoaned the noble House of Ahab, vnder which they had beaten those enemies to whom they were now a prey, and had brauely fought for the conquest of Syria, where they had enlarged their border, by winning Ramoth Gilead, and compelled Benhadad to restore the Cities ties which his Father had wonne: whereas now they were faine to make wofull ſhifts, liuing vnder a Lord that had better fortune and courage in murdering his Maſter that had put him in truſt, than in defending his people from their cruell enemies. Thus it commonly falls out, that they who can finde all manner of difficulties in ſeruing him, to whom nothing is difficult, are, in ſtead of the eaſe and pleaſure to themſelues propounded by contrarie courſes, ouer-whelmed with the troubles which they ſought to auoide, and therein by God whom they firſt forſooke, forſaken, and left vnto the wretched labours of their owne blinde wiſedome, wherein they had repoſed all their confidence.

§. III.

Of ATHALIAHS Gouernement.

THeſe calamities falling vpon Iſrael, kept Athalia ſafe on that ſide, giuing her leiſure to looke to things at home; as hauing little to doe abroad, vnleſſe it were ſo that ſhee held ſome correſpondencie with Hazael, pretending therein to imitate her huſbands grand-father King Aſa, who had done the like. And ſome probabilitie that ſhee did ſo may be gathered out of that which is recorded of her doings. For wee finde, that this wicked ATHALIA and her children brake vp the houſe of God, and all things that were dedicate for the houſe of the Lord did they beſtow vpon BAALIM. 2. Chro. 24. v. 7. Such a ſacriledge, though it proceeded from a deſire to ſet out her owne Idolatrie, with ſuch pompe as might make it the more glorious in the peoples eyes, was not likely to want ſome faire pretext of neceſſitie of the State ſo requiring: in which caſe others before her had made bold with that holy place, and her next ſucceſſour was faine to doe the like, being thereunto forced by Hazael, who perhaps was delighted with the taſte of that which was formerly thence extracted for his ſake.

Vnder this impious gouernement of Athalia, the deuotion of the Prieſts and Leuites was very notable, and ſerued (no doubt) very much to retaine the people in the religion taught by God himſelfe, howſoeuer the Queens proceedings aduanced the contrarie. For the pouertie of that ſacred Tribe of Leui muſt needes haue been exceeding great at this time; all their lands and poſſeſſions in the ten Tribes being vtterly loſt, the oblations and other perquiſites, by which they liued, being now very few, and ſmall; and the ſtore laid vp in better times vnder godly Kings, being all taken away by ſhamefull robberie. Yet they vp-held in all this miſerie the ſeruice of God, and the daily ſacrifice, keeping duly their courſes, and performing obedience to the high Prieſt, no leſſe than in thoſe dayes wherein their entertainement was farre better.

§. IIII.

Of the preſeruation of IOAS.

IEHOIADA then occupied the high Prieſt-hood, an honourable, wiſe and religious man. To his carefulneſſe it may be aſcribed, that the ſtate of the Church was in ſome ſlender ſort vp-held in thoſe vnhappie times. His wife was Iehoſhabeth, who was daughter of King Iehoram, and ſiſter to Ahazia, a godly Ladie and vertuous, whoſe pietie makes it ſeeme that Athalia was not her Mother, though her acceſſe to the Court argue the contrarie: but her diſcreet carriage might more eaſily procure her welcome to her owne Fathers houſe, than the education vnder ſuch a Mother could haue permitted her to be ſuch as ſhee was. By her care Ioaſh the yong Prince that raigned ſoone after, was conueighed out of the nourſerie, when Athalia deſtroyed all the Kings children, and was carried secretly into the Temple, whereas secretly hee was brought vp. How it came to passe that this yong child was not hunted out, when his bodie was missing, nor any great reckoning (for ought that we finde) made of his escape, I will not stand to examine: for it was not good in policie, that the people should heare say, that one of the children had auoided that cruell blow; it might haue made them hearken after innouations, and so bee the lesse conformable to the present gouernment. So Ioash was deliuered out of that slaughter, he and his Nurse being gone no man could tell whither, and might bee thought peraduenture to bee cast away, as hauing no other guard than a poore woman that gaue him sucke, who foolishly doubting that shee her selfe should haue beene slaine, was fled away with him into some desolate places, where it was like enough that shee and hee should perish. In such cases flatterers, or men desirous of reward, easily coine such tales, and rather sweare them to bee true in their owne knowledge, than they will lose the thankes due to their ioyfull tidings.

§. V.
Whose Sonne IOAS was.

†. I.
Whether IOAS may be thought likely to haue beene the Sonne of AHAZIA.

2. Kings 11. 2. & 2. Chron. 22. v. 11.

NOw concerning this Ioash, whose sonne he was, it is a thing of much difficultie to affirme, and hath caused much controuersie among writers. The places of Scripture, which call him the sonne of AHAZIA, seeme plaine enough. How any figure of the Hebrew language might giue that title of Sonne vnto him, in regard that he was his Successor, I neither by my selfe can finde, nor can by any helpe of Authors learne how to answere the difficulties appearing in the contrarie opinions of them, that thinke him to haue beene, or not, the naturall Sonne of Ahazia. For whereas it is said, that

2. Chron. 22. v. 9. the house of AHAZIA was not able to retaine the Kingdome; some doe inferre that this Ioash was not properly called his Sonne, but was the next of his kindred, and therefore succeeded him, as a sonne in the inheritance of his Father. And hereunto the murder committed by Athalia, doth very well agree. For shee perceiuing that the Kingdome was to fall into their hands, in whom shee had no interest, might easily finde cause to feare, that the tyrannie exercised by her husband, at her instigation vpon so many noble Houses, would now bee reuenged vpon her selfe. The ruine of her Idolatrous religion might in this case terrifie both her and her Minions; the sentence of the Law rewarding that offence with death; and the Tragedie of Iezabel teaching her what might happen to another Queene. All this had little concerned her, if her owne grand-child had beene heire to the Crowne; for shee that had power enough to make her selfe Queene, could with more ease, and lesse enuie, haue taken vpon her the office of a Protector, by which authoritie shee might haue done her pleasure, and beene the more both obayed by others, and secure of her owne estate, as not wanting an Heire. Wherefore it was not needefull, that she should be so vnnaturall, as to destroy the child of her owne sonne, of whose life she might haue made greater vse, than shee could of his death: whereas indeede, the loue of grand-mothers to their Nephewes, is little lesse than that of Mothers to their children.

This argument is very strong. For it may seeme incredible, that all naturall affection should be cast a-side, when as neither necessitie vrgeth, nor any commoditie thereby gotten requireth it, yea when all humane policie doth teach one the same, which nature without reason would haue perswaded.

†. II.

†. II.

That IOAS did not deſcend from NATHAN.

BVt (as it is more eaſie to finde a difficultie in that which is related, than to ſhew how it might haue otherwiſe been) the pedegree of this Ioaſh is, by them which thinke him not the ſonne of Ahazia, ſet downe in ſuch ſort that it may very iuſtly be ſuſpected. They ſay that he deſcended from Nathan the ſonne of Dauid, and not from Salomon; to which purpoſe they bring a Hiſtorie (I know not whence) of two families of the race of Dauid, ſaying that the line of Salomon held the kingdome with this condition, that if at any time it failed, the familie of Nathan ſhould ſucceede it. Concerning this Nathan the ſonne of Dauid there are that would haue him to bee Nathan the Prophet, who, as they thinke, was by Dauid adopted. And of this opinion was Origen, as alſo S. Auguſtine ſometime was, but afterward hee reuoked it, as was meet; for this Nathan is reckoned among the ſonnes of Dauid, by Bathſhua the daughter of Ammes, and therfore could not be the Prophet. Gregory Nazianzen (as I finde him cited by Peter Martyr) and after him, Eraſmus, and Faber Stapulenſis, haue likewiſe held the ſame of Ioaſh, deriuing him from Nathan. But Nathan, and thoſe other brethren of Salomon by the ſame mother, are thought, vpon good likelihoods, to haue been the children of Vria the Hittite: and ſo are they accounted by ſundry of the fathers, and by Lyra, and Abulenſis, who follow the Hebrew expoſitors of that place in the firſt of Chronicles. The words of Salomon calling himſelfe the onely begotten of his mother, doe approoue this expoſition: for wee reade of no more than two ſonnes which Bathſhua or Bathſheba did beare vnto Dauid, whereof the one, begotten in adultery, died an infant, and Salomon only of her children by the King did liue. So that the reſt muſt needs haue been the children of Vria, and are thought to haue been Dauids onely by adoption. Wherefore, if Ioas had not been the ſonne of Ahazia, then muſt that pedegree haue been falſe, wherein S. Matthew deriueth him lineally from Salomon; yea, then had not our bleſſed Sauiour iſſued from the loynes of Dauid, according to the fleſh, but had onely been of his line by courteſie of the Nation, and forme of Law, as any other might haue been. As for the authority of Philo, which hath drawne many late writers into the opinion that Ioaſh was not of the poſteritie of Salomon, it is enough to ſay, that this was Frier Annius his Philo: for no other edition of Philo hath any ſuch matter; but Annius can make Authors to ſpeake what he liſt.

1. Chron. 3. 5.

†. III.

That IOAS may probably be thought to haue beene the ſonne of IEHORAM.

IN ſo doubtfull a caſe, if it ſeeme lawfull to hold an opinion that no man hath yet thought vpon, me thinkes it were not amiſſe to lay open at once, and peruſe together two places of Scripture, whereof the one telling the wickedneſſe of Iehoram the ſonne of Iehoſaphat King of Iuda, for which hee and his children periſhed, rehearſeth it as one of Gods mercies towards the houſe of Dauid, that according to his promiſe he would giue him a light, and to his children for euer: the other doth ſay, that for the offences of the ſame IEHORAM, there was not a ſonne left him, ſaue IEHOAHAS the yongeſt of his ſonnes. Now, if it were in regard of Gods promiſe to Dauid, that after thoſe maſſacres of Iehoram, vpon all his brethren, and of the Philiſtims, and Arabians vpon the children of Iehoram, one of the ſeede of Dauid eſcaped; why may it not be thought that hee was ſaid to haue eſcaped, in whom the line of Dauid was preſerued? for had all the race of Salomon been rooted vp in theſe woefull Tragedies, and the progenie of Nathan ſucceeded in place thereof; like enough it is that ſome remembrance more particular would haue been extant, of an euent

2. King. 8. v. 19.

so memorable. That the race of Nathan was not extinguished, it is indeed apparent by the Genealogie of our Lord; as it is recounted by S. Luke: but the preseruation of the house of Dauid, mentioned in the bookes of Kings and Chronicles, was performed in the person of Iehoahas, in whom the Royal branch of Salomon, the naturall, and not onely legall issue remaining of Dauid, was kept aliue. Wherefore it may bee thought that this Ioash, who followed Athalia in the Kingdome, was the yongest sonne of Ieboram, whose life Athalia as a stepdame, was not likely to pursue. For it were not easily vnderstood, why the preseruation of Dauids line, by Gods especiall mercie, in regard of his promise made, should pertaine rather to that time, when be-
2. King. 10. 13. sides Ahazia himselfe, there were two and fortie of his brethren, or (as in another place they are called) sonnes of his brethren remaining aliue, which afterwards
2. Chron. 22. v. 8. were all slaine by Iehu; than haue reference to the lamentable destruction and little lesse than extirpation of that progenie, wherein one onely did escape. Certainely that inhumane murther which Ieboram committed vpon his brethren, if it were (as appeareth in the Historie) reuenged vpon his owne children; then was not this vengeance of God accomplished by the Philistims and Arabians, but being onely begun by them, was afterwards prosecuted by Iehu, and finally tooke effect by the hands of that same wicked woman, at whose instigation hee had committed such barbarous outrage. And from this execution of Gods heauie iudgement layd vpon Ieboram
2. Chron. 21. 14. and all his children, onely Iehoahas his yongest sonne was exempted; whom therefore if I should affirme to bee the same with Ioas, which is called the sonne of Ahazia, I should not want good probabilitie. Some further appearance of necessitie there is, which doth argue that it could no otherwise haue beene. For it was the youngest sonne of Ieboram in whom the race was preserued; which could not in any likelihood be Ahazia, seeing that he was twenty yeeres old at the least (as is already noted) when hee began to raigne, and consequently, was borne in the eighteenth or twentieth yeere of his Fathers age. Now, I know not whether of the two is more vnlikely, either that Ieboram should haue begotten many children before he was eighteene yeeres old, or that hauing (as hee had) many wiues and children, hee should vpon the sudden, at his eighteenth yeere, become vnfruitfull, and beget no more in twenty yeeres following: each of which must haue been true, if this were true that Ahazia was the same Iehoahas, which was his yongest sonne. But this inconuenience is taken away, and those other doubts arising from the causelesse crueltie of Athalia, in seeking the life of Ioas, are easily cleared, if Ioas and Iehoahas were
2. Chron. 24. 1. one. Neither doth his age withstand this opinion. For he was seuen yeeres old when hee began to reigne; which if wee vnderstand of yeeres compleat, he might haue been a yeere old at the death of Ieboram, being begotten somewhat after the beginning of his sickenesse. Neither is it more absurd to say that he was the naturall sonne of Ieboram, though called the sonne of Ahazia, than it were to say, as great Authors haue done, this difficultie notwithstanding, that hee was of the posteritie of Nathan. One thing indeed I know not how to answer; which, had it concurred with the rest, might haue serued as the very foundation of this opinion. The name of Iehoahas, that soundeth much more neere to Ioas, than to Ahazia, in an English eare, doth in the Hebrew (as I am informed by some, skilfull in that language) through the diuersitie of certaine letters, differ much from that which it most resembleth in our Westerne
2. Chron. 22. 6. manner of writing, and little from the other. Now, although it be so that Ahazia himselfe be also called Azaria, and must haue had three names, if hee were the same with Iehoahas; in which manner Ioas might also haue had seuerall names; yet, because I finde no other warrant hereof than a bare possibilitie, I will not presume to build an opinion vpon the weake foundatation of mine owne coniecture, but leaue all to the consideration of such as haue more abilitie to iudge, and leisure to consider of this point.

†. IIII.

Vpon what reasons ATHALIA might seeke to destroy IOAS, if he were her owne grandchilde.

IF therefore we shall follow that which is commonly receiued, and interpret the text according to the letter, it may bee said, that Athalia was not onely blinded by the passions of ambition and zeale to her idolatrous worship of Baalim, but pursued the accomplishment of some naturall desires, in seeking the destruction of her grandchilde, and the rest of the bloud Royall. For whether it were so that Athalia (as proud and cruell women are not alwayes chaste) had imitated the libertie of Iezabel her sister in law, whose whoredomes were vpbraided by Iehu to her sonne; or whether she had children by some former husband, before she was married vnto Iehoram (which is not vnlikely in regard of her age, who was daughter of Omri, and sister to Ahab) certaine it is that she had sonnes of her owne, and those old enough to be imployed, as they were, in robbing of the Temple. So it is not greatly to bee wondred at, that to settle the Crowne vpon her owne children, shee did seeke to cut off, by wicked policie, all other claimes. As for Ioas, if she were his grandmother, yet shee might mistrust the interest which his mother would haue in him, left when he came to yeers, it might withdraw him from her deuotion. And hereof (besides that women doe commonly better loue their daughters husbands, than their sonnes wiues) there is some appearance in the reigne of her sonne: for shee made him spend all his time in idle iourneys, to no other apparant end, than that she might rule at home; and he liuing abroad be estranged from his wife, and entertaine some new fancies, wherein Iezabel had cunning enough to bee his tutoresse. But when the sword of Iehu had rudely cut in sunder all these fine deuices, then was Athalia faine to goe roundly to worke, and doe as shee did, whereby she thought to make all sure. Otherwise, if (as I could rather thinke) she were onely stepdame to Ioas, we neede not seeke into the reasons moouing her to take away his life; her owne hatred was cause enough to dispatch him among the first.

2. King. c. 9. v. 22.

§. VI.

A digression, wherein is maintained the liberty of vsing coniecture in Histories.

THus much concerning the person of Ioas, from whom, as from a new roote, the tree of Dauid was propagated into many branches. In handling of which matter, the more I consider the nature of this Historie, and the diuersitie betweene it and others, the lesse me thinkes I neede to suspect mine owne presumption, as deseruing blame, for curiositie in matter of doubt, or boldnesse in libertie of coniecture. For all Histories doe giue vs information of humane counsailes and euents, as farre forth as the knowledge and faith of the writers can affoord; but of Gods will, by which all things are ordered, they speake onely at randome, and many times falsly. This we often finde in profane writers, who ascribe the ill successe of great vndertakings to the neglect of some impious Rites, whereof indeede God abhorred the performance as vehemently, as they thought him to be highly offended with the omission. Hereat we may the lesse wonder, if we consider the answere made by the Iewes in Ægypt vnto Ieremie the Prophet reprehending their idolatry. For, howsoeuer the written Law of God was knowne vnto the people, and his punishments laid vpon them for contempt thereof were very terrible, and euen then but newly executed; yet were they so obstinately bent vnto their owne wills, that they would not by any meanes be drawne to acknowledge the true cause of their affliction. But they told the Prophet roundly, that they would worship the Queene of Heauen, as they and their

Ier. 44. v. 17. and 18. their Fathers, their Kings and their Princes had vſed to do; For then (ſaid they) had we plenty of victuals, and were well, and felt no euill: adding that all manner of miſeries were befallen them, ſince they left off that ſeruice of the Queene of Heauen. So blinde is the wiſedome of man, in looking into the counſaile of God, which to finde out there is no better nor other guide than his owne written will not peruerted by vaine additions.

But this Hiſtorie of the Kings of Iſrael and Iuda hath herein a ſingular prerogatiue aboue all that haue been written by the moſt ſufficient of meerely humane authours: it ſetteth downe expreſly the true, and firſt cauſes of all that happened; not in imputing the death of Ahab to his ouer-forwardneſſe in battaile; the ruine of his familie, to the ſecuritie of Ieroboam in Izreel; nor the victories of Hazael, to the great commotions raiſed in Iſrael, by the comming of Iehu; but referring all vnto the will of God, I meane, to his reuealed will: from which that his hidden purpoſes doe not varie, this ſtory, by many great examples, giues moſt notable proofe. True it is, that the concurrence of ſecond cauſes with their effects, is in theſe bookes nothing largely deſcribed; nor perhaps exactly in any of thoſe Hiſtories that are in theſe points moſt copious. For it was well noted by that worthy Gentleman, Sir PHILIP SIDNIE, that Hiſtorians doe borrow of Poets, not onely much of their ornament, but ſomewhat of their ſubſtance. Informations are often falſe, records not alwayes true, and notorious actions commonly inſufficient to diſcouer the paſſions which did ſet them firſt on foote. Wherefore they are faine (I ſpeake of the beſt, and in that which is allowed; for to take out of Liuie euery one circumſtance of Claudius his iourney againſt Aſdruball in Italie, fitting all to another buſineſſe, or any practice of that kinde, is neither Hiſtoricall nor Poeticall) to ſearch into the particular humour of Princes, and of thoſe which haue gouerned their affections, or the inſtruments by which they wrought, from whence they doe collect the moſt likely motiues, or impediments of euery buſineſſe; and ſo figuring as neere to the life as they can imagine, the matter in hand, they iudiciouſly conſider the defects in counſaile, or obliquity in proceeding.

S. Phil. Sid. in his Apol. for Poetry.

Yet all this, for the moſt part, is not enough to giue aſſurance, howſoeuer it may giue ſatisfaction. For the heart of man is vnſearchable: and Princes, howſoeuer their intents bee ſeldome hidden from ſome of thoſe many eyes which prie both into them, and into ſuch as liue about them; yet ſometimes either by their owne cloſe temper, or by ſome ſubtill miſte, they conceale the trueth from all reports. Yea, many times the affections themſelues lie dead, and buried in obliuion, when the preparations which they begate, are conuerted to another vſe. The induſtrie of an Hiſtorian, hauing ſo many things to weary it, may well be excuſed, when finding apparant cauſe enough of things done, it forbeareth to make further ſearch; though it often fall out, where ſundry occaſions worke to the ſame end, that one ſmall matter in a weake minde is more effectuall, than many that ſeemes farre greater. So comes it many times to paſſe, that great fires, which conſume whole houſes or Townes, begin with a few ſtrawes, that are waſted or not ſeene; when the flame is diſcouered, hauing faſtened vpon ſome wood-pile, that catcheth all about it. Queſtionleſſe it is, that the warre commenced by Darius, and purſued by Xerxes againſt the Greekes, proceeded from deſire of the Perſians to inlarge their Empire: howſoeuer the enterprize of the Athenians vpon Sardes, was noiſed abroad as the ground of that quarrell: yet Herodotus telleth vs, that the wanton deſire of Queene Atoſſa, to haue the Grecian dames her bondwomen, did firſt moue Darius to prepare for this warre before he had receiued any iniury; and when he did not yet ſo much deſire to get more, as to enioy what was already gotten.

Herod. l. 1.

I will not here ſtand to argue whether Herodotus bee more iuſtly reprehended by ſome, or defended by others, for alleadging the vaine appetite, and ſecret ſpeech of the Queene in bed with her husband, as the cauſe of thoſe great euils following; this I may boldly affirme, (hauing I thinke, in euery eſtate ſome ſufficient witneſſes) that matter of much consequence, founded in all seeming vpon substantiall reasons, haue issued indeed from such pettie trifles, as no Historian would either thinke vpon, or could well search out.

Therefore it was a good answere that Sixtus Quintus the Pope made to a certaine Frier, comming to visite him in his Popedome, as hauing long before in his meaner estate, beene his familiar friend. This poore Frier, being emboldened by the Pope to vse his old libertie of speech, aduentured to tell him, that he very much wondred how it was possible for his Holinesse, whom he rather tooke for a direct honest man, than any cunning polititian, to attaine vnto the Papacie; in compassing of which, all the subtiltie (sayd hee) of the most crafty braines, finde worke enough: and therefore the more I thinke vpon the Art of the conclaue, and your vnaptnesse thereto, the more I needs must wonder. Pope Sixtus to satisfie the plaine dealing Frier, dealt with him againe as plainly, saying, Hadst thou liued abroad as I haue done, and seene by what folly this world is gouerned, thou wouldest wonder at nothing.

Surely, if this be referred vnto those exorbitant engines, by which the course of affaires is mooued; the Pope said true. For the wisest of men are not without their vanities, which requiring and finding mutuall toleration, worke more closely, and earnestly, than right reason either needes or can. But if we lift vp our thoughts to that supreme Gouernour, of whose Empire all that is true, which by the Poet was said of Iupiter:

Qui terram inertem, qui mare temperat
Ventosum, & vrbes, regnaq; tristia
Diuosq;, mortalesq; turmas,
Imperio regit vnus æquo.

Who rules the duller earth, the wind-swolne streames,
The ciuill Cities, and th'infernall realmes,
Who th'host of heauen and the mortall band,
Alone doth gouerne by his iust commaund.

Then shall wee finde the quite contrary. In him there is no vncertaintie nor change; he foreseeth all things, and all things disposeth to his owne honour; Hee neither deceiueth nor can be deceiued, but continuing one and the same for euer, doth constantly gouerne all creatures by that law, which hee hath prescribed and will neuer alter. The vanities of men beguile their vaine contriuers, and the prosperitie of the wicked, is the way leading to their destruction: yea, this broad and headlong passage to hell, is not so delightfull as it seemeth at the first entrance, but hath growing in it, besides the poisons which infect the soule, many cruell thornes deepely wounding the bodie, all which, if any few escape, they haue onely this miserable aduantage of others, that their descent was the more swift and expedite. But the seruice of God is the path guiding vs to perfect happinesse, and hath in it a true, though not compleat felicitie, yeelding such abundance of ioy to the conscience, as doth easily counteruaile all afflictions whatsoeuer; though indeed those brambles that sometimes teare the skinne of such as walke in this blessed way, doe commonly lay hold vpon them at such time as they sit downe to take their ease, and make them wish themselues at their iournies end, in the presence of their Lord whom they faithfully serue, in whose presence is the fulnesse of ioy, and at whose right hand are pleasures for euermore. Psal. 16. v. 11.

Wherfore it being the end and scope of all History, to teach by example of times past, such wisdome as may guide our desires and actions, we should not maruaile though the Chronicles of the Kings of Iuda and Israel, being written by men inspired with the Spirit of God, instruct vs chiefly, in that which is most requisite for vs to know, as the meanes to attaine vnto true felicitie, both here, and hereafter, propounding pounding examples which illustrate this infallible rule, The feare of the Lord is the beginning of Wisedome. Had the expedition of Xerxes (as it was foretold by Daniel) been written by some Prophet after the captivitie: wee may well beleeue that the counsaile of God therein, and the executioners of his righteous will, should haue occupied either the whole or the principall roome in that narration. Yet had not the purpose of Darius, the desire of his Wife, and the businesse at Sardes, with other occurrents, been the lesse true, though they might haue beene omitted, as the lesse materiall: but these things it had beene lawfull for any man to gather out of prophane Histories, or out of circumstances otherwise appearing, wherein hee should not haue done iniurie to the Sacred Writings, as long as he had forborne to derogate from the first causes, by ascribing to the second more then was due.

Such, or little different, is the businesse that I haue now in hand: wherein I cannot beleeue that any man of iudgement will taxe mee, as either fabulous or presumptuous. For he doth not faine, that rehearseth probabilities as bare coniectures; neither doth he deprave the Text, that seeketh to illustrate and make good in humane reason, those things, which authority alone, without further circumstance, ought to haue confirmed in euery mans beliefe. And this may suffice in defence of the libertie, which I haue vsed in coniectures, and may hereafter vse when occasion shall require, as neither vnlawfull, nor mis-beseeming an Historian.

§. VII.

The conspiracie against ATHALIA.

When Athalia had now sixe yeeres and longer worne the Crowne of Iuda, and had found neither any forraine enemie, nor domesticall aduersarie to disturbe her possession, suddenly the period of her glory, and reward of her wickednesse meeting together, tooke her away without any warning, by a violent and shamefull death. For the growth of the yong Prince began to be such, as permitted him no longer to be concealed, and it had been very vnfitting that his education should bee simple, to make him seeme the childe of some poore man (as for his safetie it was requisite,) when his capacitie required to haue beene indued with the stomake and qualities meete for a King. All this Iehoiada the Priest considered, and withall, the great increase of impietie, which taking deepe roote in the Court, was likely to spread it selfe ouer all the Countrie, if care were not vsed to weede it vp very speedily. Wherefore he associated vnto himselfe fiue of the Captaines, in whose fidelitie he had best assurance, and hauing taken an oath of them, and shewed them the Kings sonne, he made a Couenant with them, to aduance him to the Kingdome. These drew in others of the principall men, to countenance the action, procuring at the first onely that they should repaire to Ierusalem, where they were further acquainted with the whole matter. There needed not many perswasions to winne them to the businesse: the promise of the Lord vnto the house of Dauid, was enough to assure them, that the action was both lawfull, and likely to succeede as they desired.

But in compassing their intent some difficulties appeared: For it was not to bee hoped, that with open force they should bring their purpose to good issue; neither were the Captaines, and other associats of Iehoiada able by close working, to drawe together so many trustie and seruiceable hands as would suffice to manage the businesse. To helpe in this case, the Priest gaue order to such of the Leuites, as had finished their courses in waiting on the Diuine seruice at the Temple, and were now relieued by others that succeeded in their turnes, that they should not depart vntill they knew his further pleasure. So by admitting the new commers, and not discharging the old, he had, without any noise, made vp such a number, as would bee able able to deale with the Queens ordinarie Guard, and that was enough, for if the Tyranneſſe did not preuaile againſt them at the firſt brunt, the fauour of the People was like to ſhew it ſelfe on their ſide, who made head againſt her. Theſe Leuites were placed in the inner Court of the Temple, about the perſon of the King, who as yet was kept cloſe; the followers of the Captaines, and other adherents, were beſtowed in the vtter Courts: As for weapons, the Temple it ſelfe had ſtore enough; King Dauid had left an Armorie to the place, which was now employed in defence of his iſſue.

All things being in a readineſſe, and the day come, wherein this high deſigne was to be put in execution; Iehoiada deliuered vnto the Captaines, Armour for them and their adherents; appointed a guard vnto the Kings perſon; produced him openly, and gaue vnto him the Crowne; vſing all ceremonies accuſtomed in ſuch ſolemnities, with great applauſe of the people. Of theſe doings, the Queene was the laſt that heard any word; which is not ſo ſtrange as it may ſeeme: for inſolent natures, by dealing outragiouſly with ſuch as bring them ill tidings, doe commonly looſe the benefit of hearing what is to bee feared, whileſt yet it may bee preuented, and haue no information of danger, till their owne eyes, amazed with the ſuddenneſſe, behold it in the ſhape of ineuitable miſchiefe.

All Ieruſalem was full of the rumour, and entertayned it with very good liking. Some carried home the newes, others ranne forth to ſee, and the common joy was ſo great, that without apprehenſion of perill, vnder the windowes of the Court, were the people running and praiſing the King. Athalia hearing and beholding the extraordinarie concourſe, and noiſe, of folkes in the ſtreets, making towards the Temple, with much vnvſuall paſſion in their lookes, did preſently conceiue, that ſomewhat worthie of her care was happened; though, what it might bee, ſhee did not apprehend. Howſoeuer it were, ſhee meant to vſe her owne wiſedome in looking into the matter, and ordering all as the occaſion might happen to require. It may bee, that ſhee thought it ſome eſpeciall ſolemnitie vſed in the Diuine ſeruice, which cauſed this much adoe; and hereof the vnaccuſtomed number of Leuites, and of other deuout men, about the towne, might giue ſome preſumption. 2. Chron. 23. 12.

Many things argue that ſhee little thought vpon her owne Tragedie; although Ioſephus would make it ſeeme otherwiſe. For we finde in the Text, Shee came to the people into the houſe of the Lord (which was neere to her Palace) and that when ſhee looked and ſaw the King ſtand by his pillar, as the manner was, with the Princes, or great men of the Land by him, and the Trumpetters proclaiming him, ſhee rent her clothes, and cryed, Treaſon, Treaſon. Hereby it appeares that ſhee was quietly going, without any miſtruſt or feare, to take her place, which when ſhee found occupied by another, then ſhee begun to afflict her ſelfe, as one caſt away, and cryed out in vaine vpon the Treaſon, whereby ſhee ſaw that ſhee muſt periſh. But that ſhee came with a guard of armed men to the Temple, (as Ioſephus reporteth) and that her companie being beaten back, ſhee entred alone, and commanded the people to kill the yong Tyrant, I finde no where in Scripture, neither doe I hold it credible. For had ſhee truely knowne how things went, ſhee would ſurely haue gathered her friends about her, and vſed thoſe forces in defence of her Crowne, by which ſhee gat it, and hitherto had held it. Certainely, if it were granted, that ſhee, like a new Semiramis, did march in the head of her troupe, yet it had beene meere madneſſe in her, to enter the place alone, when her aſſiſtants were kept out; but if ſhee perceiuing that neither her authoritie, nor their owne weapons, could preuaile to let in her guard, would neuertheleſſe take vpon her to command the death of the new King, calling a child of ſeuen yeeres old a Conſpirator, and bidding them to kill him, whom ſhee ſaw to bee armed in his defence, may wee not thinke that ſhee was mad in the moſt extreme degree? Certaine it is that the counſaile of God would haue taken effect, in her deſtruction, had ſhee vſed the moſt likely meanes to diſappoint it: yet wee neede not ſo cut her throate with any morall impoſſibilities. It is 2. Chron. 23. 12. & 13. & 2. King. c. 11. vers. 13. & 14.

enough to ſay, that the godly zeale of Iehoiada found more eaſie ſucceſſe, through her indiſcretion, than otherwiſe could haue beene expected; ſo that at his appointment, ſhee was without more adoe, carried out of the Temple and ſlaine, yea ſo, that no bloud, ſaue her owne, was ſhed in that quarrell; her ſmall traine, that ſhe brought along with her, not daring to ſtand in her defence.

§. VIII.

The death of ATHALIA, with a compariſon of her and IEZABEL.

MOſt like it is, that Athalia had many times, with great indignation, bewailed the raſhneſſe of her Nephew Iehoram the Iſraelite, who did fooliſhly caſt himſelfe into the very throat of danger, gaping vpon him, only through his eager deſire of quickly knowing what the matter meant: yet, ſhee her ſelfe, by the like bait, was taken in the like trap, and hauing liued ſuch a life as Iezabel had done, was rewarded with a ſutable death. Theſe two Queenes were in many points much alike, each of them was Daughter, Wife, and Mother to a King; each of them ruled her huſband; was an Idolatreſſe, and a Murdreſſe. The only difference appearing in their conditions, is, that Iezabel is more noted as incontinent of body, Athalia as ambitious: So that each of them ſurviuing her huſband about eight yeeres, did ſpend the time in ſatisfying her owne affections; the one vſing tyrannie, as the exerciſe of her haughtie minde; the other painting her face, for the ornament of her vnchaſte body. In the manner of their death little difference there was, or in thoſe things which may ſeeme in this world to pertaine vnto the dead when they are gone. Each of them was taken on the ſuddaine by Conſpirators, and each of them exclayming vpon the Treaſon, receiued ſentence from the mouth of one that had liued vnder her ſubjection; in execution whereof, Iezabel was trampled vnder the feet of her enemies horſes; Athalia ſlaine at her owne horſe-gate; the death of Athalia hauing (though not much) the more leiſure to vexe her proud heart; that of Iezabel, the more indignitie, and ſhame of body. Touching their buriall, Iezabel was deuoured by Dogges, as the Lord had threatned by the Prophet Elias; what became of Athalia wee doe not finde. Like enough it is, that ſhe was buried, as hauing not perſecuted and ſlaine the Lords Prophets, but ſuffered the Prieſts to exerciſe their function; yet of her buriall there is no monument; for ſhee was a Church-robber. The ſeruice of Baal erected by theſe two Queenes, was deſtroyed as ſoone as they were gone, and their Chaplaines, the Prieſts of that Religion, ſlaine. Herein alſo it came to paſſe, alike, as touching them both when they were dead; the Kings who ſlue them, were afterwards afflicted, both of them by the ſame hand of Hazael the Syrian; in which point Athalia had the greater honour, if the Syrian (who ſeemes to haue beene her good friend) pretended her reuenge, as any part of his quarrell to Iuda. Concerning children, all belonging to Iezabel, periſhed in few dayes after her: whether Athalia left any behinde her, it is vncertaine; ſhee had ſonnes liuing after ſhee was Queene, of whom, or of any other, that they were ſlaine with her, we doe not finde.

This is a matter not vnworthie of conſideration, in regard of much that may depend vpon it. For if the children of Athalia had beene in Ieruſalem when their Mother fell, their death would ſurely haue followed hers as neerely, and beene regiſtred, as well as the death of Mattan the Prieſt of Baal. That Law by which God forbade that the children ſhould die for the fathers, could not haue ſaued theſe vngracious Imps, whom the clauſe following would haue cut off, which commands, that euery man ſhall die for his owne ſinne. Seeing therefore that they had beene profeſſors & aduancers of that vile and Idolatrous worſhip of Baal, yea had robbed the Temple of the Lord, and enriched the houſe of Baal with the ſpoile of it; likely it is, that they ſhould not haue eſcaped with life, if Iehoiada the Prieſt could haue gotten ten them into his hands. As there was lawfull cauſe enough requiring their death, ſo the ſecuritie of the King and his friends, that is, of all the Land, craued as much, and that very earneſtly. For theſe had beene eſteemed as heires of their mothers Crowne, and being reckoned as her aſſiſtants in that particular buſineſſe of robbing the Temple, may be thought to haue carried a great ſway in other matters, as Princes and fellowes with their Mother in the Kingdome. Therefore it is euident, that either they were now dead, or (perhaps following Hazael in his warres againſt Iehu) abſent from Ieruſalem; whereby Iehoiada might, with the more confidence, aduenture to take Armes againſt their Mother, that was deſolate.

CHAP. XXII.

Of IOAS and AMASIA, with their Contemporaries; where ſomewhat of the building of Carthage.

Of IOAS his doings, whileſt IEHOIADA the Prieſt liued.

BY the death of Athalia, the whole Countrie of Iuda was filled with great ioy and quietneſſe, wherein Ioas a childe of ſeuen yeeres old or there-about, began his raigne, which continued almoſt fortie yeeres. During his minoritie, hee liued vnder the protection of that honorable man Iehoiada the Prieſt, who did as faithfully gouerne the Kingdome, as hee had before carefully preſerued the Kings life, and reſtored him vnto the Throne of his anceſtors. When hee came to mans eſtate, he tooke by appointment of Iehoiada two wiues, and begat Sonnes and Daughters, repairing the family of Dauid, which was almoſt worne out. The firſt Act that hee tooke in hand, when he began to rule without a Protector, was the reparation of the Temple. It was a needfull piece of worke, in regard of the decay wherein that holy Place was fallen, through the wickedneſſe of vngodly Tyrants; and requiſite it was that he ſhould vp-hold the Temple, whom the Temple had vp-held. This buſineſſe hee followed with ſo earneſt a zeale, that not onely the Leuites were more ſlack than he, but euen Iehoiada was faine to be quickned by his admonition. Money was gathered for the charges of the worke, partly out of the taxe impoſed by Moſes, partly out of the liberalitie of the people: who gaue ſo freely, that the Temple, beſides all reparations, was enriched with veſſels of gold and ſiluer, and with all other Vtenſiles. The ſacrifices likewiſe were offered, as vnder godly Kings they had beene, and the ſeruice of God was magnificently celebrated. 2. Chron. 24. 14.

§. II.

The death of IEHOIADA, and Apostasie of IOAS.

BVt this endured no longer than the life of Iehoiada the Priest: who hauing liued an hundred and thirtie yeeres, dyed before his Countrie could haue spared him. He was buried among the Kings of Iuda, as he well deserued, hauing preserued the race of them, and restored the true Religion, which the late Princes of that house, by attempting to eradicate, failed but a little, of rooting vp themselues, and all their issue. Yet his honorable Funerall seemes to haue beene giuen to him, at the motion of the people; it being said, They buried him in the Citie of DAVID. As for the King himselfe, who did owe to him no lesse than his Crowne and life, he is not likely to haue beene Author of it, seeing that he was as easily comforted after his death, as if hee had thereby beene discharged of some heauie debt.

For after the death of Iehoiada, when the Princes of Iuda beganne to flatter their King, he soone forgate, not onely the benefits, receiued by this worthie man his old Councellour, but also the good precepts which he had receiued from him, yea and God himselfe, the Author of all goodnesse. These Princes drew him to the worship of Idols, wherewith Iehoram and Athalia had so infected the Countrie, in fifteene or sixteene yeeres; that thirtie yeeres, or there-about, of the raigne of Ioas, wherein the true Religion was exercised, were not able to cleere it from that mischiefe. The King himselfe, when once hee was entred into these courses, ranne on head-long, as one that thought it a token of his libertie, to despise the seruice of God; and a manifest proofe of his being now King indeede, that hee regarded no longer the sowre admonitions of deuout Priests. Hereby it appeares, that his former zeale was onely counterfaited, wherein like an actor vpon the stage, he had striuen to expresse much more liuely affection, than they could shew, that were indeed religious.

§. III.

The causes and time of the Syrians inuading Iuda in the dayes of IOAS.

BVt God, from whom hee was broken loose, gaue him ouer into the hands of men, that would not easily be shaken off. Hazael King of Aram, hauing taken Gath, a Towne of the Philistims, addressed himselfe towards Ierusalem, whither the little distance of way, and great hope of a rich bootie, did inuite him. He had an Armie heartned by many victories, to hope for more; and for ground of the warre (if his ambition cared for pretences) it was enough, that the Kings of Iuda had assisted the Israelites, in their enterprises vpon Aram, at Ramoth Gilead. Yet I thinke he did not want some further instigation. For if the Kingdome of Iuda had molested the Aramites, in the time of his predecessour, this was throughly recompensed, by forbearing to succour Israel, and leauing the ten Tribes in their extreme miserie, to the furie of Hazael himselfe. Neither is it likely, that Hazael should haue gone about to awake a sleeping Dogge, and stirre vp against himselfe a powerfull enemie, before hee had assured the conqueste of Israel, that lay betweene Ierusalem and his owne Kingdome, if some oportunitie had not promised such easie and good successe, as might rather aduance, than any way disturbe, his future proceedings against the ten Tribes. Wherefore I hold it probable, that the sonnes of Athalia, mentioned before, were with him in this action, promising (as men expelled their Countries vsually doe) to draw many partakers of their owne to his side; and not to remaine, as Ioas did, a neutrall in the warre betweene him and Israel, but to ioyne all their forces with his, as they had

cauſe, for the rooting out of Iehu his poſteritie, who, like a bloudie Traytor, had vterly deſtroyed all the kindred of the Queenes, their mother, euen the whole houſe of Ahab, to which he was a ſubiect. If this were ſo, Hazael had the more apparant reaſon to inuade the Kingdome of Iuda. Howſoeuer it were, wee finde it plainely, that Ioas was afraid of him, and therefore tooke all the hallowed things, and all the gold that was found in the treaſures of the houſe of the Lord, or in his owne houſe, with which preſent hee redeemed his peace: the Syrian (queſtionleſſe) thinking it a better bargaine, to get ſo much readily paid into his hand for nothing, than to hazard the aſſurance of this, for the poſſibilitie of not much more. So Hazael departed with a rich bootie of vnhappie treaſure, which, belonging to the liuing God, remayned a ſmall while in the poſſeſſion of this mightie, yet corruptible man, but ſent him quickly to the graue. For in the thirtie ſeuenth of Ioas, which was the fifteenth of Iehoahaz, he made this purchaſe; but in the ſame or the very next yeere he died, leauing all that he had vnto his Sonne Benhadad, with whom theſe treaſures proſpered none otherwiſe, than ill-gotten goods are wont. 2.King.12.18.

This enterpriſe of Hazael is, by ſome, confounded with that warre of the Aramites vpon Iuda, mentioned in the ſecond Booke of Chronicles. But the reaſons alleaged by them that hold the contrarie opinion, doe forcibly prooue, that it was not all one warre. For the former was compounded without bloud-ſhed or fight; in the later, Ioas tryed the fortune of a battaile, wherein being put to the worſt, hee loſt all his Princes, and hardly eſcaped with life: In the one, Hazael himſelfe was preſent; in the other, he was not named: but contrariwiſe, the King of Aram then reigning (who may ſeeme to haue then beene the Sonne of Hazael) is ſaid to haue beene at Damaſcus. The firſt Armie came to conquer, and was ſo great, that it terrified the King of Iuda; The ſecond was a ſmall companie of men, which did animate Ioas (in vaine, for God was againſt him) to deale with them, as hauing a very great Armie. 2.Chron.24.24.

Now, concerning the time of this former inuaſion, I cannot perceiue that God forſooke him, till he had firſt forſaken God. There are indeede ſome, very learned, who thinke that this expedition of Hazael was in the time of Iehoiada the Prieſt, becauſe that ſtorie is ioyned vnto the reſtauration of the Temple. This had beene probable, if the death of Iehoiada had beene afterwards mentioned in that place of the ſecond Booke of Kings, or if the Apoſtaſie of Ioas, or any other matter implying ſo much, had followed in the relation. For it is not indeede to be doubted, that the Lord of all may diſpoſe of all things, according to his owne will and pleaſure, neither was he more vniuſt in the afflictions of Iob that righteous man, or the death of Ioſias that godly King, than in the plagues which he laid vpon Pharaoh, or his iudgements vpon the houſe of Ahab. But it appeares plainely, that the rich furniture of the Temple, and the magnificent ſeruice of God therewithall, which are ioyned together, were vſed in the houſe of the Lord continually, all the dayes of IEHOIADA; ſoone after whoſe death, if not immediately vpon it, that is (as ſome very learnedly collect) in the ſixe, or thirtie ſeuenth yeere of this Ioas his raigne, the King falling away from the God of his Father, became a foule Idolater. 2.Chron.24.14.

And indeede we commonly obſerue, that the croſſes which it hath pleaſed God ſometimes to lay vpon his ſeruants, without any cauſe notorious in the eyes of men, haue alwayes tended vnto the bettering of their good. In which reſpect, euen the ſufferings of the bleſſed Martyrs (the death of his Saints being precious in the ſight of the Lord) are to their great aduantage. But with euil and rebellious men, God keepeth a more euen, and more ſtrict account; permitting vſually their faults to get the ſtart of their puniſhment, and either delaying his vengeance (as with the Amorites) till their wickedneſſe be full: or not working their amendment by his correction, but ſuffering them to runne on in their wicked courſes, to their greater miſerie. So hath he dealt with many; and ſo it appeares that he dealt with Ioas. For this vnhappie man did not onely continue an obſtinate Idolater, but grew ſo forgetfull of God and all goodneſſe, as if he had ſtrouen to exceede the wickedneſſe of all that Pſal.115.15.

went before him,and to leaue such a villainous patterne vnto others,as few or none of the most barbarous Tyrants should indure to imitate.

How ZACHARIA was murdered by IOAS.

SVndry Prophets hauing laboured in vaine to reclaime the people from their superstition, Zacharia the sonne of Iehoiada the Priest, was stirred vp at length by the Spirit of God, to admonish them of their wickednesse, and make them vnderstand the punishment due vnto it, whereof they stood in danger. This Zacharia was a man so honourable, and sonne to a man so exceeding beloued in his life time,and reuerenced,that if Ioas had reputed him (as Ahab did Elias) his open enemie,yet ought he in common honestie, to haue cloaked his ill affection, and haue vsed at least some part of the respect that was due to such a person: On the other side, the singular affection which he and his father had borne vnto the King, and the vnrecountable benefits, which they had done vnto him, from his first infancie, were such, as should haue placed Zacharia in the most hearty and assured loue of Ioas,yea though he had beene otherwise a man of very small marke, and not verie good condition. The truth is, that the message of a Prophet sent from God, should bee heard with reuerence, how simple soeuer he appeares that brings it. But this King Ioas,hauing alreadie scorned the admonitions and protestations of such Prophets as first were sent,did now deale with Zacharia, like as the wicked husbandman in that parable of our Sauiour, dealt with the heire of the Vineyard; who said, This is the heire, come let vs kill him, that the Inheritance may be ours. By killing Zacharia he thought to become an absolute Commander, supposing belike that hee was no free Prince, as long as any one durst tell him the plaine truth, how great soeuer that mans deseruing were, that did so, yea though Gods commandement required it. So they conspired against this holy Prophet, and stoned him to death at the Kings appointment; but whether by any forme of open Law, as was practised vpon Naboth; or whether surprising him by any close treacherie, I doe neither reade nor can conjecture. The dignitie of his person, considered together with their treacherous conspiracie, makes it probable, that they durst not call him into publique judgement, though the manner of his death, being such as was commonly, by order of Law, inflicted vpon malefactors, may argue the contrarie. Most likely it is, that the Kings commandement, by which he suffered,tooke place in stead of Law: which exercise of meere power (as hath beene alreadie noted) was nothing strange among the Kings of Iuda.

Luke 20.14.

§. V.

How IOAS was shamefully beaten by the Aramites, and of his death.

THis odious murder,committed by an vnthankfull snake vpon the man in whose bosome he had beene fostered, as of it selfe alone it sufficed, to make the wretched Tyrant hatefull to men of his owne time, and his memorie detested in all ages; so had it the well-described curse of the blessed Martyr, to accompanie it vnto the throne of God, and to call for vengeance from thence, which fell downe swiftly, and heauily vpon the head of that vngratefull monster. It was the last yeere of his raigne; the end of his time comming then vpon him, when he thought himselfe beginning to liue how he listed without controulement. When that yeere was expired, the Aramites came into the Countrie,rather as may seeme to get pillage, than to performe any great action; ction; for they came with a ſmall companie of men: but God had intended to doe more by them, than they themſelues did hope for. 2. Chron. 24. 24.

That Ioas naturally was a coward, his bloudie malice againſt his beſt friend, is, in my iudgement proofe ſufficient: though otherwiſe his baſe compoſition with Hazael, when hee might haue leauied (as his ſonne after him did muſter) three hundred thouſand choſen men for the warre, doth well enough ſhew his temper. Yet now he would needs bee valiant and make his people know, how ſtout of diſpoſition their King was, when he might haue his owne will. But his timorous heart was not well cloaked. For to encounter with a few bands of rouers, hee tooke a verie great Armie, ſo that wiſe-men might well perceiue, that he knew what he did, making ſhew as if he would fight for his Countrie, and expoſe his perſon to danger of warre, when as indeed all was meere oſtentation, and no perill to be feared; he going forth ſo ſtrongly appointed, againſt ſo weake enemies. Thus might wiſemen thinke, and laugh at him in ſecret; conſidering what adoe he made about that, which in all apparent reaſon was (as they ſay) a thing of nothing. But God, before whom the wiſedome of this world is fooliſhneſſe, did laugh not onely at this vaine-glorious King, but at them that thought their King ſecure, by reaſon of the multitude that he drew along with him.

When the Aramites and King Ioas met, whether it were by ſome folly of the leaders, or by ſome amazement happening among the Souldiers, or by whatſoeuer meanes it pleaſed God to worke, ſo it was, that that great Armie of Iuda receiued a notable ouer-throw, and all the Princes were deſtroyed: the Princes of Iuda, at whoſe perſwaſion the King had become a Rebell to the King of Kings. As for Ioas himſelfe (as Abulenſis and others expound the ſtorie) hee was ſorely beaten and hurt by them, being (as they thinke) taken and ſhamefully tormented, to wring out of him an exceſſiue ranſome.

And ſurely, all circumſtances doe greatly ſtrengthen this conjecture. For the text (in the old tranſlation) ſaith, they exerciſed vpon Ioas ignominious iudgements; and that departing from him, they diſmiſſed him in great languor. All, which argues, that they had him in their hands, and handled him ill-fauouredly. Now at that time Ioas the ſon of Iehoahaz raigned ouer Iſrael, and Benhadad the ſon of Hazael ouer the Syrians in Damaſcus; the one a valiant vnder-taking Prince, raiſed vp by God to reſtore the State of his miſerable Countrie; the other inferior euery way to his father, of whoſe purchaſes he loſt a great part, for want of skill to keepe it. The difference in condition found betweene theſe two Princes, promiſing no other euent than ſuch as after followed, might haue giuen to the King of Iuda good cauſe to bee bold, and plucke vp his ſpirits, which Hazael had beaten downe, if God had not beene againſt him. But his fearefull heart being likely to quake vpon any apprehenſion of danger, was able to put the Syrian King in hope, that by terrifying him with ſome ſhew of warre at his doores, it were eaſie to make him craue any tolerable conditions of peace. The vnexpected good ſucceſſe hereof, alreadie related, and the (perhaps as inexpected) ill ſucceſſe, which the Aramites found in their following warres againſt the King of Iſrael, ſheweth plainely the weakneſſe of all earthly might, reſiſting the power of the Almightie. For by his ordinance, both the Kingdome of Iuda, after more than fortie yeeres time of gathering ſtrength, was vnable to driue out a ſmall companie of enemies; and the Kingdome of Iſrael, hauing ſo beene trodden downe by Hazael, that onely fiftie Horſe-men, ten Chariots, and ten thouſand Foot-men were left, preuailed againſt his Sonne, and recouered all from the victorious Aramites. But examples hereof are euery-where found, and therefore I will not inſiſt vpon this; though indeed we ſhould not, if we be Gods children, thinke it more tedious to heare long and frequent reports of our heauenly Fathers honour, than of the noble acts performed by our fore-father vpon earth.

When the Aramites had what they liſted, and ſaw that they were not able, being ing so few, to take any possession of the Countrie, they departed out of Iuda loden with spoile, which they sent to Damascus, themselues belike falling vpon the ten Tribes, where it is to be thought that they sped not halfe so well. The King of Iuda being in ill case, was killed on his bed when he came home, by the sonnes of an Ammonitesse, and of a Moabitesse, whom some (because onely their Mothers names being strangers, are expressed) thinke to haue beene bond-men. Whether it were contempt of his fortune, or feare, lest (as Tyrants vse) hee should reuenge his disaster vpon them, imputing it to their fault, or whatsoeuer else it were that animated them to murder their King; the Scripture tells vs plainly, that, for the bloud of the children of IEHOIADA, this befell him. And the same appeares to haue beene vsed as the pretence of their conspiracie, in excuse of the fact when it was done. For Amazia, the sonne and successor of Ioas, durst not punish them, till his Kingdome was established: but contrariwise, his bodie was judged vnworthie of buriall in the Sepulchres of the Kings: whereby it appeares, that the death of Zecharia caused the treason, wrought against the King, to find more approbation, than was requisite, among the people, though afterwards it was recompensed by his Sonne, vpon the Traytors, with well-deserued death.

§. VI.

Of the Princes liuing in the time of IOAS: Of the time when Carthage was built; and of DIDO.

THere liued with Ioas, Mezades and Diognetus in Athens: Eudemus and Aristomedes in Corinth: about which time Agrippa Syluius, and after him Syluius Alladius, were Kings of the Albans in Italie. Ocrazapes, commonly called Anacyndaraxes, the thirtie seuenth King succeeding vnto Ophratanes, began his raigne ouer the Assyrians, about the eighteenth yeere of Ioas, which lasted fortie two yeeres. In the sixteenth of Ioas, Cephrenes, the fourth from Sesac, succeeded vnto Cheops in the Kingdome of Ægypt, and held it fiftie yeeres.

In this time of Ioas, was likewise the raigne of Pigmalion in Tyre, and the foundation of Carthage by Dido; the building of which Citie is, by diuers Authors, placed in diuers ages, some reporting it to be seuentie yeeres yonger than Rome, others aboue foure hundred yeeres elder, few or none of them giuing any reason of their assertions, but leauing vs vncertaine whom to follow: Iosephus, who had read the Annalls of Tyre, counting one hundred fortie and three yeeres and eight moneths from the building of Salomons Temple, in the twelfth yeere of Hyram King of Tyre, to the founding of Carthage by Dido, in the seuenth of Pigmalion. The particulars of this accompt (which is not rare in Iosephus) are very perplexed, and serue not verie well to make cleere the totall summe. But whether it were so that Iosephus did omit, or else that he did mis-write, some number of the yeeres, which hee reckoneth in Fractions, as they were diuided among the Kings of Tyre, from Hyram to Pigmalion; we may well enough beleeue, that the Tyrian writers, out of whose Bookes he giues vs the whole summe, had good meanes to know the truth, and could rightly reckon the difference of time, betweene two workes no longer following one the other, than the memorie of three or foure generations might easily reach. This hundred fortie and foure yeeres current, after the building of Salomons Temple, being the eleuenth yeere of Ioas, was a hundred fortie and three yeeres before the birth of Rome, and after the destruction of Troy, two hundred eightie and nine: a time so long after the death of Æneas, that wee might truely conclude all to bee fabulous which Virgil hath written of Dido, as Ausonius noteth, who doth honor her Statua with this Epigramme.

ILLA ego ſum DIDO vultu quam conſpicis hoſpes, Auſon. Ep. 117.
Aſſimulata modis pulchraq; mirificis.
Talis eram, ſed non MARO quam mihi finxit erat mens,
Vita nec incæſtis læta cupidinibus (Namq; nec ÆNEAS vidit me Troius vnquam
Nec Libyam aduenit, claſſibus Iliacis.
Sed furias fugiens, atq; arma procacis IARBAE;
Seruaui, fateor, morte pudicitiam;
Pectore transfixo, caſtos quod pertulit enſes)
Non furor, aut læſo crudus amore dolor.
Sic cecidiſſe iuuat: vixi ſine vulnere famæ,
Vlta virum, poſitis mœnibus oppetij.
Inuida cur in me ſtimulaſti Muſa MARONEM,
Fingeret vt noſtræ damna pudicitiæ?
Vos magis hiſtoricis lectores credite de me
Quam qui furta Deum concubituſq; canunt.
Falſidici vates: temerant qui carmine verum,
Humaniſq; deos aſſimulant vitijs.

Which in effect is this,

I Am that DIDO which thou here do'ſt ſee,
Cunningly framed in beauteous Imag'rie.
Like this I was, but had not ſuch a ſoule,
As MARO fained, inceſtuous and foule.
ÆNEAS neuer with his Troian hoaſt
Beheld my face, or landed on this coaſt.
But flying proud IARBAS villanie,
Not mou'd by furious loue or iealouſie;
I did with weapon chaſt, to ſaue my fame,
Make way for death vntimely, ere it came.
This was my end; but firſt I built a Towne,
Reueng'd my huſbands death, liu'd with renowne.
Why did'ſt thou ſtirre vp VIRGIL, enuious Muſe,
Falſely my name and honour to abuſe?
Readers, beleeue Hiſtorians; not thoſe
Which to the world IOVES thefts and vice expoſe.
Poets are lyers, and for verſes ſake
Will make the gods of humane crimes partake.

From the time of Dido vnto the firſt Punick warre, that Carthage grew and flouriſhed in wealth and conqueſts, we find in many hiſtories: but in particular we find little of the Carthaginian affaires before that warre, excepting thoſe few things that are recorded of their attempts vpon the Iſle of Sicil. Wee will therefore deferre the relation of matters concerning that mightie Citie, vntill ſuch time as they ſhall encounter with the State of Rome, by which it was finally deſtroyed; and proſecute in the meane while the Hiſtorie that is now in hand.

The beginning of AMAZIA his reigne. Of IOAS King of Israel, and ELISHA the Prophet.

AMAZIAS, the sonne of Ioash, being twentie fiue yeeres old when his father dyed, tooke possession of the Kingdome of Iuda, wherein he laboured so to demeane himselfe, as his new beginning raigne might be least offensiue. The Law of Moses he professed to obserue; which howsoeuer it had beene secretly despised since the time of Iehoram, by many great persons of the Land, yet had it by prouision of good Princes, yea and of bad ones (in their best times) imitating the good, but especially by the care of holy Priests, taken such deepe roote in the peoples hearts, that no King might hope to be very plausible, who did not conforme himselfe vnto it. And at that present time, the slaughter, which the Aramites had made of all the Princes, who had with-drawne the late King from the seruice of God, being seconded by the death of the King himselfe, euen whilest that execrable murther, committed by the King vpon Zechari, was yet fresh in memorie, did serue as a notable example of Gods justice against Idolaters, both to animate the better sort of the people in holding the Religion of their fathers, and to discourage Amazia from following the way, which led to such an euill end. He therefore, hauing learned of his father the arte of dissimulation, did not only forbeare to punish the Traytors that had slaine King Ioas, but gaue way to the time, and suffered the dead bodie to be interred, as that of Iehoram formerly had beene, in the Citie of Dauid, yet not among the Sepulchres of the Kings of Iuda. Neuertheless, after this, when (belike) the noise of the people hauing wearied it selfe into silence, it was found that the Conspirators (howsoeuer their deede done, was applauded as the handie-worke of God) had neither any mightie partakers in their fact, nor strong maintayners of their persons, but rested secure, as hauing done well, seeing it was not ill taken; the King, who perceiued his gouernement well establi∫hed, called them into question, at such a time, as the heate of mens affections, being well allayed, it was easie to distinguish betweene their treasons and Gods judgement, which, by their treasons, had taken plausible effect. So they were put to death without any tumult, and their children (as the Law did require) were suffered to liue; which could not but giue contentment to the people, seeing that their King did the office of a iust Prince, rather than of a reuenging sonne. This being done, and his owne life the better secured, by such exemplarie iustice, against the like attempts; Amazia carried himselfe outwardly as a Prince well affected to Religion, and so continued in rest, about twelue or thirteene yeeres.

As Amazia gathered strength in Iuda by the commoditie of a long peace, so Ioas the Israelite grew as fast in power, by following the warre hotly against the Aramites. He was a valiant and fortunate Prince, yet an Idolater, as his Predecessors had beene, worshipping the Calues of Ieroboam. For this sinne had God so plagued the house of Iehu, that the ten Tribes wanted little of being vtterly consumed, by Hazael and Benhadad, in the time of Iehu and his sonne Iehoahaz. But as Gods benefits to Iehu, sufficed not to with-draw him from this politique Idolatrie; so were the miseries, rewarding that impietie, vnable to reclaime Iehoahaz from the same impious course: yet the mercy of God beholding the trouble of Israel, condescended vnto the prayers of this vngodly Prince, euen then when hee and his miserable subjects, were obstinate in following their owne abominable wayes. Therefore in temporall matters, the ten Tribes recouered apace, but the fauour of God, which had beene infinitely more worth, I doe not find, nor beleeue, that they sought; that they had it not, I finde in the words of the Prophet, saying plainly to AMAZIA, The Lord is not with Israel, neither with all the house of EPHRAIM.

2. Chron. 25. 7.

Whe-

Whether it were ſo, that the great Prophet Eliſha, who liued in thoſe times, did fore-tell the proſperitie of the Iſraelites vnder the Raigne of Ioas; or whether Iehoahaz, wearied and broken with long aduerſitie, thought it the wiſeſt way, to diſcharge himſelfe in part of the heauie cares attending thoſe vnhappy Syrian warres, by laying the burthen vpon his hopefull ſonne; we finde that in the thirtie-ſeuenth yeere of IOAS, King of Iuda, IOAS the ſonne of IEHOAHAZ began to raigne ouer Iſrael in Samaria, which was in the fifteenth of his fathers raigne, and ſome two or three yeeres before his death. 2. Kings 13. 10.

It appeares that this yong Prince, euen from the beginning of his Rule, did ſo well huſband that poore ſtocke which hee receiued from his Father, of ten Chariots, fiftie Horſe-men, and ten thouſand Foot, that he might ſeeme likely to proue a thriuer. Among other circumſtances, the wordes which he ſpake to Eliſha the Prophet, argue no leſſe. For Ioas viſiting the Prophet, who lay ſicke, ſpake vnto him thus; O my father, my father, the Chariot of Iſrael, and the horſe-men of the ſame: by which manner of ſpeech hee did acknowledge, that the prayers of this holy man had ſtood his Kingdome in more ſtead, than all the Horſes and Chariots could doe. 2. Kings 13. 14.

This Prophet who ſucceeded vnto Elias, about the firſt yeere of Ioram the ſonne of Ahab King of Iſrael, dyed (as ſome haue probably collected) about the third or fourth yeere of this Ioas, the Nephew of Iehu. To ſhew how the Spirit of Elias was doubled, or did reſt vpon him; it exceedeth my facultie. This is recorded of him, that hee did not onely raiſe a dead child vnto life, as Elias had done, but when hee himſelfe was dead, it pleaſed God that his dead bones ſhould reſtore life vnto a carcaſſe, which touched them in the graue. In fine, hee beſtowed, as a legacie, three victories vpon King Ioas, who thereby did ſet Iſrael in a faire way of recouering all that the Aramites had vſurped, and weakning the Kings of Damaſco in ſuch ſort, that they were neuer after terrible to Samaria.

§. VIII.

Of AMAZIA his warre againſt EDOM; His Apoſtaſie; and ouerthrow by IOAS.

THe happie ſucceſſe which Ioas had found in his warre againſt the Aramites, was ſuch as might kindle in Amazia a deſire of vndertaking ſome expedition, wherein himſelfe might purchaſe the like honour. His kingdome could furniſh three hundred thouſand ſeruiceable men for the wars; and his treaſures were ſufficient for the payment of theſe, and the hire of many more. Cauſe of warre he had very iuſt againſt the Edomites, who hauing rebelled in the time of his grand-father Iehoram, had about fiftie yeeres beene vnreclaymed, partly by meanes of the troubles happening in Iuda, partly through the ſloth and timorouſneſſe of his father Ioas. Yet, foraſmuch as the men of Iuda had in many yeeres beene without all exerciſe of warre (excepting that vnhappie fight wherein they were beaten by a few bands of the Aramites) he held it a point of wiſedome to increaſe his forces, with Souldiers waged out of Iſrael, whence hee hired for an hundred talents of ſiluer, an hundred thouſand valiant men, as the Scripture telleth vs, though Ioſephus diminiſh the number, ſaying that they were but twentie thouſand. 2. Chron. 21. 6. Ioſ. Antiq. Iud. lib. 9. 6. 10.

This great Armie, which with ſo much coſt Amazia had hired out of Iſrael, he was faine to diſmiſſe, before he had imployed it, being threatned by a Prophet with ill ſucceſſe, if hee ſtrengthned himſelfe with the helpe of thoſe men, whom God (though in mercy hee gaue them victorie againſt the cruell Aramites) did not loue, becauſe they were Idolaters. The Iſraelites therefore departed in great anger, taking in ill part this diſmiſſion, as an high diſgrace; which to reuenge, they fell vpon a peece of Iuda in their returne, and ſhewed their malice in the ſlaughter of three thouſand men; and ſome ſpoile, which they carryed away. But Amazia with his owne forces, knowing that God would be aſſiſtant to their journey, entered couragiouſly into the Edomites Countrie; ouer whom obtayning victorie, hee ſlew ten thouſand, and tooke other ten thouſand priſoners, all which hee threw from an high rocke; holding them, it ſeemes, rather as Traytors, than as iuſt enemies. This victorie did not ſeeme to reduce Edom vnder the ſubjection of the crowne of Iuda, which might be the cauſe of that ſeueritie, which was vſed to the priſoners; the Edomites that had eſcaped, refuſing to buy the liues of their friends and kinſmen at ſo deare a rate, as the loſſe of their owne libertie. Some townes in mount Seir, Amazia tooke, as appeares by his carrying away the Idols thence; but it is like they were the places moſt indefencible, in that he left no garriſons there, whereby he might another yeere the better haue purſued the conqueſt of the whole Countrie. Howſoeuer it were, he got both honor by the journie, & gaines enough, had he not loſt himſelfe.

Among other ſpoiles of the Edomites, were carried away their gods, which being vanquiſhed and taken priſoners, did deſerue well to be led in triumph. But they contrariwiſe, I know not by what ſtrange witchcraft, ſo beſotted this vnworthie King Amazia, that hee ſet them vp to bee his gods, and worſhipped them, and burned incenſe vnto them.

2. Chron. 25. 14.

For this when he was rebuked by a Prophet ſent from God, hee gaue a churliſh and threatning anſwere; asking the Prophet, who made him a Counſeller, and bidding him hold his peace for feare of the worſt. If either the coſtly ſtuffe, whereof theſe Idols were made, or the curious workemanſhip and beautie, with which they were adorned by Artificers, had rauiſhed the Kings fancie; me thinkes, he ſhould haue rather turned them to matter of profit, or kept them as houſe-hold ornaments and things of pleaſure, than thereby haue ſuffered himſelfe to be blinded, with ſuch vnreaſonable deuotion towards them. If the ſuperſtitious account wherein the Edomites had held them, were able to worke much vpon his imagination; much more ſhould the bad ſeruice which they had done to their old Clients, haue moued him thereupon to laugh, both at the Edomites, and them. Wherefore it ſeemes to me, that the ſame affections caried him from God, vnto the ſeruice of Idols, which afterwards mooued him to talke ſo roughly to the Prophet reprehending him. He had alreadie obeyed the warning of God by a Prophet, and ſent away ſuch auxiliarie forces as he had gathered out of Iſrael; which done, it is ſaid, that he was encouraged, and led forth his people, thinking belike, that God would now rather aſſiſt him by miracle, than let him faile of obtayning all his hearts deſire. But with better reaſon he ſhould haue limited his deſires by the will of God, whoſe pleaſure it was, that Eſau, hauing broken the yoke of Iacob from his necke, accordingly as Iſaac had foretold, ſhould no more become his ſeruant. If therefore Amazia did hope to reconquer all the Countrie of Edom, he failed of his expectation; yet ſo, that he brought home both profit and honor, which might haue well contented him.

2. Chron. 25. 11.

But there is a fooliſh and a wretched pride, wherwith men being tranſported, can ill endure to aſcribe vnto God the honour of thoſe actions, in which it hath pleaſed him to vſe their owne induſtrie, courage, or fore-ſight. Therefore it is commonly ſeene, that they, who entring into battaile, are carefull to pray for aide from heauen, with due acknowledgement of his power, who is the giuer of victorie; when the field is won, doe vaunt of their owne exploits: one telling how he got ſuch a ground of aduantage; another, how he gaue checke to ſuch a battallion; a third, how hee ſeized on the enemies Canon; euery one ſtriuing to magnifie himſelfe, whileſt all forget God, as one that had not beene preſent in the action. To aſcribe to fortune the effects of another mans vertue, is, I confeſſe, an argument of malice. Yet this is true, that as he which findeth better ſucceſſe, than he did, or in reaſon might expect, is deeply bound to acknowledge God the Authour of his happineſſe; ſo hee whoſe meere wiſedome and labour hath brought things to a proſperous iſſue, is doubly doubly bound to ſhew himſelfe thankefull, both for the victorie, and for thoſe vertues by which the victorie was gotten. And indeed ſo farre from weakeneſſe is the nature of ſuch thankeſgiuing, that it may wel be called the height of magnanimity; no vertue being ſo truly heroicall, as that by which the ſpirit of a man aduanceth it ſelfe with confidence of acceptation, vnto the loue of God. In which ſenſe it is a braue ſpeech that Euander in Virgil, vſeth to Æneas, none but a Chriſtian being capable of the admonition,

Aude hoſpes contemnere opes, & te quoque dignum
Finge Deo.

With this Philoſophie Amazia (as appeares by his carriage) troubled not his head: he had ſhewed himſelfe a better man of warre than any King of Iuda, ſince the time of Iehoſaphat, and could be well contented, that his people ſhould thinke him little inferior to Dauid: of which honour hee ſaw no reaſon why the Prophets ſhould rob him, who had made him looſe a hundred talents, and done him no pleaſure, he hauing preuailed by plaine force and good conduct, without any miracle at all. That he was diſtempered with ſuch vaine thoughts as theſe (beſides the witneſſe of his impietie following) Ioſephus doth teſtifie; ſaying, That hee deſpiſed GOD, and that being puft vp with his good ſucceſſe, of which neuertheleſſe hee would not acknowledge God to bee the Authour, hee commanded Ioas King of Iſrael to become his ſubject, and to let the tenne Tribes acknowledge him their Soueraigne, as they had done his Anceſtors King Dauid and King Salomon. Some thinke that his quarrell to Ioas was rather grounded vpon the iniurie done to him by the Iſraelites, whom he diſmiſſed in the journey againſt Mount Seir. And likely it is, that the ſenſe of a late wrong had more power to ſtirre him vp, than the remembrance of an olde title, forgotten long ſince, and by himſelfe neglected thirteene or foureteene yeeres. Neuertheleſſe it might ſo be, that when he was thus prouoked, he thought it not enough to requite new wrongs, but would alſo call olde matters into queſtion; that ſo the Kings of Iſrael might, at the leaſt, learne to keepe their ſubjects from offending Iuda, for feare of endangering their owne Crownes. Had Amazia deſired onely recompence for the injurie done to him, it is not improbable that he ſhould haue had ſome reaſonable anſwere from Ioas, who was not deſirous to fight with him. But the anſwere which Ioas returned, likening himſelfe to a Cedar, and Amazia in reſpect of him to no better than a thiſtle, ſhewes that the challenge was made in inſolent tearmes, ſtuft perhaps with ſuch proud compariſon of nobilitie, as might be made (according to that which Ioſephus hath written) betweene a King of ancient race, and one of leſſe nobilitie than vertue.

Ioſ. Ant. l. 9. c. 10

It is by Sophocles reported of Aiax, that when, going to the warre of Troy, his father did bid him to be valiant, and get victorie by Gods aſſiſtance, he made anſwere, that by Gods aſſiſtance, a coward could get victorie, but he would get it alone without ſuch helpe: after which proud ſpeech, though hee did many valiant acts, hee had ſmall thankes, and finally killing himſelfe in a madneſſe, whereinto he fell vpon diſgrace receiued, was hardly allowed the honour of buriall. That Amazia did vtter ſuch words, I doe not find: but hauing once entertained the thoughts, which are parents of ſuch words, hee was rewarded with ſucceſſe according. The verie firſt counſaile wherein this Warre was concluded, ſerues to proue that hee was a wiſe Prince indeed at Ieruſalem, among his Paraſites; but a foole when hee had to deale with his equals abroad. For it was not all one, to fight with the Edomites, a weake people, truſting more in the ſite of their Countrey than the valour of their Souldiers; and to encounter with Ioas, who from ſo poore beginnings had rayſed himſelfe to ſuch ſtrength, that hee was able to lend his friend a hundred thouſand men, and had all his Nation exerciſed, and trained vp, in a long victorious warre. But as Amazia diſcouered much want of judgement, in vndertaking ſuch a match;

Sophocles in Aiace Lor.

so in prosecuting the businesse, when it was set on foot, hee behaued himselfe as a man of little experience, who hauing once onely tried his fortune, and found it to be good, thought that in warre there was nothing else to doe, than send a defiance, fight, and winne. Ioas on the contrarie side; hauing beene accustomed to deale with a stronger enemie than the King of Iuda, vsed that celeritie, which peraduenture had often stood him in good stead against the Aramite. Hee did not sit waiting till the enemies brake in and wasted his Countrie, but presented himselfe with an Armie in Iuda, readie to bid battaile to Amazia, and saue him the labour of a long journie. This could not but greatly discourage those of Iuda; who (besides the impression of feare which an inuasion beats into people, not inured to the like) hauing deuoured, in their greedie hopes, the spoyle of Israel, fully perswading themselues to get as much, and at as easie rate as in the journie of Edom; were so farre disappointed of their expectation, that well they might suspect all new assurance of good lucke, when the olde had thus beguiled them. All this notwithstanding, their King that had stomacke enough to challenge the patrimonie of Salomon, thought like another Dauid, to winne it by the sword. The issue of which foole-hardinesse might easily be foreseene in humane reason; comparing together, either the two Kings, or the qualitie of their Armies, or the first and ominous beginning of the Warre. But meere humane wisedome, howsoeuer it might foresee much, could not haue prognosticated all the mischiefe that fell vpon Amazia. For as soone as the two Armies came in sight, God, whose helpe this wretched man had so despised, did (as Iosephus reports it) strike such terrour and amazement into the men of Iuda, that without one blow giuen, they fled all away, leauing their King to shift for himselfe, which hee did so ill, that his enemie had soone caught him, and made him change his glorious humour into most abiect baseneſſe. That the Armie which fled, sustained any other losse than of honour, I neither find in the Scriptures nor in Iosephus; it being likely that the soone beginning of their flight, which made it the more shamefull, made it also the more safe. But of the mischiefe that followed this ouerthrow, it was Gods will that Amazia himselfe should sustaine the whole disgrace. For Ioas carried him directly to Ierusalem, where he bad him procure that the gates might be opened, to let him in and his Armie; threatning him otherwise with present death. So much amazed was the miserable caytiue, with these dreadfull wordes, that he durst doe none other, than perswade the Citizens, to yeeld themselues to the mercie of the Conqueror. The Towne, which afterwardes being in weaker state, held out two yeeres, against Nebuchadnezzar, was vtterly dismayed, when the King, that should haue giuen his life to saue it, vsed all his force of command and intreatie to betray it. So the gates of Ierusalem were opened to Ioas, with which honour (greater than any King of Israel had euer obtained) hee could not rest contented, but, the more to despight Amazia and his people, he caused foure hundred cubits of the wall to be throwne downe, and entred the Citie in his Chariot through that breach, carrying the King before him, as in triumph. This done, he sackt the Temple, and the Kings Palace, and so, taking hostages of Amazia, hee dismissed the poore creature that was glad of his life, and returned to Samaria.

A discourse of the reasons hindering IOAS from vniting IVDA to the Crowne of Israel, when he had wonne Ierusalem, and held AMAZIA prisoner. The end of IOAS his Raigne.

WE may justly maruaile how it came to passe, that Ioas, being thus in possession of Ierusalem, hauing the King in his hands, his enemies forces broken, and his owne entire, could bee so contented to depart quietly, with a little spoyle, when hee might haue seized vpon the whole Kingdome. The raigne of Athalia had giuen him cause to hope, that the issue of Dauid might be dispossessed of that crowne; his owne Nobilitie, being the sonne and grand-childe of Kings, together with the famous acts that hee had done, were enough to make the people of Iuda thinke highly of him; who might also haue preferred his forme of gouernment, before that of their owne Kings, especially at such a time, when a long succession of wicked Princes had smothered the thankes, which were due to the memorie of a few good ones. The commoditie that would haue ensued, vpon the vnion of all the twelue Tribes, vnder one Prince, is so apparant, that I need not to insist on it. That any message from God forbad the Israelites (as afterwards in the victorie which Peka the sonne of Romelia got vpon Ahaz) to turne his present aduantage, to the best vse, wee doe not reade. All this makes it the more difficult to resolue the question, why a Prince so well exercised, as Ioas had bin, in recouering his owne, and winning from his enemy, should forsake the possession of Ierusalem, and wilfully neglect the possibilities, or rather cast away the full assurance of so faire a conquest, as the Kingdome of Iuda.

But concerning that point, which, of all others, had beene most materiall, I meane the desire of the vanquished people to accept the Israelite for their King, it is plainely seene, that entring Ierusalem in triumphant manner, Ioas was vnable to concoct his owne prosperitie. For the opening of the gates had beene enough to haue let him not only into the Citie, but into the Royall Throne, and the peoples hearts, whom by faire intreatie (especially hauing sure meanes of compulsion) hee might haue made his owne, when they saw themselues betrayed, and basely giuen away by him whose they had beene before. The faire marke which this opportunity presented, he did not ayme at, because his ambition was otherwise and more meanely busied, in leuelling at the glorie of a triumphant entrie through a breach. Yet this errour might afterwardes haue beene corrected well enough, if entring as an enemie, and shewing what he could doe, by spending his anger vpon the walles, he had within the Citie done offices of a friend, and laboured to shew good will to the inhabitants. But when his pride had done, his couetousnesse beganne, and sought to please it selfe, with that which is commonly most readie to the spoyler, yet should be most forborne. The treasure wherewith Sesac, Hazael, and the Philistims, men ignorant of the true God & his Religion, had quenched their greedy thirst, ought not to haue tempted the appetite of Ioas, who though an Idolatour, yet acknowledged also and worshipped the eternall God, whose Temple was at Ierusalem. Therefore when the people saw him take his way directly to that holy place, and lay his rauenous hands vpon the consecrated vessels, calling the family of Obed Edom (whose children had hereditarie charge of the treasurie) to a strict account, as if they had beene Officers of his owne Exchequer, they considered him rather as an execrable Churchrobber, than as a Noble Prince, an Israelite and their brother, though of another Tribe. Thus following that course, which the most vertuous King of our age (taxing it with the same phrase) hath wisely auoyded; by stealing a few Apples, hee lost the inheritance of the whole Orchard. The people detested him, and after the respite of a few dayes, might by comparing themselues one to one, perceiue his

1. Chron. 26. 15.

Souldiers to be no better than men of their owne mould, and inferiour in number to the inhabitants of so great a Citie. It is not so easie to hold by force a mightie towne entered by capitulation, as to enter the gates opened by vnaduised feare. For when the Citizens, not being disarmed, recouer their spirits, and begin to vnderstand their first errour; they will thinke vpon euery aduantage, of place, of prouisions, of multitude, yea of women armed with tile-stones, and rather choose by desperate resolution, to correct the euills growne out of their former cowardice, than suffer those mischiefs to poyson the body, which in such halfe-conquests, are easily tasted in the mouth. A more liuely example hereof cannot be desired, than the Citie of Florence, which through the weakenesse of Peter de Medices, gouerning therein as a Prince, was reduced into such hard termes, that it opened the gates vnto the French King Charles the Eighth, who not plainely professing himselfe either friend or foe to the Estate, entred the Towne, with his Armie, in triumphant manner, himselfe and his horse armed, with his lance vpon his thigh. Many insolencies were therein committed by the French, and much argument of quarrell ministred, betweene them and the Townes-men: so farre forth that the Florentines, to preserue their libertie, were driuen to prepare for fight. To conclude the matter, Charles propounds intolerable conditions, demanding huge summes of readie money, and the absolute Signorie of the State, as conquered by him, who entred the Citie in Armes. But Peter Caponi, a principall Citizen, catching these Articles from the Kings Secretarie, and tearing them before his face, bade him sound his trumpets, and they would ring their bells: which peremptorie wordes made the French bethinke themselues, and come readily to this agreement, that for fortie thousand pounds, and not halfe of that mony to be paid in hand, Charles should not onely depart in peace, but restore whatsoeuer he had of their Dominion, and continue their assured friend. So dangerous a matter did it seeme for that braue Armie, which in few moneths after wanne the Kingdome of Naples, to fight in the streets, against the armed multitude of that populous Citie. It is true, that Charles had other businesse (and so perhaps had Ioas, as shall anon be shewed) that called him away: but it was the apprehension of imminent danger that made him come to reason. In such cases the firing of houses, vsually drawes euery Citizen to saue his owne, leauing victorie to the Souldier: yet where the people are prepared and resolued, women can quench, as fast as the enemie, hauing other things to looke vnto, can set on fire. And indeed that Commander is more giuen to anger than regardfull of profit, who vpon the vncertaine hope of destroying a Towne, forsakes the assurance of a good composition. Diuersitie of circumstance may alter the case: it is enough to say, that it might be in Ierusalem, as we know it was in Florence.

How strongly soeuer Ioas might hold himselfe within Ierusalem, he could not easily depart from thence, with his bootie safe, if the Armie of Iuda, which had beene more terrified than weakned in the late encounter, should re-enforce it selfe, and giue him a checke vpon the way. Wherefore it was wisely done of him, to take hostages for his better securitie, his Armie being vpon returne, and better loden than when it came forth; for which causes it was the more vnapt to fight.

Besides these impediments, within the Citie and without, seruing to coole the ambition of Ioas, and keepe it downe from aspiring to the Crowne of Iuda; it appeares that somewhat was newly fallen out, which had reference to the anger of Elisha the Prophet; who when this Ioas had smitten the ground with his arrowes thrice, told him that he should no oftner smite the Aramites. The three victories which Israel had against Aram, are by some, and with great probabilitie, referred vnto the fifth, sixth and seuenth yeeres of Ioas: after which time, if any losses ensuing had blemished the former good successe, ill might the King of Israel haue likened himselfe to a stately Cedar, and worse could hee haue either lent the Indean one hundred thousand men, or meet him in battaile, who was able to bring into the field three hundred thousand of his owne. Seeing therefore it is made plaine by the words of Eliſha, that after three victories, Ioas ſhould find ſome change of fortune, and ſuffer loſſe; we muſt needs conclude, That the Aramite preuailed vpon him this yeere, it being the laſt of his Raigne. That this was ſo, and that the Syrians, taking aduantage of Ioas his abſence, gaue ſuch a blow to Iſrael, as the King at his returne was not able to remedie, but rather fell himſelfe into new misfortunes, which increaſed the calamitie, wee may euidently perceiue in that which is ſpoken of Ieroboam his ſonne. For it is ſaid, That the Lord ſaw the exceeding bitter afflictions of Iſrael, and that hauing not decreed to put out the name of Iſrael from vnder the heauen, he preſerued them by the hand of IEROBOAM, the ſonne of IOAS. This is enough to proue, that the victorious Raigne of Ioas was concluded with a ſad cataſtrophe; the riches of the Temple haſtning his miſerie and death, as they had done with Seſac, Athalia, and Hazael, and as afterwards they wrought with Antiochus, Craſſus, and other ſacrilegious Potentates.

Thus eyther through indignation conceiued againſt him, by the people of Ieruſalem, and courage which they tooke to ſet vpon him within the Walls: or through preparation of the Armie that lay abroad in the Countrey, to bid him battaile in open field, and recouer by a new charge the honour which was loſt at the former encounter; or through the miſeries daily brought vpon his owne Countrey, by the Syrian in his abſence, if not by all of theſe; Ioas was driuen to lay aſide all thought of winning the Kingdome of Iuda; and taking hoſtages for his quiet paſſage, made all haſte homewards, where hee found a ſad wel-come, and being vtterly forſaken of his wonted proſperitie, forſooke alſo his life in few moneths after, leauing his Kingdome to Ieroboam the ſecond, his fortunate and valiant ſonne.

The end of AMAZIA his Raigne and Life.

ANy man is able to gheſſe how Amazia looked, when the enemy had left him. He that had vaunted ſo much of his owne great proweſſe and skil in armes, threatning to worke wonders, and ſet vp anew the glorious Empire of Dauid, was now vncaſed of his Lyons hide, and appeared nothing ſo terrible a beaſt as he had beene painted. Much argument of ſcoffing at him he had miniſtred vnto ſuch, as held him in diſlike; which at this time, doubtleſſe, were very many: for the ſhame that fals vpon an inſolent man, ſeldome failes of meeting with aboundance of reproch. As for Amazia (beſides that the multitude are alwayes prone to lay the blame vpon their Gouernours, euen of thoſe calamities which happened by their owne default) there was no child in all Ieruſalem, but knew him to be the root of all this miſchiefe. He had not only challenged a good man of Warre, being himſelfe a Daſtard; but when he was beaten and taken by him, had baſely pleaded for the common enemy, to haue him let into the Citie, that with his owne eyes hee might ſee what ſpoyle there was, and not make a bad bargaine by heare-ſay. The father of this Amazia, was a beaſtly man; yet when the Aramites tooke him and tormented him, hee did not offer to buy his owne life at ſo deare a rate, as the Citie and Temple of Ieruſalem. Had he offered, ſhould they haue made his promiſe good? Surely the haſte which they had made in condeſcending to this hard match, was very vnfortunate: for by keeping out the Iſraelite (which was eaſie enough) any little while, they ſhould ſoone haue beene rid of him, ſeeing that the Aramites would haue made him runne home, with greater ſpeed than hee came forth. Then alſo, when hauing truſſed vp his baggage, hee was ready to bee gone, a little courage would haue ſerued to perſwade him to leaue his load behind; had not their good King deliuered vp Hoſtages, to ſecure his returne, as loth to defraud him of the recompence due to his paines taken.

Such exprobrations could not but vexe the heart of this vnhappy King: it had beene well for him, if they had made him acknowledge his faults vnto God, that had punished him by all this dishonour. But we find no mention of his amendment. Rather it appeares, that hee continued an Idolatour to the very last. For it is said of
2. Chron.25.27. him, that after his turning away from the Lord, they wrought treason against him in Ierusalem; a manifest proofe that he was not reclaimed, vnto his liues end. And certainely, they which tell a man in his aduersitie of his faults passed, shall sooner bee thought to vpbraid him with his fortune, than to seeke his reformation. Wherefore it is no maruaile, that Priests and Prophets were lesse welcome to him, than euer they had beene. On the other side, flatterers, and such as were desirous to put a heart into him, whereof themselues might alwayes be masters, wanted not plausible matter to reuiue him. For hee was not first, nor second, of the Kings of Iuda, that had beene ouercome in battaile. Dauid himselfe had abandoned the Citie, leauing it, before the Enemie was in sight, vnto Absalom his rebellious sonne. Many besides him had receiued losses, wherein the Temple bare a part. If Ioas might so easily haue beene kept out; why did their Ancestors let Sesac in? Asa was reputed a vertuous Prince, yet with his owne hands hee emptied the Temple, and was not blamed, but held excusable by necessitie of the State. Belike these traducers would commend no actions but of dead Princes: if so, hee should rather liue to punish them, than dye to please them. Though wherein had he giuen them any cause of displeasure? It was he indeed that commanded to set open the gates to Ioas; but it was the people that did it. Good seruants ought not to haue obeyed their Masters Commandements, to his disaduantage, when they saw him not master of his owne Person. As his captiuitie did acquite him from blame, of all things that hee did or suffered in that condition; so was that misfortune it selfe, in true estimation, as highly to his honour, as deeply to his losse. For had hee beene as hasty to flye, as others were; hee might haue escaped, as well as others did. But seeking to teach the base Multitude courage, by his Royall example, he was shamefully betrayed by those in whom hee trusted. Vnworthie creatures that could readily obey him, when speaking another mans wordes, being prisoner, he commanded them to yeeld; hauing neglected his charge, when leading them in the field, he bade them stand to it, and fight like men. The best was that they must needs acknowledge his mischance, as the occasion whereby many thousand liues were saued; the Enemie hauing wisely preferred the surprise of a Lion that was Captaine, before the chase and slaughter of an Armie of Stags that followed him.

These or the like words comforting Amazia, were able to perswade him, that it was euen so indeed. And such excuses might haue serued well enough to please the people, if the King had first studied how to please God. But hee that was vnwilling to ascribe vnto God the good successe foretold by a Prophet; could easily find how to impute this late disaster, vnto fortune, and the fault of others. Now concerning fortune, it seemes that hee meant to keepe himselfe safe from her, by sitting still; for in fifteene yeeres following (so long he out-liued his honour) we find not that he stirred. As for his subjects, though nothing henceforth bee recorded of his gouernment, yet we may see by his end, that the middle time was ill spent among them, increasing their hatred, to his owne ruine. He that suspecteth his owne worth, or other mens opinions, thinking that lesse regard is had of his person, than he beleeueth to be due to his place, will commonly spend all the force of his authoritie, in purchasing the name of a seuere man. For the affected sowrenesse of a vaine fellow, doth many times resemble the grauitie of one that is wise: and the feare wherein they liue, which are subiect vnto oppression, carries a shew of reuerence, to him that does the wrong; at least it serues to dazle the eyes of vnderlings, keeping them from prying into the weaknesse of such as haue iurisdiction ouer them. Thus the time, wherein, by well vsing it, men might attaine to be such as they ought, they doe vsually misspend, in seeking to appeare such as they are not. This is a vaine and deceiuable course; procuring instead of the respect that was hoped for, more indignation than was feared. Which is a thing of dangerous consequence; especially when an vnable spirit, being ouerparted with high authoritie, is too passionate in the execution of such an Office, as cannot be checked but by violence. If therefore Amazia thought by extreme rigour to hold vp his reputation, what did hee else than striue to make the people thinke he hated them, when of themselues they were apt enough to beleeue, that he did not loue them? The best was that he had, by reuenging his fathers death, prouided well enough for his owne securitie: but who should take vengeance; (or vpon whom?) of such a murther, wherein euery one had a part? Surely God himselfe, who had not giuen commandement or leaue vnto the people, to take his office out of his hand, in shedding the bloud of his Anoynted. Yet as Amazia, careleſſe of God, was carried headlong by his owne affections; so his subjects, following the same ill example, without requiring what belonged vnto their duties, rose vp against him, with such headlong fury, that being vnable to defend himselfe in Ierusalem, he was driuen to forsake the Citie, and flye to Lachis, for safegard of his life. But so extreme was the hatred conceiued against him, and so generall, that neyther his absence could allay the rage of it in the Capitall Citie, nor his presence in the Countrey abroad procure friends, to defend his life. Questionlesse, he chose the Towne of Lachis for his refuge, as a place of all other best affected to him; yet found he there none other fauour, than that the people did not kill him with their owne hands: for when the Conspiratours (who troubled not themselues about raysing an Armie for the matter) sent pursuers after him, hee was abandoned to death. Lachis was the vtmost Citie of his Dominion Westward, standing somewhat without the border of Iuda; so that he might haue made an easie escape (if hee durst aduenture) into the Territorie of the Philistims, or the Kingdome of Israel. Therefore it may seeme that hee was detained there, where certaine it is that hee found no kind of fauour: for had not the people of this Towne, added their owne treason to the generall insurrection; the murtherers could not at so good leisure as they did, haue carried away his bodie to Ierusalem, where they gaue him buriall with his fathers.

§. XI.

Of the Interregnum, or vacancie, that was in the Kingdome of IVDA, after the death of AMAZIA.

IT hath alreadie beene shewed, that the raignes of the Kings of Iuda and Israel were sometimes to be measured by compleat yeeres; otherwhiles, by yeeres current: and that the time of one King is now and then confounded with the last yeeres of his fathers Raigne, or the foremost of his sonnes. But we are now arriued at a meere vacation, wherein the Crowne of Iuda lay voyd eleuen whole yeeres: a thing not plainly set downe in Scriptures, nor yet remembred by Iosephus, and therefore hard to bee beleeued, were it not proued by necessary consequence.

Twice we find it written, that AMAZIA, King of Iuda, liued after the death of IOAS King of Israel fifteene yeeres; whereupon it followes, that the death of Amazia, was about the end of fifteene yeeres compleate, which Ieroboam the second (who in the fifteenth yeere of AMAZIA was made King ouer Israel) had raigned in Samaria. But the succession of Vzzia, who is also called Azaria, vnto his father in the Kingdome of Iuda, was eleuen yeeres later than the sixteenth of Ieroboam: for it is expressed, that AZARIA beganne to raigne in the seuen and twentieth yeere of IEROBOAM; the sixteenth yeere of his life, being ioyned with the first of two and fiftie that he raigned. So the Interregnum of eleuen yeeres cannot be diuided, without some hard meanes vsed, of interpreting the text otherwise than the letter sounds.

2. Chron. 25. 2. & 2 Kin. 14. 17. 2. King. 14. 23.

2. King. 15. 1.

Yet

Yet some conjectures there are made, which tend to keepe all euen, without acknowledging any voyde time. For it is thought that in the place last of all cited, by the seuen and twentieth yeere of Ieroboam, we should perhaps vnderstand the seuen and twentieth yeere of his life; or else (because the like wordes are no where else interpreted in the like sense) that Azaria was eleauen yeeres vnder age, that is, fiue yeeres old, when his father died, and so his sixteenth yeere might concurre with the seuen and twentieth of Ieroboam; or that the text it selfe may haue suffered some wrong, by miswriting twentie seuen for seuenteene yeeres, and so, by making the seuenteenth yeere of Ieroboam to be newly begun, all may be salued. These are the conjectures of that worthie man Gerard Mercator: concerning the first of which, it may suffice, that the Author himselfe doth easily let it passe, as improbable; the last is followed by none that I know, neither is it fit, that vpon euery doubt, we should call the text in question, which could not be satisfied in all coppies, if perhaps it were in one: as for the second, it may be held with some qualification, that Azaria began his Raigne being fiue yeeres old; but then must we adde those eleauen yeeres which passed in his minoritie, to the two and fiftie that followed his sixteenth yeere, which is all one, in a manner, with allowing an interregnum.

But why should we be so carefull to auoide an interregnum in Iuda, seeing that the like necessitie hath inforced all good Writers, to acknowledge the like vacancy, twice happening within few yeeres, in the Kingdome of Israel? The space of time betweene Ieroboams death, and the beginning of Zachariahs Reigne, and such another gap found betweene the death of Peka, and the beginning of Hosea, haue made it easily to be admitted in Samaria, which the consideration of things as they stood in Iuda, when Amazia was slaine, doth make more probable to haue happened there, yea although the necessitie of computation were not so apparant.

For the publike furie, hauing so farre extended it selfe, as vnto the destruction of the Kings owne person, was not like to be appeased without order taken for obtaining some redresse of those matters, which had caused it at the first to breake forth into such extremity. Wee need not therefore wonder how it came to passe, that they which already had throwne themselues into such an horrible treason, should afterwards dare to withhold the Crowne from a Prince of that age, which being inuested in all ornaments of Regalitie, is neuertheless exposed to many injuries, proceeding from head-strong and forgetfull subjects.

As for their conjecture, who make Azaria to haue beene King but one and forty yeeres, after hee came out of his nonage; I dare not allow it, because it agrees too harshly with the text. The best opinion were that, which giues vnto Ieroboam eleauen yeeres of Raigne with his Father, before he beganne to raigne single in the fifteenth of Amazia; did it not swallow vp almost the whole Raigne of Ioas, and extending the yeeres of those which raigned in Israel (by making such of them compleat, as were only current) and take at the shortest the Raignes of Princes ruling in other Nations. But I will not stand to dispute further of this: euery man may follow his owne opinion, and see mine more plainly in the Chronologicall Table, drawne for these purposes.

§. XII.

Of Princes Contemporarie with AMAZIA, and more particularly of SARDANAPALVS.

THE Princes liuing with Amazia, and in the eleauen yeeres that followed his death, were Ioas and Ieroboam in Israel; Cephrenes and Mycerinus in Egypt; Syluius Alladius, and Syluius Auentinus in Alba; Agamemnon in Corinth; Diognetus Pheredus, and Ariphron in Athens; in Lacedæmon Theleclus, in whose time the Spartans wan from the Achaians, Gerauthæ, Amyclæ, and some other Townes.

But

But more notable than all theſe, was Aſſyrian Sardanapalus, who in the one and twentieth yeere of Amazia, ſucceeding his father Ocrazapes or Anacyndaraxes, raigned twentie yeeres, and was ſlaine the laſt of the eleuen void yeeres which fore-went the Raigne of Azaria. In him ended (as moſt agree) the line of Ninus, which had held that Empire one thouſand, two hundred and fortie yeeres. A moſt luxurious and effeminate Palliard he was, paſſing away his time among ſtrumpets, whom he imitated both in apparell and behauiour.

In theſe voluptuous courſes hee liued an vnhappie life, knowing himſelfe to bee ſo vile, that he durſt not let any man haue a ſight of him; yet ſeene he was at length, and the ſight of him was ſo odious, that it procured his ruine. For Arbaces, who gouerned Media vnder him, finding meanes to behold the perſon of his King, was ſo incenſed with that beaſtly ſpectacle, of a man diſguiſed in womans attire, and ſtriuing to counterfeit an harlot, that hee thought it great ſhame to liue vnder the command of ſo vnworthie a creature. Purpoſing therefore to free himſelfe and others from ſo baſe ſubiection, he was much encouraged by the prediction of Beleſis or Beloſus a Chaldæan, who told him plainely, that the Kingdome of Sardanapalus ſhould fall into his hands. Arbaces well pleaſed with this prophecie, did promiſe vnto Beloſus himſelfe the gouernment of Babylon; and ſo concluding how to handle the buſines, one of them ſtirred vp the Medes, and allured the Perſians into the quarrell, the other perſwaded the Babylonians and Arabians to venture themſelues in the ſame cauſe. Theſe foure Nations armed fortie thouſand men againſt Sardanapalus, who in this danger was not wanting to himſelfe, but gathering ſuch forces as hee could, out of other Nations, encountred the rebels, as one that would by deedes refute the tales that they had told of him. Neither did his carriage in the beginning of that warre, anſwere to the manner of his retiredneſſe. For in three battailes hee carried away the better, driuing Arbaces and his followers into ſuch fearefull termes, that had not Beloſus promiſed them conſtantly ſome vnexpected ſuccours, they would forthwith haue broken vp their Campe. About the ſame time, an Armie out of Bactria was comming to aſſiſt the King; but Arbaces encountring it vpon the way, perſwaded ſo ſtrongly by promiſe of libertie, that thoſe forces joyned themſelues with his. The ſodaine departure of the enemie ſeeming to be a flight, cauſed Sardanapalus to feaſt his Armie, triumphing before victorie. But the Rebels being ſtrengthened with this new ſupply, came vpon him by night, and forced his Camp, which through ouer-great ſecuritie was vnprepared for reſiſtance.

This ouerthrow did ſo weaken the Kings heart, that leauing his wiues brother Salamenus to keepe the field, he withdrew himſelfe into the Citie of Nineue; which, till new aides that he ſent for ſhould come, hee thought eaſily to defend; it hauing beene prophecied, that Niniue ſhould neuer be taken, till the Riuer were enemie to the Towne. Of the greatneſſe and ſtrength of Niniue, enough hath beene ſpoken in our diſcourſe of Ninus. It was ſo well victualled, that Arbaces (hauing in two battailes ouerthrowne the Kings Armie, and ſlaine Salamenus) was faine to lye two whole yeeres before it, in hope to winne it by famine; whereof yet he ſaw no appearance. It ſeemes that he wanted Engines and skill to force thoſe wals, which were a hundred foot high, and thicke enough for three Charriots in front to paſſe vpon the rampire. But that which he could not doe in two yeeres, the Riuer of Tygris did in the third: for being high ſwolne with raines, it not only drowned a part of the Citie through which it ranne, but threw downe twentie furlongs of the wall, and made a faire breach for Arbaces to enter.

Sardanapalus, eyther terrified with the accompliſhment of the olde Oracle, or ſeeing no meanes of reſiſtance left, ſhutting vp himſelfe into his Palace, with his wiues, Eunuches and all his treaſures, did ſet the houſe on fire, wherewith hee and they were together conſumed. Strabo ſpeakes of a monument of his, that was in Anchiale a Citie of Cilicia, whereon was found an inſcription, ſhewing that he built that Citie and Tharſus vpon one day: but the addition hereto, bidding men eate Strabo l. 9.

and drinke,and make merry, encouraging other, with verses well knowne, to a voluptuous life, by his owne example,testifie that his nature was more prone to sensuality, than to any vertue beseeming a Prince.

There are some that faintly report otherwise of his end;saying that Arbaces,when hee first found him among his Concubines, was so enraged, that suddenly hee slew him with a dagger. But the more generall consent of Writers agrees with this relation of Diodorus Siculus, who citeth Ctesias a Greeke Writer, that liued in the Court of Persia, where the truth might best be knowne.

Diod.Sic.l.2 c.7

Concerning the Princes which raigned in Assyria; from the time of Semiramis, vnto Sardanapalus, though I beleeue that they were sometimes (yet not, as Orosius hath it, incessantly) busied, in offensiue or else defensiue armes;yet for the most part of them I doe better trust Diodorus Siculus, who saith that their names were ouerpassed by Ctesias, because they did nothing worthie of memory. Whatsoeuer they did; that which Theophilus Antiochenus hath said of them is verie true; Silence and oblivion hath oppressed them.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of VZZIA.

The prosperitie of VZZIA, and of IEROBOAM the second, who raigned with him in Israel. Of the Anarchie that was in the tenne Tribes after the death of IEROBOAM. Of ZACHARIA, SALLVM, MENAHEM and PEKAHIA.

VZZIA, who is also called Azaria the sonne of Iotham, was made King of Iuda, when he was sixteene yeeres old, in the seuen and twentieth yeere of Ieroboam the sonne of Ioas King of Israel. Hee serued the God of his father Dauid, and had therefore good successe in all his enterprises. Hee built Eloth, a Towne that stood neere to the Red Sea, and restored it to Iuda. Hee ouercame the Philistims, of whose Townes hee dismantled some, and built others in sundrie parts of their Territories. Also hee got the mastrie ouer some parts of Arabia, and brought the Ammonites to pay him tribute. Such were the fruits of his prosperous warres, wherein (as Iosphus rehearseth his acts) he beganne with the Philistims, and then proceeded vnto the Arabians and Ammonites. His Armie consisted of three hundred and seuen thousand men of warre, ouer which were appointed two thousand sixe hundred Captaines. For all this multitude the King prepared shields, and speares, and helmets,and other Armes requisite; following therein happily a course quite opposite vnto that which some of his late predecessors had held, who thought it better policie to vse the seruice of the Nobilitie, than of the multitude; carrying forth to warre the Princes and all the Charriots.

2.Chron.26.14.

2.Chron.21.9.

As the victories of Vzzia were farre more important, than the atchieuements of of all that had raigned in Iuda, ſince the time of Dauid; ſo were his riches and magnificent workes, equall, if not ſuperior to any of theirs that had beene Kings betweene him and Salomon. For beſides that great conqueſts are wont to repay the charges of Warre with triple intereſt, he had the skill to vſe, as well as the happineſſe to get. Hee turned his Lands to the beſt vſe, keeping Ploughmen and Dreſſers of Vines, in grounds conuenient to ſuch huſbandry. In other places hee had Cattell feeding, whereof he might well keepe great ſtore, hauing wonne ſo much from the Ammonites and Arabians, that had aboundance of waſte ground ſeruing for paſturage. For defence of his Cattell and Heardſmen, hee built Towres in the wilderneſſe. He alſo digged many Ciſternes or Ponds. Ioſephus cals them Water-courſes; but in ſuch drie grounds, it was enough that he found water, by digging in the moſt likely places. If by theſe Towres hee ſo commanded the water, that none could without his conſent, releeue themſelues therewith; queſtionleſſe he tooke the onely courſe, by which he might ſecurely hold the Lordſhip ouer all the Wilderneſſe; it being hardly paſſable, by reaſon of the extreme drought, when the few Springs therein found, are left free to the vſe of Trauailers.

Beſides all this coſt, and the building both of Eloth by the Red Sea, and of ſundrie Townes among the Philiſtims; hee repaired the wall of Ieruſalem, which Ioas had broken downe, and fortified it with Towres, whereof ſome were an hundred and fiftie Cubits high.

The State of Iſrael did neuer ſo flouriſh, as at this time, ſince the diuiſion of the twelue Tribes into two Kingdomes. For as Vzzia preuailed in the South, ſo (if not more) Ieroboam the ſonne of Ioas, King of the tenne Tribes, enlarged his border on the North; where obtaining many victories, againſt the Syrians, he wanne the Royall Citie of Damaſcus, and he wanne Hamath, with all the Countrie thereabout from the entring of Hamath, vnto the Sea of the Wilderneſſe, that is (as the moſt expound it) vnto the vaſt deſerts of Arabia, the end whereof was vndiſcouered. So the bounds of Iſrael in thoſe parts, were in the time of this Ieroboam, the ſame (or not much narrower) which they had beene in the Raigne of Dauid. 2.Reg.14.25.28.

But it was not for the pietie of Ieroboam, that hee thriued ſo well; for hee was an Idolater: it was only the compaſſion which the Lord had on Iſrael, ſeeing the exceeding bitter affliction, whereinto the Aramites had brought his people, which cauſed him to alter the ſucceſſe of warre, and to throw the victorious Aramites, vnder the feet of thoſe, whom they had ſo cruelly oppreſſed. The line of Iehu, to which God had promiſed the Kingdome of Iſrael vnto the fourth generation, was now not farre from the end; and now againe it was inuited vnto repentance, by new benefits, as it had beene at the beginning. But the ſinne of Ieroboam the ſonne of Nebat, was held ſo precious, that neither the Kingdome it ſelfe, giuen to him by God, was able to draw Iehu from that politike Idolatrie; nor the miſery falling vpon him and his poſteritie, to bring them to a better courſe of Religion; nor yet, at the laſt, this great proſperitie, of Ieroboam the ſonne of Ioas, to make him render the honour that was due, to the onely giuer of victorie. Wherefore the promiſe of God, made vnto Iehu, that his ſonnes, vnto the fourth generation, ſhould ſit on the throne of Iſrael, was not enlarged; but, being almoſt expired, gaue warning of the approching end, by an accident (ſo ſtrange, that wee, who find no particulars recorded, can hardly gheſſe at the occaſions) forgoing the laſt acompliſhment. 2.Reg.10.13.

When Ieroboam the Sonne of Ioas, after a victorious raigne of one and fortie yeeres, had ended his life, it ſeemes in all reaſon that Zacharia his Son, ſhould forthwith haue beene admitted, to raigne in his ſtead; the Nobilitie of that race hauing gotten ſuch a luſtre, by the immediate ſucceſſion of foure Kings, that any Competitor, had the crowne paſſed by election, muſt needes haue appeared baſe; and the vertue of the laſt King, hauing beene ſo great, as might well ſerue to lay the foundation of a new houſe, much more to eſtabliſh the alreadie confirmed right of a family ſo rooted in poſſeſſion. All this notwithſtanding, two or three and twentie yeeres yeeres did passe, before Zacharia the Sonne of Ieroboam was, by vniforme consent, receiued as King. The true originall causes hereof were to be found at Dan and Bethel, where the golden Calues did stand: yet second instruments of this disturbance, are likely not to haue beene wanting, vpon which, the wisedome of man was ready to cast an eye. Probable it is, that the Captaines of the Armie (who afterwardes slew one another, so fast, that in fourteene yeeres there raigned fiue Kings) did now by head-strong violence, rent the Kingdome asunder, holding each what hee could, and eyther despising or hating some qualities in Zacharia; vntill, after many yeeres, wearied with dissention, and the principall of them perhaps, being taken out of the way by death, for want of any other eminent man, they consented to yeeld all quietly to the sonne of Ieroboam. That this Anarchie lasted almost three and twentie yeeres, we find by the difference of time, betweene the fifteenth yeere of Vzzia, which was the last of Ieroboam his one and fortieth (his seuen and twentieth concurring with the first of Vzzia) and the eight and thirtieth of the same Vzzia, in the last sixe moneths whereof, Zacharia raigned in Samaria. There are some indeed that by supposing Ieroboam to haue raigned with his father eleuen yeeres, doe cut off the interregnum in Iuda (before mentioned) and by the same reason, abbridge this Anarchie, that was before the Raigne of Zacharia in Israel. Yet they leaue it twelue yeeres long: which is time sufficient to proue, that the Kingdome of the ten Tribes was no lesse distempered, than as is alreadie noted. But I choose rather to follow the more common opinion, as concurring more exactly with the times of other Princes raigning abroad in the World, than this doubtfull conjecture, that giues to Ieroboam two and fiftie yeeres, by adding three quarters of his fathers Raigne, vnto his own, which was it selfe indeed so long, that hee may well seeme to haue begunne it very yong: for I doe not thinke, that God blessed this Idolater, both with a longer raigne, and with a longer life, than he did his seruant Dauid.

Thus much being spoken of the time, wherein the throne of Israel was voide, before the raigne of Zacharia; little may suffice to be said of his Raigne it selfe, which lasted but a little while. Sixe moneths onely was he King; in which time he declared himselfe a worshipper of the golden Calues; which was enough to iustifie the judgement of God, whereby he was slaine. He was the last of Iehu's house, being (inclusiuely) the first of that line; which may haue beene some cause of the troubles impeaching his orderly succession: the prophecie hauing determined that race in the fourth generation. But (besides that Gods promise was extended vnto the vtmost) there was no warrant giuen to Sallum or to any other, for the death of Zacharia, as had beene giuen to Iehu, for the slaughter of Iehoram, and for the eradication of Ahabs house.

Zacharia hauing beene sixe moneths a King, was then slaine by Sallum, who raigned after him, the space of a moneth in Samaria. What this Sallum was, I doe not find; saue onely that he was a Traytour, and the sonne of one Iabesh, whereby his father got no honour. It seemes that he was one of those, who in time of faction had laboured for himselfe; and now, when al other Competitors were sitten downe, thought easily to preuaile against that King, in whose person the race of Iehu was to faile. Manifest it is, that Sallum had a strong partie: for Tiphsah or Thapsa, and the Coast thereof euen from Tirzah, where Menahem, his enemie and supplanter then lay, refused to admit, as King in his stead, the man that murdered him. Yet at the end of one moneth, Sallum receiued the reward of his treason, and was slaine by Menahem who raigned in his place.

2. King. 15. 13.

Menahem the sonne of Gadi, raigned after Sallum tenne yeeres. In opposition to Sallum, his hatred was deadly, and inhumane: For hee not onely destroyed Tiphsah, and all that were therein, or thereabouts, but he ript vp all their women with child, because they did not open their gates and let him in. Had this crueltie beene vsed in reuenge of Zacharias death, it is like that hee would haue beene as earnest, in procuring vnto him his Fathers Crowne when it was first due. But in performing that office, office, there was vſed ſuch long deliberation, that wee may plainely diſcouer Ambition, Diſdaine, and other priuate paſſions, to haue beene the cauſes of this beaſtly outrage.

In the time of Menahem, and (as it ſeemes) in the beginning of his Raigne; Pul, King of Aſſyria, came againſt the Land of Iſrael; whom this new King appeaſed, with a thouſand talents of ſiluer, leauied vpon all the ſubſtantiall men in his Countrey. With this money the Iſraelite purchaſed, not only the peace of his Kingdome, but his owne eſtabliſhment therein: ſome factious man (belike) hauing either inuited Pul thither, or (if he came vncalled) ſought to vſe his helpe, in depoſing this ill beloued King. Ioſephus reports of this Menahem, that his Raigne was no milder than his entrance. But after ten yeeres, his tyrannie ended with his life: and Pekahia, his Sonne, occupied his roome. Ioſ. ant. l. 9. c. 11.

Of this Pekahia the ſtorie is ſhort: for hee raigned only two yeeres; at the end whereof, he was ſlaine by Peka, the Sonne of Remalia, whoſe treaſon was rewarded with the Crowne of Iſrael, as, in time comming, another mans Treaſon againſt himſelfe ſhall be. There needs no more to be ſaid of Menahem, and his Sonne, ſaue that they were, both of them, Idolaters; and the Sonne (as wee finde in Ioſephus) like to his Father in crueltie. Concerning Pul the Aſſyrian King, who firſt opened vnto thoſe Northerne Nations the way into Paleſtina, it will ſhortly follow in order of the Storie, to deliuer our opinion: whether he were that Beloſus (called alſo Beleſes, and by ſome, Phul Belochus) who joyned with Arbaces the Median, againſt Sardanapalus, or whether he were ſome other man. At the preſent it is more fit that wee relate the end of Vzzia's life, who out-liued the happineſſe wherein we left him. Ioſ. ibid.

§. II.

The end of VZZIA his Raigne and life.

AS the zeale of Iehoiada, that godly Prieſt, was the meane, to preſerue the linage of Dauid, in the perſon of Ioas; ſo it appeares, that the care of holy men was not wanting to Vzzia, to bring him vp, and aduance him to the Crowne of Iuda, when the hatred borne to his Father Amazia, had endangered his ſucceſſion. For it is ſaid of Vzzia, That hee ſought God in the dayes of ZECHARIA (which vnderſtood the viſions of God) and when as he ſought the Lord, God made him proſper. 2. Chron. 26. 5.

But, when he was ſtrong, his heart was lifted vp to his deſtruction: for hee trangreſſed againſt the Lord his God, and went into the Temple of the Lord to burne incenſe, vpon the Altar of incenſe. V. 16. Thus he thought to enlarge his owne authoritie, by medling in the Prieſts office, whoſe power had in euery extremitie beene ſo helpefull to the Kings of Iuda, that meere gratitude, and ciuill policie, ſhould haue held backe Vzzia from incroching thereupon; yea, though the Law of God had beene ſilent in this caſe, and not forbidden it. Howſoeuer the King forgot his dutie, the Prieſts remembred theirs, and God forgat not to aſſiſt them. Azaria the high Prieſt interrupted the Kings purpoſe, and gaue him to vnderſtand, how little to his honour it would proue, that he tooke vpon him the office of the ſonnes of Aaron. There were with Azaria foureſcoure other Prieſts, valiant men, but their valour was ſhewed only in aſſiſting the high Prieſt, when (according to his dutie) hee reprehended the Kings preſumption. This was enough, the reſt God himſelfe performed. Wee find in Ioſephus, that the King had apparelled himſelfe in Prieſtly habit, and that hee threatned Azarias and his Companions, to puniſh them with death, vnleſſe they would be quiet. Ioſephus, indeed, inlargeth the Storie, by inſerting a great Earthquake, which did teare downe halfe an Hill, that rowled foure furlongs, till it reſted againſt another Hill, ſtopping vp the high-wayes, and ſpoyling the Kings Garden in the paſſage. With this Earth-quake, he ſayth, that the roofe of the Temple did Ioſ. ant. l. 9. c. 11.

cleaue, and that a Sunne-beame did light vpon the Kings face, which was presently infected with leprosie. All this may haue beene true; and some there are who thinke that this Earth-quake is the same, which is mentioned by the Prophet Amos; wherein they doe much misse-reckon the times. For the Earth-quake spoken of by Amos, was in the daies of Ieroboam King of Israel, who dyed seuen and thirtie yeeres before Vzzia; so that Iotham the Sonne of Vzzia, which supplyed his Fathers place in gouernment of the Land, should, by this accompt, haue beene then vnborne: for hee was but fiue and twentie yeeres old, when hee beganne to raigne as King. Therefore, thus farre only wee haue assurance; that while VZZIA was wroth with the Priests, the leprosie rose vp in his forehead, before the Priests. Hereupon he was caused, in all haste, to depart the place, and to liue in a house by himselfe, vntill he dyed; the rule ouer the Kings house, and ouer all the Land, being committed to Iotham, his Sonne, and Successor. Iotham tooke not vpon him selfe the stile of King, till his Father was dead; whom they buried in the same field wherein his Ancestors lay interred, yet in a Monument a-part from the rest, because he was a Leper.

2. *Chron.*26.20.

§. III.

Of the Prophets which liued in the time of VZZIA; and of Princes then ruling in Ægypt, and in some other Countries.

IN the time of Vzzia were the first of the lesser Prophets, Hosea, Ioel, Amos, Obadia, and Ionas. It is not indeed set downe, when Ioel, or Obadia, did prophecie: but if the Prophets, whose times are not expressed, ought to bee ranged (according to S. Hieromes rule) with the next before them; then must these two be iudged contemporarie with Hosea and Amos, who liued vnder King Vzzia. To enquire which of these fiue was the most ancient, it may perhaps be thought, at least a superfluous labour; yet if the age wherein Homer liued, hath so painefully beene sought, without reprehension; how can he be taxed, which offers to search out the antiquitie of these holy Prophets? It seemes to me, that the first of these, in order of time, was the Prophet Ionas; who foretold the great victories of Ieroboam King of Israel; & therefore is like to haue prophecied in the dayes of Ioas, whileſt the affliction of Israel was exceeding bitter; the Text it selfe intimating no lesse: by which consequence, he was elder than the other Prophets, whose workes are now extant. But his prophecies that concerned the Kingdome of Israel, are now lost. That which remaineth of him, seemes, not without reason, vnto some very learned, to haue belonged vnto the time of Sardanapalus, in whose dayes Niniue was first of all destroyed. This Prophet rather taught Christ by his sufferings, than by his writings now extant: in all the rest are found expresse promises of the Messias.

2. *Chron.*c.14. v.25.26.

In the Raigne of Vzzia likewise it was, that Esai, the first of the foure great Prophets, beganne to see his visions. This difference of greater and lesser Prophets, is taken from the Volumes which they haue left written (as S. Augustine giues reason of the distinction) because the greater haue written larger Bookes. The Prophet Esai was great indeed, not only in regard of his much written; or of his Nobilitie, (for their opinion is reiected, who thinke him to haue beene the sonne of Amos the Prophet) and the high account wherein he liued; but for the excellencie, both of his stile, and argument, wherein he so plainly foretelleth the Birth, Miracles, Passion, and whole Historie of our Sauiour, with the calling of the Gentiles, that hee might as well be called an Euangelist, as a Prophet; hauing written in such wise, That (as Hierome sayth) one would thinke he did not foretell of things to come, but compile an Historie of matters alreadie past.

Aug. de ciui. Dei l.18. c.19.

Hier. in præf. super Esaiam.

Bocchoris was King of Ægypt, and the ninth yeere of his Raigne, by our computation tion (whereof in due place we will giue reaſon) was current, when Vzzia tooke poſſeſſion of the Kingdome of Iuda.

After the death of Bocchoris, Aſychis followed in the Kingdome of Ægypt, vnto him ſucceeded Anyſis; and theſe two occupied that Crowne ſix yeeres. Then Sabacus, an Æthopian, became King of Ægypt, and held it fiftie yeeres, whereof the tenne firſt ranne along with the laſt of Vzzia his Raigne and life. Of theſe and other Ægyptian Kings, more ſhall be ſpoken, when their affaires ſhall come to be intermedled with the buſineſſe of Iuda.

In Athens, the two laſt yeeres of Ariphron his twentie, the ſeuen and twentieth of Theſpeius, the twentieth of Agamneſtor, and threethe firſt of Æſchylus his three and twentie, made euen with the two and fiftie of Vzzia: as likewiſe did in Alba the laſt ſeuen of Siluius Auentinus his ſeuen and thirtie, together with the three and twentie of Siluius Procas, and two and twentie the firſt of Syluius Amulius. In Media Arbaces beganne his new Kingdome, in the firſt of Vzzia, wherein, after eight and twentie yeeres, his Sonne Oſarmus ſucceeded him, and raigned thirtie yeeres. Of this Arbaces, and the diuiſion of the Aſſyrian Empire, betweene him and others, when they had oppreſſed Sardanapalus, I hold it conuenient to vſe more particular diſcourſe, that we may not wander in too great vncertaintie in the Storie of the Aſſyrian Kings, who haue alreadie found the way into Paleſtina, and are not likely to forget it.

§. IIII.

Of the Aſſyrian Kings, deſcending from PHVL: and whether PHVL and BELOSVS were one perſon; or heads of ſundrie Families, that raigned a-part in Niniue and Babylon.

BY that which hath formerly beene ſhewed of Sardanapalus his death, it is apparant, that the chiefe therein was Arbaces the Median; to whom the reſt of the Confederates did not only ſubmit themſelues in that Warre, but were contented afterwards to bee judged by him; receiuing by his authoritie ſentence of death, or pardon of their forfeited liues. The firſt example of this his power, was ſhewne vpon Beloſus the Babylonian, by whoſe eſpeciall aduice and helpe, Arbaces himſelfe was become ſo great. Yet was not this power of Arbaces exerciſed in ſo tyrannicall manner, as might giue offence in that great alteration of things, eyther to the Princes that had aſſiſted him, or to the generalitie of the people. For in the condemnation of Beloſus, he vſed the counſaile of his other Captaines, and then pardoned him of his owne Grace; allowing him to hold, not only the Citie and Prouince of Babylon, but alſo thoſe treaſures, for embezeling whereof his life had beene endangered.

In like manner, he gaue rewards to the reſt of his partakers, and made them Rulers of Prouinces; retayning (as it appeares) only the Soueraignetie to himſelfe, which to vſe immoderately hee did naturally abhorre. Hee is ſaid, indeede, to haue excited the Medes againſt Sardanapalus, by propounding vnto them hope of tranſferring the Empire to their Nation. And to make good this his promiſe, hee deſtroyed the Citie of Niniue; permitting the Citizens neuertheleſſe to take and carrie away euery one his owne goods. The other Nations that ioyned with him, as the Perſians and Bactrians, he drew to his ſide, by the allurement of libertie; which he himſelfe ſo greatly loued, that by ſlacking too much the reines of his owne Soueraigetie, he did more harme to the generall eſtate of Media, than the pleaſure of the freedome, which it enioyed, could recompence. For both the Territorie of that Countrey was pared narrower by Salmanaſſar (or perhaps by ſome of his Progenitors) whom wee finde, in the Scriptures, to haue held ſome Townes of the Medes, and the ciuill administration was so disorderly, that the people themselues were glad to see that reformation, which Deioces, the first of Arbaces his Line, did make in that gouernment, by reducing them into stricter termes of obedience.

How the force of the Assyrians grew to be such, as might in fourescore yeeres, if not sooner, both extend it selfe vnto the conquest of Israel, and teare away some part of Media, it is a question hardly to be answered; not only in regard of the destruction of Niniue, and subuersion of the Assyrian Kingdome, whereof the Medes, vnder Arbaces, had the honour; who may seeme at that time to haue kept the Assyrians vnder their subiection, when the rest of the Prouinces were set at libertie; but in consideration of the Kings themselues, who raigning afterwardes in Babylon, and Niniue, are confounded by some, and distinguished by others; whereby their Historie is made vncertaine.

I will first therefore deliuer the opinion generally receiued, and the grounds whereupon it stands: then, producing the obiections made against it; I will compare together the determination of that worthie man Ioseph Scaliger, with those learned that subscribe thereunto, and the iudgement of others that were more ancient Writers, or haue followed the Ancients in this doubtfull case. Neyther shall it be needfull to set downe a-part the seuerall authorities and arguments of sundrie men adding somewhat of weight or of clearnesse one to another: it will be enough to relate the whole substance of each discourse: which I will doe as briefly as I can, and without feare to be taxed of partialitie, as being no more addicted to the one opinion than to the other, by any fancie of mine owne, but meerely led by those reasons which vpon examination of each part, seemed to me most forceable, though to others they may perhaps appeare weake.

That which, vntill of late, hath passed as currant, is this; That Belosus was the same King, who, first of the Assyrians, entred Palæstina with an Armie; being called Pul, or Phul, in the Scriptures, and by Annius his Authours with such as follow them, Phul Belochus. Of this man it is said, that he was a skilfull Astrologer, subtile, and ambitious; that he got Babylon by composition made with Arbaces; and that not therewith content, he got into his hand part of Assyria: finally, that hee raigned eight and fortie yeeres, and then dying, left the Kingdome to Teglat phalasar his Sonne, in whose Posteritie it continued some few descents, till the house of Merodach preuailed. The truth of this, if Annius his Metasthenes were sufficient proofe, could not be gainsaid: for that Authour (such as he is) is peremptorie herein. But, howsoeuer Annius his Authors deserue to be suspected, it stands with no reason, that we should conclude all to be false which they affirme. They, who maintaine this Tradition, justifie it by diuers good Allegations, as a matter confirmed by circumstances found in all Authours, and repugnant vnto no Historie at all. For it is manifest by the relation of Diodorus (which is indeed the foundation whereupon all haue built) that Arbaces and Belosus were Partners in the action against Sardanapalus; and that the Bactrians, who joyned with them, were thought well rewarded with libertie, as likewise other Captaines were with gouernements: but that any third Person was so eminent, as to haue Assyria it selfe, the chiefe Country of the Empire, bestowed vpon him, it is a thing whereof not the least apparence is found in any Historie. And certainly it stood with little reason, that the Assyrians should bee committed vnto a peculiar King, at such time as it was not thought meet to trust them in their owne wals and houses. Rather it is apparent, that the destruction of Niniue by Arbaces, and the transplantation of the Citizens, was held a needfull policie because thereby the people of that Nation might be kept downe, from aspiring to recouer the Soueraignty, which else they would haue thought to belong, as of right, vnto the Seat of the Empire.

Vpon such considerations did the Romans, in ages long after following, destroy Carthage and dissolue the Corporation, or Bodie politike, of the Citizens of Capua; because those two Townes were capable of the Empire: a matter esteemed ouerdangerous euen to Rome it selfe, that was Mistresse of them both. This being so, how can it be thought that the Assyrians in three or foure yeeres had erected their Kingdome a-new, vnder one Pul? or what must this Pul haue beene (of whose deseruings, or entermedling, or indeed of whose very name, wee find no mention in the Warre against Sardanapalus) to whom the principall part of the Empire fell, eyther by generall consent in diuision of the Prouinces, or by his owne power and purchase very soone after? Surely he was none other than Belosus; whose neere Neighbourhood gaue him opportunitie (as he was wise enough to play his owne game) both to get Assyria to himselfe, and to empeach any other man, that should haue attempted to seize vpon it. The Prouince of Babylon, which Belosus held, being (as Herodotus reports) in riches, and power, as good as the third part of the Persian Empire, was able to furnish him with all that was requisite for such a businesse: if that were not enough, he had gotten into his owne hands all the gold and siluer that had beene in the Palace of Niniue. And questionlesse to restore such a Citie as Niniue, was an enterprise fit for none to take in hand, except he had such meanes as Belosus had; which Pul, if he were not Belosus, is likely to haue wanted.

Herodot. li. 1.

Besides all this, had Pul beene a distinct person from Belosus, and Lord of Assyria, which lay beyond the Countries of Babylon and Mesopotamia, it would not haue beene an easie matter for him, to passe quite through another mans Kingdome with an Armie, seeking bootie afarre off in Israel: the only action by which the name of Phul is knowne. But if we grant, that he, whom the Scriptures call Pul or Phul, was he same whom prophane writers haue called Belosus, Beleses, and Belestis, (in like manner as Iosephus acknowledgeth, that hee, whom the Scriptures called neuer otherwise than Darius the Mede, was the Sonne of Astyages, and called of the Greekes by another name, that is, Cyaxares) then is this scruple vtterly remooued. For Babylon and Mesopotamia did border vpon Syria and Palæstina: so that Belosus, hauing settled his affaires in Assyria towards the East and North, might with good leisure encroach vpon the Countries that lay on the other side of his Kingdome, to the South and West. He that lookes into all particulars, may find euery one circumstance concurring, to proue that Phul who inuaded Israel, was none other than Belosus. For the Prince of the Arabians, who joyned with Arbaces, and brought no small part of the forces wherewith Sardanapalus was ouerthrowne, did enter into that action, meerely for the loue of Belosus. The friendship of these Arabians was a thing of maine importance, to those that were to passe ouer Euphrates with an Armie into Syria. Wherefore Belosus, that held good correspondence with them; and whose most fruitfull Prouince, adjoyning to their barraine quarters, might yeerely doe them inestimable pleasures; was not only like to haue quiet passage through their borders, but their vtmost assistance; yea, it stands with good reason, that they, who loued not Israel, should for their owne behoofe haue giuen him intelligence, of the destruction and ciuill broyles among the tenne Tribes; whereby, as this Pul got a thousand talents, so it seemes that the Syrians and Arabians, that had felt an heauie Neighbour of Ieroboam, recouered their owne, setting vp a new King in Damasco, and clearing the Coast of Arabia, (from the Sea of the Wildernesse to Hamath) of the Hebrew Garrisons. Neyther was it any new acquaintance, that made the Nations diuided by Euphrates hold together in so good termes of friendship: it was ancient consanguinitie; the memorie whereof was auaileable to the Syrians, in the time of Dauid, when the Aramites beyond the Riuer came ouer willingly, to the succour of Hadadezer, and the Aramites about Damasco. So Belosus had good reason to looke into those parts; what a King raigning so farre off as Niniue, should haue to doe in Syria, if the other end of his Kingdome had not reached to Euphrates, it were hard to shew.

Iosep. ant. l. 10. cap. 12.

But concerning this last argument of the businesse which might allure the Chaldæans into Palæstina, it may bee doubted, lest it should seeme to haue ill coherence with that which hath beene said of the long Anarchie that was in the tenne Tribes.

For if the Crowne of Israel were worne by no man in three and twentie yeeres, then is it likely that Belosus was eyther vnwilling to stirre, or vnable to take the aduantage when it was faireſt, and firſt diſcouered. This might haue compelled thoſe, who alone were not ſtrong enough, to ſeeke after helpe from ſome Prince that lay further off; and ſo the opinion of thoſe that diſtinguiſh Phul from Belosus, would be ſomewhat confirmed. On the other ſide, if we ſay, that Belosus did paſſe the Riuer of Euphrates, as ſoone as hee found likelihood of making a proſperous journey, then may it ſeeme that the inter-regnum in Israel was not ſo long as we haue made it: for three and twentie yeeres leiſure would haue afforded better opportunitie, which ought not to haue beene loſt.

For anſwere hereunto, we are to conſider, what Oroſius and Euſebius haue written concerning the Chaldees: the one, that after the departure of Arbaces into Media, they laid hold on a part of the Empire: the other, that they preuailed and grew mightie, betweene the times of Arbaces and Deioces the Medes. Now, though it be held an errour of Oroſius, where he ſuppoſeth that the occupying of Babylonia by the Chaldæans, was in manner of a rebellion from the Medes; yet herein hee and Euſebius doe concurre, that the authoritie of Arbaces did reſtraine the ambition, which by his abſence grew bold, and by his death, regardfull only of it ſelfe. Now, though ſome haue conjectured that all Aſſyria was giuen to Belosus (as an ouerplus, beſides the Prouince of Babylon, which was his by plaine bargaine made aforehand) in regard of his high deſeruings, yet the opinion more commonly receiued is, that hee did only encroch vpon that Prouince by little and little, whileſt Arbaces liued, and afterwards dealing more openly, got it all himſelfe. Seeing therefore, that there paſſed but twelue yeeres betweene the death of Arbaces, and the beginning of Menahem his Raigne; manifeſt it is, that the conqueſt of Aſſyria, and ſettling of that Countrey, was worke enough to hold Belosus occupyed, beſides the reſtauration of Niniue, which alone was able to take vp all the time remaining of his Raigne, if perhaps he liued to ſee it finiſhed in his owne dayes. So that this argument may rather ſerue to proue that Phul and Belosus were one perſon; foraſmuch as the iourney of Phul againſt Israel was not made vntill Belosus could find leiſure; and the time of aduantage which Belosus did let ſlip, argued his buſineſſe in ſome other quarter, namely in that Prouince of which Phul is called King. Briefly, it may bee ſaid, that he who conquered Aſſyria, and performed ſomewhat vpon a Countrie ſo farre diſtant as Palæſtina, was likely to haue beene, at leaſt, named in ſome Hiſtorie, or, if not himſelfe, yet his Countrey to haue beene ſpoken of for thoſe victories: but we neither heare of Phul, in any prophane Authour, neyther doth any Writer, ſacred or prophane, once mention the victories or acts whatſoeuer of the Aſſyrians, done in thoſe times; whereas of Belosus, and the power of the Chaldæans, wee find good Record.

Surely, that great ſlaughter of ſo many thouſand Aſſyrians, in the quarrell of Sardanapalus, together with other calamities of that long and vnfortunate warre, which ouerwhelmed the whole Countrey, not ending but with the ruine and vtter deſolation of Niniue, muſt needes haue ſo weakened the ſtate of Aſſyria, that it could not in thirtie yeeres ſpace be able to inuade Palæſtina, which the ancient Kings, raigning in Niniue, had, in all their greatneſſe, forborne to attempt. Yet theſe afflictions, diſabling that Countrey, did helpe to enable Belosus to ſubdue it; who hauing once extended his Dominion to the borders of Media, and being (eſpecially if he had compounded with the Medes) by the interpoſition of that Countrey, ſecure of the Scythinns, and other warlike Nations on that ſide, might very well turne Southward, and trie his fortune in thoſe Kingdomes; whereinto ciuill diſſention of the inhabitants, and the bordering enuie of the Arabians and Aramites about Damaſco, friends and Couſins to the Chaldæans and Meſopotamians, did inuite him. For theſe, and the other before alledged reaſons, it may be concluded, That what is ſaid of Pul in the Scriptures, ought to be vnderſtood of Belosus; euen as by the names of Nebuchadnezzar, nezzar, Darius the Mede, Artaſhaſht, and Ahaſhuereſh, with the like, are thought, or knowne, to be meant the ſame, whom prophane Hiſtorians, by names better knowne in their own Countries, haue called Nabopollaſſar, Cyaxares, and Artaxerxes: eſpecially conſidering, that hereby we ſhall neither contradict any thing that hath beene written of olde, nor neede to trouble our ſelues and others with framing new conjectures. This in effect is that, which they alledge in maintenance of the opinion commonly receiued.

Now this being once granted; other things, of more importance, will of themſelues eaſily follow. For it is a matter of no great conſequence to know the truth of this point (conſidering it apart from that which depends thereon) Whether Pul were Beloſus, or ſome other man: the whole race of theſe Aſſyrian and Babylonian Kings, wherin are found thoſe famous Princes, Nabonaſſar, Mardocempadus, and Nabopollaſſar (famous for the Aſtronomicall obſeruations recorded from their times) is the maine ground of this contention. If therefore Beloſus or Beleſis were that Phul which inuaded Iſrael; if he and his poſteritie raigned both in Niniue and in Babylon; if he were father of Teglat-Phul-Aſar, from whom Salmanaſar, Senacherib, and Aſarhaddon deſcended; then it is manifeſt, that we muſt ſeeke Nabonaſſar, the Babylonian King, among theſe Princes; yea, and conclude him to be none other then Salmanaſar, who is knowne to haue raigned in thoſe yeeres, which Ptolomey the Mathematician hath aſſigned vnto Nabonaſſar. As for Merodach, who ſupplanted Aſar-haddon, manifeſt it is, that he and his ſucceſſors were of another houſe. This is the ſcope and end of all his diſputation.

But they that maintaine the contrarie part, will not bee ſatisfied with ſuch coniectures. They lay hold vpon the concluſion, and by ſhaking that into pieces, hope to ouerthrow all the premiſſes, vpon which it is inferred. For (ſay they) if Nabonaſſar, that raigned in Babylon, could not be Salmanaſſar, or any of thoſe other Aſſyrian Kings, then is it manifeſt, that the races were diſtinct, and that Phul and Beloſus were ſeuerall Kings. This conſequence is ſo plaine, that it needs no confirmation. To proue that Nabonaſſar was a diſtinct perſon from Salmanaſſar, are brought ſuch arguments as would ſtagger the reſolution of him that had ſworne to hold the contrarie. For firſt, Nabonaſſar was King of Babylon, and not of Aſſyria. This is proued by his name, which is meerely Chaldean, whereas Salman, the firſt part of Salmanaſſars name, is proper to the Aſſyrians. It is likewiſe proued by the Aſtronomicall obſeruations, which proceeding from the Babylonians, not from the Aſſyrians, doe ſhew, that Nabonaſſar, from whom Ptolomie drawes that Epocha, or account of times, was a Babylonian, and no Aſſyrian. Thirdly, and more ſtrongly, it is confirmed by the ſucceſſor of Nabonaſſar, which was Mardocempadus, called in his owne language Mero-dac-ken-pad, but more briefely in Eſay his propheſie, Merodach, by the former part of his name; or Merodach Baladan, the ſonne of Baladan. Now if Merodach, the ſonne of Baladan, King of Babel, were the ſonne of Nabonaſſar, then was Nabonaſſar none other then Baladan King of Babel, and not Salmanaſſar King of Aſſyria. Eſay 39. 1.

What can be plainer? As for the cadence of theſe two names, Nabonaſſar & Salmanaſſar, which in Greeke or Latine writing hath no difference, we are taught by Scaliger, that in the Hebrew letters there is found no affinitie therein. So concerning the places of Babylonia, whereinto Salmanaſſar carried captiue ſome part of the ten Tribes; it may well be granted, that in the Prouince of Babylon Salmanaſſar had gotten ſomewhat, yet will it not follow that he was King of Babylon it ſelfe. To conclude, Merodach began his raigne ouer Babylon in the ſixt yeere of Hezekia, at which time Salmanaſſar tooke Samaria; therefore, if Salmanaſſar were King of Babylon, then muſt we ſay that he and Merodach, yea and Nabonaſſar, were all one man. Theſe are the arguments of that noble and learned Writer Ioſeph Scaliger; who not contented to follow the common opinion, founded vpon likelihood of coniectures, hath drawne his proofes from matter of more neceſſarie inference.

Touching all that was ſaid before of Phul Beloſus, for the prouing that Phul and Beloſus were not ſundrie Kings; Ioſeph Scaliger pitties their ignorance, that haue ſpent their labour to ſo little purpoſe. Honeſt and painefull men he confeſſeth that they were, who by their diligence might haue wonne the good liking of their Readers, had they not, by mentioning Annius his Authors, giuen ſuch offence, that men refuſed thereupon to reade their Bookes and Chronologies. A ſhort anſwere.

Beloſus

For mine owne part, howſoeuer I beleeue nothing that Annius his Beroſus, Metaſthenes, and others of that ſtampe affirmes, in reſpect of their bare authoritie; yet am I not ſo ſqueamiſh, but that I can well enough digeſt a good Booke, though I finde the names of one or two of theſe good fellowes alleaged in it: I haue (ſomewhat peraduenture too often) alreadie ſpoken my minde of Annius his Authors: neuertheleſſe, I may ſay here againe, that where other Hiſtories are ſilent, or ſpeake not enough, there may we without ſhame borrow of theſe, as much as agrees with that little which elſewhere we finde, and ſerueth to explaine or inlarge it without improbabilities.

Neither indeede are thoſe honeſt and painefull men (as Scaliger termes them, meaning, if I miſtake him not; good ſilly fellowes) who ſet downe the Aſſyrian Kings from Pul forwards, as Lords alſo of Babylon, taking Pul for Beloſus, and Salmanaſſar for Nabonaſſar, ſuch Writers as a man ſhould bee aſhamed or vnwilling to read. For (to omit a multitude of others, that herein follow Annius, though diſliking him in generall) Gerard Mercator is not ſo ſlight a Chronologer, that hee ſhould be laughed out of doores, with the name of an honeſt meaning fellow.

But I will not make compariſons betweene Scaliger and Mercator, they were both of them men notably learned: let vs examine the arguments of Scaliger, and ſee whether they be of ſuch force, as cannot either be reſiſted or auoided. It will eaſily be granted, that Nabonaſſar was King of Babylon; that hee was not King of Aſſyria, ſome men doubt whether Scaligers reaſons be enough to proue. For though Nabonaſſar be a Chaldaan name, and Salmanaſſar an Aſſyrian; yet what hinders vs from beleeuing, that one man in two languages might bee called by two ſeuerall names? That Aſtronomie flouriſhed among the Chaldees, is not enough to proue Nabonaſſar either an Aſtrologer, or a Chaldaan. So it is, that Scaliger himſelfe calls them, Prophetas neſcio quos, qui NABONASSARVM Aſtronomum fuiſſe in ſomnis viderunt; Prophets I know not who, that in their ſleepe haue dreamt of NABONASSAR, that he was an Aſtrologer.

Scal. Canon. l. 3.

Whether Nabonaſſar were an Aſtrologer or no, I cannot tell; it is hard to maintaine the negatiue. But as his being Lord ouer the Chaldaans, doth not proue him to haue beene learned in their ſciences; ſo doth it not proue him, not to haue beene alſo King of Aſſyria. The Emperor Charles the fift, who was borne in Gant, and Philip his Sonne, King of Spaine, and Lords of the Netherlands, had men farre more learned in all Sciences, and particularly in the Mathematicks, among their Subiects of the Low Countries, then were any that I read of then liuing in Spaine, if Spaine at that time had any; yet I thinke, Poſteritie will not vſe this as an argument, to proue that Spaine was none of theirs. It may well be, that Salmanaſſar or Nabonaſſar, did vſe the Aſſyrian Souldiers, and Babylonian Schollers: but it ſeemes, that hee and his poſteritie, by giuing themſelues wholly to the more warlike Nation, loſt the richer, out of which they firſt iſſued; as likewiſe King Philip loſt partly, and partly did put to a dangerous hazard all the Netherlands, by ſuch a courſe. As for the two vnanſwerable arguments, (as Scaliger termes them, being me thinks none other than anſweres to ſomewhat that is or might be alleaged on the contrarie ſide) one of them which is drawne from the vnlike ſound and writing of thoſe names, Salmanaſſar and Nabonaſſar in the Hebrew, I hold a point about which no man will diſpute; for it is not likeneſſe of ſound, but agreement of time, and many circumſtances elſe, that muſt take away the diſtinction of perſons: the other likewiſe may be granted; which is, that Salmanaſſar might be Lord of ſome places in the Prouince of Babylon, yet not King of Babylon it ſelfe: this indeede might bee ſo, and it might be otherwiſe.

Hitherto

Hitherto there is nothing ſaue conjecture againſt conjecture. But in that which is alleaged out of the Prophet Eſai, concerning Merodach the Sonne of Baladan; and in that which is ſaid of this Merodach, or Mardokenpadus, his being the Succeſſor of Nabonaſſar, and his beginning to raigne in the ſixt yeere of Hezekia, I finde matter of more difficultie, than can be anſwered in haſt. I will therefore deferre the handling of theſe objections, vntill I meete with their ſubject in his proper place; which will be when we come to the time of Hezekia; wherein Merodach liued & was King. Yet that I may not leaue too great a ſcruple in the minde of the Reader, thus farre will I here ſatisfie him; that how ſtrong ſoeuer this argument may ſeeme, Scaliger himſelfe did liue to retract it, ingenuouſly confeſſing, that in thinking Merodach to be the Sonne of Nabonaſſar, he had beene deceiued.

Nowtherefore let vs conſider, in what ſort they haue faſhioned their Storie, who taking Pul to be a diſtinct perſon from Beloſus or Beleſis, haue in like ſort, as was neceſſarie, diſtinguiſhed their off-ſpring, making that of Pul to faile in Aſarhaddon, which left all to Merodach the Babylonian. And here I muſt firſt confeſſe mine owne want of Bookes, if perhaps there be many, that haue gone about to reduce this narration into ſome ſuch order, as might preſent vnto vs the bodie of this Hiſtorie, in one view. Diuers, indeede, there are, whom I haue ſeene, that ſince Ioſeph Scaliger deliuered his opinion, haue written in fauour of ſome one or other point thereof: but Sethus Caluiſius himſelfe, who hath abridged Scaligers learned Worke, De emendatione Temporum, hath not beene carefull to giue vs notice, how long Beleſus, Baladan, Pul, or Tiglat Pulaſſar, did raigne, (perhaps becauſe he found it not expreſſed in Scaliger) but is content to ſet downe Baladan, for the ſame perſon with Nabonaſſar, which Scaliger himſelfe reuoked. In this caſe therefore I muſt lay downe the plot of theſe deuided Kingdomes, in ſuch ſort as I finde it contriued by Auguſtinus Torniellus; who onely of all that I haue ſeene, ſets downe the ſucceſſion, continuance, and acts, of thoſe that raigned in Aſſyria after Sardanapalus, diſtinguiſhing them from Beloſus, and his Poſteritie, of whom he hath the like remembrance. This Torniellus is a Regular Clarke of the congregation of S. Paul, whoſe Annales were printed the laſt yeere; he appeares to me a man of curious induſtrie, ſound judgement, and free Spirit; yet many times (and I take it, wilfully) forgetfull of thanking, or mentioning thoſe Proteſtant Writers, by whoſe Bookes hee hath receiued good information, and enriched his workes by inſerting ſomewhat of theirs. But in this buſineſſe he hath openly profeſſed to follow Scaliger, whoſe helpe, without wrong or diſhonour to himſelfe, hee hath both vſed and acknowledged. For mine owne part, I will not ſpare to doe right vnto Torniellus; but confeſſe my ſelfe to haue receiued benefit by his writing; and wiſh that his Annales had ſooner come to light; for that as hee hath much confirmed mee in ſome things, ſo would hee haue inſtructed and emboldened mee, to write more fully and leſſe timorouſly in other things, which now I haue not leiſure to reuiſe. Particularly in that coniecture (which I had faintly deliuered, and yet feared leſt it had ouer-haſtily paſſed out of my hand, and beene expoſed to other mens conſtructions) of the foure Kings that inuaded the Vallie of Siddim, and were ſlaine by Abraham, I finde him aduenturing, as I haue done, to ſay, that they may probably be thought to haue been ſome pettie Lords; the contrarie opinion of all Writers notwithſtanding. But now let vs conſider how he hath ordered theſe laſt Aſſyrian and Babylonian Kings. C. 1. §. 13.

After the deſtruction of Sardanapalus, Arbaces being the moſt mightie, ſought to get all to himſelfe, but was oppoſed by Beloſus; in which contention, one Phul, a powerfull man in Aſſyria, ſided with Beloſus, and they two preuailed ſo farre, that finally Arbaces was content to ſhare the Empire with them, making ſuch a diuiſion thereof, as was long after made of the Roman Empire, betweene Octauian, Anthonie, and Lepidus.

Another conjecture is (for Torniellus offers not this, or the reſt, as matter of certainetie) that Arbaces made himſelfe Soueraigne Lord of all, and placed the ſeate of his Empire in Media, appointing Beloſus his Lieutenant in Babylonia, and Phul in Aſſyria. But in ſhort ſpace, that is, in foure yeeres, it came to paſſe, by the juſt judgement of God, that Phul and Beloſus rebelled againſt Arbaces, like as Arbaces had done againſt Sardanapalus, and in ſtead of being his Viceroyes, made themſelues abſolute Kings. And to this later opinion Torniellus himſelfe leanes, holding it much the more probable, as being more agreeable to that which is found in prophane Hiſtories. Why he did make and publiſh the former ſuppoſition, reſoluing to hold the later, I ſhall anon, without any wrong to him, make bold to gueſſe. Hauing thus deuiſed, how Phul and Beloſus might, at the firſt, attaine to be Kings, hee orders their time, and their ſucceſſors, in this manner.

Foure yeeres after Arbaces, Phul beginnes to raigne, and continues eight and fortie yeeres. Theglatphaleſar (whoſe name, and the names of other Princes, I write diuerſly, according as the Authors whom I haue in hand are pleaſed to diuerſifie them) ſucceeding vnto Phul, raigned three and twentie. Salmanaſſar followed him, and raigned tenne. After him Senacharib raigned ſeuen: and when hee was ſlaine, Aſarhaddon his ſonne tenne yeeres; in whom that Line failed.

The ſame time that Phul tooke vpon him as King of Aſſyria, or not long after, (why not rather afore? for ſo it had beene more likely) Beloſus vſurped the Kingdome of Babylon, and held it threeſcore and eight yeeres; at the leaſt threeſcore and eight yeeres did paſſe, before Nabonaſſar followed him in the poſſeſſion.

To Nabonaſſar, whom (with Scaliger) hee thinkes to be Baladan, are aſſigned ſixe and twentie yeeres: then, two and fiftie to Merodach, or Mardocempadus: foure and twentie to Ben Merodach: and laſtly, one and twenty to Nabolaſſar, the father of Nabuchodonoſor, who is like to offer matter of further diſputation.

Concerning the originall of theſe Aſſyrian and Babylonian Kingdomes, I may truly ſay, That the conjectures of other men, who giue all to Beloſus, and confound him with Phul, appeare to me more neerely reſembling the truth. Neither doe I thinke, that Torniellus would haue conceiued two different wayes, by which Phul might haue gotten Aſſyria (for how Beloſus came to get Babylon, it is plaine enough) if either of them alone could haue contented him. He adhæres to the later of the two, as better agreeing with Diodore, and other Hiſtorians. But he perceiued, that to make Phul on the ſuddaine King of Aſſyria; or to giue him ſo noble a Prouince, as would, of it ſelfe, inuite him to accept the name and power of a King, was a thing moſt vnlikely to haue happened, vnleſſe his deſerts (whereof wee finde no mention) had beene proportionable to ſo high a reward. And for this cauſe (as I take it) hath hee deuiſed the meanes, whereby Phul might be made capable of ſo great a ſhare in the Empire. If this were a true or probable ſuppoſition, then would a new doubt ariſe, Why this Phul, being one of the three that diuided all betweene them, was vtterly forgotten by all Hiſtorians? yea, why this Diuiſion it ſelfe, and the ciuile Warres that cauſed it, were neuer heard of. Queſtionleſſe, the interuerting of ſome Treaſures by Beloſus, with his Iudgement, Condemnation, and Pardon following, were matters of farre leſſe note. Therefore I doe not ſee, how one of the two inconueniences can this way be auoided; but that either wee muſt confeſſe, the Dominion giuen to Phul to haue beene exceeding his merits, or elſe his merits, and name withall, to haue beene ſtrangely forgotten: either of which is enough to make vs thinke, that rather the conjecture, inferring ſuch a ſequele, is wide of the truth. As for the rebellion of Phul and Beloſus againſt Arbaces, it was almoſt impoſſible for the Aſſyrians to recouer ſuch ſtrength in foure yeeres, as might ſerue to hold out in rebellion: for Beloſus, it was needleſſe to rebell, conſidering, that Arbaces did not ſeeke to moleſt him, but rather permitted (as being an ouer-great fauourer of libertie) euen the Medes, that were vnder his owne Gouernment, to doe what they lifted.

But it is now fit that wee peruſe the Catalogue of theſe Kings: not paſſing through them all (for ſome will require a large diſcourſe in their owne times) but ſpeaſpeaking of their order and time in generall. If it bee ſo vnlawfull to thinke, that ſome of Annius his tales (let them all be counted his tales, which are not found in other Authors as well in his) may bee true, eſpecially ſuch, as contradict no acknowledged truth, or apparant likelihood, why then is it ſaid, that Phul did raigne in Aſſyria eight and fortie yeeres? For this hath no other ground than Annius. It is true, that painefull and judicious Writers haue found this number of yeeres, to agree fitly with the courſe of things in Hiſtory: yet all of them tooke it from Annius. Let it therefore be the puniſhment of Annius his forgerie (as queſtionleſſe he is often guiltie of this crime) that when he tells truth, or probabilitie, hee be not beleeued for his owne ſake; though for our owne ſakes we make vſe of his boldneſſe, taking his words for good, whereas (nothing elſe being offered) wee are vnwilling our ſelues to be Authors, of new, though not vnprobable conjectures. Herein we ſhall haue this commoditie, that wee may without bluſhing alter a little, to helpe our owne opinions, and lay the blame vpon Annius, againſt whom wee ſhall be ſure to finde friends that will take our part.

The raignes of Theglathalaſar and Salmanaſſar did reach, by Annius his meaſure, to the length of fiue and twentie yeeres the one, and ſeuenteene the other; Torniellus hath cut off two from the former, and ſeuen from the later of them, to fit (as I thinke) his owne computation; vſing the libertie whereof I ſpake laſt: for that any Author, ſaue our good Metaſthenes, or thoſe that borrowed of him, hath gone about to tell how long each of theſe did raigne, it is more then I haue yet found. To Senacherib and Aſarhaddon, Torniellus giues the ſame length of raigne, which is found in Metaſthenes. I thinke there are not many, that will arrogate ſo much vnto themſelues, as may well bee allowed vnto a man ſo judicious as is Torniellus: yet could I wiſh, that he had forborne to condemne the followers of Annius, in this buſineſſe, wherein he himſelfe hath choſen, in part, rather to become one of them, than to ſay, as elſe he muſt haue done, almoſt nothing.

The like libertie we finde that he hath vſed in meaſuring the raignes of the Chaldeans; filling vp all the ſpace betweene the end of Sardanapalus, and the beginning of Nabonaſſar, with the threeſcore and eight yeeres of Beloſus. In this reſpect it was, perhaps, that hee thought Beloſus might haue begunne his raigne ſomewhat later then Phul: for threeſcore and eight yeeres would ſeeme a long time for him to hold a Kingdome, that was no yong man when he tooke poſſeſſion of it. But how is any whit of his age abated by ſhortning his raigne, ſeeing his life reacheth to the end of ſuch a time, as were alone, without adding the time wherein hee was a priuate man, enough for a long liuer? Indeede, eight and fortie yeeres had beene ſomewhat of the moſt, conſidering that hee ſeemes by the Storie to haue been little leſſe, at ſuch time as hee joyned with Arbaces; and therefore the addition of twentie yeeres did vvell deſerue that note (which Torniellus aduiſedly giues) that if his raigne extended not ſo farre, then the raigne of ſuch as came after him, occupied the middle time, vnto Nabonaſſar.

I neither doe reprehend the boldneſſe of Torniellus, in conjecturing, nor the modeſtie of Scaliger and Sethus Calviſius, in forbearing to ſet downe as warrantable, ſuch things as depend only vpon likelihood. For things, whereof the perfect knowledge is taken away from vs by Antiquitie, muſt be deſcribed in Hiſtorie, as Geographers in their Maps deſcribe thoſe Countries, whereof as yet there is made no true diſcouerie, that is, either by leauing ſome part blanke, or by inſerting the Land of Pigmies, Rocks of loade-ſtone, with Head-lands, Bayes, great Riuers, and other particularities, agreeable to common report, though many times controlled by following experience, and found contrarie to truth. Yet indeede the ignorance growing from diſtance of place, allowes not ſuch libertie to a Deſcriber, as that which ariſeth from the remedileſſe obliuion of conſuming time. For it is true that the Poet ſaith;

——Neq; feruidis
Pars inclusa caloribus
Mundi, nec Boreæ finitimum latus,
Duratæq; sole Niues,
Mercatorem abigunt: horrida callidi
Vincunt æquora Nautæ.

Nor Southerne heate, nor Northerne snow
That freezing to the ground doth grow,
The subiect Regions can fence,
And keepe the greedie Marchant thence.
The subtile Shipmen way will find,
Storme neuer so the Seas with winde.

Therefore the fictions (or let them be called conjectures) painted in Maps, doe serue only to mislead such discouerers as rashly beleeue them; drawing vpon the publishers, eyther some angry curses, or well deserued scorne; but to keepe their own credit, they cannot serue alwaies. To which purpose I remember a pretie jest of Don Pedro de Sarmiento, a worthie Spanish Gentleman, who had beene employed by his King in planting a Colonie vpon the Streights of Magellan: for when I asked him, being then my Prisoner, some question about an Island in those Streights, which me thought, might haue done eyther benefit or displeasure to his enterprise, he told me merrily, that it was to be called the Painters wiues Island; saying, That whilest the fellow drew that Map, his wife sitting by, desired him to put in one Countrey for her; that she, in imagination, might haue an Island of her owne. But in filling vp the blankes of old Histories, we need not be so scrupulous. For it is not to be feared, that time should runne backward, and by restoring the things themselues to knowledge, make our conjectures appeare ridiculous: What if some good Copie of an ancient Author could bee found, shewing (if wee haue it not alreadie) the perfect truth of these vncertainties? would it be more shame to haue beleeued in the meane while, Annius or Torniellus, than to haue beleeued nothing? Here I will not say, that the credit, which we giue to Annius, may chance otherwhiles to bee giuen to one of those Authors whose names he pretendeth. Let it suffice, that in regard of authority, I had rather trust Scaliger or Torniellus, than Annius; yet him than them, if his assertion bee more probable, and more agreeable to approued Histories than their conjecture, as in this point it seemes to me; it hauing moreouer gotten some credit, by the approbation of many, and those not meanly learned.

To end this tedious disputation; I hold it a sure course in examination of such opinions, as haue once gotten the credit of being generall, so to deale as Pacuuius in Capua did with the multitude, finding them desirous to put all the Senatours of the Citie to death. He lockt the Senatours vp within the State-house, and offered their liues to the Peoples mercie; obtayning thus much, that none of them should perish, vntill the Commonaltie had both pronounced him worthie of death, and elected a better in his place. The condemnation was hastie; for as fast as euery name was read, all the Towne cryed, Let him dye: but the execution required more leisure; for in substituting another, some notorious vice of the Person, or baseneſse of his condition, or insufficiencie of his qualitie, made each new one that was offered, to be rejected: so that finding the worse and lesse choise, the further and the more that they sought, it was finally agreed, that the old should be kept for lack of better.

§. V.

Of the Olympiads, and the time when they began.

AFter this diuiſion of the Aſſyrian Empire, followes the inſtauration of the Olympian games, by Iphitus, in the raigne of the ſame King Vzzia, and in his one and fiftieth yeare. It is, I know, the generall opinion, that theſe games were eſtabliſhed by Iphitus, in the firſt of Iotham: yet is not that opinion ſo generall, but that Authors, waightie enough, haue giuen to them a more early beginning. The truth is, that in fitting thoſe things vnto the ſacred Hiſtorie, which are found in prophane Authors, wee ſhould not bee too carefull of drawing the Hebrewes to thoſe workes of time, which had no reference to their affaires; it is enough, that ſetting in due order theſe beginnings of accompts, we ioyne them to matters of Iſrael and Iuda, where occaſion requires.

Theſe Olympian games and exerciſes of actiuitie, were firſt inſtituted by Hercules, who meaſured the length of the race by his owne foot; by which Pythagoras found out the ſtature and likely ſtrength of Hercules his bodie. They tooke name, not from the Mountaine Olympus, but from the Citie Olympia, otherwiſe Piſa, neere vnto Elis; where alſo Iupiters Temple in Elis, famous among the Græcians, and reputed among the wonders of the World, was knowne by the name of the Temple of Iupiter Olympius. Theſe games were exerciſed from euery fourth yeare compleat, in the plaines of Elis, a Citie of Peloponneſus, neere the Riuer Alpheus.

After the death of Hercules, theſe meetings were diſcontinued for many yeares, till Iphitus by aduice from the Oracle of Apollo, re-eſtabliſhed them, Lycurgus the Law-giuer then liuing: from which time they were continued by the Græcians, till the raigne of Theodoſius the Emperor, according to Cedrenus: other thinke that they were diſſolued vnder Conſtantine the Great. Aul. Gell. l. 1. c. 1 ex Plut. Plut. out of Hermippus.

From this inſtitution, Varro accompted the Græcian times, and their ſtories, to be certaine: but reckoned all before either doubtfull, or fabulous: and yet Plinie giues little credit to all that is written of Greece, till the raigne of Cyrus, who beganne in the fiue and fiftieth Olympiad, as Euſebius out of Diodore, Caſtor, Polybius, and others hath gathered, in whoſe time the ſeuen wiſe Græcians flouriſhed. For Solon had ſpeech with Cræſus, and Cræſus was ouerthrowne and taken by Cyrus. Plin. l. 36. c. 4.

Many patient and piercing braines haue laboured to finde out the certaine beginning of theſe Olympiads, namely, to ſet them in the true yeare of the World, and the raigne of ſuch and ſuch Kings: but ſeeing they all differ in the firſt accompt, that is, of the Worlds yeare, they can hardly jumpe in particulars thereon depending.

Cyril againſt Iulian, and Didymus, beginne the Olympiads the nine and fortieth of Oſias, or Azariah.

Euſebius, who is contrarie to himſelfe in this reckoning, accompts with thoſe that finde the firſt Olympiad in the beginning of the foure hundreth and ſixth yeere after Troy, yet he telleth vs, that it was in the fiftieth yeare of Vzzia, which is (as I finde it) two yeares later. Euſeb. de Præp. Euang. l. 10. c. 3.

Eratoſthenes placeth the firſt Olympiad foure hundred and ſeuen yeares after Troy, reckoning the yeares that paſſed betweene; to whom Dionyſius Halicarnaſſæus, Diodorus Siculus, Solinus, and many others adhere. Eratoſth. apud Clem. Alex. Strom. l. 1.

The diſtance betweene the deſtruction of Troy, and the firſt Olympiad, is thus collected by Eratoſthenes. From the taking of Troy, to the deſcent of Hercules his Poſteritie into Peloponneſus, were foureſcore yeares; thence to the Ionian expedition, threeſcore yeares; from that expedition to the time of Lycurgus his gouernement in Sparta, one hundred fiftie nine; and thence to the firſt Olympiad, one hundred and eight yeares. In this account the firſt yeare of the firſt Olympiad is not included.

But vaine labour it were, to seeke the beginning of the Olympiads, by numbring the yeares from the taking of Troy, which is of a date farre more vncertaine. Let it suffice, that by knowing the instauration of these games, to haue beene in the foure hundreth and eight yeare current after Troy, we may reckon backe to the taking of that Citie, setting that, and other accidents, which haue reference thereto, in their proper times. The certaintie of things following the Olympiads, must teach vs how to finde when they began.

To this good vse, we haue the ensuing yeares, vnto the death of Alexander the Great, thus diuided, by the same Eratosthenes. From the beginning of the Olympiads, to the passage of Xerxes into Greece, two hundreth fourescore and seuenteen yeares; from thence to the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre, eight and fortie yeares; forwards to the victorie of Lysander, seuen and twentie; to the battaile of Leuctra, thirtie foure; to the death of Philip King of Macedon, fiue and thirtie; and finally to the death of Alexander, twelue. The whole summe ariseth to foure hundred fiftie and three yeares; which number he otherwise also collecteth, and it is allowed by the most.

Now for placing the institution of the Olympiads in the one and fiftieth yeare of Vzziah, we haue arguments, grounded vpon that which is certaine, concerning the beginning of Cyrus his raigne, and the death of Alexander; as also vpon the Astronomicall calculation of sundrie Eclipses of the Sunne, as of that which happened, when Xerxes set out of Sardis with his Armie to inuade Greece; and of diuers other.

Touching Cyrus, it is generally agreed that his raigne as King, before hee was Lord of the great Monarchie, began the first yeere of the fiue and fiftieth Olympiad, and that he raigned thirtie yeeres; they who giue him but twentie nine yeeres of raigne (following Herodotus rather than Tully, Iustine, Eusebius, and others) beginne a yeere later, which comes all to one reckoning. So is the death of Alexander set by all good Writers, in the first yeere of the hundreth and fourteenth Olympiad. This later note of Alexanders death, serues well to leade vs back to the beginning of Cyrus; as many the like obseruations doe. For if we reckon vpwards from the time of Alexander, we shall finde all to agree with the yeeres of the Olympiads, wherein Cyrus beganne his raigne, either as King, or (taking the word Monarch, to signifie a Lord of many Kingdomes) as a great Monarch. From the beginning of Cyrus, in the first yeere of the fiue and fiftieth Olympiad, vnto the end of the Persian Empire, which was in the third of the hundreth and twelfth Olympiad, we find two hundred and thirtie yeeres compleat: from the beginning of Cyrus his Monarchie, which lasted but seuen yeeres, we finde compleat two hundred and seuen yeeres, which was the continuance of the Persian Empire.

Now therefore seeing that the first yeere of Cyrus his Monarchie (which was the last of the sixtieth Olympiad, and the two hundreth and fortieth yeere from the institution of those games by Iphitus) followed the last of the seuentie yeeres, of the captiuitie of Iuda, and desolation of the Land of Israel; manifest it is, that wee must reckon backe those seuentie yeeres, and one hundred threescore and ten yeeres more, the last which passed vnder the Kings of Iuda, to finde the first of these Olympiads; which by this accompt is the one and fiftieth of Vzzia, as wee haue already noted.

The Eclipses whereof we made mention, serue well to the same purpose. For examples sake, that which was seene when Xerxes mustered his Armie at Sardis, in the two hundreth threescore and seuenth yeere of Nabonassar, being the last of the threescore and fourteenth Olympiad; leades vs backe vnto the beginning of Xerxes, and from him to Cyrus, whence we haue a faire way through the threescore and ten yeeres, vnto the destruction of Ierusalem; and so vpwards through the raignes of the last Kings of Iuda, to the one and fiftieth yeere of Vzzia.

Thus much may suffice, concerning the time wherein these Olympiads beganne.

To

To tell the great ſolemnitie of them, and with what exceeding great concourſe of all Greece they were celebrated, I hold it a ſuperfluous labour. It is enough to ſay, that all bodily exerciſes, or the moſt of them, were therein practiſed; as Running, Wraſtling, Fighting, and the like. Neither did they onely contend for the Maſtrie in thoſe feates, whereof there was good vſe, but in running of Chariots, fighting with Whorle-bats, and other the like ancient kinds of exerciſes, that ſerued onely for oſtentation. Thither alſo repaired Orators, Poets, Muſicians, and all that thought themſelues excellent in any laudable qualitie, to make triall of their skill. Yea the very Cryers, which proclaimed the victories, contended which of them ſhould get the honour, of hauing plaied the beſt part.

The Eleans were Preſidents of thoſe Games; whoſe juſtice, in pronouncing without partialitie, who did beſt, is highly commended. As for the rewards giuen to the Victors, they were none other than Garlands of Palme, or Oliue, without any other commoditie following, than the reputation. Indeede there needed no more. For that was held ſo much, that when Diagoras had ſeene his three Sonnes crowned for their ſeuerall victories in thoſe games, one came running to him with this gratulation: Morere, DIAGORAS, non enim in cælum aſcenſurus es; that is; Die, DIAGORAS, For thou ſhalt not clime vp to heauen: as if there could bee no greater happineſſe on earth, than what alreadie had befallen him. In the like ſenſe Horace ſpeakes of theſe Victors, calling them,

Such as like heauenly weights doe come
With an Elæan Garland home.

Neither was it only the voice of the People, or the ſongs of Poets, that ſo highly extolled them, which had wonne theſe Olympian prizes; but euen graue Hiſtorians thought it a matter worthie of their noting. Such was (as Tullie counts it) the vanitie of the Greekes, that they eſteemed it almoſt as great an honor, to haue wonne the victorie at Running or Wraſtling in thoſe games, as to haue triumphed in Rome for ſome famous victorie, or conqueſt of a Prouince. Tull. in Orat. pro Flacco.

That theſe Olympian games were celebrated at the full of the Moone, and vpon the fifteenth day of the Moneth Hecatombæon, which doth anſwere to our Iune; and what meanes they vſed to make the Moneth begin with the new Moone, that the fifteenth day might be the full; I haue ſhewed in another place. Wherefore I may now returne vnto the Kings of Iuda, and leaue the merrie Greekes at their games, whom I ſhall meete in more ſerious emploiments, when the Perſian quarrells draw the bodie of this Hiſtorie into the coaſts of Ionia and Helleſpont.

§. VI.

Of IOTHAM and his Contemporaries.

IOTHAM the Sonne of Vzziah, when hee was fiue and twentie yeeres old, and in the ſecond of Pekah King of Iſrael, was anointed King in Ieruſalem, his Father yet liuing. He built an exceeding high Gate to the Temple, of threeſcore cubits vpright, and therefore called Ophel: beſides diuers Cities in the Hills of Iuda, and in the Forreſts, Towers, and Palaces: he inforced the Ammonites to pay him Tribute, to wit, of Siluer an hundreth talents, and of Wheate and Barly two thouſand meaſures: hee raigned ſixe and twentie yeeres: of whom Ioſephus giues this teſtimonie: Eiuſmodi vero 2. Kings 15. 33.

Princeps hic fuit, vt nullum in eo virtutis genus desideres: vt qui Deum adeo pie coluerit, hominibus suis adeo iustè præfuerit, vrbem ipsam tantæ sibi curæ esse passus sit, & tantopere auxerit, vt vniuersum regnum hostibus quidem minimè contemnendum, domestitis autem eius incolis atque ciuibus fœlix, faustum & fortunatum sua virtute effecerit; This was such a Prince, as a man could finde no kinde of vertue wanting in him: hee worshipped God so religiously, hee gouerned his men so righteously, hee was so prouident for the Citie, and did so greatly amplifie it, that by his vertue and proweſſe hee made his whole Kingdome not contemptible to his enemies, but to his Seruants, Inhabitants and Citizens, prosperous and happie.

This is all that I finde of Iotham: his raigne was not long, but as happie in all things, as he himselfe was deuout and vertuous.

Auchomenes about this time succeeded Phelesteus in Corinth: after whom, the Corinthians erected Magistrates, which gouerned from yeere to yeere. And yet Pausanias in his second Booke, with Strabo and Plutarch, in many places are of opinion, That Corinth was gouerned by Kings of the race of the Bacidæ, to the time of Cypselus, who droue them out.

Teglathphalassar, or Tiglathpeleser, the sonne of Phul, the second of the Babylonians and Assyrians that was of this new race, about this time inuaded Israel, while Pekah (who murthered his Master Pekaiah) was King thereof. In which Expedition hee tooke most of the Cities of Nephtali and Galile, with those of Gilead, ouer Iordan, and carried the inhabitants captiue. This Tiglath raigned fiue and twentie yeeres, according to Metasthenes. But Krentzhemius findes, that with his sonne Salmanassar he raigned yet two yeeres longer: which yeeres I would not ascribe to the sonne, because the Aera of Nabonassar beginnes with his single raigne, but reckon them to Tighlath Phulassar himselfe, who therewith raigned seuen and twentie yeeres:

2. Kings 15.

Æschylus, the sonne of Agamnestor, about the same time, the twelfth Archon in Athens, ruled fiue and twentie yeeres. Alcamenes gouerned Sparta: after whom, the Estate changed, according to Eusebius: but therin surely Eusebius is mistaken. For Diodore, Plutarch, Pausanias, and others, witnesse the contrarie. Pausanias affirmeth, That Polydorus, a Prince of eminent vertues, succeeded his father, and raigned threescore yeeres, and out-liued the Messeniack Warre: which was ended by Theopompus, the sonne of Nicander, his royall companion.

Paus. l. 3.

At this time liued Nahum the Prophet, who fore-told the destruction of the Assyrian Empire, and of the Citie of Niniue; which succeeded (saith Iosephus) a hundred and fifteene yeeres after. The Cities of Cyrene and of Aradus were built at this time, while in Media, Sosarmus and Medidus raigned, being the second and third Kings of those parts.

§. VII.

Of ACHAZ and his Contemporaries.

ACHAS, or Achaz, succeeded vnto Iotham in the seuenteenth yeere of Peka, the sonne of Remalia: the same being also the last yeere of his fathers raigne, who began in the second of the same Peka, and raigned sixteene, but not complete yeeres. This Ahaz was an Idolater, exceeding all his predecessors. Hee made molten Images for Baalim, and burnt his sonne for sacrifice before the Idoll Moloch, or Saturne, which was represented by a man-like brazen bodie, bearing the head of a Calfe, set vp not farre from Ierusalem, in a Valley shaddowed with Woods, called Gehinnom, or Tophet, from whence the word Gehenna is vsed for Hell. The children offered, were inclosed within the carkasse of this Idoll, and as the fire encreased, so the sacrificers, with a noyse of Cymbals and other Instruments, filled the ayre, to the ende the pitifull cries of the children might might not be heard: which vnnaturall, cruell, and deuilliſh Oblation, Ieremie the Prophet vehemently reprehendeth, and of which S. Hierome vpon the tenth of Matthew hath written at large. By the prohibition in Leuiticus the eighteenth, it appeareth that this horrible ſinne was ancient: in the twelfth of Deuteronomie, it is called an abomination which God hateth. That it was alſo practiſed elſewhere, and by many Nations remote from Iudæa, diuers Authors witneſſe; as Virgil in the ſecond of his Æneids, — Sanguine placaſtis, &c. and Silius, — Poſcere cade Deos. Saturne is ſaid to haue brought this cuſtome into Italie, beſides the caſting of many ſoules into the Riuer of Tyber, in ſtead of which, Hercules commanded, that the waxen Images of men ſhould be throwne in and drowned. The Deuill alſo taught the Carthaginians this kinde of butcherie, in ſo much, that when their Citie was beſieged, and in diſtreſſe, the Prieſt made them beleeue, that becauſe they had ſpared their owne children, and had bought and brought vp others to bee offered, that therefore Saturne had ſtirred vp, and ſtrengthened their Enemies againſt them: whereupon they preſently cauſed two hundred of the nobleſt youths of their Citie to be ſlaine, and offered to Saturne or Satan, to appeaſe him: who beſides theſe forenamed Nations had inſtructed the Rhodians, the people of Crete, and Chios, of Meſſene, of Galatia, with the Maſſagets, and others, in theſe his ſeruices: Further, as if hee were not content to deſtroy the ſoules of many Nations in Europe, Aſia, and Africa, (as Acoſta writeth) the Mexicans and other people of America, were brought by the Deuill vnder this fearefull ſeruitude, in which he alſo holdeth the Floridans and Virginians at this day.

Acoſt. de Hiſt. nat. & mor. Ind.

For the wickedneſſe of this King Ahaz, God ſtirred vp Rezin of Damaſcus; and Pekah the Sonne of Remaliah, King of Iſrael againſt him, who inuaded Iudæa, and beſieged Ieruſalem, but entred it not.

The King of Syria, Rezin, poſſeſt himſelfe of Elah by the Red Sea, and caſt the Iewes out of it, and Pekah ſlaughtered in one day an hundred and twentie thouſand Iudæans, of the ableſt of the Kingdome, at which time Maaſeiah, the Sonne of Achaz was alſo ſlaine by Zichri, with Azrikam the Gouernour of his houſe: and Elcanath the ſecond perſon vnto the King. Beſides all this, two hundred thouſand priſoners of women and children, the Iſraelites led away to Samaria: but by the counſell of the Prophet Oded, they were returned and deliuered backe againe.

2.Chron.28.6.

As Iſrael and Aram vexed Iuda on the North; ſo the Edomites and the Philiſtims, who euermore attended the ruine of Iudæa, entred vpon them from the South; and tooke Bethſemes, Aialon, Gaderoth, Socho, Timnah, and Gemzo, ſlew many people, and carried away many priſoners. Whereupon when Achaz ſaw himſelfe enuironed on all ſides, and that his Idolls and dead gods gaue him no comfort, hee ſent to the Aſſyrian Tiglathpileſer, to deſire ſome aide from him againſt the Iſraelites and Aramites, preſenting him with the ſiluer and gold both of the Temple, and Kings Houſe.

2.King 16.

Tiglathpileſer wanted not a good example to follow, in making profit of the troubles that roſe in Paleſtina. His Father hauing lately made himſelfe from a Prouinciall Lieutenant, King of Babylon and Aſſyria, had a little before led him the way into Iudæa, inuited by Menahem, King of Iſrael. Wherefore now the Sonne willingly hatkened to Achaz, and embraced the aduantage. As for Belochus himſelfe, he was content to aſſigne ſome other time for going through with this enterpriſe: becauſe (as I haue ſaid before) he was not firmely ſettled at home, and the Syrian Kings lay directly in his way, who were yet ſtrong both in men and fame. But Tiglath, hauing now, with the treaſures of Ieruſalem, prepared his Armie, firſt inuaded the Territorie of Damaſcus, wanne the Citie, and killed Rezin, the laſt of the race of the Adads, who beganne with Dauid, and ended with this Achaz. At Damaſcus Achaz met Tiglath, and taking thence a patterne of the Altar, ſent it to Vriah the Prieſt, commanding the like to be made at Ieruſalem, whereon at his returne hee burnt Sacrifice to the Gods of the Syrians. In the meane while Tiglath poſſeſt all Baſan, and the reſt beyond Iordan, which belonged to the Tribe of Reuben, Gad, and Manasse. And then passing the Riuer, he mastered the Cities of Galilee, inuaded Ephraim, and the Kingdome of Israel, and made them his Vassalls. And notwithstanding that he was inuited and waged by Achaz, yet after the spoile of Israel, he possest himselfe of the greater part of Iuda, and as it seemeth, inforced Achaz to pay him Tribute. For in the second of Kings, the eighteenth, it is written of Ezechia, that he reuolted from Assur, or rebelled against him, and therefore was inuaded by Senacherib. After Ahaz had beheld and borne these miseries, in the end of the sixteenth yeere of his raigne hee died: but was not buried in the Sepulchers of the Kings of Iuda.

With Ahaz liued Medidus, the third Prince in Media, who gouerned fortie yeeres, 10
Euseb. in Chron. saith Eusebius: Diodorus and Ctesias finde Anticarmus in stead of this Medidus, to haue beene Sosarmus his Successour, to whom they giue fiftie yeeres.

Tiglath Phileser held the Kingdome of Assyria, all the raigne of Ahaz: yet so, that Salmanassar his Sonne may seeme to haue raigned with him some part of the time.
2. Kings 28.16. For we finde that Ahaz did send vnto the Kings of ASHVR to helpe him. The Geneua note saies, that these Kings of Assur were Teglath Pileser, and those Kings that were vnder his Dominion. But that hee or his Father had hitherto made such conquests, as might giue him the Lordship ouer other Kings, I doe neither finde any Historie, nor circumstance that proueth. Wherefore I thinke that these Kings of Assur, were Tiglath, and Salmanassar his Sonne, who raigned with his Father, as 20 hath beene said before: though how long hee raigned with his Father, it bee hard to define.

At this time beganne the Ephori in Lacedæmon, a hundred and thirtie yeeres after Plut. in vita Soli. Lycurgus, according to Plutarch. Eusebius makes their beginning farre later, namely, in the fifteenth Olympiad. Of these Ephori, Elalus was the first; Theopompus and Polydorus, being then joynt Kings. These Ephori, chosen euery yeere, were controllers, as well of their Senators as of their Kings, nothing being done without their aduice and consent. For (saith Cicero) they were opposed against their Kings, as the Roman Tribunes against the Consuls. In the time of Ahaz died Æschylus, who had ruled in Athens euer since the fiftith yeere of Vzzia. Alcamenon the thirteenth of the Medontidæ, or Gouernours of the Athenians (so called of Medon who followed Codrus) 30 succeeded his Father Æschylus, and was the last of these Gouernors: he ruled only two yeeres. For the Athenians changed first from Kings (after Codrus) to Gouernors for life; which ending in this Alcamenon, they erected a Magistrate, whom they termed an Archon, who was a kind of Burghomaster, or Gouernor of their City for ten yeeres.

This alteration Pausanias in his fourth Booke beginnes, in the first yeere of the eight Olympiad. Eusebius and Halicarnasseus in the first of the seuenth Olympiad: at which time indeed, Carops the first of these, began his ten yeeres rule.

The Kingdome of the Latines gouerned about three hundred yeere by the Syluij, of the race of Æneas, tooke ende the same Ahaz time: the foundation of Rome, being 40 laied by Romulus and Remus in the eight yeere of the same King. Codoman builds it the eleuenth of Achaz, Bucholzer in the eighth, as I think he should, others somewhat later, and in the raigne of Ezechias. Cicero, Eutropius, Orosius, and others, square the time of the foundation to the third yeere of the sixth Olympiad. But Halicarnassæus, Solinus Antiochenus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Eusebius, to the first yeere of the seuenth: who seeme not only to me, but to many very learned Chronologers, to haue kept herein the best accompt.

Of the Antiquities of Italie, and foundation of Rome in the time of AHAS.

§. I.

Of the old Inhabitants, and of the name of Italie.

AND here to ſpeake of the more ancient times of Italie, and what Nations poſſeſt it before the arriuall of Æneas, the place may ſeeme to inuite vs: the rather becauſe much fabulous matter hath beene mixed with the truth of thoſe elder plantations. Italie before the fall of Troy, was knowne to the Greekes by diuers names: as firſt Heſperia, then Auſonia, the one name ariſing of the Seate, the other of the Auſones, a people inhabiting part of it: one ancient name of it was alſo Oenotria, which it had of the Oenotri: whom Halicarnaſſæus thinks to haue been the firſt, that brought a Colonie of Arcadians into that Land. Afterward it was called Italie of Italus: concerning which changes of names, Virgil ſpeakes thus. Halicar. l. 1.

Eſt locus Heſperiam Graij cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens armis, atque vbere glebæ:
Oenotrij coluêre viri, nunc fama minores
Italiam dixiſſe, ducis de nomine, gentem.

There is a Land which Greekes Heſperia name,
Ancient, and ſtrong, of much fertilitie.
Oenotrians held it, but we heare by fame,
That by late ages of Poſteritie,
'Tis from a Captaines name called Italie.

Who this Captaine or King may haue beene, it is very vncertaine. For Virgil ſpeakes no more of him, and the opinions of others are many and repugnant. But like enough it is, that the name which hath continued ſo long vpon the whole Countrie, and worne out all other denominations, was not at the firſt accepted without good cauſe. Therefore to finde out the originall of this name, and the firſt planters of this noble Countrie, Reineccius hath made a very painful ſearch, and not improbable conjecture. And firſt of all he grounds vpon that of Halicarnaſſæus, who ſpeakes of a Colonie which the Eleans did leade into Italie, before the name of Italie was giuen to it: Secondly, vpon that of Iuſtine, who ſaith, that Brunduſium was a Colonie of the Ætolians: Thirdly, vpon that of Strabo, who affirmes the ſame of Temeſa or Tempſa, a Citie of the Brutij in Italie: Laſtly, vpon the authoritie of Plinie, who ſhewes that the Italians did inhabite onely one Region of the Land, whence afterward the name was deriued ouer all. Concerning that which is ſaid of the Eleans and Ætolians, who (as hee ſhewes) had one originall, from them hee brings the name of Italie. For the word Italia, differs in nothing from Aitolia, ſaue that the firſt Letter is caſt away, which in the Greeke words Halicarn. l. 1. Iuſt. l. 12. Strabo l. 6. Plin. l. 3. c. 5.

words is common, and the letter (o) is changed into (a) which change is found in the name of Æthalia an Iſland neere Italie, peopled by the Ætholians: and the like changes are very familiar in the Æolic Dialect; of which Dialect (being almoſt proper to the Ætolians) the accent and pronunciation, together with many words little altered, were retained by the Latines, as Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, Quintilian, and Priſcian the Grammarian teach. Hereunto appertaines that of Iulian the Apoſtata, who called the Greekes, couſins of the Latines. Alſo the common originall of the Greekes and Latines from Iauan; and the Fable of Ianus, whoſe Image had two faces, looking Eaſt and Weſt, as Greece and Italie lay, and was ſtamped on Coynes, with a Ship on the other ſide; all which is, by interpretation, referred to Iauan, father of the Greekes and Latines: who ſayling ouer the Ionian Sea, that lyes betweene Ætolia and the Weſterne parts of Greece and Italie, planted Colonies in both. Now whereas Reyneccius thinkes, that the names of Atlas and Italus belonged both to one man, and thereto applyes that of Beroſus, who called Cethim, Italus; though it may ſeeme ſtrengthened by the marriage of Dardanus, whileſt hee abode in Italie with Electra, the daughter of Atlas, yet is it by arguments (in my valuation) greater and ſtronger, eaſily diſproued. For they who make mention of Atlas, place him before the time of Moſes: and if Atlas were Cethim, or Kittim, then was he the ſonne of Iauan, and nephew of Iapheth, the eldeſt ſonne of Noah: which antiquity farre exceedes the name of Italie, that began after the departure of Hercules out of the Countrey, not long before the Warre of Troy.

Likewiſe Virgil, who ſpeakes of Atlas, and of Dardanus his marriage with Electra, hath nothing of his meeting with her in Italie; but calleth Electra and her ſiſter Maia (poetically) daughters of the Mountaine Atlas in Africa, naming Italus among the Kings of the Aborigenes; which he would not haue done, had Atlas and Italus beene one perſon.

As for the authoritie of Beroſus in this caſe, wee neede the leſſe to regard it, for that Reyneccius himſelfe, whoſe conjectures are more to be valued then the dreames wherewith Annius hath filled Beroſus, holds it but a figment.

That the name of Italie began long after Atlas, it appeares by the Verſes of Virgil laſt rehearſed, wherein hee would not haue ſaid, ——— Nunc fama minores Italiam dixiſſe ducis de nomine gentem, had that name beene heard of ere Dardanus left the Countrey. But ſeeing that, when Hercules, who died a few yeeres before the Warre of Troy, had left in Italie a Colonie of the Eleans (who in a manner were one and the ſame Nation with the Ætolians, as Strabo, Herodotus, and Pauſanias teach) then the name of Italie began: and ſeeing Virgil makes mention of Italus among the Italian Kings, it were no great boldneſſe to ſay, that Italus was Commander of theſe Eleans. For though I remember not, that I haue read of any ſuch Greeke as was named Italus; yet the name of Ætolus, written in Greeke Aitolus, was very famous both among the Ætolians, and among the Eleans, he being ſonne of a King of Elis, and founder of the Ætolian Kingdome. Neither is it more hard to deriue the name of Italus from Ætolus, then Italia from Ætolia. So may Virgils authoritie ſtand well with the collections of Reyneccius; the name of Italie being taken both from a Captaine, and from the Nation, of which he and his people were.

§. II.

§. II.

Of the Aborigines, and other Inhabitants of Latium, and of the reaſon of the names of Latini and Latium.

IN Italie the Latines and Hetrurians were moſt famous; the Hetrurians hauing held the greateſt part of it vnder their ſubjection; and the Latines by the vertue and felicitie of the Romans, who were a branch of them, ſubduing all Italie, and in few ages whatſoeuer Nation was knowne in Europe: together with all the Weſterne parts of Aſia, and North of Africk.

The Region called Latium, was firſt inhabited by the Aborigines, whom Halicarnaſſaus, Varro, and Reyneccius (following them) thinke to haue beene Arcadians: and this name of Aborigines (to omit other ſignifications that are ſtrained) imports as much as originall, or natiue of the place, which they poſſeſſed: which title the Arcadians are knowne in vaunting manner to haue alwaies vſurped, fetching their antiquitie from beyond the Moone; becauſe indeede, neither were the inhabitants of Peloponneſus inforced to forſake their ſeates ſo oft as other Greekes were, who dwelt without that halfe Iſland, neither had the Arcadians ſo vnſure a dwelling as the reſt of the Peloponneſians, becauſe their Countrie was leſſe fruitfull in land, mountainous, and hard of acceſſe, and they themſelues (as in ſuch places commonly are found) very warlike men. Some of theſe therefore hauing occupied a great part of Latium, and held it long, did according to the Arcadian manner, ſtile themſelues Aborigines, in that language, which either their new Seate, or their Neighbours thereby had taught them. How it might bee that the Arcadians who dwelt ſomewhat farre from Sea, and are alwaies noted as vnapt men to proue good Mariners, ſhould haue beene Authors of new diſcoueries, were a queſtion not eaſie to be anſwered, were it not ſo, that both fruitfulneſſe of children, in which thoſe ages abounded, inforceth the ſuperfluous companie to ſeeke another ſeat, and that ſome expeditions of the Arcadians, as eſpecially that of Euander, into the ſame parts of Italie, are generally acknowledged.

After the Aborigines, were the Pelaſgi, an ancient Nation, who ſometimes gaue name to al Grecce: but their antiquities are long ſince dead, for lack of good records. Neither was their glorie ſuch in Italie, as could long ſuſtaine the name of their owne Tribe; for they were in ſhort ſpace accounted one people with the former inhabitants. The Sicani, Auſones, Aurunci, Rutili, and other people, did in ages following diſturbe the peace of Latium, which by Saturne was brought to ſome ciuilitie; and he therefore canonized as a god.

This Saturne S. Auguſtine calleth Sterces or Sterculius, others terme him Stercutius, and ſay, that hee taught the people to dung their grounds. That Latium tooke his name of Saturne, becauſe he did latere, that is, lie hidden there, when he fled from Iupiter, it is a queſtionleſſe fable. For as in Heatheniſh ſuperſtition, it was great vanitie to thinke that any thing could be hidden from God, or that there were many gods of whom one fled from another; ſo in the truth of Hiſtorie, it is well knowne, that no King raigning in thoſe parts was ſo mightie, that it ſhould be hard to finde one Countrie or an other, wherein a man might be ſafe from his purſuit. And yet, as moſt fables and poeticall fictions, were occaſioned by ſome ancient truth, which either by ambiguitie of ſpeech or ſome alluſion, they did maimedly and darkly expreſſe (for ſo they fained a paſſage ouer a Riuer in Hell, becauſe death is a paſſage to another life, and becauſe this paſſage is hatefull, lamentable, and painefull, therefore they named the Riuer Styx of Hate, Cocytus of Lamentation, and Acheron of Paine: ſo alſo becauſe men are ſtonie-hearted, and becauſe the Greeke λαὸς people, and χᾶις ſtones, are neere in ſound, therefore they fained in the time of Deucalion ſtones conuerted into men, as at other times men into ſtones) in like manner it may be, that the originall of Saturnes hiding himselfe, was some allusion to that old opi-

Acts 17.23. nion of the wisest of the Heathen, that the true God was ignotus Deus, as it is noted Esay 45.15. in the Acts; whence also Esay of the true God saies, Tu Deus abdens te. For it can not be in vaine, that the word Saturnus should also haue this very signification, if it bee deriued (as some thinke) from the Hebrew Satar, which is to hide: Howbeit I denie not, but that the original of this word, Latium, ought rather to be sought elsewhere.

Reyneccius doth conjecture that the Ceteans, who descended of Cethim, the Sonne of Iauan, were the men who gaue the name to Latium. For these Ceteans are remembred by Homer as aiders of the Troians in their Warre. Strabo interpreting the place of Homer, calls them subjects to the Crowne of Troy. Hereupon Reyneccius gathers, that their abode was in Asia: viz. in agro Elattico; in the Elattian Territorie, which agreeth with Strabo. Of a Citie which the Æolians held in Asia, called Elæa, or Elaia, Pausanias makes mention: Stephanus calls it Cidæmis, or (according to the Greeke writing) Cidamis, which name last rehearsed hath a very neere sound to Cethim, Citim, or Cithim; the Greeke Letter (D) hauing (as many teach) a pronunciation very like to (TH) differing onely in the strength or weakenesse of vtterance, which is found betweene many English words written with the same letters. Wherefore that these Ceteans being descended of Cethim, Cittim, or Kittim, the Sonne of Iauan, who was Progenitor of the Greekes, might very well take a denomination from the Citie, and Region, which they inhabited, and from thence be called Elaites, or Elaites, it is very likely, considering that among the Arcadians, Phocians, Ætolians, and Eleans, who all were of the Æolique Tribe, are found the names of the Mountaine Elæus, the Hauen Eleas, the people Elaitæ, the Cities Eleus, Elaia, and Elateia, of which last it were somewhat harsh in the Latine tongue to call the Inhabitants by any other name then Elatini, from whence Latini may come. Now whereas both the Cetæi and Arcadians, had their originall from Cethim, it is nothing vnlikely, that agreeing in language and similitude of names, they might neuertheless differ in sound and pronunciation of one and the same word. So that as he is by many called Sabinus, to whom some (deriuing the Sabines from him) giue the name of Sabus: in the like manner might he whom the Arcadians would call Elatus (of which name they had a Prince that founded the Citie Elateia) bee named of the Ceteans Latinus. Reyneccius pursuing this likelihood, thinks, that when Eurypilus, Lord of the Ceteans, being the Sonne of Telephus, whom Hercules begat vpon Auge, the Daughter of Aleus King of Arcadia, was slaine by Achilles in the Troian Warre: then did Telephus, brother to Euripylus, conduct the Ceteans; who (fearing what euill might befall themselues by the Greekes, if the affaires of Troy should goe ill) passed into that part of Italie, where the Arcadians were planted by Oenotrus. And Reyneccius farther thinks, that Telephus being the more gracious among the Oenotrian Arcadians, by the memorie of his Grand-mother Auge, an Arcadian Ladie, was well contented to take an Arcadian name, and to be called Elatus, which in the dialect and pronunciation either of the Ceteans, or of the Oenotrians, was first Elatinus, and then Latinus: That this name of Elatus may haue been taken or imposed by the Arcadians, it is the more easie to be thought, for that there were then two Families, the one of Aphidas, the other of Elatus, who were Sonnes of Arcas King of Arcadia, which gaue name to the Countrie: and betweene these two Families the succession in that Kingdome did passe, almost enterchangeably for many ages, till at the end of the Troian warre it fell into the hand of Hippotheus of the race of Elatus, in whose Posteritie it continued vntill the last. Againe, the name Latinus, hauing a deriuatiue sound, agrees the better with the supposition of such an accident. This is the conjecture of Reyneccius, which if he made ouer-boldly, yet others may follow it with the lesse reproofe, considering that it is not easie to finde either an apparent truth, or faire probabilitie among these disagreeing Authors, which haue written the originals of Latium.

§. III.

§. III.

Of the ancient Kings of the Latines vntill ÆNEAS his comming.

THe Kings which raigned in Latium before the arriual of Æneas, were, Saturnus, Picus, Faunus, and Latinus. Of Saturne there is nothing remembred, saue what is mentioned alreadie, and many fables of the Greekes, which whether they be appliable to this man, it is for him to judge, who shall be able to determine, whether this were the Saturne of the Greekes, called by them Κρόνος, or some other, stiled Saturne by the Aborigines. For the age wherein hee liued, may very well admit him to haue beene the same: but the names of * Sterces, and Stercutius (for it may be, this name was not borrowed from the skill which hee taught the people, but rather the soile which they laied on their grounds, had that appellation from him) doe rather make him seeme some other man.

Of Picus it is said, that he was a good Horse-man. The fable of his being changed into a Bird, which we call a Pie, may well seeme (as it is interpreted) to haue growne from the skill which he had in sooth-saying, or diuination, by the flight and chattering of Fowles. Faunus, the Sonne of Picus, raigned after his Father. Hee gaue to Euander the Arcadian (who hauing slaine by mischance his Father Echemus King of Arcadia, fled into Italie) the waste grounds on which Rome was afterward built.

Fauna, called Fatua, the sister of Faunus, was also his Wife, as all Historians agree; shee was held a Propheteesse, and highly commended for her chastitie; which praise in her must needs haue beene much blemished by her marriage, it selfe being meerely incestuous.

It is not mentioned that Faunus had by his sister any child, neither doe we reade of any other Wife which he had, saue only that Virgil giues vnto him Latinus as his Sonne, by a Nymph, called Marica.

But who this Marica was it is not found, saue onely that her abode was about the Riuer Liris neere Minturnæ.

Of the name Latinus, there are by Pomponius Sabinus recounted foure: one, the Sonne of Faunus, another of Hercules, a third of Vlysses by Circe, the fourth of Telemachus. Suidas takes notice onely of the second, of whom hee saith, that his name was Telephus, and the people anciently named the Cetij, were from his surname called Latini. This agrees in effect with the opinion of Reyneccius, the difference consisting almost in this only, that Suidas calls Telephus, the Sonne of Hercules, whereas Reyneccius makes him his Nephew, by a sonne of the same name. This Latinus hauing obtained the succession in that Kingdome after Faunus, did promise his only Daughter and Heire Lauinia, to Turnus the sonne of Venilia, who was sister to Amata Latinus his Wife.

But when Æneas arriued in those parts with fifteene ships, or perhaps fewer, wherein might bee imbarked according to the rate which Thucydides allowes to the Vessells then vsed, about one thousand & two hundred men: then Latinus finding that it would stand best with his assurance, to make alliance with the Troian, and moued with the great reputation of Æneas, which himselfe had heard of in the Warre of Troy, gaue his Daughter to him, breaking off the former appointment with Turnus, who incensed herewith, sought to auenge himselfe by warre: which was soone ended with his owne death.

Of Amata the Wife of Latinus, it is very certaine, that were shee an Italian, shee could not haue borne a Daughter marriageable at the arriuall of Æneas; vnlesse we should wholly follow Suidas, and rather giue the conduct of the Cetei into Italie, to Telephus the Father, than to his Sonne, who serued in the last yeere of the Troian Warre. But Reyneccius holds her an Asiatique, and thinkes withall, that Lauinia was borne

* Ezekiel often cals the Idols of the heathen deos stercoreos: and hence it may be that in the Euangelist wee reade for Belzebub, Belzebul, which is interpreted Dominus Stercoreus: and it may be that after that Saturne became the name of an Idol, it pleased God that in a like sense this name Stercutius should sticke vnto him. Aeneid. 7.

Suidas in the word Latini.

borne before Telephus came into Italie. That this name Amata, by which Virgil and Haliearnassæus call her, was not proper, but rather a surname, it may seeme by Varro; who calleth her Palatia: which name very well might bee deriued from the Greeke name Pallas. Amata, which signifieth beloued, or deare, was the name by which the High Priest called euery Virgin, whom hee tooke to serue as a Nunne of Vesta; wherefore it is the more easily to be thought a surname, howsoeuer Virgil discourse of her and Venilia her sister.

Lauinia, the daughter of Latinus, being giuen in marriage to Æneas, the Kingdome of Latium, or the greatest part of that Countrie, was established in that race: wherin it continued vntill it was ouer-growne by the might and greatnesse of the Romans.

§. IIII.

Of ÆNEAS, and of the Kings and Gouernours of Alba.

ÆNEAS himselfe being of the royall bloud of Troy, had the commaund of the Dardanians: hee was a valiant man, very rich, and highly honoured among the Troians. By his wife Creusa, the daughter of Priamus, hee had a sonne called Ascanius; whose surname vvas Iulus, hauing before the ruine of Troy (as Virgil notes) beene surnamed Ilus. But when Æneas vvas dead, his wife Lauinia, the daughter of Latinus, being great with child by him, and fearing the power of this Ascanius, fled into the Woods, where she was deliuered of a sonne, called therevpon Syluius, and surnamed Posthumus, because hee was borne after his fathers Funerall. This flight of Lauinia was so euill taken by the people, that Ascanius procured her returne, entreated her honourably, and vsing her as a Queene, did foster her young sonne, his halfe-brother Syluius. Yet afterwards, whether to auoid all occasions of disagreement, or delighted with the situation of the place; Ascanius leauing to his mother in law the Citie Lauinium, which Æneas had built, and called after his new wiues name, founded the Citie Alba Longa, and therein raigned. The time of his raigne was, according to some, eight and twentie yeeres: Virgil giues him thirtie; others fiue and thirtie, and eight and thirtie. After his decease, there arose contention betweene Syluius, the sonne of Æneas, and Iulus the sonne of Ascanius, about the Kingdome: but the people inclining to the sonne of Lauinia, Iulus was contented to hold the Priesthood, which he and his race enjoyed, leauing the Kingdome to Syluius Posthumus, whose posteritie were afterward called Syluij.

The raigne of the Alban Kings, with the continuance of each mans raigne, I finde thus set downe.

The

The moſt of theſe Kings liued in peace, and did little or nothing worthie of remembrance.

Latinus founded many Townes in the borders of Latium: who ſtanding much vpon the honour of their originall, grew thereby to be called Priſci Latini. Of Tiberinus ſome thinke that the Riuer Tiber had name, being formerly called Albula: but Virgil giues it that denomination of another called Tibris, before the comming of Æneas into Italie. The Mountaine Auentinus had name (as many write) from Auentinus King of the Albanes, who was buried therein: but Virgil hath it otherwiſe. Iulus, the brother of Auentinus, is named by Euſebius as father of another Iulius, and grandfather of Iulius Proculus; who leauing Alba, dwelt with Romulus in Rome. Numitor, the elder ſonne of Procas, was depriued of the Kingdome by his brother Amulius; by whom alſo his ſonne Ægeſthus was ſlaine, and Ilia his daughter made a Nunne of Veſta, that thereby the iſſue of Numitor might be cut off. But ſhe conceiued two ſonnes, eyther by her vncle Amulius, as ſome thinke; or by Mars, as the Poets faine; or perhaps by ſome man of warre. Both the children their vncle commanded to be drowned, and the mother buried quicke, according to the Law; which ſo ordained, when the Veſtall Virgins brake their chaſtitie. Whether it was ſo, that the mother was pardoned at the entreatie of Antho, the daughter of Amulius, or puniſhed as the Law required (for Authors herein doe varie) it is agreed by all, that the two children were preſerued, who afterward reuenged the crueltie of their vncle, with the ſlaughter of him and all his, and reſtored Numitor their grandfather to the Kingdome: wherein how long hee raigned, I find not, neyther is it greatly materiall to know; for as much as the Eſtates of Alba and of Latium were preſently eclipſed by the ſwift increaſe of Rome; vpon which the computation of Time following (as farre as concernes the things of Italie) is dependant. After the death of Numitor, the Kingdome of Alba ceaſed; for Numitor left no male iſſue. Romulus choſe rather to liue in Rome; and of the Line of Syluius none elſe remained. So the Albanes were gouerned by Magiſtrates; of whom onely two Dictators are mentioned, namely Caius Cluilius, who in the dayes of Tullus Hoſtilius, King of the Romanes, making Warre vpon Rome, dyed in the Campe; and Metius Suffetius, the ſucceſſor of Cluilius, who ſurrendred the Eſtate of Alba vnto the Romanes, hauing committed the hazard of both Signories to the ſucceſſe of three men of each ſide, who decided the quarrell by Combat: in which, the three brethren Horatij, the Champions of the Romanes, preuailed againſt the Curiatij, Champions of the Albanes. After this Combat, when Metius (following Tullus Hoſtilius with the Albane forces againſt the Veientes and Fidenates) withdrew his Companies out of the battaile, hoping thereby to leaue the Romanes to ſuch an ouerthrow, as might make them weak enough for the Albanes to deale with Tullus, who notwithſtanding this falſehood, obtained the victorie, did reward Metius with a cruell death, cauſing him to be tyed to two Chariots, and ſo torne in pieces. Then was Alba deſtroyed and the Citizens carried to Rome, where they were made free Denizens, the noble Families being made Patritians; among which were the Iulij: of whom C. Iulius Ceſar being deſcended, not onely gloried in his ancient, royall, and forgotten pedegree, in full aſſembly of the Romanes, then gouerned by a free Eſtate of the People: but by his rare induſtrie, valour, and judgement, obtained the Soueraignetie of the Roman Empire (much by him enlarged) to himſelfe and his poſteritie; whereby the name of Æneas, and honour of the Troian and Alban Race, was ſo reuiued, that ſeldome, if euer, any one Family hath attained to a proportionable height of glorie.

§. V.

Of the beginning of Rome, and of ROMVLVS birth and death.

OF Rome, which deuoured the Alban Kingdome, I may here best shew the beginnings, which (though somewhat vncertaine) depend much vpon the birth and education of Romulus, the grand-child of Numitor, the last that raigned in Alba. For how not onely the bordering people, but all Nations betweene Euphrates and the Ocean were broken in peeces by the yron teeth of this fourth Beast, it is not to bee described in one place, hauing beene the worke of many Ages; whereof I now doe handle onely the first, as incident vnto the discourse preceding. Q. Fabius Pictor, Portius Cato, Calphurnius Piso, Sempronius, and others, seeke to deriue the Romans from Ianus: but Herodotus, Marsylus, and many others of equall credit, giue the Grecians for their ancestors: and as Strabo reporteth in his fifth Booke; CAECILIVS rerum Romanorum Scriptor eo argumento colligit, Romam a Græcis esse conditam, quod Romani Græco ritu, antiquo instituto HERCVLI rem sacram faciunt, matrem quoque EVANDRI venerantur Romani; CAECILIVS (saith he) a Romane Historiographer, doth by this argument gather, that Rome was built by the Greekes, because the Romanes, after Greekish fashion, by ancient Ordinance doe sacrifice to HERCVLES: the Romanes also worship the mother of EVANDER. Plutarch in the life of Romulus remembers many founders of that Citie: as Romanus the sonne of Vlysses and Circe; Romus the sonne of Emathion, whom Diomedes sent thither from Troy; or that one Romus, a Tyrant of the Latines, who draue the Tuscans out of that Countrey, built it. Solinus bestowes the honour of building Rome vpon Euander, saying; That it was beforetimes called Valentia. Heraclides giues the denomination to a captiue Ladie, brought thither by the Grecians: others say, That it was anciently called Febrù, after the name of Februa, the mother of Mars; witnesse Saint Augustine in his third Booke de Ciuitate Dei. But Liuie will haue it to be the worke of Romulus, euen from the foundation: of whom and his consorts Iuuenal to a Roman Citizen vaunting of their originall, answered in these Verses:

Attamen vt longe repetas, longeq; reuoluas
Maiorum quisquis primus fuit ille tuorum,
Aut pastor fuit, aut illud quod dicere nolo.

Yet though thou fetch thy pedegree so farre;
Thy first Progenitor, who ere he were,
Some Shepheard was, or else, that Ile forbeare.
meaning eyther a Shepheard, or a Theefe.

Strab. l. 5. fol. 159

Now of Romulus begetting, of his education and preseruation, it is said, That he had Rhea for his mother, and Mars was supposed to be his father; that he was nurst by a Wolfe, found and taken away by Faustula, a Shepheards wife. The same vnnaturall nursing had Cyrus, the same incredible fostering had Semiramis; the one by a Bitch, the other by Birds. But, as Plutarch sayth, it is like enough that Amulius came couered with armour to Rhea, the mother of Romulus, when he begat her with child: and therein it seemeth to mee that hee might haue two purposes; the one, to destroy her, because she was the daughter and heire of his elder brother, from whom he injuriously held the Kingdome; the other to satisfie his appetite, because shee was faire and goodly. For shee being made a Nunne of the Goddesse Vesta, it was death in her, by the Law, to breake her chastitie. I also find in Fauchet his Antiquitez de Gaule, that Meroueë, King of the Francs, was begotten by a Monster of the Sea: but Fauchet sayes, Let them beleeue it that list; Il le croira qui voudra:

also of Alexander, and of Scipio African, there are poeticall inuentions: but to answere these imaginations in generall, it is true, that in those times, when the World was full of this barbarous Idolatrie, and when there were as many gods as there were Kings, or passions of the minde, or as there were of vices and vertues; then did many women greatly borne, couer such slips as they made, by protesting to bee forced by more then humane power: so did Oenone confesse to Paris, that shee had beene rauished by Apollo. And Anchyses boasted that hee had knowne Venus. But Rhea was made with childe by some man of Warre, or other, and therefore called Mars, the God of battell, according to the sense of the time. Oenone was ouercome by a strong wit, and by such a one as had those properties ascribed to Apollo. The Mother of Merouée might fancie a Sea-Captaine to be gotten with yong by such a one: as the Daughter of Inachus fancied, according to Herodotus. Æneas was a bastard and begotten vpon some faire Harlot, called for her beautie Venus, and was therefore the child of lust, which is Venus. Romulus was nurst by a Wolfe, which was Lupa, or Lupina, for the Curtesans in those dayes were called Wolfes, quæ nunc (sayth HALICARNASSAEVS) honestiori vocabulo amicæ appellantur; Which are now by an honester name called friends. It is also written, that Romulus was in the end of his life taken vp into heauen, or rather out of the world by his Father Mars, in a great storme of thunder, and lightning: so was it said that Æneas vanished away by the Riuer Numicus: but thereof Liuie also speaketh modestly; for he rehearseth the other opinion, that the storme was the furie of the Senatours, but seemeth to adhere partially to this taking vp; and many Authours agree, that there was an vnnaturall darkenesse, both at his birth and at his death, and that hee might bee slaine by thunder or lightning, it is not vnlikely. For the Emperour Anastasius was slaine with lightning, so was Strabo the Father of Pompey slaine with a thunder-bolt: so Carus the Emperour (who succeeded Probus) whilest he lodged with his Armie vpon the Riuer Tigris, was there slaine with lightning. But a Mars of the same kinde might end him that began him; for he was begotten by a man of warre, and by violence destroyed. And that he dyed by violence (which destinie followed most of the Roman Emperours) it appeareth by Tarquinius Superbus: who was but the seuenth King after him: who when hee had murthered his Father-in-law, commanded that hee should not bee buried, for (said he) Romulus himselfe dyed and was not buried. But let Halicarnassæus end this dispute; whose words are these: They (sayth he) who draw neerest to the truth, say that he was slaine by his owne Citizens; and that his crueltie in punishments of offendors, together with his arrogancie, were the cause of his slaughter. For it is reported, that both when his mother was rauished, whether by some man, or by a God, the whole body of the Sunne was eclipsed, and all the earth couered with darkenesse like vnto night, and that the same did happen at his death.

Such were the birth and death of Romulus: whose life historified by Plutarch, doth containe (besides what is here alreadie spoken of him) the conquest of a few myles which had soone beene forgotten, if the Roman greatnesse built vpon that foundation, had not giuen it memorie in all ages following, euen vnto this day. A valiant man hee was, very strong of bodie, patient of trauell, and temperate in dyet, as forbearing the vse of wine and delicacies: but his raging ambition he knew not how to temper, which caused him to slay his brother, and neglect reuenge of the death of Tatius, his companion in the Kingdome, that he himselfe might be Lord alone in those narrow Territories. He raigned seuen and thirtie yeeres: first alone, then with Tatius, and after his death single, till he was slaine, as is alreadie shewed: after which time the Soueraigntie fell into the hands of Numa, a man to him vnknowne, and more Priest-like than King-like: wherein Rome it selfe in her later times hath somewhat resembled this King. For hauing long beene sole Gouernesse till Constantinople shared with her: afterwardes, when as the Greeke Emperour was crushed by forraine enemies, and the Latines dispoyled of Imperiall power, she fell into the subjection of a Prelate, swelling by degrees from the Sheepe-hooke to the Sword, & therewith victorious to excessiue magnificence, from whence by the same degrees it fell, being driuen from luxurie to defensiue armes, and therein hauing bin vnfortunate, at length betakes her selfe againe to the Crosiers staffe.

And thus much of Rome in this place by occasion of the Storie of the times of King Ahaz, during whose raigne in Iurie, the foundations of this famous Citie were laied.

CHAP. XXV.

Of EZEKIA, and his Contemporaries:

§. I.

Of the beginning of EZECHIAS, and of the agreeing of PTOLOMIES, NABONASSAR, NABOPOLASSAR and MARDOCEMPADVS, with the historie of the Bible.

AS the first yeere of Ahaz his Raigne was confounded with the last of his father Iotham, so was the later end of his sixteene yeeres taken vp in the three first of Ezekias his Sonne. This appeares by the Raigne of Hosea, ouer Israel, which beganne in the twelfth of Ahaz, and therefore the third thereof was concurrent with Ahaz his foureteenth. But the third of Hosea was the first of Ezekia; so it followes, that Ezekia beganne to raigne in his Fathers foureteenth yeere. Like enough it is, that the third yeere of Hosea, the same being the fourteenth of Ahaz, was almost spent when Ezekia beganne, and so the fifteenth yeere of Ahaz may haue beene concurrent, for the most part, with the first of Ezekia.

By supposing that Hosea beganne his Kingdome, when the twelfth yeere of Ahaz was almost compleat, some would find the meanes how to disioyne the first of Hezekia from the fifteenth of Ahaz, placing him yet one yeere later, of which yeere, Ahaz may perhaps haue liued not many dayes. But seeing that the foureteenth and fifteenth yeeres of Ezekia, may not be remoued out of their places; it is vaine labour to alter the first yeere.

2. King. 8. 13. In the foureteenth of EZEKIA, SENACHERIB inuading Iuda, and the Countries adjoyning, lost his Armie by a miraculous stroke from Heauen, fled home, and was slaine. The yeere following it was that God added fifteene yeeres to the life of Ezekia, when he had alreadie raigned fourteene of his nine and twentie: and the same yeere was that miracle seene of the Sunnes going backe; of which wonder (as I heare) one Bartholomew Scultet, who is much commended for skill in Astronomie, hath by calculation found the very day which answered vnto the twentie fifth of April, in the Iulian yeere, being then Thursday. I haue not seene any workes of Scultet; but surely to find a motion so irregular and miraculous, it is necessarie that he produce some record of obseruation made at such a time. Howsoeuer it bee, the fifteenth yeere of Ezekia is agreed vpon; and therefore wee may not alter the first.

3. Chron. 28. 27. As for that saying, which is vsuall in the like cases, that AHAZ slept with his Fathers, and EZEKIA his Sonne raigned in his stead, it doth no more proue that Ezekia raigned not with his Father, than the like saying doth inferre the like at the death of Iehosaphat, Saphat, and succession of Iehoram; whereof, as concerning the beginning of the Sonne to raigne whilest his Father liued, we haue alreadie said enough.

Of this godly King Ezekias, we finde, that his very beginning testified his deuotion and zeale. For whether it were so, that his vnfortunate and vngracious Father (who had out-worne his reputation) gaue way to his Sonnes proceedings, which perhaps it lay not in him to hinder; or whether (as I rather thinke) the first yeere and first moneth of his raigne, wherein Ezekias opened the doores of the Temple, were to be vnderstood as the beginning of his sole gouernement; we plainely finde it to haue beene his first worke, that he opened the doores of the house of the Lord, which Achaz had shut vp, cleansed the Citie and Kingdome of the Idols, restored the Priests to their offices, and estates, commanded the Sacrifices to bee offered which had beene for many yeeres neglected, and brake downe the brasen Serpent of Moses, because the people burnt incense before it, and he called it Nehushtan, which signifieth a lumpe of brasse. He did also celebrate the Passe-ouer with great magnificence, inuiting thereunto the Israelites of the ten Tribes: many there were, euen out of those Tribes, that came vp to Ierusalem, to this feast. But the generall multitude of Israel did laugh the Messengers of Ezekia to scorne. 2.*Chro.*29.*v.*3. 2.*Chron.*30. 2.*Kings*18.

It was not long ere they that scorned to solemnize the memoriall of their deliuerance out of the Ægyptian seruitude, fell into a new seruitude, out of which they neuer were deliuered. For in the fourth of Ezekia his raigne, Salmanassar the Sonne of Tiglath, the Sonne of Belochus, hearing that Hosea King of Israel had practised with Soe King of Ægypt, against him, inuaded Israel, besieged Samaria, and in the third yeare (after the Inhabitants had endured all sorts of miseries) forced it, and carried thence the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Assyria and Media: among whom Tobias and his Sonne of the same name, with Anna his Wife, were sent to Niniue, in whose Seates and Places the Assyrians sent strangers of other Nations, and among them many of the ancient Enemies of the Israelites, as those of Cutha, Ana, Hamah, and Sphernaim, besides Babylonians: whose Places and Nations I haue formerly described in the Treatise of the Holy Land.

These later Assyrian Kings, and the Persians, which followed them, are the first, of whom wee finde mention made both in Prophane and Sacred bookes. These therefore serue most aptly to joyne the times of the old World, (whereof none but the Prophets haue written otherwise than fabulously) with the Ages following that were better knowne, and described in course of Historie. True it is, that of Cyrus and some other Persians, we finde in the Bible the same names by which other Authors haue recorded them: but of Phul and Salmanassar, with other Assyrian, Chaldæan Kings, diuersitie of name hath bred question of the persons. Therefore, whereas the Scriptures doe speake of Salmanassar, King of Assur, who raigned in the time of Ahaz, and Ezekia, Kings of Iuda, and of Hosea King of Israel, whom he carried into captiuitie: and wheras Ptolomie makes mention of Nabonassar, speaking precisely of the time wherein he liued; it is very pertinent to shew, that Salmanassar and Nabonassar were one and the same man. The like reason also requireth, that it bee shewed of Nebuchadnezzar, that hee was the same, whom Ptolomie calleth Nabopolassar.

Of both these points Bucholerus hath well collected sufficient proofe from the exact calculations of sundrie good Mathematicians. For by them it appeares, that betweene Nabonassar and the birth of Christ, there passed seuen hundred fortie and sixe yeares: at which distance of time the raigne of Salmanassar was. One great proofe hereof is this, which the same Bucholerus alleageth out of Erasmus Reinholdus, in the Prutenick Tables. Mardocempadus King of Babylon (whom Ptolomie, speaking of three Eclipses of the Moone, which were in his time, doth mention) was the same whom the Scriptures cal Merodach, who sent Embassadors to Hezekia, King of Iuda. So that if wee reckon backwards to the difference of time, betweene Merodach and Salmanassar, we shall finde it the same which is betweene Mardocempadus and Nabo- nassar. Likewise Functius doth shew, that whereas from the destruction of Samaria, to the deuastation of Ierusalem, in the nineteenth of Nebuchadnessar, we collect out of the Scriptures, the distance of one hundred thirtie and three yeeres: the selfe-same distance of time is found in Ptolomie, betweene Nabonassar and Nabopolassar. For, whereas Ptolomie seemes to differ from this accompt, making Nabonassar more ancient by an hundred and fortie yeeres, than the destruction of Ierusalem, wee are to vnderstand that he took Samaria in the eighth yeere of his raigne; so that the seuen foregoing yeeres added to these one hundred thirty and three, make the accompts of the Scriptures fall euen with that of Ptolomie. Ptolomies computation is, that from the first of Nabonassar, to the fifth of Nabopolassar, there passed one hundred twentie and seuen yeeres. Now if wee adde to these one hundred twentie seuen, the thirteene ensuing of Nabuchadnessars yeeres, before the Citie and Temple were destroied, we haue the summe of one hundred and fortie yeeres. In so plaine a case more proofes are needlesse, though many are brought, of which this may serue for all, that Ptolomie placeth the first of Nabopolassar one hundred twentie and two yeeres, after the first of Nabonassar, which agreeth exactly with the Scriptures. To these notes are added the consent of all Mathematicians: which in accompt of times I hold more sure than the authoritie of any Historie; and therefore I thinke it follie to make doubt, whereas Historians and Mathematicall obseruations doe so throughly concurre.

Yet forasmuch as that argument of the learned Scaliger doth rest vnanswered, whereby he proued Baladan the Father of Merodach, to haue beene this Nabonassar, I will not spare to loose a word or two in giuing the Reader satisfaction herein. It is true, that the next obseruations of the heauenly Bodies, which Ptolomie recorded, after the time of Nabonassar, were in the raigne of Mardocempadus; the second yeere of whose raigne is, according to Ptolomie, concurrent in part with the twentie seuen of Nabonassar. For the second of three ancient Eclipses which hee calculates, being in the second yeare of Mardocempadus, was from the beginning of Nabonassar twentie seuen yeeres, seuenteene daies, and eleuen houres: the accompt from Nabonassar, beginning at high-noone the first day of the Ægyptian moneth Thot, then answering to the twentie sixt of Februarie; and this Eclipse being fiftie minutes before mid-night, on the eighteenth day of that Moneth, when the first day thereof agreed with the nineteenth of Februarie; so that the difference of time betweene the two Kings Nabonassar and Mardocempadus, is noted by Ptolomie, according to the Ægyptian yeeres. But how does this proue, that Mardocempadus or Merodach, was the Sonne of Nabonassar? yea, how doth it proue, that he was his next Successor, or any way of his Linage? It was enough to satisfie me, in this argument, that Scaliger himselfe did afterwards beleeue Mardocempadus to haue beene rather the Nephew, than the Sonne of Baladan, or Nabonassar. For if he might be either the Nephew, or the Sonne; hee might perhaps be neither the one, nor the other. But because our Countrie-man Lidyate hath reprehended Scaliger for changing his opinion; and that both Torniellus, who followes Scaliger herein, and Sethus Caluisius, who hath drawne into forme of Chronologie, that learned worke, De Emendatione Temporum, doe hold vp the same assertion, confounding Baladan with Nabonassar: I haue taken the paines to search, as farre as my leisure and diligence could reach, after any sentence that might proue the Kindred or succession of these two. Yet cannot I finde in the Almageſt (for the Scriptures are either silent in this point, or aduerse to Scaliger; and other good authoritie, I know none, in this businesse) any sentence more neerely prouing the succession of Merodach to Nabonassar, than the place now last rehearsed: which makes no more, to shew that the one of these was Father to the other, than (that I may vse a like example) the as neere succession of William the Conqueror, declares him, to haue beene Sonne, or Grand-child to Edward the Confessor. This considered, wee may safely goe on with our accompt from Nabonassar, taking him for Salmanassar; and not fearing, that the Readers will be driuen from our booke, when they finde ſomething in it, agreeing with Annius, foraſmuch as theſe Kings mentioned in Scriptures, raigned in Babylon, and Aſſyria, in thoſe very times which by Diodorus and Ptolomie are aſſigned to Beloſus, Nabonaſſar, and Mardocempadus, and the reſt: no good Hiſtorie naming any others, that raigned there in thoſe ages, and all Aſtronomicall obſeruations, fitly concurring, with the yeeres that are attributed to theſe, or numbred from them.

§. II.

Of the danger and deliuerance of Iudæa from SENNACHERIB.

WHen Salmanaſſar was dead, and his ſonne Sennacherib in poſſeſſion of the Empire, in the fourteenth yeere of Ezechias, he demanded of him ſuch Tribute as was agreed on, at ſuch time as Teglath, the Grand-father of Sennacherib, and Father of Salmanaſſar, inuited by Ahaz, inuaded Rezen King of Damaſcus, and deliuered him from the dangerous Warre which Iſrael had vndertaken againſt him. This Tribute and acknowledgement when Ezechias denied, Sennacherib, hauing (as it ſeemes) a purpoſe to inuade Ægypt, ſent one part of his Armie to lie before Ieruſalem. Now though Ezechias (fearing this powerfull Prince) had acknowledged his fault, and purchaſed his peace, as he hoped, with thirtie hundred talents of ſiluer, and thirty talents of gold: wherewith he preſented Sennacherib, now ſet downe before Lachis in Iudæa, yet vnder the colour of better aſſurance, & to force the King of Iudæa to deliuer hoſtages, the Aſſyrian enuironed Ieruſalem with a groſſe Armie, and hauing his Sword in his hand, thought it the fitteſt time to write his owne conditions. 2. Kin. 18. 21.

Ezechias directed his three greateſt Counſellers, to parlie with Rabſaces, ouer the Wall; and to receiue his demands: who vſed three principall arguments to perſwade the people to yeeld themſelues to his Maſter Sennacherib. For though the Chancellor, Steward, and Secretarie, ſent by Ezechias, deſired Rabſaces to ſpeake vnto them in the Syrian tongue, and not in the Iewiſh, yet hee with a more loud voice directed his ſpeech to the multitude in their owne language. And for the firſt, hee made them know, That if they continued obſtinate, and adhered to their King, that they would, in a ſhort time, be inforced to eate their owne dung, and drinke their owne vrine: Secondly, he altogether diſabled the King of Ægypt, from whom the Iudæans hoped for ſuccour; and compared him to a broken ſtaffe, on which whoſoeuer leaneth, pierceth his owne hand: Thirdly, that the gods who ſhould helpe them, Ezechias had formerly broken and defaced, meaning chiefly (as it is thought by ſome) the braſen Serpent, which had beene preſerued euer ſince Moſes time: and withall he bade them remember the gods of other Nations: whom, notwithſtanding any power of theirs, his Maſter had conquered and throwne downe; and for God himſelfe, in whom they truſted, hee perſwaded them by no meanes to relie on him; for he would deceiue them. But finding the people ſilent (for ſo the King had commanded them) after a while, when he had vnderſtood that the King of Arabia was marching on with a powerfull Armie, hee himſelfe left the Aſſyrian forces in charge to others, and ſought Sennacherib at Lebna in Iudæa, either to informe him of their reſolution in Ieruſalem, or to conferre with him concerning the Armie of Terhaca the Arabian. Soone vpon this there came letters from Sennacherib to Ezechias, whom he partly aduiſed, and partly threatned to ſubmit himſelfe: vſing the ſame blaſphemous outrage againſt the all-powerfull God, as before. But Ezechias ſending thoſe Counſellers to the Prophet Eſay, which had lately beene ſent to Rabſaces, receiued from him comfort, and aſſurance, that this Heathen Idolater ſhould not preuaile; againſt whom the King alſo beſought aide from Almightie God, repeating the moſt inſolent and blaſphemous parts of Sennacheribs letter, before the 2. Kings 18. 21.

The reason that moued Sennacherib to desire to possesse himself in haste of Ierusalem, was, that he might thereinto haue retraited his Armie, which was departed, as it seemeth, from the siege of Pelusium in Ægypt, for feare of Terhaca: and though the Scriptures are silent of that enterprise (which in these bookes of the Kings, and of the Chronicles or Paralipomenon, speake but of the affaires of the Iewes in effect) yet the ancient Berosus, and out of him Iosephus, and S. Hierome, together with Herodo-

* To wit in part, for Herodotus mentioneth nothing, neither of Tarhaca, nor of Ierusalem, nor of the Armie there.

Out of Esay it is gathered, that this destruction of the Assyrian Armie was in this manner: Thou shalt be visited of the Lord of Hosts with thunder and shaking, and a great noise, a whirle-winde and a tempest, and a flame of deuouring fire. But Iosephus hath it more largely out of the same Berosus, an authoritie (because so well agreeing with the Scriptures) not to be omitted, SENNACHERIBVS autem ab Ægyptiaco bello ded in the Kingdome. Who in the beginning of his raigne sent new troupes out of Assyria and Samaria, to fortifie the Colonie therein planted by his grandfather Salmanassar. What this Nesroch was, it is vncertaine: Hierome in his Hebrew traditions hath somewhat of him, but nothing positiuely. It is certaine, that Venus Vrania was worshipped by the Assyrians; and so was Iupiter Belus, as Dion, Eusebius, and Cyrillus witnesse. Many fancies there are, what cause his sonne had to murther him; but the Lyr. most likely is, that he had formerly dis-inherited those two, and conferred the Empire on Assarhaddon. Tobit tells vs, That it was fiftie fiue dayes after Senacheribs returne, ere he was murthered by his sonnes; during which time he slew great numbers of the Israelites in Nineue, till the most just God turned the Sword against his owne brest.

§. III.

Of EZEKIAS his sickneße and recouerie; and of the Babylonian King that congratulated him.

AFter this maruellous deliuerie, Ezekias sickened, and was told by Isaiah, that he must die: but after hee had besought God with teares for his deliuerie, Isaiah, as hee was going from him, returned againe, and had warrant from the Spirit of God to promise him recouerie after three dayes, and a prolongation of his life for fifteene yeeres. But Ezekias somewhat doubtfull of this exceeding grace, prayeth a signe to confirme him: whereupon, at the prayer of Isaiah, the shadow of the Sunne cast it selfe the contrarie way, and 2. King. 20. went backe tenne degrees, vpon the Dyall of Achaz. The cause that moued Ezekias to lament (saith Saint Hierome) was, because he had as yet no sonne, and then in despaire that the Messias should come out of the house of Dauid, or at least of his Seede. His disease seemeth to be the Pestilence, by the medicine giuen him by the Prophet, to wit, a masse of Figges, layed to the Botch or Sore.

This wonder when the Wise-men of Chaldea had told to Merodach, King of Babylon, the first of that house, he sent to Ezekias, to be informed of the cause: at which time Ezekias shewed him all the Treasure hee had, both in the Court and in the Kingdome: for which he was reprehended by the Prophet Isaiah, who told him; The dayes are at hand, that all that is in thine house, and whatsoeuer thy fathers haue layed vp in store to this day, shall be carried into Babel; nothing shall bee left, saith the Lord. Esay 39. It may seeme strange, how Ezekia should haue got any treasure worth the shewing: for Senacherib had robbed him of all, the yeere before. But the spoile of the same Senacherib his Campe repayed all with aduantage, and made Ezekia richer vpon the suddaine then euer he had beene: which vnexpected wealth was a strong temptation to boasting. After this time Ezekia had rest, and spending without noyse that addition which God had made vnto his life, he died, hauing raigned nine and twentie yeeres. One onely offensiue Warre he made, which was against the Philistims with good successe. Among his other acts (shortly remembred in Ecclesiasticus) hee Eccl. 48. deuised to bring water to Ierusalem.

In two respects they say that hee offended God: the one, that hee rejoyced too much at the destruction and lamentable end of his enemie; the other, that hee so much gloried in his riches, as he could not forbeare to shew them to strangers. But the reason which moued Ezekias (speaking humanely) to entertaine the Embassadors of Merodach in this friendly and familiar manner, was, because he came to visit him, and brought him a present, congratulating the recouerie of his health; as also in that Merodach had weakened the house of Senacherib, his fearefull enemie. For Merodach, who was Commander and Lieutenant vnder Senacherib in Babylon, vsurped that State himselfe, in the last yeere of that King, and held it by strong hand against his sonne Assarhaddon; who was not onely simple, but impaired in strength, by the moleſtation of his brothers. This aduantage Merodach eſpied, and remembring, that their anceſtor Phul Belochus had ſet his owne maſter Sardanapalus beſides the cuſhion, thought it as lawfull for himſelfe to take the opportunitie which this Kings weakeneſſe did offer, as it had beene for Belochus to make vſe of the others wickedneſſe: and ſo, finding himſelfe beloued of the Babylonians, and ſufficiently powerfull, he did put the matter to hazard, and preuailed. The aſſertion of this hiſtorie is made by the ſame arguments that were vſed in maintaining the common opinion of Writers, touching Phul Belochus; which I will not here againe rehearſe. So of this new Race, which cut a-ſunder the Line of Ninus, there vvere onely fiue Kings.

But foraſmuch as the laſt yeere of Salmanaſſar was alſo the firſt of Senacherib his ſonne, we reckon the time, wherein the houſe of Phul held the Aſſyrian Kingdome, to haue beene an hundred and one yeeres, of which, the laſt fiue and twentie vvere ſpent with Ezekia, vnder Salmanaſſar, Senacherib, and Aſſarhaddon.

The Kings that were in Media during the raigne of EZEKIA: Of the difference found betweene ſundrie Authors, in rehearſing the Median Kings. Other contemporaries of EZEKIA: of CANDAVLES, GYGES, and the Kings deſcended from HERCVLES.

IN the time of Ezekia, Medidus, and after him Cardiceas, raigned in Media. Whether it were ſo, that varietie of names, by which theſe Kings were called in ſeuerall Hiſtories, hath cauſed them to ſeeme more than indeede they were; or whether the ſonnes raigning with the fathers, haue cauſed not onely the names of Kings, but the length of Time, wherein they gouerned Media, to exceede the due proportion: or whether the Copies themſelues, of Cteſias and Annius his Metaſthenes, haue beene faultie, as neither of theſe two Authors is ouer-highly commended of truſtineſſe: ſo it is, that the names, number, and length of raigne, are all very diuerſly reported of theſe Median Kings, that followed Arbaces: Therefore it neede not ſeeme ſtrange, that I reckon Medidus and Cardiceas as contemporaries with Ezekia. For to reconcile ſo great a difference, as is found in thoſe Writers that varie from Euſebius, is more than I dare vndertake. I will onely here ſet downe the roll of Kings that raigned in Media, accordingly as ſundrie Authors haue deliuered it.

Annius his Metaſthenes orders them and their raignes thus:

Diodorus Siculus following Cteſias (as perhaps Annius made his Metaſthenes follow Diodore, with ſome litte variation, that he might not ſeeme a borrower) placeth them thus.

Mercator hath laboured with much diligence, to reconcile theſe Catalogues, and to make them alſo agree with Euſebius. But foraſmuch as it ſeemes to mee an impoſſible matter, to attaine vnto the truth of theſe forgotten times, by conjectures founded vpon Cteſias and Metaſthenes, I will lay the burthen vpon Euſebius, who liued in an age better furniſhed than ours, with bookes of this argument. Let it therefore ſuffice, that theſe two Kings (whom I haue reckoned as contemporaries with Ezekia) Medidus and Cardiceas, are found in Euſebius: for whether Cardiceas were Diodorus his Arbianes, I will not ſtay to ſearch. The Kings of Media, according to Euſebius, raigned in this order.

Theſe names, and this courſe of ſucceſſion I retaine; but adde vnto theſe, Cyaxares the ſonne of Aſtyages, according to Xenophon; and ſometimes follow Herodotus, in ſetting downe the length of a Kings raigne, otherwiſe than Euſebius hath it: of which variations, I will render my reaſons in due place.

The twentie nine yeeres of Ezekia were concurrent, in part, with the rule of the foure firſt that were choſen Gouernours of Athens for ten yeeres; that is, of Charops, Æſimedes, Elidicus, and Hippones. Touching the firſt of theſe I heare nothing, ſaue that Rome was built in his firſt yeere; of which perhaps himſelfe did not heare. Of the ſecond and third I finde only the names. The fourth made himſelfe knowne by a ſtrange example of juſtice, or rather of crueltie, that hee ſhewed vpon his owne Daughter. For hee finding that ſhee had offended in vnchaſtitie, cauſed her to be lockt vp with an Horſe, giuing to neither of them any foode: ſo the Horſe, conſtrained by hunger, deuoured the vnhappie Woman.

In Rome, the firſt King, and Founder of that Citie Romulus, did raigne both before, and ſomewhat after Ezekia.

In Lydia, Candaules the laſt King, ruled in the ſame age.

This

This Region was first called Meonia. Lydus the sonne of Atys raigning in it, gaue the name of Lydia, if wee beleeue such authoritie as wee finde. This Kingdome was afterward, by the appointment of an Oracle, conferred vpon Argon, who came of Alceus the sonne of Hercules, by Iardana, a bond-woman. The race of these Heraclidæ continued raigning fiftie fiue yeeres (in which two and twentie Generations passed) the sonne continually succeeding the father. Candaules the sonne of Myrsus was the last of his race, who doated so much vpon the beautie of his owne Wife, that hee could not bee content to enjoy her, but would needs enforce one Gyges, the sonne of Dascylus, to behold her naked bodie; and placed the vnwilling man secretly in her chamber, where he might see her preparing to bed-ward. This was not so closely carried, but that the Queene perceiued Gyges at his going forth, and vnderstanding the matter, tooke it in such high disdaine, that she forced him the next day to requite the Kings follie with treason. So Gyges, being brought againe into the same chamber by the Queene, slew Candaules, and was rewarded not only with his Wife, but with the Kingdome of Lydia. He raigned thirtie eight yeeres, beginning in the last of Ezekia, one yeere before the death of Romulus.

After Gyges, his sonne Ardys raigned nine and fortie yeeres; then Sadyattes, twelue; Halyattes, fiftie seuen; and finally Cræsus, the sonne of Halyattes, fourteene yeeres: who lost the Kingdome, and was taken by Cyrus of Persia.

And here by the way we may note, that as the Lydian Kings, whom Cræsus his Progenitor dispossest, are deduced from Hercules, so of the same Hercules there sprang many other Kings, which gouerned seuerall Countries very long; as in Asia, the Mysians; in Greece, the Lacedæmonians, Messenians, Rhodians, Corinthians, and Argiues; and from the Argiues, the Macedonians; as likewise from the Corinthians, the Syracusanes: besides many great and famous, though priuate, Families.

But of the Heraclidæ that raigned in Lydia, I haue not troubled my selfe to take notice in the times of their seuerall raignes: for little is found of them, beside the bare names, and the follie of this last King Candaules.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the Kings that raigned in Ægypt, betweene the deliuerance of ISRAEL from thence, and the raigne of EZEKIA in Iuda, when Ægypt and Iuda made a league against the Assyrians.

§. I.

That many names of Ægyptian Kings, found in Historie, are like to haue belonged only to Viceroyes. An example prouing this out of WILLIAM of Tyre his Historie of the holy Warre.

THE emulation and quarrells arising in these times, betweene the mightie Kingdomes of Ægypt and Assyria, doe require our paines, in collecting the most memorable things in Ægypt, and setting downe briefly the state of that Countrie, which had continued long a flowrishing Region, and was of great power, when it contended with Assyria for the Mastrie. Of Cham the sonne of Noah, who first planted that Countrie, and of Osiris, Orus, and other ancient Kings, that raigned there, vntill the Israelites were thence deliuered, more hath beene said a'readie than I can stand to; though I hold it no shame to faile in such coniectures. That which I haue deliuered, in speaking mine opinion of the Ægyptian Dynasties, must heere againe helpe me. For it may truely be affirmed, That the great number of Kings, which are said to haue raigned in Ægypt, were none other than Viceroyes or Stewards, such as Ioseph was, and such as were the Soldanes in later ages. Therefore, I will not onely forbeare to seeke after those, whom Herodotus and Diodorus haue reckoned vp, from the mouthes of Ægyptian Priests, deliuering them by number, without rehearsing their names; but will saue the labour of marshalling them in order, whose names only are found; the yeares of their raignes, and other circumstances, prouing them to haue beene Kings in deede, being not recorded.

But that I may not seeme before hand, to lay an imaginarie ground, whereupon after I may build what I list; it were not amisse, to giue vnto the Reader such satisfaction in this point, as apparent reason, and truth of Historie doth affoord. First therefore, wee ought not to beleeue those numbers of Generations, which the lying Priests haue reckoned vp, to magnifie their Antiquities. For wee know, that from Abraham, our Sauiour Christ was remoued onely fortie two descents, which makes it euident, that in farre shorter time, namely before the Persian Empire, there could not haue passed away twice as many successions in Ægypt: especially considering, that many of these, whose continuance is expressed, haue raigned longer than fortie yeeres. It followes that we should square the number of the Ægyptian Kings in some euen proportion, to those which did beare rule in other Countries. As for the rest, whose names we finde scattered here and there; any man that will take the paines to reade the nineteenth booke of the holy warre, written by William Archbishop of Tyre, may easily perswade himselfe, that it is not hard to find names enow, of such as might be thought to haue raigned in Ægypt, being none other then Regents or Viceroies. Yet will I here insert, as briefly as I can, some things making to that purpose for the pleasure and information of such, as will not trouble themselues with turning ouer many Authors.

When Elhadech the Caliph ruled in Ægypt, one Dargan, a powerfull and a subtile man, made himselfe Soldan, by force and cunning, chasing away Sanar an Arabian, who was Soldan before and after him. This Dargan ministred matter of quarrell to Amalricke King of Ierusalem; and sustained, with little losse, an inuasion, which Amalricke made vpon Ægypt. Hereupon hee grew so insolent and proud, that Sanar the former Soldan hoped to make his partie good against him, if he could get any forces wherewith to enter Ægypt. Briefly, Sanar sueth to Noradine, King of Damasco, for aide, who sends an Army of his Turkes, vnder the command of Syracon, against the Soldan Dargan. So Dargan and Sanar met, and fought: The Victorie was Dargans; but hee enioyed it not: for in few daies after, hee was slaine by treason, whereby Sanar did recouer his Dignitie: which to establish, he slew all the Kindred and Friends of Dargan, that he could finde in the great Citie of Cairo.

To all these doings, the Caliph Elhadech gaue little regard: for he thought it little concerned him, which of them liued, and had the administration of the Kingdome, whilest he might haue the profit of it, and enioy his pleasure. But new troubles presently arise, which (one would thinke) doe neerely touch the Caliph himselfe. Syracon with his Turkes, whom Sanar hath gotten to come into Ægypt, will not now be entreated there to leaue him, and quietly goe their way home. They seize vpon the Towne of Belbeis, which they fortifie, and there attend the arriuall of more companie from Damasco, for the conquest of al Ægypt. The Soldan perceiues their intent, and findes himselfe not strong enough to expell them; much lesse to repell the Turkish Armie, that was likely to second them. He therefore sends Messengers to King Almaricke of Ierusalem, whom with large promises, he gets to bring him aide, and so driues out the Turkes. Of al this trouble, the great Caliph heares nothing, or not so much, as should make him looke to the playing of his owne game.

A greater mischiefe ariseth, concerning the Caliph Elhadech particularly, in his owne Title. Syracon, Captaine of the Turkes that had beene in Ægypt, goes to the Caliph of Baldach (who was opposite to him of Ægypt, each of them claiming as heire to Mahomet, that false prophet, the Soueraignetie ouer all that were of the Saracen Law) and tells him the weakenesse of the Ægyptian, with his owne abilitie of doing seruice in those parts, offering his best meanes for the extirpation of the Schismaticall Caliph, and the reduction of all Ægypt, with the Westerne parts, vnder the subiection of the Babylonian. This motion is readily and ioyfully entertained; all the Easterne Prouinces are vp in Armes; and Syracon, with a mightie power, descendeth into Ægypt. The noise of this great expedition so affrighteth King Almaricke, that with all his forces he hasteth into Ægypt: well knowing how neerely it concerned him and his Kingdome of Ierusalem, to keep the Saracens from ioyning all vnder one head. Sanar the Soldan perceiuing the faithful care of the Christians his friends, welcomes them, and bestirs himselfe in giuing them all manner of content, as it behoued him: for by their admirable valour, he finally draue the enemies out of the Countrie. But this victorie was not so soone gotten, as it is quickly told.

Strange it is (which most concernes our present purpose) that of so desperate a danger, the Caliph, as yet, seemes to know nothing. May we not thinke him to haue beene King in title only, who medled so little in the Gouernment? The Soldan, finding that the Christians (without whose helpe, all was lost) could not well stay, so long as his necessities required; makes large offers to King Almaricke, vpon condition, that he should abide by it. He promiseth a great Tribute (William of Tyre cals it a Tribute; the Saracens, perhaps, called it a Pension) which the Kings of Ierusalem should receiue out of Ægypt, for this behouefull assistance. But the Christians vnderstanding that the Soldan (how much soeuer he tooke vpon him) was subiect to an higher Lord, would make no bargaine of such importance, with any other than the Caliph himselfe. Hereupon Hugh Earle of Cæsarea, and a Knight of the Templars, are sent vnto Elhadech, to ratifie the couenants. Now shall we see the greatnesse of the Caliph and his estate.

These Embassadors were conueighed by the Soldan to Cairo; where arriuing at the Palace, they found it guarded by great troupes of Souldiers. The first entrance was through darke Porches, that were kept by many armed bands of Æthiopians, which with al diligence, did reuerence vnto the Soldan, as he passed along. Through these streights the Warders led them, into goodly open Courts, of such beautie and riches, that they could not retaine the grauitie of Embassadors, but were enforced to admire the things which detained their eyes. For there they saw goodly marble Pillars, gilded Beames, all wrought ouer with embossed works, curious pauements, fish-ponds of marble with cleare waters, and many sorts of strange Birds, vnknown in these parts of the world, as comming perhaps from the East Indies, which then were vndiscouered. The further they went, the greater was the magnificence; for the Caliph his Eunuches conueighed them into other Courts within these; as farre excelling the former, as the former did surpasse ordinary houses. It were tedious perhaps to rehearse, how, the further they entred, the more high state they found, and cause of maruaile; suffice it, that the good Archbishop, who wrot these things, was neuer held a vaine Author. Finally they were brought into the Caliphs owne lodgings, which were yet more stately, and better guarded, where entring the presence, the Soldan hauing twice prostrated himselfe, did the third time cast off his Sword, that he ware about his neck, and throw himselfe on the ground, before the curtaine, behinde which the Caliph sate. Presently the trauerse, wrought with Gold and pearles was opened, and the Caliph himselfe discouered, sitting with great Maiestie on a throne of gold, hauing very few of his most inward seruants and Eunuches about him. When the Soldan had humbly kissed his Masters feet, he briefly told the cause of his comming, the danger wherein the land stood, and the offers that he had made vnto King Almericke, desiring the Caliph himselfe to ratifie them, in presence of the Embassadors. The Caliph answered, That he would throughly performe all which was promised. But this contented not the Embassadors: They would haue him to giue his hand vpon the bargaine; which the Ægyptians, that stood by, thought an impudent request. Yet his greatnes condescended at length, after much deliberation, at the earnest request of the Soldan, to reach out his hand. When the Earle of Cæsarea saw that the Caliph gaue his hand, neither willingly nor bare, hee told him roundly thus much in effect. SIR, Truth seekes no holes to hide it selfe; Princes, that will hold couenant, must deale openly, nakedly, and sincerely; Giue vs therefore your bare hand, if you meane that we shall trust you, for we will make no bargaines with your Gloue. Much adoe there was about this: for it seemed against the Maiestie of such a Prince to yeelde so farre. But, when it would none otherwise be, with a smiling cheare (though to the great griefe of his Seruants) hee vouchsafed to let the Earle take him by the bare hand; and so rehearsing the couenants word by word, as the Earle spake them, he ratified all; dismissing finally the Embassadors, with such rewards as testified his Greatnesse.

In this Caliph and his Sultan, we may discerne the Image of the ancient Pharaoh, and his Viceroy: we see a Prince of great estate, sitting in his Palace, and not vexing himself with the great preparations made against him, which terrifie his neighbour Countries: we see his Viceroy, in the meane season, vsing all Royal power, making warre and peace; entertaining, and expelling Armies of strangers; yea making the Land of Ægypt tributarie to a forraine Prince. What greater authoritie was giuen to Ioseph, when Pharaoh said vnto him, Thou shalt be ouer mine house, and at thy word shall all my people be armed, only in the Kings Throne will I bee aboue thee, Behold, I haue set thee ouer all the Land of Ægypt?

I doe not commend this forme of Gouernement; neither can I approoue the coniecture of mine Author, where hee thinks, that the Ægyptians, euer since Iosephs time, haue felt the burden of that seruitude, which hee brought vpon them, when he bought them, and their Lands, for Pharaoh. Herein I finde his iudgement good; that he affirmes this manner of the Ægyptian Kings, in taking their ease, and ruling by a Viceroy, to be part of the ancient customes, practised by the Pharaohs. For we finde, that euen the Ptolomies (excepting Ptolomæus Lagi, and his sonne Philadelphus, founder and establisher of that race) were giuen, all of them, wholly to please their owne appetites, leauing the charge of the Kingdome to Women, Eunuches, and other ministers of their desires. The pleasures which that Countrie affoorded, were indeede sufficient to inuite the Kings thereof vnto a voluptuous life; and the awfull regard wherein the Ægyptians held their Princes, gaue them securitie, whereby they might the better trust their officers, with so ample Commission. But of this matter, I will not stand longer to dispute. It is enough to haue shewed, that the great and almost absolute power of the Viceroyes gouerning Ægypt, is set downe by Moses, and that a liuely example of the same is found in William of Tyre; who liued in the same age; was, in few yeeres after, Chancellour of the Kingdome of Ierusalem; and had full discourse with Hugh Earle of Cæsarea, touching all these matters. Wherefore it remaines, that wee bee not carried away with a vaine opinion, to beleeue that all they were Kings, whom reports of the fabulous Ægyptians haue honored with that stile; but rest contented with a Catalogue of such, as we finde by circumstance, likely to haue raigned in that Countrie; after whom it followes that we should make enquirie.

§. II.

Of ACHERRES; whether he were VCHOREVS that was the eighth from OSYMANDYAS, of OSYMANDYAS and his Tombe.

IN this businesse I hold it vaine to be too curious. For who can hope to attaine to the perfect knowledge of the truth, when as Diodorus varies from Herodotus, Eusebius, from both of them; and late Writers, that haue sought to gather the truth out of these and others, finde no one with whom they can agree? In this case Annius would doe good seruice, if a man could trust him. But it is enough to be beholding to him, when others doe either say nothing, or that which may iustly bee suspected. I will therefore hold my selfe contented, with the pleasure that he hath done me, in saying somewhat of Osiris, Isis, Orus, and those antiquities remoued so farre out of sight: as for the Kings following the departure of Israel out of Ægypt, it shall suffice, that Herodotus, Diodorus, and Eusebius, haue not beene silent, and that Reineccius hath taken paines, to range into some good order the names that are extant in these, or found scattering in others.

From the departure of Israel out of Ægypt, vnto the raigne of Thuoris (who is generally taken to be the same that the Greeks call Proteus) there is little or no disagreement about the Ægyptian Kings. Wherefore I set downe the same which are found in Eusebius, and giue to euerie one the same length of raigne.

Acherres was the first of these, who succeeded vnto Chenchres, that perished in the Red Sea. This King seemes to Reineccius to be the same whom Diodorus calls Vchoreus, the founder of Memphis. But whereas mention is found in Diodorus of a great King, named Osymandyas, from whom Vchoreus is said to be the eighth; it will either hardly follow, that Timaus (as Reineccius coniectures) was the great Osymandyas; or else that this Acherres was Vchoreus: for the distance betweene them was more then eight generations. Mercator iudgeth Osymandyas to haue beene the husband of Acencheres, Orus the second his Daughter; thinking that Manethon (cited by Iosephus) doth omit his name, and insert his wiues, into the Catalogue of Kings, because he was King in his wiues right. As for Vchoreus, it troubles not Mercator to finde him the eighth from this man: for he takes Ogdous, not to signifie in this place of Diodore (as that Greeke word else doth) the eighth, but to be an Ægyptian name, belonging also to Vchoreus, who might haue had two names, as many of the rest had. I will not vexe my braines in the vnprofitable search of this, and the like inextricable doubts. All that Diodore hath found of this Osymandyas, was wrought vpon his monument; the most thereof in figures, which I thinke the Ægyptians did fabulously expound. For whereas there was pourtraied a great Armie with the siege of a Towne, the captiuitie of the People, and the triumph of the Conqueror; all this, the Ægyptians said to denote the conquest of Bactria made by that King: which how likely it was, let others iudge. I hold this goodly peece of worke, which Diodore so particularly describes, to haue beene erected for a common place of buriall, to the ancient Kings and Queenes of Ægypt, and to their Viceroyes; whilest yet they were not so ambitious, as euery one to haue his owne particular monument, striuing therein to exceed all others. This appeares by the many statuaes, therein placed, by the Warres, the iudgement Seate, the receiuing of Tribute, the offering Sacrifice to God, the account of Reuennues, and plentie of all Cattaile and Foode; all which were there curiously wrought, shewing the seuerall Offices of a Gouernour. On the Tombe of Osymandyas was this inscription. I am OSYMANDYAS King of Kings; If any desire to know what I am, or where I lie, let him exceede some of my workes. Let them, that hope to exceede his workes, labour to know what he was. But since by those wordes, Or where I lie, it should seeme that hee lay not there interred, wee may lawfully suspect that it was Ioseph, whose body was preserued among the Hebrewes, to be buried in the Land of Canaan, and this emptie Monument might King Orus, who out-liued him, erect in honor of his high deserts, among the royall Sepulchers. To which purpose, the plentie of Cattell, and all manner of viands, had good reference. The name Osymandyas doth not hinder this coniecture; seeing Ioseph had one new name giuen to him by Pharaoh, for expounding the dreame, and might, vpon further occasions, haue another, to his encrease of honor. As for that stile, King of Kings, it was perhaps no more than Beglerbeg, as the Turkish Bassaes are called, that is, Great aboue the Great.

Now although it be so, that the reckoning falls out right, betweene the times of Ioseph and Acherres (for Acherres was the eighth in order, that raigned after the great Orus, whose Viceroy Ioseph was) yet will I hereby seeke, neither to fortifie mine owne coniecture, as touching Ioseph, nor to inferre any likelihood of Acherres his being Vchoreus. For it might well bee, that Memphis was built by some such King as was Gehoar, Lieutenant vnto the Caliph Elcain, who hauing to his Masters vse, conquered Ægypt, and many other Countries, did build, not farre from old Memphis, the great Citie of Cairo (corruptly so pronounced) naming it El Cahira, that is, an enforcing, or an imperious Mistresse, though he himselfe were a Dalmatian slaue. Iohn Leo Hist. Afric. l. 1. & l. 8.

§. III.

of CHERRES, ARMEVS, RAMESSES, and AMENOPHIS. Of MYRIS, and the Lake that beares his name.

WHen Acherres had raigned eight yeeres, Cherres succeeded, and held the Kingdome fifteene yeeres: then raigned Armeus fiue yeeres, and after him Rameſſes, threeſcore and eight. Of Armeus and Rameſſes is that Hiſtorie vnderſtood by Euſebius, which is common among the Greekes, vnder the names of Danaus and Ægyptus. For it is ſaid that Danaus, being expelled out of Ægypt by his Brother, fled into Greece, where he obtained the Kingdome of Argos: that he had fiftie Daughters, whom vpon ſeeming reconciliation, hee gaue in marriage to his Brothers fiftie Sonnes, but commanded euery one of them to kill her husband the firſt night; that onely Hypermneſtra, one of his Daughters, did ſaue her husband Lynceus, and ſuffered him to eſcape; finally, That for this fact, all the bloudie ſiſters, when they died, were enioyned this fooliſh puniſhment in Hell, to fill a leaking Veſſell with water.

The raigne of Danaus in Argos was indeed in this age; but that Armeus, was Danaus; and Rameſſes, Ægyptus; is more then Reineccius beleeues: hee rather takes Armeus to haue beene Myris, or Meris, who cauſed the great lake to be made which beares his name. For my owne part, as I can eaſily beleeue, that he which fled out of Ægypt into Greece, was a man of ſuch qualitie as the Soldan Sanar, of whom we ſpake before; ſo doe I not finde how in ſo ſhort a raigne, as fiue yeeres, a worke of that labour could be finiſhed, which was required vnto the Lake of Myris, and the Monuments therein; whereof his owne Sepulchre and his wiues being ſome part, it is manifeſt that he was not buried in Argos. Wherefore of Myris, and of all other Kings, whoſe age is vncertaine, and of whoſe raignes we haue no aſſurance, I may truly ſay, that their great workes are not enough to prooue them of the houſe of Pharaoh, ſeeing that greater deedes or more abſolute, then were thoſe of Ioſeph, who bought all the people of Ægypt as bond-men, and all their Land for bread; of Gehoar, who founded Cairo; and of Sanar, who made the Countrie Tributarie; were performed by none of them.

It ſhall therefore be enough to ſet downe the length of their raignes, whom we finde to haue followed one another in order of ſucceſſion; but in rehearſing the great acts which were performed, I will not ſtand to examine, whether they that did them were Kings or no.

The Lake of Myris is, by the report of Diodore and Herodotus, three thouſand ſixe hundred furlongs in compaſſe, and fiftie fadomes deepe. It ſerued to receiue the waters of Nilus, when the ouer-flow, being too great, was harmefull to the Countrie; and to ſupply the defect, by letting out the waters of the Lake, when the Riuer did not riſe high enough. In opening the ſluces of this Lake, for the letting in or out of waters, were ſpent fiftie talents; but the Lake it ſelfe defraied that coſt; ſeeing the tribute impoſed vpon Fiſh taken therein, was euery day one talent, which Myris gaue to his Wife to buy ſweet ointments, and other ornaments for her bodie. In the middeſt of it was left an Iland, wherein were the Sepulchers of Myris and his Wife, and ouer each of them a Pyramis, that was a furlong, or (according to Herodotus) fiftie paces high; hauing on the tops their ſtatues, ſitting in Thrones. I finde not the deſcription of this Lake in Maps, anſwerable to the report of Hiſtorians: yet is it very great. The yeeres of Armeus are by Manethon diuided, by inſerting one Armeſis (whom Euſebius omits) that ſhould haue raigned one yeere and odde moneths of the time; but I hold not this difference worthy of examination.

After Rameſſes, his ſonne Amenophis held the Kingdome fortie yeares. Some giue him only nineteene yeeres; and Mercator thinkes him to haue beene the King that was drowned in the Red Sea: whereof I haue already ſpoken in the firſt Booke.

King

§. IIII.

Of the Kings that raigned in the Dynaſtie of the Larthes.

SETHOSIS, or Zethus, raigned after his Father Amenophis, fiftie fiue yeeres. To him are aſcribed the famous acts of that ancient Seſoſtris. But the ſtate of the World was not ſuch in theſe times, that ſo great an expedition, as the old Seſoſtris made, could haue beene either eaſily performed, or forgotten in the Countries through which he paſſed, had it now beene performed, as any man will perceiue, if hee looke vpon my Chronologicall Table, and conſider who liued with this Zethus. With this King beganne the Dinaſtie of the Larthes; which Reineccius conjectures to haue had the ſame ſignification, wherein the old Kings of Hetruria were called Lartes, (the Hetrurians being iſſued out of Lydia, the Lydians out of Ægypt) and to haue ſignified as much as Imperator or Generall. The Warres in which theſe Kings were Generalls, I take to haue beene againſt the Æthiopians: for ſure I am, that they troubled not the Countrie of Paleſtina, that lay next vnto them on the one hand; nor is it likely that they trauailed ouer the deſart ſands, on the other hand; to ſeeke matter of conqueſt, in the poore Countries of Africa. But theſe Generalls (if the Larthes were ſuch) were not many. Fiue only had that title; and the laſt of theſe tooke it, perhaps, as hereditarie from the firſt; in ſuch ſort as the Roman Emperors were proud for a while, to be called Antonini, till the moſt vnſuteable conditions of Heliogabalus, made his Succeſſors forbeare the name.

Here it may be objected, that the Dynaſties (as appeares by this particular) tooke name from the Kings, that the Kings alſo did adminiſter the gouernement themſelues; and that therefore I am deceiued in aſcribing ſo much vnto the Viceroies. But it is to be conſidered, that what is ſaid of theſe Larthes, depends only vpon conjecture, and that the authoritie of the Regents, or Viceroies, might bee great enough, though ſome few Kings tooke the conduct of Armies into their owne hands. For ſo we finde in Iohn Leo, that the Soldan of Ægypt (after ſuch time as the Soldan Saladine, murdering the Caliph, got the Soueraignetie to himſelfe) had vnder him a Viceroy, ſtiled Eddaguadare, who had authoritie to place, or diſplace, any Magiſtrates, or Officers; and that this mans Familie was almoſt as great, as the Soldans owne. Yet was there alſo the Amir Cabir, or Lord Generall of the Soldans forces, who had the charge of defending the Land, and might as he thought good, ſpend of the Soldans Treaſure. So might the Office of the Viceroies continue, though the Kings themſelues, taking the charge, or title of Generalls vpon them, did ſomewhat abridge the greatneſſe of that ſecond place. As for the names of the Dynaſties, it skills not whence they were drawne; whether from their Countrie, as thoſe of the Thebans and Diapolitans, or from ſome eminent men, or man, who ruled in that time, as many thinke, that the ſeuenteenth Dynaſtie was called of the Sheep-heards, becauſe Ioſeph gouerned in part therof; or from the Kings themſelues that raigned; as this was ſaid to be of the Larthes or Generalls. The next, as Manetho (but Annius his Manetho) hath it, was without any Larthes or Generals, yet was it not without Kings, foraſmuch as Vaphres, and Seſac, raigned therein, if many others did not. But let vs now returne to the buſineſſe which we left. Iohn Leo, l. 8.

Ramſes was King after Zethus, or Sethoſis, threeſcore and ſixe yeeres. He is miſtaken for that ſecond Seſoſtris, of whom I haue ſpoken in the firſt Bookes. I finde nothing worth rehearſall of this Ramſes, or of Amenophis, and Annemenes, that followed him in order, the former of which raigned fortie, the later ſixe and twentie

yeeres. Wherefore it may well bee, that the name which Zethus had from valour, was taken by these as hereditarie.

Thuoris, the last of the Larthes, raigned only seuen yeeres; yet is hee thought to haue beene that Proteus, of whom Herodotus hath mention, saying, That hee tooke Helena from Paris, and after the sack of Troy, restored her to Menelaus. I neede say no more in refutation of this, then that the time of Thuoris his raigne, lasted not so long as from the Rape of Helen to her restitution.

This Proteus or Cetes (as he is named by some) together with Thon, and others, mentioned by Greeke Writers in this businesse, or in other such matters, may seeme to be vnder-Officers: for such only are like to haue had their residencie about Pharos, and the Sea-coast, where Menelaus arriued.

Of Proteus, who detained Helen, it is said, That he could foretell things to come, and that hee could change himselfe into all shapes: whereby is signified his craftie head, for which he is growne into a Prouerbe. The Poets fained him a Sea-God, and keeper of Neptunes Seale-fishes, for belike he was some vnder-Officer to the Admirall, hauing charge of the Fishing about the Isle of Pharos, as was said before.

Remphes, the Sonne of Proteus, is reckoned the next King, by Diodore, as also by Herodotus, who calls him Ramsinitus, and tells a long tale, fit to please children, of his couetousnesse, and how his treasure-house was robbed by a cunning Theefe, that at last married his Daughter. But of this a man may beleeue what he list. How long this King raigned I know not, nor thinke that either hee, or his Father, did raigne at all.

§. V.

Of Ægyptian Kings whose names are found scattering in sundrie Authors, their times being not recorded. The Kings of Ægypt, according to CEDRENVS. Of VAPHRES and SESAC.

MAny other names of Ægyptian Kings, are found scattered heere and there; as Tonepherſobis, of whom Suidas deliuers only the bare name and title; Senemures, or Senepos, mentioned in Macrobius, who perhaps was the same that by Suidas is called Senyes, or Euenes, noted by occasion of a great Phisicion that liued vnder him; Banchyris, recorded by the same Suidas, for his great justice; and Thulis, of whom Suidas tells great matters; as that his Empire extended to the Ocean Sea; that he gaue name to the Isle of Thule, which some take to be Iseland; and that he consulted with the Deuill, or (which is all one) with Serephis, desiring to know, who before him had beene, or after him should be so mightie as himselfe. The answere or confession of the Deuill was remarkable; which I finde Englished in the translation of Plessis his worke, Of the trueneſſe of Christian Religion. The Greeke Verses are somewhat otherwise, and more imperfect in those Copies that I haue of Cedrenus and Suidas, but the sense is all one; which is this:

> First GOD, and next THE WORD, and then THE SPRITE,
> Which three be ONE, and joyne in ONE all three:
> Whose force is endlesse. Get thee hence fraile wight,
> The Man of Life vnknowne excelleth thee.

I should haue thought that Suidas had borrowed all this of Cedrenus, had I not found somewhat more in Suidas, than Cedrenus hath hereof; as the forme of inuocation which Thulis vsed, and that clause, of his giuing name to the Iland: though in this last point I hold Suidas to be deceiued; as also Cedrenus is, or (at least) seemes

to

to me, in giuing to this King such profound antiquitie of raigne. Indeede the very name of that Booke, cited often by Cedrenus, which he calls Little Genesis, is alone enough to breede suspition of some imposture: but the Frierly stuffe that hee alledgeth out of it, is such as would serue to discredit himselfe, were it not otherwise apparant, that he was a man both deuout, and of good judgement, in matters that fell within his compasse. I will here set downe the List of olde Ægyptian Kings deliuered by him, and leaue the censure to others.

The first King of Ægypt that he sets downe, is Mizraim, the sonne of Cham. After him hee findes many of a new race, deriuing their pedegree thus: Nimrod, the sonne of Chus, was also called Orion; and further, tooke vpon him the name of the Planet Saturne, had to wife Semiramis, who was of his owne Linage, and by her three sonnes; Picus, surnamed Iupiter, Belus and Ninus. Picus chasing his father out of Assyria into Italie, raigned in his stead thirtie yeeres, and then gaue vp that Kingdome to Iuno, his sister and wife, and to Belus his sonne: after which Belus, who raigned onely two yeeres, Ninus had the Kingdome, and married his owne mother Semiramis. But Picus went into Italie, to visite his olde father Saturne; Saturne forthwith resigned the Kingdome to him. Picus Iupiter raigned in Italie threescore and two yeeres, had threescore and tenne Wiues or Concubines, and about as many children: finally died, and lyes buried in the Isle of Crete. The principall of Iupiters sonnes were Faunus, Perseus, and Apollo. Faunus was called by the name of the Planet Mercurie: hee raigned in Italie, after his father, fiue and thirtie yeeres: and then (finding that all his brethren conspired against him) he went into Ægypt, with abundance of Treasure; where, after the death of Mizraim, hee got the Kingdome, and held it nine and thirtie yeeres. After Mercurie, Vulcan raigned in Aegypt foure yeeres and a halfe. Then Sol, the sonne of Vulcan, raigned twentie yeeres and a halfe. There followed in order Sosis, Osiris, Orus, and Thules, of whome we spake before: the length of their seuerall raignes is not set downe. After Thules, was the great Sesostris King twentie yeeres. His successor was Pharao, called Narecho, that held the Crowne fiftie yeeres, with which there passed from him the surname of Pharao, to a very long posteritie.

These reports of Cedrenus I hold it enough to set downe as I finde them: let their credit rest vpon the Author.

Others yet we finde, that are said to haue raigned in Aegypt, without any certaine note, when, or how long: about whome I will not labour, as fearing more to be reprehended of vaine curiositie, in the search made after these alreadie rehearsed, then of negligence, in omitting such as might haue beene added.

Vaphres, the father in law to Salomon; and Sesac, the afflicter of Rehoboam, leade vs againe into faire way, but not farre. The name of Vaphres is not found in the Scriptures; but wee are beholding to Clemens Alexandrinus and Eusebius for it. Clem. Strom. l. 1 These giue vs not the length of his raigne; but we know, that he liued in the times of Dauid and of Salomon. He came into Palestina with an Armie, tooke Gezar from the Canaanites, and gaue it to his daughter, Salomons wife: though for her sake perhaps it was, that in time following either he, or (as I rather take it) Sesac his sonne did fauour the enemies of Salomon, who kept so many Wiues and Concubines, besides this Aegyptian Princesse. In the life of Rehoboam all hath beene written that I finde of Sesac, excepting the length of his raigne, which must haue beene sixe and twentie yeeres, if he were that Smendis with whome Eusebius beginnes the one and twentieth Dynastie.

1. King. 9. 16. & 11. v. 18, 19, &c.

Now forasmuch as it would serue to no great purpose, that wee knew the length of Sesac his raigne, and of theirs that followed him, vnlesse therewithall we knew the beginning of Sesac, vpon which the rest haue dependance; this course I take. From the fourth yeere of Iehoiakim, King of Iuda, in which Pharao Neco was slaine, I reckon vpwards the yeeres of the same Neco, and of his predecessors, vnto the beginning of Sesac: by which acommpt, the first yeere of Sesac is found, concurrent with with the twentieth of Salomons raigne, and the twentie sixt of Sesac with the fift of Rehoboam: wherein Sesac spoyled the Temple, and died, enjoying the fruits of his Sacriledge no longer, then Ioas the Israelite and Crassus the Romane did; who, after him, spoyled the Temple of Ierusalem.

To fill vp the time betweene Sesac and Neco, I haue rather taken those Kings that I find in the Greeke Historians, than them which are in Eusebius his Catalogue. For of these that are deliuered by Eusebius, wee finde no Name nor Act recorded elsewhere, saue onely of Bocchoris, who is remembred by Diodore, Plutarch, and others, much being spoken of him, that makes him appeare to haue beene a King. Hereunto I may adde, that the succession is often interrupted in Eusebius by Aethiopians, which got the Kingdome often, and held it long: whereas contrariwise it appeares by the Prophet Esay, that the Councellors of Pharao did vaunt of the long and flourishing continuance of that house, insomuch, that they said of Pharaoh, I am the Sonne of the Wise, I am the Sonne of the ancient King. But that which ouerthrowes the reckoning of Eusebius, is, the good agreement of it with his mistaken times of the Kings of Iuda. For though it please him well to see how the raignes of Iosias and Neco meete by his computation, yet this indeede marres all; the raigne of Iosias being misplaced. This error growes from his omitting, to compare the raignes of the Kings of Iuda with theirs of Israel: by which occasion, Ioram, King of Israel, is made to raigne three yeeres after Ahazia of Iuda; Samaria is taken by Salmanassar before Hezekia was King: and in a word, all, or most of the Kings, haue their beginnings placed in some other yeere of their collateralls than the Scriptures haue determined.

§. VI.

Of CHEMMIS, CHEOPS, CEPHRENES, and other Kings recited by HERODOTVS and DIODORVS SICVLVS, which raigned betweene the times of REHOBOAM and EZEKIA.

FOllowing therefore the Greeke Historians, I place Chemmis, or (according to Diodore) Chembis, first in the ranke of those that were Kings after Sesac. Hee raigned fiftie yeeres, and built the greatest of the three Pyramides, which was accompted one of this worlds Wonders. The Pyramis hath his name from the shape, in that it resembleth a flame of fire, growing from the bottome vpwards narrower and narrower to the toppe. This of Chemmis being foure-square, had a Base of seuen akers euery way, and was aboue sixe akers high. It was of a very hard and durable Stone, which had lasted, when Diodore saw it, about a thousand yeeres, without complaining of any injurie that it had suffered by weather in so long space. From the raigne of Chemmis, vnto the age of Augustus Caesar, wherein Diodore liued, are indeede a thousand yeeres; which giues the better likelyhod vnto this time wherein Chemmis is placed. As for this and other Pyramides, late Writers testifie, that they haue seene them yet standing.

After Chemmis, Diodore placeth Cephrenes his brother; but doubtfully, and enclining rather to the opinion, that his sonne Chabreus succeeded. Herodotus hath Cheops (who might bee Chabreus) and Cephrenes after him. These are said to haue beene brethren; but the length of their raignes may argue the later to haue beene sonne to the former: for Cheops raigned fiftie yeeres; Cephrenes fiftie sixe. These were, as Chemmis had beene, builders of Pyramides, whereby they purchased great hatred of their people, who already had ouer-laboured themselues in erecting the first. These Pyramides were ordained to be Tombes, for those that raised them; but but the malice of the Ægyptians is said to haue cast out their bodies; and to haue called their Monuments by the name of an Heardsman, that kept his Beasts thereabouts. It may be, that the robbing them of their honour, and entituling a poore fellow to their workes, was held to be the casting out of their bodies: otherwise, it is hard to conceiue, how it might bee, that they, who had not power to auoide the like slaueric, laid vpon them by the yonger brother, or sonne, should haue power or leisure to take such reuenge vpon his Predecessor. To the like malice may be ascribed the tale deuised against Cheops his Daughter; That her Father, wanting mony, did prostitute her, and that shee, getting of euery man that accompanied her, one stone, did build with them a fourth Pyramis, that stood in the middest of the other three. Belike shee was an insolent Lady, and made them follow their drudgery, for her sake, longer a while than they thought to haue done, in raising a Monument, with the superfluitie of her Fathers prouisions.

Mycerinus, the sonne of Cephrenes, raigned after his Father sixe yeeres. He would haue built as his foregoers did, but preuented by death, finished not what hee had begunne. The people thought him a good King, for that he did set open the Temples, which Cheops and Cephrenes had kept shut. But an Oracle threatned him with a short life of sixe yeeres only, because of this his deuotion; For (said the Oracle) Ægypt should haue beene afflicted an hundred and fiftie yeeres, which thy Predecessors knew, and performed for their parts, but thou hast released it, therefore shalt thou liue but sixe yeeres. It is very strange, that the Gods should bee offended with a King for his pietie; or that they should decree to make a Countrie impious, when the people were desirous to serue them; or that they hauing so decreed, it should lie in the power of a King, to alter destinie, and make the ordinance of the Gods to faile in taking full effect. But these were Aegyptian Gods. The true GOD was, doubtlesse, more offended with the restitution of such Idolatrie, than with the interruption. And who knowes, whether Chemmis did not learne somewhat at Ierusalem, in the last yeere of his Father Sesac, that made him perceiue, and deliuer to those that followed him, the vanitie of his Aegyptian superstition? Sure it is that his raigne, and the raignes of Cheops, and Cephrenes, were more long and more happie, than that of Mycerinus, who, to delude the Oracle, reuelled away both daies and nights, as if by keeping candles lighted, hee had changed his nights into daies, and so doubled the time appointed: a seruice more pleasing to the Deuill, than the restitution of Idolatrie durst then seeme, when it could speede no better. I finde in Reinecctus fiftie yeeres assigned to this King; which I verily beleeue to haue beene some errour of the print, though I finde it not corrected among other such ouer-sights: for I know no Author that giues him so many yeeres, and Reineccius himselfe takes notice of the Oracle, that threatned Mycerinus with a short life, as is before shewed.

Bocchorus is placed next vnto Mycerinus, by Diodore, who speakes no more of him than this, that he was a strong man of body, and excelling his Predecessors in wit. He is spoken of by diuers Authors, as one that loued iustice; and may be taken for that Banchyris, whom Suidas commends in that kinde: Eusebius reckons foure and fortie yeeres of his raigne.

After Bocchorus, one Sabacus an Aethiopian followes, in the Catalogue of Diodore; but certaine ages after him. Herodotus, quite omitting Bocchorus, hath Asychis; who made a sharpe law (as it was then held) against bad debtors, that their dead bodies should be in the creditors disposition, till the debt were paied. This Asychis made a Pyramis of brick, more costly and faire, in his owne judgement, than any of those that the former Kings had raised. Besides this Asychis, Herodotus placeth one Anysis, a blinde man, before the Aethiopian. The raignes of these two are perhaps those many ages, which the Aegyptians, to magnifie their antiquities, accounted betweene Bocchorus and him that followed them. But all this could make but sixe yeeres; and so long doth Functius, so long doth Reineccius hold, that these two Kings, betweene them both, did gouerne. If any man would lengthen this time, holding it vnprobable, bable, that the raignes of two Kings should haue beene so soone spent; he may doe it by taking some yeeres from Sethon or Psammeticus, and adding them to either of these. To adde vnto these, without subtracting from some other, would breede a manifest inconuenience: forasmuch as part of Sesac his raigne, must haue beene in the fift of REHOBOAM; as also the last of Pharao Neco was the fourth of Iehoiakim, and the first of Nebuchadnezzar. For mine owne part I like it better to allow sixe yeeres only to these two Kings, than to loose the witnesse of Herodotus, who, concurring herein with the Scriptures, doth speake of Senacheribs warre: at which time Sethon was King of Aegypt. I will not therefore adde yeeres vnto these obscure names; for by adding vnto these men three yeeres, wee shall thrust the beginning of Sethon out of place, and make it later than the death of Senacherib. In regard of this agreement of Herodotus with the Scriptures, I am the more willing to hold with him, in his Aegyptian Kings. Otherwise it were a matter of no great enuie, to leaue both Asychis and Anysis out of the roll; which were easily done, by placing Sesac lower, and extending his life yet sixe yeeres further, or more, (if the like abridgement shall be required of Psammeticus his raigne) into the yeeres of Rehoboam.

1.King.14.25. 2.Chron.12.v.2.

Of Sabacus the Aethiopian, who tooke the Kingdome from Amyrtis, it is agreed by the most, that he raigned fiftie yeeres. He was a merciful Prince, not punishing all capitall offences with death, but imposing bondage and bodily labour vpon malefactors; by whose toyle he both got much wealth into his owne hands, letting out their seruice to hire, and performed many workes, of more vse than pompe, to the singular benefit of the Countrey. Zonaras calls this King Sua; the Scriptures call him So. Hosea, the last King of Israel, made a League with him against Salmanassar, little to his good: for the Aegyptian was more rich than warlike, and therefore his friendship could not preserue the Israelite from destruction.

It seemes, that the encroching power of the Assyrian, grew terrible to Aegypt about these times; the victories of Tiglath Phulassar, and Salmanassar, hauing eaten so farre into Syria, in the raigne of this one King So or Sabacus. Yea, perhaps it was in his daies (for his raigne beganne in the fourth of Menahem) that Phul himselfe did make the first entrance into Palæstina. This caused So to animate the halfe subdued people, against their Conquerours; but the helpe which he and his Successor gaue them was so faint, that Senacheribs Embassador compared the Aegyptian succour to a broken staffe of Reede. Such indeede had Hosea found it, and such Ezekia might haue found it, had hee not beene supported by the stronger staffe of Him, that rules all Nations with a rod of yron. It appeares by the words of Rabsake, that the opinion was great in Iuda, of the Ægyptian forces, for Charrets and Horse-men; but this power, what soeuer it was, grew needfull, within a little while, for the defence of Ægypt it selfe, which So left vnto Sethon his successor, hauing now fulfilled the fiftie yeeres of his raigne. Herodotus and Diodorus haue both one tale, from the relation of Aegyptian Priests, concerning the departure of this King; saying, that he left the Countrie, and willingly retired into Æthiopia, because it was often signified vnto him in his dreames, by the God which was worshipped at Thebes, that his raigne should be neither long nor prosperous, vnlesse he slew all the Priests in Ægypt; which rather than to doe, he resigned his Kingdome. Surely, these Ægyptian gods were of a strange qualitie, that so ill rewarded their Seruants, and inuited Kings to doe them wrong. Well might the Ægyptians (as they likewise did) worship Dogs as gods, when their chiefe gods had the propertie of Dogs, which loue their Masters the better for beating them. Yet to what end the Priests should haue fained this tale, I cannot tell; and therefore I thinke that it might be some deuice of the fearefull old man, who seeing his Realme in danger of an inuasion, sought an honest excuse for his departure out of it, and with-drawing himself into Æthiopia, where he had beene bred in his youth. What if one should say, that the Æthiopia into which he went, was none other than Arabia, whereof Tirhaka the King (perhaps at the instigation of this man) raised an Armie against Senacherib, when hee meant to inuade Ægypt, within two or three yeeres after? But I will not trouble my ſelfe with ſuch enquirie. This I hold, that So, or Sabacus, was not indeede an Æthiopian (for in his time liued the Prophet Eſay, who mentioneth the antiquitie of Pharaohs houſe) but onely ſo ſurnamed for his education, and becauſe iſſuing from thence, he got the Kingdome from Anyſis, who was his oppoſite. The quiet and milde forme of his Gouernement; his holding the Kingdome ſo long without an Armie; and many other circumſtances argue no leſſe. But whether finally hee betooke to a priuate life, or whether hee fore-went his Life and Kingdome at once, being now very old, it is time that we leaue him, and ſpeake of Sethon his next Succeſſor, who is omitted by Diodore, but remembred by Herodotus, by a ſure token of his hauing beene King.

Of SETHON who raigned with EZEKIA, and ſided with him againſt SENNACHERIB.

THe firſt yeere of Sethons raigne falls into the twelfth of Ezekia, which was the fift of Sennacherib. It was a troubleſome age, and full of danger; the two great Kingdomes of Aſſyria and Ægypt, being then ingaged in a Warre, the iſſue whereof was to determine, whether of them ſhould rule or ſerue. The Aſſyrian had the better men of warre; the Ægyptian better prouiſion of neceſſaries: the Aſſyrian, more Subjects; the Ægyptian, more Friends; and among the new conquered halfe Subjects of Aſſur, manie that were Ægyptian in heart, though Aſſyrian in outward ſhew.

Of this laſt ſort were Ezekia, and his people; who, knowing how much it concerned Pharao, to protect them againſt his owne great Enemie, preferred the friendſhip of ſo neere and mightie a Neighbour, before the ſeruice of a terrible, yet farre remoued King. But herein was great difference, betweene Ezekia and his Subjects: For the good King, fixing his eſpeciall confidence in God, held that courſe of policie, which hee thought moſt likely to turne to the benefit of his Countrie: the multitude of Iudæa, looking into the faire hopes which this Ægyptian league promiſed, were puffed vp with vaine conceits, thinking that all was ſafe, and that now they ſhould not neede to feare any more of thoſe iniuries, which they had ſuffered by the Aſſyrians, and ſo became forgetfull of God, taking counſaile but not of him. The Prophet Eſay complained much of this preſumption; giuing the people of Iuda to vnderſtand, That the Ægyptians were men, and not God, and their Horſes fleſh, and not Spirit; that God himſelfe ſhould defend Iſrael vpon repentance, and that ASSVR ſhould fall by the ſword, but not of man. As for the Aegyptians (ſaid the Prophet) they are vanitie, and they ſhall helpe in vaine, their ſtrength is to ſit ſtill. Eſay 30.1. Eſay 31.v.3. & 8. Eſay 30.7.

According to the Prophets words it came to paſſe. For in the treatie of Confederacie that was held at Zoan, all manner of contentment and aſſurance was giuen to the Iewes, by Sethon, or his Agents, who filled them with ſuch reports, of Horſes and Charets, that they did not looke (as Eſay ſaith) vnto the holy one of Iſrael, nor ſeeke vnto the Lord. But he yet is wiſeſt. Eſay 3.4. Eſay 31.1,2.

After a while came Sennacherib with his Armie, and wakened them out of theſe dreames; for Sethon their good Neighbour, as neere as hee was, did ſeeme farre off, being vnreadie, when his helpe was moſt needfull. It may ſeeme that he purpoſed, rather to make Paleſtina than Ægypt the ſtage, whereon this great Warre ſhould be acted, and was not without hope, that the Aſſyrians and Iewes, weakening one another, ſhould yeeld vnto him a faire aduantage ouer both. Yet he fought with monie; for he ſent Horſes and Camels laden with treaſure, to hire the Arabians, whom

Esay 30.6. Esay calleth a people that cannot profit. These Arabians did not profit indeede; for (besides that it seemes by the same place of Esay, that the rich treasures miscarried, and fell into the enemies hands before any helpe appeared from Tirhaca,) all the strong Cities of Iuda were taken by Sennacherib, except Libna, Lachis, and Ierusalem it selfe, which were in sore distresse, till the sword of God, and not of Man, defeated
Esay 31.9. the Assyrian, who did goe, for feare, to his Tower, that is, he fled to Nineue, where he was slaine.

Concerning this expedition of Sennacherib, Herodotus takes this notice of it: That it was purposed against Ægypt, where the men of warre, being offended with Sethon their King, who had taken away their allowance, refused to beare armes in defence of him and their Country; that Sethon being Vulcans Priest, bemoaned himselfe to his god, who by dreame promised to send him helpers; that hereupon Sethon, with such as would follow him, which were crafts-men, shop-keepers, and the like) marched towards Pelusium; and that a great multitude of field-mice entring the Campe of Sennacherib by night, did so gnaw the bowes, quiuers, and straps of his mens armour, that they were faine the next day to flie away in all haste, finding themselues disarmed. In memorie hereof (saith Herodotus) the statue of this King is set vp in the Temple of Vulcan, holding a Mouse in his hand, with this inscription: Let him, that b holds me, serue God. Such was the relation of the Ægyptian Priests, wherein how farre they swarued from the truth, being desirous to magnifie their owne King, it may easily be perceiued. It seemes that this Image of Sethon was fallen downe, and the tale forgotten in Diodorus his time, or else perhaps, the Priests did forbeare to tell it him (which caused him to omit it) for that the Nation of the Iewes was then well knowne to the world, whereof euery child could haue told, how much falsehood had beene mingled with the truth.

We finde this historie agreeable to the Scriptures, thus farre forth; That Sennacherib King of the Assyrians, and Arabians, (so Herodotus calleth him: the Syrians or peraduenture some borderers vpon Syria, being meant by the name of Arabians) liued in this age, made Warre vpon Ægypt, and was miraculously driuen home. As for that exploit of the Mice, and the great pleasure that Vulcan did vnto his Priest; happy it was (if Sethon were a Priest) that he took his god now in so good a moode. For within three or foure yeeres before this, all the Priests in Ægypt should haue beene slaine, if a merciful King had not spared their liues, as it were halfe against the gods will. Therefore this last good turne was not enough to serue as an example, that might stirre vp the Ægyptians to pietie, seeing that their deuotion, which had lasted so long before, did bring all the Priests into danger of such a bad reward. Rather I thinke, that this Image did represent Sennacherib himselfe, and that the Mouse in his hand, signified Hieroglyphically (as was the Ægyptian manner of expressing things) the shamefull issue of his terrible expedition, or the destruction of his Armie, by meanes which came no man knew from whence. For the vengeance of God, shewed vpon this vngodly King, was indeede a very good motiue to pietie. But the embleme, together with the Temple of Vulcan (being perhaps the chiefe Temple in that Towne where this Image was erected) might giue occasion to such a fable; the Deuill helping to change the truth into a lie, that God might be robbed of his honour. Yet that we may not belie the Deuill, I hold it very likely, that Sethon, finding himselfe in danger, did call vpon his gods, that is, vpon Vulcan, Serapis, or any to whom hee had most deuotion. But so had other of his Predecessors done in the like neede: yet which of them had obtained succour by the like miracle? Surely the Iewes (euen such of them as most were giuen to Idolatrie) would haue beene ashamed of the confidence which they reposed, in the Charets of Ægypt, be- Esay 31.1. cause they were many, and in the Horse-men, because they were very strong; had it beene told them, that Sethon, in stead of sending those Horse-men and Charets, was beseeching Vulcan, to send him and them good luck, or else (for these also were Ægyptian gods) addressing his praiers to some Onyon or Cat. Howsoeuer it was, doubtlesse lesse the prophecie of Esay tooke effect, which said, They shall be all ashamed of the people that cannot profit them, nor helpe, nor doe them good, but shall bee a shame and also a reproch. Such is commonly the issue of humane wisedome, when resting secure vpon prouision that it selfe hath made, it will no longer seeme to stand in need of God.

Some there are who take Sethon to haue beene set downe by Eusebius, vnder the name of Tarachus the Æthiopian; and therefore the twentie yeeres which are giuen to Tarachus, they allow to the Raigne of Sethon. These haue well obserued, that Tarachus the Æthiopian is mentioned in the Scriptures, not as a King of Ægypt, but as a friend to that Countrie, or at least an enemie to Senacherib, in the war last spoken of the Æthiopians (as they are englished) ouer which hee raigned, being indeede Chusites or Arabians. Hereupon they suppose aright, that Eusebius hath mistaken one King for another. But whereas they thinke, that this Tarachus or Tirhaka, is placed in the roome of Sethon, and therefore giue to Sethon the twentie yeeres of Tarachus, I hold them to haue erred on the other hand. For this Æthiopian (as he is called) began his Raigne ouer Ægypt, by Eusebius his accompt, after the death of Senacherib and of Ezekia, in the first yeere of Manasses King of Iuda. Therefore he, or his yeeres, haue no reference to Sethon.

Herodotus forgets to tell how long Sethon raigned; Functius peremptorily, citing no Authour, nor alleaging reason for it, sets him downe thirtie three yeers; many omit him quite; and they that name him, are not carefull to examine his continuance. In this case, I follow that rule which I propounded vnto my selfe at the first, for measuring the Raignes of these Ægyptian Kings. The yeeres which passed from the fift of Rehoboam, vnto the fourth of Iehoiakim, I so diuide among the Ægyptians, that giuing to euery one the proportion allowed vnto him by the Author in whom hee is found, the rest is to be conferred vpon him whose length of Raigne is vncertaine; that is, vpon this Sethon. By this accompt I find the thirtie three yeeres, that are set downe by Functius, to agree very neerely, if not precisely, with the time of Sethons Raigne; therefore I conforme my owne reckoning to his, though I could be content to haue it one yeere lesse. The reason of this computation I shall render more at large, when I arriue at the time of Psammiticus, whereupon it hath much dependance, and whereinto the course of this Historie will shortly bring me, the Ægyptian affaires growing now to be interlaced with the matters of Iuda, to which is meete that I returne.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of MANASSE and his Contemporaries.

MANASSE, the Sonne of Ezekias, forgetting the pietie of his Father, and the prosperitie which followed him, set vp, repaired, adorned, and furnished, all the Altars, Temples, and high Places, in which the Deuill was by the Heathen worshipped. Besides, hee himselfe esteemed the Sunne, the Moone, and the Starres, with all the hoste of Heauen, as gods, and worshipped them: and of all his acts the most abominable was, that he burnt his Sonnes for a Sacrifice to the Deuill Moloch, or Melchor, in the Valley of Hinnon, or Benhennon: wherein was kindled the fire of Sacrifice to the Deuills.

He also gaue himselfe to all kinde of Witchcraft and Sorcerie, accompanied and maintained those that had familiar Spirits, and all sorts of Enchanters: besides, he shed so much innocent bloud, as Ierusalem was replenished therewith, from corner to corner. For all his vices and abominations, when he was reprehended by that aged and reuerent Prophet Esay (who was also of the Kings race, and as the Iewes affirme, the Father-in-law of the King) he caused the Prophet neere vnto the Fountaine of Siloe to be sawne in sunder, with a woodden saw, in the eightieth yere of his life: a cruelty more barbarous and monstrous then hath been heard of. The Scriptures indeede are silent hereof, yet the same is confirmed by Epiphanius, Isidore, Eusebius, and others, too many to rehearse, and too good to be suspected. Therefore the Lord brought vpon them the Captaines of the Hoste of the Kings of ASHVR, which tooke MANASSE, and put him in fetters, and bound him in chaines, and carried him to Babel: Where after he had lien twentie yeere as a captiue, and dispoiled of all honour and hope; yet to his heartie repentance and continuall praier, the God of infinite mercie had respect, and moued the Assyrians heart to deliuer him.

2. Chron. 33. 11.

It is also likely that Merodach, becausse he loued his father Ezechias, was the easilier perswaded to restore Manasse to his libertie and estate. After which, and when hee was againe established, remembring the miseries which followed his wickednesse, and Gods great mercies toward him, he changed forme, detested his former foolish and deuillish Idolatry, and cast downe the Idols of his owne erection, prepared the Altar of God, and sacrificed theron. He repaired a great part of Ierusalem: and dyed after the long raigne of fiftie fiue yeeres. Glycas and Suidas report, that Manasse was held in a case of yron by the Assyrians: and therein fedde with bread of branne and water, which men may beleeue as it shall please their fancies.

§. II.

Of troubles in Ægypt following the death of SETHON. The raigne of PSAMMITICVS.

THat the wickednesse of King Manasses was the cause of the euill, which fell vpon his Kingdome and Person, any Christian must needes beleeue: for it is affirmed in the Scriptures. Yet was the state of things, in those parts of the World, such, at that time, as would haue inuited any Prince (and did perhaps inuite Merodach, who fulfilled Gods pleasure, vpon respect borne to his owne ends) desirous of enlarging his Empire, to make attempt vpon Iuda. For the Kingdome of Ægypt, which was become the pillar, whereon the state of Iuda leaned, about these times was miserably distracted with ciuill dissension, and after two yeeres, ill amended by a diuision of the gouernment betweene twelue Princes. After some good agreement betweene these, eleuen of them fell out with the twelfth of their colleagues, and were all finally subdued by him, who made himselfe absolute King of all. This Inter-regnum, or meere Anarchie, that was in Ægypt, with the diuision of the Kingdome following it, is placed by Diodore, who omitteth Sethon, betweene the raignes of Sabacus, and Psammiticus: but Herodotus doth set the Aristocratie, or twelue Gouernours, immediately before Psammiticus, who was one of them, and after Sethon.

The occasion of this dissension seemes to haue beene the vncertainetie of title to that Kingdome (for that the Crowne of Ægypt passed by succession of bloud, I haue often shewed) which ended, for a while, by the partition of all among twelue, though things were not settled, vntill one had obtained the Soueraignetie.

These twelue Rulers gouerned fifteene yeeres, in good seeming agreement, which to preserue, they made straite couenants and alliances one with another, being jealous of their estate, because an Oracle had foretold, that one of them should depose all the rest, noting him by this token, that he should make a drinke-offering, in Vulcans Temple, out of a Copper goblet. Whilest this vnitie lasted, they joyned together in raising a Monument of their Dominion, which was a Labyrinth, built neere vnto the Lake of Mœris; a worke so admirable, that (as Herodotus, who beheld it, affirmes) no words could giue it commendation, answerable to the statelinesse of the worke it selfe. I will not here set downe that vnperfect description, which Herodotus makes of it, but thinke enough to say, that he preferres it farre before the Pyramides, one of which (as he saith) excelled the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, or any of the faireſt workes in Greece. Diodorus reports this Labyrinth to haue beene the worke of Marus, or Menides, a King which liued fiue generations before Proteus, that is, before the Warre of Troy, and from this Labyrinth (saith hee) Dædalus tooke the patterne of that which hee made for Minos in Creete. Who this Marus, or Menides was, I cannot tell. Reineccius takes him to haue beene Annemenes, which raigned immediately before Tkuoris. But this agrees not with Diodore: for Dædalus and Minos were both dead long before Annemenes was King. Belike Reineccius, desiring to accommodate the fabulous relations of Manethon, Chæremon, and others, that are found in Iosephus, touching Amenophis and his children, to the storie of Amasis, & Actisanes the Æthiopian, mentioned by Diodore; held it consequent, after he had conjectured Manethons Amenophis, to be Diodorus his Amasis; that Sethon should be Actisanes, and that Annemenes should bee Marus. If in this case I might intrude a conjecture; the times which wee now handle, are those, about which Reineccius hath erred in making search; Amasis was Anysis; Actisanes was Sabacus; and Marus was one of these twelue Princes, to whom Herodotus giues the honour of building this famous Labyrinth. For Actisanes the Æthiopian deposed Amasis; Sabacus the Æthiopian deposed Anysis; Actisanes gouerned well, and was milde in punishing offendors; offendors; ſo likewiſe was Sabacus; Marus the next King after Actiſanes built this Labyrinth; and the next (ſauing Sethon, whom Diodore omits, as hauing not heard of him) that ruled after Sabacus, performed the ſame worke, according to Herodotus, who was more likely to heare the truth, as liuing neerer to the Age wherein it was performed. The varietie of names, and difference of times, wherein Diodore beleeued the Prieſts, might bee a part of the Ægyptian vanitie, which was familiar with them, in multiplying their Kings, and boaſting of their antiquities. Here I might adde, that the twelue great Hals, Parlours, and other circumſtances remembred by Herodotus, in ſpeaking of this building, doe helpe to proue, that it was the worke of theſe twelue Princes. But I haſten to their end.

At a ſolemne feaſt in Vulcans Temple, when they were to make their drinke-offerings, the Prieſt, forgetting himſelfe, brought forth no more than eleuen Cups. Hereupon Pſammiticus, who ſtanding laſt, had not a Cup, tooke off his brazen Helmet, and therewith ſupplyed the want. This cauſed all the reſt to remember the Oracle, and to ſuſpect him as a Traitor; yet, when they found that it was not done by him vpon ſet purpoſe, or ill intent, they forbare to kill him, but, being jealous of their eſtate, they baniſhed him into the mariſh Countries by the Sea ſide. This Oracle, and the euent, is held by Diodore as a fable, which I beleeue to haue beene none other: In the reſt Herodotus and Diodore agree, ſaying, that Pſammiticus hyred Souldiers out of Caria and Ionia, by whoſe aide he vanquiſhed his Companions, and made himſelfe ſole King.

The yeeres of his raigne, according to Herodotus, were fiftie foure; according to Euſebius, fortie foure; Mercator, to reconcile theſe two, giues fortie foure yeeres to his ſingle raigne, and ten to his ruling, joyntly with the Princes before ſpoken of. Indeede, he that was admitted, being a man growne (for hee cannot in reaſon be ſuppoſed to haue beene then a yong fellow) into the number of the twelue Gouernours, muſt be thought to haue liued vnto extreme old age, if he ruled partly with others, partly alone, threeſcore and nine yeeres. I therefore yeeld rather to Euſebius; but will not aduenture to cut fiue yeeres from the Ariſtocratie: though peraduenture Pſammiticus was not at firſt one of the twelue, but ſucceeded (either by election, or as next of bloud) into the place of ſome Prince that dyed, and was ten yeeres companion in that gouernement.

Another ſcruple there is, though not great, which troubles this reckoning. The yeeres of theſe Aegyptians, as we finde them ſet downe, are more by one, than ſerue to fill vp the time, betweene the fift of Reboboam, and the fourth of Iehoiakim. This may not be. Wherefore either we muſt abate one yeere from Sethons raigne; that was of vncertaine length; or elſe (which I had rather doe; becauſe Funccius may haue followed better authoritie than I know, or than himſelfe alleageth, in giuing to Sethon a time ſo neerely agreeing with the truth) wee muſt confound the laſt yeere of one raigne, with the firſt of another. Such a ſuppoſition were not inſolent. For no man can ſuppoſe, that all the Kings, or any great part of them, which are ſet downe in Chronologicall tables, raigned preciſely ſo many yeeres as are aſcribed vnto them, without any fractions: it is enough to thinke, that the ſurpluſage of one mans time, ſupplied the defect of anothers. Wherefore I confound the laſt yeere of thoſe fifteene, wherein the twelue Princes ruled, with the firſt of Pſammiticus; who ſurely did not fall out with his Companions, fight with them, and make himſelfe Lord alone, all in one day.

Concerning this King, it is recorded, that he was the firſt in Ægypt, who entertained any ſtrait amitie with the Greekes; that hee retained in pay his Mercenaries of Caria, Ionia, and Arabia, to whom hee gaue large rewards and poſſeſſions; and that he greatly offended his Ægyptian Souldiers, by beſtowing them in the left wing of his Armie, whileſt his Mercenaries held the right wing (which was the more honorable place) in an expedition that he made into Syria. Vpon this diſgrace it is ſaid, that his Souldiers, to the number of two hundred thouſand, forſooke their naturall Countrie of Ægypt, and went into Æthiopia, to dwell there: neither could they be reuoked by kinde Meſſages, nor by the King himſelfe, who ouer-tooke them on the way; but when hee told them of their Countrie, their Wiues, and Children, they anſwered, that their weapons ſhould get them a Countrie, and that nature had enabled them to get other wiues and children.

Countrie

It is alſo reported of him, That he cauſed two Infants to be brought vp in ſuch ſort, as they might not heare any word ſpoken; by which meanes, he hoped to find out, what Nation or Language was moſt ancient; foraſmuch as it ſeemed likely, that nature would teach the children to ſpeake that language, which men ſpake at the firſt. The iſſue hereof was, that the children cried, Beccus, Beccus, which word being found to ſignifie Bread in the Phrygian tongue, ſerued greatly to magnifie the Phrygian antiquitie. Goropius Becanus makes no ſmall matter of this, for the honour of his Low-Dutch; in which the word Becker, ſignifies (as Baker in Engliſh) a maker of bread. He that will turne ouer any part of Goropius his works, may finde enough of this kinde, to perſwade a willing man, that Adam and all the Patriarchs vſed none other tongue than the Low-Dutch, before the confuſion of languages at Babel; the name it ſelfe of Babel, being alſo Dutch and giuen by occaſion of this confuſion; for that there they beganne to babble, and talke, one knew not what.

But I will not inſiſt vpon all that is written of Pſammiticus. The moſt regardable of his acts was the ſiege of Azotus in Palæſtina, about which he ſpent nine and twentie yeeres. Neuer haue wee heard (ſaith Herodotus) that any Citie endured ſo long a ſiege as this; yet Pſammiticus carried it at the laſt. This Towne of Azotus had beene wonne by Tartan, a Captaine of Senacherib, and was now, as it ſeemeth, releeued, but in vaine, by the Babylonian, which made it hold out ſo well.

§. III.

What reference theſe Ægyptian matters might haue to the impriſonment and enlargement of MANASSES. In what part of his raigne MANASSES was taken priſoner.

WEre it certainely knowne, in what yeere of his raigne Manaſſes was taken priſoner, and how long it was before hee obtained libertie; I thinke wee ſhould finde theſe Ægyptian troubles to haue beene no ſmall occaſion, both of his captiuitie and enlargement: God ſo diſpoſing of humane actions, that euen they, who intended onely their owne buſineſſe, fulfilled onely his high pleaſure. For either the ciuill warres in Ægypt that followed vpon the death of Sethon; or the renting of the Kingdome, as it were, into twelue peeces; or the warre betweene Pſammiticus and his Colleagues; or the expedition of Pſammiticus into Syria, and the ſiege of Azotus, might miniſter vnto the Babylonian, either ſuch cauſe of hope, to enlarge his Dominion in the South parts; or ſuch neceſſitie of ſending an Armie into thoſe parts, to defend his owne, as would greatly tempt him, to make ſure worke with the King of Iuda. The ſame occaſions ſufficed alſo, to procure the delinerie of Manaſſes, after he was taken. For hee was taken (as Ioſephus hath it) by ſubtiltie, not by open force, neither did they that apprehended him, winne his Countrie, but only waſte it. So that the Iewes, hauing learned wit, by the ill ſucceſſe of their folly, in redeeming Amazia, were like to be more circumſpect, in making their bargaine vpon ſuch another accident: and the Babylonian (to whom the Aegyptian matters preſented more weighty arguments of hope and feare, than the little Kingdome of Iuda could affoord, had no reaſon, to ſpend his forces, in purſuing a ſmall conqueſt, but as full of difficultie as a greater, whereby hee ſhould compell his mightieſt enemies to come to ſome good agreement; when by quitting his present aduantage ouer the Iewes, hee might make his way the fairer into Ægypt.

Now concerning the yeere of Manasses his raigne, wherein hee was taken prisoner; or concerning his captiuitie it selfe, how long it lasted; the Scriptures are silent, and Iosephus giues no information. Yet I finde cited by Torniellus three opinions, the one of Bellarmine, who thinkes that Manasses was taken in the fifteenth yeere of his raigne; the other of the Author of the greater Hebrew Chronologie, who affirmes, that it was in his twentie seuenth yeere; the third, of Rabbi Kimhi vpon Ezekiel, who saith, that he was fortie yeeres an Idolater, and liued fifteene yeeres after his repentance. The first of these conjectures is vpheld by Torniellus, who reiects the second, as more vnprobable, and condemnes the third as most false. Yet the reasons alleaged by Torniellus in defence of the first, and refutation of the last opinion, are such as may rather proue him to fauour the Cardinall, as farre as he may, (for where need requires, hee doth freely dissent from him) than to haue vsed his accustomed diligence in examining the matter, before hee gaue his judgement. Two arguments he brings to maintaine the opinion of Bellarmine: the one, that Ammon the Sonne of Manasses, is said by Iosephus, to haue followed the workes of his Fathers youth; the other, that had Manasses growne old in his sinnes, it is not like that hee should haue continued, as hee did, in his amendment vnto the end of his life. Touching the former of these arguments, I see no reason, why the sinnes of Manasses might not be distinguished from his repentance in his old age, by calling them workes of his youth, which appeared when he was twelue yeeres old; though it were granted that hee continued in them (according to that of Rabbi Kimhi) vntill he was but fifteene yeeres from death. Touching the second; howsoeuer it be a fearefull thing, to cast off vnto the last those good motions vnto repentance, which we know not whether euer God will offer vnto vs againe; yet were it a terrible hearing, That the sinnes, which are not forsaken before the age of two and fiftie yeeres, shall bee punished with finall impenitencie. But against these two collections of Torniellus, I will lay two places of Scripture, whence it may be inferred, as not vnlikely, That Manasses continued longer in this wickednesse, than Bellarmine hath intimated, if not as long as Rabbi Kimhi hath affirmed. In the second Booke of Kings, the euill which Manasses did, is remembred at large, and his repentance vtterly omitted; so that his amendment may seeme to haue taken vp no great part of his life, the storie of him being thus concluded, in the one and twentieth Chapter. Concerning the rest of the acts of MANASSES, and all that he did, and his sinne that hee sinned, are they not written in the booke of the Chronicles of the Kings of Iuda? The other place is in the foure and twentieth Chapter of the same Booke, where in rehearsing the calamities with which that Nation was punished in the time of Iehoiakim, the great Grand-child of this Manasses, it is said; Surely by the commandement of the Lord came this vpon Iuda, that hee might put them out of his sight, for the sinnes of MANASSE, according to all that hee did, and for the innocent bloud that hee shed (for he filled Ierusalem with innocent bloud) therefore the Lord would not pardon it. Whoso considers well these places, may finde small cause to pronounce it most false, That the repentance and amendment of Manasses was no earlier then fifteene yeeres before his death; or most probable, That when he was twenty seuen yeeres old, he repented, and becomming a new man, liued in the feare of God fortie yeeres after. I will no longer dispute about this matter, seeing that the truth can not be discouered. It sufficeth to say, that two yeeres of ciuill dissension in Ægypt, fourteene or fifteene yeeres following, wherein that Kingdome was weakened, by partition of the Soueraignetie: the warre of Psammiticus against his Associates: and foure and twentie yeeres, of the nine and twentie, wherein the siege of Azotus continued, being all within the time of Manasses, did leaue no one part of his raigne (after the first fifteene yeeres) free from the danger of being oppressed by the Babylonian, whose men of warre had continuall occasions of visiting his Countrie. All which I will adde hereto is this; that the fifteenth of

Manasses

Manaſſes, was the laſt yeere of Sethon in Ægypt, and the one and thirtieth of Merodach his raigne, or (accounting from the death of Aſarhaddon) the twentieth: The ſeuen and twentieth of Manaſſes was the tenth of the twelue Princes, and the three and fortieth of Merodach: his fortieth, was the twentie third of Pſammiticus, and the fift of Nabulaſſar, the ſonne of Merodach in Babylon: but which of theſe was the yeere of his impriſonment, or whether any other, I forbeare to ſhew mine opinion, leſt I ſhould thereby ſeeme to draw all matters ouer violently to mine owne computation.

This was the firſt great maſtrie that the Babylonians had of the Kingdome of Iuda. For though Achaz promiſed Tribute to Salmanaſſar, yet Ezechias neuer payed it. True it is, that hee hoped to ſtay Sennacheribs enterpriſe againſt him, by preſenting him with three hundred talents of ſiluer, and thirtie of gold, beſides the plate which couered the doores and pillars of the Temple. 2. Kings 18.

But Manaſſes being preſſed with greater neceſſitie, could refuſe no tolerable conditions, that the Babylonian would impoſe vpon him; among which it ſeemes, that this was one, (which was indeede a point of ſeruitude) that hee might not hold peace with the Ægyptians, whileſt they were enemies to Babylon. This appeares not onely by his fortifying with men of warre all the ſtrong Cities of Iuda after his returne (which was rather againſt Pſammiticus, whoſe partie hee had forſaken, than againſt the Babylonian, with whom hee had thenceforth no more controuerſie) but likewiſe by that oppoſition, which Ioſias made afterwards to Pharao Neco, in fauour of Nabulaſſar, which had beene againſt all reaſon and policie, if it had not beene his dutie by couenant. Of this I will ſpeake more in conuenient place.

†. IIII.

Of the firſt and ſecond Meſſenian Warres, which were in the raignes of EZEKIA, and MANASSES Kings of Iuda.

NOw concerning ſuch actions as were performed abroad in the world, about theſe times of Manaſſes, the moſt remarkeable were the Meſſenian Warres; which happening in this age, and being the greateſt action performed in Greece, betweene the Troian and Perſian Warres, deſerue not to be paſſed ouer with ſilence.

The firſt Meſſenian Warre beganne and ended in the daies of Ezekias; the ſecond in the raigne of Manaſſes: but to auoide the trouble of interrupting our Hiſtorie, I haue thought it beſt, to rehearſe them both in this place. Other introduction is needleſſe, than to ſay, that the poſteritie of Hercules, driuing the iſſue of Pelops, and the Achæans, out of their ſeates, diuided their lands betweene themſelues, and erected the Kingdomes of Lacedæmon, Argos, Meſſene, and Corinth; all which agreeing well together a while, did afterwards forget the bond of Kindred, and ſought one anothers ruine with bloudie Warres; whereof theſe Meſſenian were the greateſt.

The pretended grounds of the Meſenian Warre, are ſcarce worth remembrance; they were ſo ſleight. Ambition was the true cauſe of it; wherewith the Lacedæmonians were ſo tranſported, that any thing ſerued them as a colour, to accompliſh their greedie deſires. Yet other matter was alleaged; namely, that one Polychares a Meſſenian had ſlaine many Lacedæmonians, for which the Magiſtrates of Sparta deſiring to haue him yeelded into their hands, could not obtaine it. The Meſſenians on the other ſide, excuſed Polychares, for that he was growne frantick, through injuries receiued from Euaphnes a Lacedæmonian. This Euaphnes had bargained to giue paſture to the Cattell of Polychares, and was therefore to receiue part of the increaſe:

but not contented with the gaine appointed, hee sold the Cattaile, and Slaues that kept them, to Merchants, which done, he came with a faire tale to his friend, saying, that they were stollen. Whileſt the lye was yet scarce out of his mouth, one of the slaues that had escaped from the Merchants, came in with a true report of all. The Lacedæmonian being thus deprehended, confeſſed all, and promiſed large amends; which to receiue, he carried the Sonne of Polychares home with him; but hauing him at home, hee villanouſly ſlew him. Wherefore, the Lacedæmonians hauing refuſed, after long ſute made by the wretched Father, to doe him right againſt this Theefe and Murderer, ought not to pick matter of quarrell, out of thoſe things, which hee did in that madneſſe, whereinto they themſelues had caſt him. So ſaid the Meſſenians, & further offered to put the matter to compromiſe, or to ſtand vnto the judgement of the Amphictyones, who were as the generall Counſaile of Greece, or to any other faire courſe. But the Lacedæmonians, who had a great deſire to occupy the faire Countrie of Meſſene, that lay cloſe by them, were not content with ſuch allegations. They thought it enough, to haue ſome ſhew for their doings, which the better to colour, they reckoned vp many old injuries, and ſo without ſending any defiance, ſecretly tooke an oath, to hold warre with Meſſene, till they had maſtered it: which done, they ſeized vpon Amphia, a frontier Towne of that Prouince, wherein they put all to the Sword without mercie, very few eſcaping.

Hereupon the Meſſenians tooke Armes, and were met by the Enemie. A furious battaile was fought betweene them, which ended not vntill darke night, with vncertaine victorie. The Meſſenians did ſtrongly encampe themſelues; The Lacedæmonians, vnable to force their Campe, returned home. This Warre beganne in the ſecond yere of the ninth Olympiad, and ended in the firſt of the fourteenth Olympiad, hauing laſted twentie yeeres. The two enemie Nations tried the matter, for a while, with their proper forces; the Lacedæmonians waſting the inland parts of Meſſene; and the Meſſenians, the Sea-coaſt of Laconia. But it was not long ere friends, on both ſides, were called in to helpe. The Arcadians, Argiues, and Sicyonians, tooke part with Meſſene; the Spartans had, beſides many Subjects of their owne, aide from Corinth, and hired Souldiers out of Crete. So a ſecond, third, and fourth battaile were fought, with as great obſtinacie as the firſt; ſauing that, in the fourth battaile, the Lacedæmonians were enforced to turne their backs; in the other fights, the victorie was ſtil vncertaine, though in one of them the Meſſenians loſt Euphaes their King, in whoſe ſtead they choſe Ariſtodemus.

Many yeeres were ſpent, ere all this bloud was ſhed; for peſtilent diſeaſes, and want of monie to entertaine Souldiers, cauſed the Warre to linger. And for the ſame reaſons, did the Meſſenians forſake all their inland Townes, excepting Ithome, which was a mountaine with a Towne vpon it, able to endure more, than the enemies were likely to doe. But, as ſome Authors tell vs, the Lacedæmonians were ſo obſtinate, in this Warre, becauſe of their vow, that hauing abſented themſelues ten yeeres from Sparta, their wiues ſent them word, that their Citie would grow vnpeopled, by reaſon that no children had beene borne them in all that time: Whereupon they ſent back all their ableſt yong men, promiſcuouſly to accompanie the yong women, who got ſo many of them with child, as they became a great part of their Nation, and were called Parthenians. Diodorus referres the begetting of theſe Parthenians to a former time. But in proceſſe of this Meſſenian Warre, when the Deuill in an Oracle had aduiſed the Meſſenians to ſacrifice a Virgin of the ſtock of Ægyptus*, that ſo they might be victorious againſt the Lacedæmonians; the lot falling vpon the Daughter of one Lyciſcus, Epibolus the Prieſt, willing to ſaue her, ſaid, ſhee was only a foſtered child, and not borne of the wife of Lyciſcus: which anſwere giuing delay to the execution of the Maide, Lyciſcus ſecretly fled away with her into Sparta. Then Ariſtodemus, which afterwards was King, voluntarily offered his owne Daughter: but a yong Noble man, being in loue with the Maide, when otherwiſe he could not preuaile, ſaid openly that ſhee was no Virgin, but that he had defloured floured her, and got her with child: whereupon the Father in a rage ripped vp his innocent Daughters belly, to diſproue the Louers ſlander: at the graue of which Daughter of his, afterward falling, by other ſuperſtitions, into deſpaire of preuailing againſt the Lacedæmonians, he ſlew himſelfe, to the great hurt of his Countrie, which he loued moſt dearely. For after his death the Meſſenians loſt their courage, and finding themſelues diſtreſſed by many wants, eſpecially of victuals, they craued peace; which they obtained vnder moſt rigorous conditions. Halfe the yeerely fruits of their Land they were bound to ſend vnto Sparta; and they, with their Wiues, to make ſolemne lamentations, at the death of euery Spartan King; they were alſo ſworne to liue in true ſubjection to the Lacedæmonians; and part of their Territorie was taken from them, which was giuen to the Aſmæi, and ſuch as had followed the Spartans in this Warre.

This peace being made vpon ſo vneuen termes, was not like to hold long. Yet nine and thirtie yeeres it continued (the Meſſenians not finding how to help themſelues) and then brake out into a new and more furious Warre, than the former. The able yong men, that were growne vp in the roome of thoſe Meſſenians, whom the former Warre had conſumed, beganne to conſider their owne ſtrength and multitude, thinking themſelues equall to the Lacedæmonians, and therefore ſcorning to ſerue ſuch Maſters, as had againſt all right, oppreſſed their Fathers. The chiefe of theſe was Ariſtomenes, a noble Gentleman, of the houſe of Æpytus; who perceiuing the vniforme deſires of his Countrie-men, aduentured to become their Leader. He therefore ſounding the affections of the Argiues, and Arcadians, which he found throughly anſwerable to his purpoſe, began open warre vpon the State of Lacedæmon. This was in the fourth yere of the three and twentieth Olympiad; when the Lacedæmonians, haſted to quench the fire before it ſhould grow too hot, with ſuch forces as they could raiſe of their own, without troubling their friends, meaning to deale with their Enemies, ere any ſuccour were lent them. So a ſtrong battaile was fought betweene them, and a doubtfull; ſaue that the Meſſenians were pleaſed with the iſſue, foraſmuch as they had thereby taught their late proud Lords, to thinke them their equalls. Particularly, the valour of Ariſtomenes appeared ſuch in this fight, that his people would haue made him their King: but he, refuſing the honour of that name, accepted of the burthen, and became their Generall. Within one yeere another battaile was fought, whereunto each part came better prouided. The Lacedæmonians brought with them the Corinthians, and ſome other friends to helpe: the Meſſenians had the Argiues, Arcadians, and Sicyonians. This alſo was a long and bloudie fight; but Ariſtomenes did ſo behaue himſelfe, that finally hee made the Enemies runne for their liues. Of ſuch importance was this victory, that the Lacedæmonians beganne to bethinke themſelues, of making ſome good agreement. But one Tyrtæus an Athenian Poet, whom by appointment of an Oracle they had gotten to direct them, reenforced their Spirits with his Verſes. After this, Ariſtomenes tooke by ſurpriſe a Towne in Laconia, and vanquiſhed in fight Anaxander King of Sparta, who did ſet vpon him, in hope to haue recouered the bootie.

But all theſe victories of Ariſtomenes periſhed, in the loſſe of one battaile, whereof the honour (if it were honour) or ſurely the profit, fell vnto the Lacedæmonians, through the treaſon of Ariſtocrates, King of Arcadia, who being corrupted by the enemies with mony, fled away, and left the Meſſenians expoſed to a cruell butcherie. The loſſe was ſo great, that together with Andania their principal Citie, al the towns in Meſſene, ſtanding too farre from the Sea, were abandoned, for lack of men to defend them, and the Mount Era fortified, whither the multitude, that could not bee ſafe abroad, was conueied, into a place of ſafetie. Here the Lacedæmonians found a tedious worke, that held them eleuen yeeres. For beſides that Era it ſelfe was a ſtrong peece, Ariſtomenes with three hundred ſtout Souldiers, did many incredible exploits, that wearied them, and hindred their attendance on the ſiege. Hee waſted all the fields of Meſſene, that were in the enemies power, and brake into Laconia, taking king away Corne, Wine, Cattaile, and all prouiſions, neceſſarie for his owne people; the Slaues and houſhold ſtuffe he changed into monie, ſuffering the owners to redeeme them. To remedie this miſchiefe the Lacedæmonians made an Edict, that neither Meſſene, nor the adjoyning parts of their owne Countrie, ſhould bee tilled or huſbanded; which bred a great tumult among priuate men, that were almoſt vndone by it. Yet the Poet Tyrtæus appeaſed this vproare with pleaſing Songs. But Ariſtomenes grew ſo bold, that he not onely ranged ouer all the fields, but aduentured vpon the Townes, ſurpriſed, and ſackt Amycle, and finally cauſed the enemies to encreaſe and ſtrengthen their Companies; which done, there yet appeared no likelihood of taking Era.

In performing theſe and other ſeruices, thrice Ariſtomenes was taken priſoner; yet ſtill hee eſcaped. One eſcape of his deſerues to bee remembred, as a thing very ſtrange and maruailous. Hee had with too much courage aduentured to ſet vpon both the Kings of Sparta; and being in that fight wounded, and felled to the ground, was taken vp ſenſeleſſe, and carried away priſoner, with fiftie of his Companions. There was a deepe naturall Caue into which the Spartans vſed to caſt head-long, ſuch as were condemned to die for the greateſt offences. To this puniſhment were Ariſtomenes and his companions adjudged. All the reſt of theſe poore men dyed with their falls; Ariſtomenes (howſoeuer it came to paſſe) tooke no harme. Yet was it harme enough to be impriſoned in a deepe Dungeon, among dead carcaſſes, where he was like to periſh through hunger and ſtench. But after a while hee perceiued by ſome ſmall glimmering of light (which perhaps came in at the toppe) a Foxe that was gnawing vpon a dead bodie. Hereupon hee bethought himſelfe, that this beaſt muſt needs know ſome way, to enter the place and get out. For which cauſe he made ſhift to lay hold vpon it, and catching it by the taile with one hand, ſaued himſelfe from biting with the other hand, by thruſting his coate into the mouth of it. So letting it creepe whither it would, hee followed, holding it as his guide, vntill the way was too ſtrait for him; and then diſmiſſed it. The Foxe being looſe, ranne through an hole, at which came in a little light; and there did Ariſtomenes delue ſo long with his nailes, that at laſt he clawed out his paſſage. When ſome fugitiues of Meſſene brought word to Sparta, that Ariſtomenes was returned home, their tale ſounded alike, as if they had ſaid, that a dead man was reuiued. But when the Corinthian forces, that came to helpe the Lacedæmonians in the ſiege of Era, were cut in peeces, their Captaines ſlaine, and their Campe taken; then was it eaſily beleeued, that Ariſtomenes was aliue indeede.

Thus eleuen yeeres paſſed whileſt the enemies houering about Era, ſaw no likelihood of getting it; and Ariſtomenes with ſmall forces did them greater hurt than they knew how to requite. But at the laſt, a ſlaue, that had fled from Sparta, betraied the place. This fellow had enticed to lewdneſſe the wife of a Meſſenian, and was entertained by her, when her huſband went forth to watch. It happened in a rainie-winter-night, that the huſband came home vnlooked for, whileſt the Adulterer was within. The Woman hidde her Paramour, and made good countenance to her huſband, asking him, by what good fortune he was returned ſo ſoone. He told her, that the ſtorme of foule weather was ſuch, as had made all his fellowes leaue their Stations, and that himſelfe had done as the reſt did; as for Ariſtomenes, he was wounded of late in fight, and could not looke abroad; neither was it to bee feared, that the enemies would ſtirre, in ſuch a darke-rainie-night, as this was. The ſlaue that heard theſe tidings, roſe vp ſecretly out of his lurking hole, and got him to the Lacedæmonian Campe with the newes. There hee found Emperamus his Maſter, commanding in the Kings abſence. To him hee vttered all; and obtaining pardon for his running away, guided the Armie into the Towne. Little or nothing was done that night. For the Allarme was preſently taken; and the extreme darkeneſſe, together with the noiſe of winde and raine, hindred all directions. All the next day was ſpent in moſt cruell fight; one part being incited, by neere hope of ending a long worke; the other inraged by meere deſperation. The great aduantage that the Spartans had in numbers, was recompenſed partly by the aſſiſtance, which women and children (to whom the hatred of ſeruitude had taught contempt of death) gaue to their husbands and fathers; partly by the narrowneſſe of the ſtreets and other paſſages, which admitted not many hands to fight at once. But the Meſſenians were in continuall toile; their enemies fought in courſe, refreſhing themſelues with meat and ſleepe, and then returning ſupplyed the places of their wearie fellowes, with freſh Companies. Ariſtomenes therefore, perceiuing that his men for want of reliefe were no longer able to hold out, (as hauing beene three daies, and three nights, vexed with all miſeries, of labour, watchings, fighting, hunger, and thirſt, beſides continuall raine and cold) gathered together all the weaker ſort, whom he compaſſed round with armed men, and ſo attempted to breake out through the midſt of the enemies. Emperamas Generall of the Lacedæmonians was glad of this: and to further their departure, cauſed his Souldiers to giue an open way, leauing a faire paſſage to theſe deſperate madmen. So they iſſued forth, and arriued ſafe in Arcadia, where they were moſt louingly entertained.

Vpon the firſt bruit of the taking of Era, the Arcadians had prepared themſelues to the reſcue: but Ariſtocrates their falſe hearted King, ſaid it was too late, for that all was alreadie loſt. When Ariſtomenes had placed his followers in ſafetie, he choſe out fiue hundred the luſtieſt of his men, with whom he reſolued to march in all ſecret haſte vnto Sparta, hoping to find the Town ſecure, and ill manured, the people being runne forth to the ſpoile of Meſſene. In this enterpriſe, if he ſped well, it was not doubted, that the Lacedæmonians would be glad to recouer their owne, by reſtitution of that which they had taken from others; if all failed, an honourable death was the worſt that could happen. There were three hundred Arcadians that offered to ioyne with him; but Ariſtocrates marred all, by ſending ſpeedie aduertiſement hereof, to Anaxander King of Sparta. The Epiſtle which Anaxander ſent backe to Ariſtocrates, was intercepted, by ſome that miſtruſted him to whom it was directed. Therein was found all his falſehood, which being publiſhed in open aſſembly, the Arcadians ſtoned him to death, and caſting foorth his body vnburied, erected a monument of his treacherie, with a note: That the Periurer cannot deceiue God.

Of Ariſtomenes no more is remaining to be ſaid, than that committing his people to the charge of his ſonne Gorgus and other ſufficient Gouernours, who ſhould plant them in ſome new ſeat abroad, he reſolued himſelfe to make abode in thoſe parts, hoping to finde the Lacedæmonians worke at home. His daughters hee beſtowed honourably in marriage. One of them Demagetus, who raigned in the Ile of Rhodes, tooke to wife, being willed by an Oracle, to marrie the daughter of the beſt man in Greece. Finally Ariſtomenes went with his daughters to Rhodes, whence he purpoſed to haue trauailed vnto Ardys the Son of Gyges King of Lydia, and to Phraortes King of Media: but death preuented him at Rhodes, where hee was honourably buried.

The Meſſenians were inuited by Anaxilas (whoſe great Grandfather was a Meſſenian and went into Italie after the former war) being Lord of the Rhegians in Italie, to take his part againſt the Zanclæans in Sicilie, on the other ſide of the Straights. They did ſo; and winning the Towne of Zancle, called it Meſſene, which name it keepes to this day.

This ſecond Meſſenian warre ended in the firſt yeere of the twentie eight Olympiade. Long after which time, the reſt of that Nation, who ſtaying at home ſerued the Lacedæmonians, found meanes to rebell; but were ſoone vanquiſhed, and being driuen to forſake Peloponneſus, they went into Acarnania; whence likewiſe, after few ages they were expelled by the Lacedæmonians, and then followed their ancient Countrimen into Italie and Sicilie; ſome of them went into Africa, where they choſe vnto themſelues a ſeat.

It is verie strange, that during two hundred and foure score yeeres, this banished Nation retained their name, their ancient customes, language, hatred of Sparta, and loue of their forsaken Countrie, with a desire to returne vnto it. In the third yeere of the hundred and second Olympiad, that great Epaminondas, hauing tamed the pride of the Lacedæmonians, reuoked the Messenians home, who came flocking out of all quarters, where they dwelt abroad, into Peloponnesus. There did Epaminondas restore vnto them their old possession, and helpe them in building a faire Citie; which, by the name of the Prouince, was called Messene, and was held by them euer after, in despight of the Lacedæmonians, of whom they neuer from thenceforth stood in feare.

§. V.

Of the Kings that were in Lydia and Media, while MANASSES raigned. Whether DEIOCES the Mede were that ARPHAXAD which is mentioned in the Booke of IVDITH. Of the historie of IVDITH.

ARDYS King of Lydia, and Phraortes of the Medes, are spoken of by Pausanias, as raigning shortly after the Messenian warre. Ardys succeeding vnto his father Gyges, beganne his raigne of nine and fortie yeeres, in the second of the fiue and twentieth Olympiad. He followed the steppes of his father, who encroaching vpon the Ionians in Asia, had taken Colophon by force, and attempted Miletus and Smyrna. In like manner Ardys wanne Priene, and assailed Miletus; but went away without it. In his raigne, the Cimmerians, being expelled out of their owne Countrie by the Scythians, ouerranne a great part of Asia, which was not freed from them before the time of Alyattes this mans Grand-child, by whom they were driuen out. They had not onely broken into Lydia, but wanne the Citie of Sardes; though the Castle or Citadell thereof was defended against them, and held still for King Ardys; whose long raigne was vnable, by reason of this great storme, to effect much.

Phraortes was not King vntill the third yeere of the nine and twentieth Olympiad, which was sixe yeeres after the Messenian warre ended; the same being the last yeere of Manasses his raigne ouer Iuda.

Deioces the father of this Phraortes, was King of Media, three and fiftie of these fiue and fiftie yeeres in which Manasses raigned. This Deioces was the first that ruled the Medes in a strict forme, commanding more absolutely than his predecessors had done. For they, following the example of Arbaces, had giuen to the people so much licence, as caused euery one to desire the wholesome seueritie of a more Lordly King. Herein Deioces answered their desires to the full. For he caused them to build for him a stately Palace; he tooke vnto him a Guard, for defence of his person; he seldome gaue presence, which also when he did, it was with such austerity, that no man durst presume to spit or cough in his sight. By these and the like ceremonies he bred in the people an awfull regard, and highly vpheld the Maiestie, which his Predecessours had almost letten fall, through neglect of due comportiments. In execution of his Royall Office, he did vprightly and seuerely administer iustice, keeping secret spies to informe him of all that was done in the Kingdome. Hee cared not to enlarge the bounds of his Dominion, by encroaching vpon others; but studied how to gouerne wel his own. The difference found between this King, and such as were before him, seemes to haue bred that opinion which Herodotus deliuers, that Deioces was the first who raigned in Media.

Herod. lib. 1.

This

This was he that built the great City of Ecbatane, which now is called Tauris; and therefore he ſhould be that King Arphaxad, mentioned in the ſtorie of Iudith, as alſo Ben Merodach, by the ſame accompt, ſhould bee Nabuchodonoſor the Aſſyrian, by whom Arphaxad was ſlaine, and Holophernes ſent to worke wonders, vpon Phud and Lud, and I know not what other Countries. For I reckon the laſt yeere of Deioces to haue beene the nineteenth of Ben Merodach; though others place it otherwiſe, ſome earlier in the time of Merodach Baladan, ſome later, in the raigne of Nabulaſſar, who is alſo called Nabuchodonoſor.

In fitting this Booke of Iudith to a certaine time, there hath much labour beene ſpent with ill ſucceſſe. The raignes of Cambyſes, Darius, Hyſtaſpis, Xerxes, and Ochus, haue beene ſought into; but affoord no great matter of likelihood: and now of late, the times, foregoing the deſtruction of Ieruſalem, haue beene thought vpon, and this age that we haue in hand, choſen by Bellarmine, as agreeing beſt with the ſtorie; though others herein cannot (I ſpeake of ſuch as faine would) agree with him. Whileſt Cambyſes raigned, the Temple was not rebuilt, which in the ſtorie of Iudith, is found ſtanding and dedicated. The other two Perſian Kings, Darius and Xerxes are acknowledged to haue been very fauourable to the Iewes; therefore neither of them could be Nabuchodonoſor, whoſe part they refuſed to take, and who ſent to deſtroy them. Yet the time of Xerxes hath ſome conueniences, aptly fitting this Hiſtorie; & aboue al, the opinion of a few Ancient writers (without whoſe iudgement the authoritie of this Booke were of no value) hauing placed this argument in the Perſian Monarchie, inclines the matter to the Raigne of this vaine-glorious King. As for Ochus, very few, and they faintly, entitle him to the buſineſſe. Manifeſt it is, and granted, that in the time of this Hiſtorie, there muſt be a returne from captiuitie lately foregoing; the Temple rebuilt; Ioacim High Prieſt; and a long peace, of threeſcore and ten yeeres or thereabout, enſuing. All theſe were to bee among the Iewes. Likewiſe on the other ſide, we muſt finde a King that raigned in Niniue, eighteene yeeres at the leaſt; that vanquiſhed and ſlew a King of the Medes; one whom the Iewes refuſed to aſſiſt; one that ſought to bee generally adored as God, and that therefore commanded, all temples, of ſuch as were accounted gods, to be deſtroyed; one whoſe Viceroy or Captaine Generall knew not the Iewiſh Nation, but was faine to learne what they were of the bordering people.

Of all theſe circumſtances; the Prieſthood of Ioacim, with a returne from Captiuitie, are found concurring, with either the time of Manaſſes before the deſtruction of Ieruſalem, or of Xerxes afterward: the rebuilding of the Temple a while before, and the long peace following, agree with the raigne of Xerxes; the reſt of circumſtances requiſite, are to be found all together, neither before, nor after the Captiuitie of the Iewes, and deſolation of the Citie. Wherefore the briefe deciſion of this controuerſie is, That the Booke of Iudith is not Canonicall. Yet hath Torniellus done as much, in fitting all to the time of Xerxes, as was poſſible in ſo deſperate a caſe. For he ſuppoſeth, that vnder Xerxes there were other Kings, among which Arphaxad might be one (who perhaps reſtored and reedified the Citie of Ecbatane, that had formerly beene built by Deioces) and Nabuchodonoſor might be another. This granted; he addes, that from the twelfth yeere to the eighteenth of Nabuchodonoſor, that is fiue or ſixe yeeres, the abſence and ill fortune of Xerxes, in his Gracian expedition (which he ſuppoſeth to haue beene ſo long) might giue occaſion vnto Arphaxad, of rebelling: and that Nabuchodonoſor hauing vanquiſhed and ſlaine Arphaxad, might then ſeek to make himſelfe Lord of all, by the Armie which he ſent forth vnder Holofernes. So ſhould the Iewes haue done their dutie, in adhering to Xerxes their Soueraigne Lord, and reſiſting one that rebelled againſt him; as alſo the other circumſtances rehearſed before, be well applyed to the argument. For in theſe times, the affaires of Iurie were agreeable to the Hiſtorie of Iudith, and ſuch a King as this ſuppoſed Nabuchodonoſor, might well enough bee ignorant of the Iewes, and as proud as we ſhall need to thinke him. But the ſilence of all Hiſtorics, takes away beliefe, from this coniecture: and the ſuppoſition it ſelfe is very hard, that a rebell, whoſe King was abroad, with an Armie conſiſting of ſeuenteene hundred thouſand men, ſhould preſume ſo farre, vpon the ſtrength of twelue hundred thouſand foot, and twelue thouſand Archers on horſebacke, as to thinke that hee might doe what he liſt, yea that there was none other God then himſelfe. It is indeed eaſie to find enough that might be ſaid againſt this deuice of Torniellus: yet if there were any neceſſitie, of holding the booke of Iudith, to bee Canonicall, I would rather chooſe to lay aſide all regard of prophane Hiſtories, and build ſome defence vpon this ground; than, by following the opinion of any other, to violate, as they all doe, the text it ſelfe. That Iudith liued vnder none of the Perſian Kings, Bellarmine (whoſe workes I haue not read, but finde him cited by Torniellus) hath prooued by many arguments. That ſhee liued not in the Raigne of Manaſſes, Torniellus hath prooued very ſubſtantially, ſhewing how the Cardinall is driuen, as it were to breake through a wall, in ſaying that the text was corrupted, where it ſpake of the deſtruction of the Temple foregoing her time. That the Kings Arphaxad and Nabuchodonoſor, found out by Torniellus, are the children of meere fantaſie, it is ſo plaine that it needs no proofe at all. Wherefore we may truly ſay, that they, which haue contended about the time of this Hiſtorie, being well furniſhed of matter, wherewith to confute each other, but wanting wherewith to defend themſelues (like naked men in a ſtony field) haue chaſed Holofernes out of all parts of time, and left him and his great expedition, Extra anni ſoliſque vias, in an age that neuer was, and in places that were neuer knowne.

Iudith c. 2. ver. 23. & 25. Surely, to find out the borders of IAPHETH, which were towards the South, and ouer againſt Arabia; or the Countries of Phud and Lud, that lay in Holofernes his way; I thinke it would as much trouble Coſmographers, as the former queſtion hath done Chronologers. But I will not buſie my ſelfe herewith; hauing already ſo farre digreſſed, in ſhewing who liued not with Manaſſes, that I think it high time, to returne vnto mine owne worke, and rehearſe what others I finde, to haue had their part, in the long time of his Raigne.

§. VI.

Of other Princes and actions that were in theſe times.

THE firſt yeere of Manaſſes was the laſt of Romulus; after whoſe death, one yeere the Romans wanted a King. Then was Numa Pompilius a Sabyne choſen; a peaceable man and ſeeming verie religious in his kinde. He brought the rude people, which Romulus had employed onely in warres, to ſome good ciuilitie, and a more orderly faſhion of life. This he effected by filling their heads with ſuperſtition; as perſwading them, that he had familiarite with a Nymph called Egeria, who taught him a many of Ceremonies, which hee deliuered vnto the Romans as things of great importance. But all theſe deuices of Numa were, in his owne iudgement, no better then meere deluſions that ſerued onely as rudiments to bring the Sauage multitude of theeues and out-lawes, gathered into one bodie by Romulus, to ſome forme of milder diſcipline, then their boyſterous and wilde natures was otherwiſe apt to entertaine. This appeared by the Bookes that were found in his graue, almoſt ſixe hundred yeeres after his death, wherein the Superſtition taught by himſelfe was condemned as vaine. His graue was opened by chance, in digging a piece of ground that belonged to one L. Petilius a Scribe. Two Coffines or Cheſts of ſtone were in it, with an inſcription in Greeke and Latine letters, which ſaid, That Numa Pompilius the ſonne of Pompo, King of the Romans lay there. In the one Coffin was nothing found; his bodie being vtterly conſumed. In the other were his Bookes, wrapped vp in two bundels of wax; of his owne conſtitutions ſeuen, and other ſeuen of Phyloſophie. They were not onely vncorrupted, but in a manner freſh and new. The Pretour of the Citie deſiring to haue a ſight of theſe Bookes, when hee perceiued whereunto they tended, refuſed to deliuer them back to the owner, and offered to take a ſolemne oath that they were againſt the Religion then in vſe. Hereupon the Senate, without more adoe, commanded them to bee openly burnt. It ſeemes that Numa did meane to acquite himſelfe vnto wiſer ages, which he thought would follow, as one that had not beene ſo fooliſh as to beleeue the Doctrine wherein he inſtructed his owne barbarous times. But the poyſon wherewith hee had infected Rome, when he ſate in his Throne, had not left working, when hee miniſtred the Antidote out of his graue. Had theſe Bookes not come to light, vntill the dayes of Tully and Cæſar, when the miſt of ignorance was ſomewhat better diſcuſſed; likely it is that they had not onely eſcaped the fire, but wrought ſome good (and peraduenture generall) effect. Being as it was, they ſerued as a confutation, without remedie, of Idolatrie that was inueterate.

Numa raigned three and fortie yeeres in continuall peace. After him Tullus Hoſtilius the third King was choſen, in the ſix and fortieth of Manaſſes, and raigned two and thirtie yeeres, buſied, for the moſt part in warre. Hee quarrelled with the Albanes, who met him in the field; but in regard of the danger, which both parts had cauſe to feare, that might grow vnto them from the Thuſcanes, cauſed them to bethinke themſelues of a courſe, whereby without effuſion of ſo much bloud, as might make them too weake for a common enemie, it might bee decided, who ſhould command, and who obey.

There were in each Campe three Brethren, Twinnes borne at one birth (Dionyſius ſayes that they were Coſen Germans) of equall yeeres and ſtrength, who were appointed to fight for their ſeuerall Countries. The end was, that the Horatij, Champions for the Romans, got the victory, though two of them firſt loſt their liues. The three Curatij that fought for Alba (as Liuie tels it) were all aliue, and able to fight, yet wounded, when two of their oppoſites were ſlaine; but the third Horatius, pretending feare, did runne away, and thereby drew the others, who by reaſon of their hurts, could not follow him with equall ſpeede, to follow him at ſuch diſtance one from another, that returning vpon them, he ſlue them, as it had beene in ſingle fight, man after man, ere they could ioyne together and ſet vpon him all at once. Dionyſius reports it ſomewhat otherwiſe, telling verie particularly, what wounds were giuen and taken, and ſaying, that firſt one of the Horatij was ſlaine, then one of the Curatij, then a ſecond Horatius, and laſtly the two Curatij, whom the third Horatius did cunningly ſeuer one from the other as is ſhewed before.

This is one of the moſt memorable things in the old Roman Hiſtorie, both in regard of the action it ſelfe, wherein Rome was laid, as it were in wager, againſt Alba, and in reſpect of the great increaſe which thereby the Roman State obtained. For the Citie of Alba did immediately become ſubiect vnto her owne Colonie, and was ſhortly after, vpon ſome treacherous dealing of their Gouernour, vtterly razed, the people being remoued vnto Rome, where they were made Citizens. The ſtrong Nation of the Latines, whereof Alba, as the mother Citie, had beene chiefe, became ere long dependant vpon Rome, though not ſubiect vnto it, and diuers pettie States adiacent, were by little and little taken in: which additions, that were ſmall, yet many, I will forbeare to rehearſe (as being the works of ſundrie ages, and few of them remarkeable conſidered apart by themſelues) vntill ſuch time as this fourth Empire, that is now in the infancie, ſhall grow to bee the maine ſubiect of this Hiſtorie.

The ſeuenth yeere of Hippomenes in Athens, was current with the firſt of Manaſſes. Alſo the three laſt Gouernours for tenne yeeres, who followed Hippomenes, were in the ſame Kings time. Of theſe I find onely names, Leocrates, Apſander, and Erixias. After Erixias yeerely Rulers were elected.

These Gouernours for tenne yeeres, were also of the race of Medon and Codrus, but their time of rule was shortned, and from tearme of life reduced vnto tenne yeeres; it being thought likely that they would gouerne the better, when they knew that they were afterwards to liue priuate men vnder the command of others. I follow Dionysius of Halicarnassus, in applying their times vnto those yeeres of the Olympiads, wherein the Chronological table, following this worke, doth set them. For he not onely professeth himselfe to haue taken great care in ordering the reckoning of times; but hath noted alwaies the yeeres of the Greeks, how they did answere vnto the things of Rome, throughout all the continuance of this Historie. Whereas therefore he placeth the building of Rome, in the first yere of the seuenth Olympiad, and affirmes, that the same was the first yeere of Charops his gouernement in Athens; I hope I shall not need excuse, for varying from Pausanias, who sets the beginning of these Athenians somewhat sooner.

Dion. Halic. l. 1. fol. 43. & 45.

In the Raigne of Manasses it was, that Midas, whom the Poets fained to haue had Asses eares, held the Kingdome of Phrygia. Many fables were deuised of him; especially that he obtained of Bacchus, as a great gift, that all things which he should touch, might immediately be changed into Gold: by which meanes he had like to haue beene starued (his meat and drinke being subiect to the same transformation) had not Bacchus deliuered him from his miserable facultie, by causing him to wash himselfe in the Riuer Pactolus, the streame whereof hath euer since, forsooth, abounded in that precious Metall. Finally, it is said hee died by drinking Buls bloud; being inuaded by the Scythians.

In this age flourished that Antimachus, who (saith Plutarch in the life of Romulus) obserued the Moones Eclipse at the foundation of Rome.

The Milesians, or, (as Eusebius hath it) the Athenians hauing obtayned some power by Sea, founded Macieratis a Citie on the East of Ægypt. Psammiticus herein seemes to haue assisted them, who vsed all meanes of drawing the Greekes into Ægypt, accounting them his surest strength. For neither Miletus nor Athens were now of power sufficient to plant a Colonie in Ægypt by force.

Plut. & Euseb.

About this time Archias with his companion Miscellus, and other Corinthians, founded Syracusa in Sicily, a Citie in after-times exceeding famous.

The Citie of Nicomedia sometime * Astacus, was enlarged and beautified in this age by Zipartes natiue of Thrace. Sybilla of Samus according to Pausanias liued about this time.

About these times also was Croton founded vpon the Bay of Tarentum by Miscellus, the companion of Archias that built Syracusa. Strabo makes it somewhat more ancient: and so doth Pausanias.

About the same time the Parthenians being of age and banished Lacedæmon, were conducted by Phalantus into Italie: where it is said they founded Tarentum: but Iustine and Pausanias find it built before, and by them conquered and amplified: and about the same time Manasse yet liuing, the Citie Phaselis was founded in Pamphylia, Gela in Sicily, Interamne in the Region of the Vmbri, now Vrbin in Italie. About which time also Chalcedon in Asia, ouer against Byzantium (now Constantinople) was founded by the Megarenses: who therefore were vpbraided as blind, because they chose not the other side of Bosphorus. It were a long worke to rehearse all that is said to haue beene done in the fiue and fiftie yeeres of Manasses: that which hath alreadie beene told is enough: the rest being not greatly worth remembrance, may well be omitted, referring onely Ben Merodach, and Nabulassar, to the businesse that will shortly require more mention of them.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of the times from the death of MANASSES to the destruction of Ierusalem.

of AMMON and IOSIAS.

MMON the sonne of Manasse, a man no lesse wicked then was his Father before his conuersion, restored the exercise of all sorts of Idolatrie: for which God hardened the hearts of his owne seruants against him: who slew him after he had raigned two yeeres: Philo, Eusebius and Nicephorus giue him tenne yeeres, following the Septuagint. 2.King.21. 2.Chron.33.

Iosias succeeded vnto Ammon, being but a childe of eight yeeres old. Hee beganne to seeke after the God of Dauid his Father; and in his twelfth yeere he purged Iuda and Ierusalem from the high places, and the groues, and the carued and molten Images: and they brake downe in his sight the Altars of BAALIM: He caused all the Images as well those which were grauen, as molten, to be stampt to powder, and strewed on their graues that had erected them, and this he commanded to be done throughout all his Dominions. Hee also slew those that sacrificed to the Sunne and Moone, and caused the Chariots and Horses of the Sunne to be burnt. Of Iosias it was prophecied in the time of Ieroboam the first, when he erected the Golden Calfe at Bethel, that a child should be borne vnto the house of Dauid, Iosias by name, and vpon thee (said the Prophet speaking to the Altar) shall he sacrifice the Priests of the high places, that burne incenses vpon thee: a prophecie very remarkeable. 2.King.22. 2.Chron.34. 1.King.13.

In the eighteenth yeere of his raigne, hee rebuilt and repaired the Temple, at which time Helkiah the Priest found the Booke of Moses, called Deuteronomie, or, of the Law, which hee sent to the King: which when hee had caused to bee read before him, and considered of the seuere commaundements therein written, the prosperitie promised to those that obserue them, and the sorrow and extirpation to the rest, he rent his garments, and commaunded Helkiah, and others, to aske counsell of the Propheteſſe Huldah, or, Olda, concerning the Booke, who answered the messengers in these words. Thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will bring euill vpon this place, and vpon the inhabitants thereof, euen all the curses that are written in the Booke, which they haue read before the King of Iuda, because they haue forsaken mee, and burnt incense to other Gods. Onely for the King himselfe, because he was a louer of God and of his Lawes, it was promised that this euill should not fall on Iuda and Ierusalem in his dayes, but that hee himselfe should inherit his graue in peace. 2.Chron.34.24. 2.King.22.15. 2.Chron.34.

Iosias assembled the Elders, caused the Booke to bee read vnto them, made a couenant with the Lord, and caused all that were found in Ierusalem and Beniamin to doe the like, promising thereby to obserue the Lawes and commaundements in the Booke contained.

The execution done by Iosias vpon the Altar, idols, monuments, and bones of the false Prophets, at Bethel, argueth his Dominion to haue extended vnto those Countries, Countries, that had beene part of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes. Yet I doe not thinke, that any victorie of Iosias in warre got possession of these places; but rather that Ezekias, after the flight and death of Senacherib, when Merodach opposed himselfe against Asarhaddon, did vse the aduantage which the faction in the North presented vnto him, and laid hold vpon so much of the Kingdome of Israel, as hee was able to people. Otherwise also it is not improbable, that the Babylonian finding himselfe vnable to deale with Psammiticus in Syria (as wanting power to raise the siege of Azotus, though the Towne held out nine and twentie yeeres) did giue vnto Manasses, together with his libertie, as much in Israel as himselfe could not easily defend. This was a good way to breake the amitie that the Kings of Iuda had so long held with those of Ægypt, by casting a bone betweene them, and withall by this benefit of enlarging their Territorie with addition of more than they could challenge, to redeeme the friendship of the Iewes, which had beene lost by iniuries done, in seeking to bereaue them of their owne. When it is said, that Manasses did after his deliuerance from imprisoment, put Captaines of warre in all the strong Cities of Iuda; it may be that some such businesse is intimated, as the taking possession, and fortifying of places deliuered into his hands. For though it be manifest that he tooke much paines, in making Ierusalem it selfe more defensible; yet I should rather beleeue, that he, hauing already compounded with the Babylonian, did fortifie himselfe against the Ægyptians, whose side hee had forsaken, than that hee trauailed in making such prouisions, onely for his minds sake. The earnestnesse of Iosias in the King of Babel his quarrell, doth argue, that the composition which Manasses had made, with that King or his Ancestor, was vpon such friendly tearmes, as required not only a faithfull obseruation, but a thankfull requitall. For no perswasions could suffice to make Iosias sit still, and hold himselfe quiet in good neutralitie, when Pharao Neco King of Ægypt passed along by him, to warre vpon the Countries about the Riuer of Euphrates.

2. Chron. 33. 14.

The last yeere of Iosias his raigne it was, when as Neco the sonne of Psammiticus, came with a powerfull Armie towardes the border of Iudæa, determining to passe that way being the neerest toward Euphrates, either to strengthen the passages of that Riuer, about Carchemish or Cercusium, for the defence of Syria (as long after this; Diocletian is said by Ammianus Marcellinus to haue done) or perhaps to inuade Syria it selfe. For it seemeth that the trauaile of Psammiticus had not beene idlely consumed about that one Towne of Azotus, but had put the Ægyptians in possession of no small part of Syria, especially in those quarters, that had formerly belonged vnto the Adades Kings of Damasco.

2. Chron. 35. 20.

Neither was the industrie of Neco lesse than his Fathers had beene, in pursuing the warre against Babel. In which warre, two things may greatly haue auailed the Ægyptians, and aduanced their affaires and hopes: the extraordinarie valour of the mercenarie Greekes, that were farre better Souldiers than Ægypt could of it selfe afford; and the danger wherein Assyria stood, by the force of the Medes, which vnder the command of more absolute Princes, began to feele it selfe better; and to shew what it could doe. These were great helpes, but of shorter endurance than was the warre; as in place more conuenient shall be noted. At the present it seemes, that either some preparation of the Chaldæans to reconquer, did enforce, or some disabilitie of theirs to make resistance, did inuite the King of Ægypt, into the Countries bordering vpon Euphrates; whither Pharao Neco ascended with a mighty Armie.

These two great Monarchs, hauing their swords drawne, and contending for the Empire of that part of the World, Iosias aduised with himselfe to which of these he might adhere, hauing his Territorie set in the mid way betweene both, so as the one could not inuade the other, but that they must of necessitie tread vpon the very face and body of his Countrie; Now though it were so that Neco himselfe desired by his Embassadors, leaue to passe along by Iudæa, protesting that hee directed himselfe against the Assyrians onely, without all harmefull purpose against Iosias; yet all sufficed not, but the King of Israel would needs fight with him.

Many examples there were, which taught, what little good the friendship of Ægypt could bring to those that had affiance therein: as that of Hosea the last King of Israel, who when he fell from the dependance of the Assyrian, and wholly trusted to Sabacus or Sous King of Ægypt, was vtterly disappointed of his hopes, and in conclusion lost both his life and estate, which the Assyrian, so rooted vp and tare in pieces, as it could neuer after be gathered together or replanted. The calamities also that fell vpon Iuda in the thirteenth and foureteenth yeeres of Ezekia, whilest that good King and his people relied vpon Sethon; and more lately, the imprisonment of Manasses, were documents of sufficient proofe, to shew the ill assurance, that was in the helpe of the Ægyptians, who (neere neighbours though they were) were alwayes vnready; when the necessities of their friends required their assistance. The remembrance hereof might be the reason why Neco did not seeke, to haue the Iewes renew their ancient league with him, but onely craued that they would be contented to sit still, and behold the pastime betweene him and the Assyrians. This was an easie thing to grant; seeing that the countenance of such an Armie, as did, soone after this, out-face Nabulassar, vpon his owne borders, left vnto the Iewes, a lawfull excuse of feare, had they forborne to giue it any checke vpon the way. Wherefore I beleeue, that this religious and vertuous Prince Iosias, was not stirred vp onely by politike respects, to stop the way of Neco; but thought himselfe bound in faith & honour, to doe his best in defence of the Babylonian Crowne; whereunto his Kingdome was obliged, either by couenant made at the enlargement of Manasses, or by the gift of such part as hee held in the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes. As for the Princes and people of Iuda, they had now a good occasion to shew, both vnto the Babylonians, of what importance their friendship was, and to the Ægyptians what a valiant Nation they had abandoned, and thereby made their enemie.

Some thinke, that this action of Iosias, was contrarie to the aduice of Ieremie the Prophet; which I doe not finde in the Prophecie of Ieremie, nor can finde reason to beleeue. Others hold opinion, that he forgat to aske the counsell of God: and this is very likely; seeing hee might beleeue that an enterprise grounded vpon fidelitie and thankfulnesse due to the King of Babel, could not but be displeasing vnto the Lord. But the wickednesse of the people (in whom the corruptions of former times had taken such roote, as all the care of Iosias in reforming the Land, could not plucke vp) was questionlesse farre from harkning how the matter would stand with Gods pleasure, and much farther from enquiring into his secret will, wherein it was determined, that their good King, whose life stood betweene them and their punishment, should now bee taken from among them, and that in such sort, as his death should giue enterance to the miseries ensuing. So Iosias leauying all the strength hee could make, neere vnto Megiddo, in the halfe Tribe of Manasses, encountered Necho: and there he receiued the stroke of death, which lingring about him till hee came to Ierusalem, brought him to the Sepulchers of his Ancestors. His losse was greatly bewailed of all the people and Princes of Iuda, especially of Ieremie the Prophet: who inserted a sorrowfull remembrance thereof into his booke of Lamentations. Lament. c. 4. v. 20.

§. II.

Of PHARAO NECO that fought with IOSIAS: Of IEHOAHAZ and IEHOIAKIM Kings of Iuda.

OF these warres, and particularly of this victorie, Herodotus hath mention, among the acts of Neco. He tels vs of this King, that hee went about to make a channell, whereby Ships might passe, out of Nilus into the Red sea. It should haue reached aboue a hundred miles in length, and beene wide enough for two Gallies to row in front. But in the middest of the worke, an Oracle foretold that the Barbarians should haue the benefit of it, which caused Neco to desist when halfe was done. There were consumed in this toilesome businesse twelue hundred thousand Ægyptians; a losse great enough to make the King forsake his enterprise, without troubling the Oracle for admonition. Howsoeuer it were, he was not a man to be idle; therefore hee built a Fleet, and leauied a great Armie, wherewith hee marched against the King of Babel. In this expedition he vsed the seruice, as well of his Nauie, as of his land-forces; but no particular exploits of his therein, are found recorded, saue onely this victorie against Iosias, where Herodotus cals the place Magdolus, and the Iewes Syrians; which is a small errour, seeing that Iudæa was a Prouince of Syria, and Magdolus or Magdala is taken to haue beene the same place (though diuersly named) in which this battaile was fought. After this, Necus tooke the Citie of Cadytis, which was perhaps Carchemish, by Euphrates, and made himselfe Lord, in a manner, of all Syria, as Iosephus witnesseth.

Ios. Ant. Iud. l. 10. cap. 7.

Particularly we finde, that the Phœnicians, one of the most powerfull Nations in Syria, were his Subjects, and that by his command they surrounded all Africa, setting saile from the gulfe of Arabia, and so passing along all the Coast, whereon they both landed, as neede required, and sowed corne for their sustenance, in that long voyage which lasted three yeeres. This was the first nauigation about Africa, wherein that great Cape, now called, Of good hope, was discouered; which after was forgotten, vntill Vasco de Gama the Portingall found it out, following a contrarie course to that which the Phœnicians held; for they, beginning in the East, ranne the way of the Sunne, South and then Westward, after which they returned home by the pillars and streights of Hercules (as the name was then) called now the straights of Gybraltar, hauing Africke still on the right hand: but the Portingals, beginning their voyage not farre from the same straights, leaue Africke on the Larboord, and bend their course vnto the East. That report of the Phœnicians, which Herodotus durst not beleeue, how the Sunne in this journie was on their right hand, that is, on the Northside of them, is a matter of necessarie truth; and the obseruation then made hereof, makes mee the better to beleeue, that such a Voyage was indeede performed.

But leauing these discourses of Neco his magnificence, let vs tell what hee did, in matters more importing his Estate. The people of Iuda, while the Ægyptians were busie at Carchemish, had made Iehoahaz their King, in the roome of his father Iosias. The Prophet Ieremie cals this new King Shallum, by the name of his younger brother; alluding perhaps to the short Raigne of Shallum King of the tenne Tribes: for Shallum of Israel raigned but one moneth; Iehoahaz no more than three. Hee was not the eldest sonne of Iosias: Wherefore it may seeme that he was set vp as the best affected vnto the King of Babel; the rest of his house being more inclined to the Ægyptian, as appeares by the sequell. An Idolater he was, and thriued accordingly. For when as Neco had dispatched his businesse in the North parts of Syria, then did he take order for the affaires of Iudæa. This Countrie was now so farre from making any resistance, that the King himselfe came to Riblah in the Land of Hamath, where where the matter went ſo ill on his ſide, that Neco did caſt him into bonds and carry him priſoner into Ægypt, giuing away his Kingdome to Eliakim his elder brother, to whom of right it did belong. This Citie of Riblath, in after times called Antiochia, was a place vnhappie to the Kings and Princes of Iuda, as may bee obſerued in diuers examples. Yet here Iehoiakim, together with his new name, got his Kingdome; an ill gaine, ſince he could no better vſe it. But how-euer Iehoiakim thriued by the bargaine, Pharao ſped well, making that Kingdome Tributarie, without any ſtroke ſtricken, which three moneths before was too ſtoute to giue him peace, when he deſired it. Certaine it is, that in his march outward, Neco had a greater taske lying vpon his hands, than would permit him to waſt his forces vpon Iudæa: but now the reputation of his good ſucceſſe at Megiddo, and Carchemiſh, together with the diſſenſion of the Princes Ioſias his ſonnes (of whom the eldeſt is probably thought to haue ſtormed at the preferment of his yonger brother) gaue him power to doe, euen what ſhould pleaſe himſelfe. Yet hee did forbeare to make a conqueſt of the Land; perhaps vpon the ſame reaſon, which had made him ſo earneſt, in ſeeking to hold peace with it. For the Iewes had ſuffered much, in the Ægyptians quarrell, and being left by theſe their friends, in time of need, vnto all extremities, were driuen to forſake thar party, and joyne with the enemies; to whom if they ſhewed themſelues faithfull, who could blame them? It was therefore enough to reclaime them; ſeeing they were ſuch a people, as would not vpon euery occaſion ſhift ſide, but endure more, than Pharao, in the pride of his victories, thought that any hencefforth ſhould lay vpon them: ſo good a Patron did he meane to be vnto them. Neuertheleſſe he laid vpon them a Tribute, of an hundred Talents of ſiluer, and one Talent of gold; that ſo he might both reape at the preſent, ſome fruit of his paines taken, and leaue vnto them ſome document in the future, of greater puniſhment then verball anger, due to them, if they ſhould rebell. So hee departed, carrying along with him into Ægypt the vnfortunate King Iehoahaz, who died in his Captiuitie.

The raigne of Iehoahaz was included in the end of his Fathers laſt yeere; otherwiſe it would hardly be found, that Iehoiakim, his ſucceſſour, did raigne tenne whole yeeres; whereas the Scriptures giue him eleuen, that is current and incomplete. If any man will rather caſt the three moneths of this ſhort raigne, into the firſt yeere of the brother, than into the fathers laſt; the ſame arguments that ſhall maintaine his opinion, will alſo proue the matter to bee vnworthy of diſputation; and ſo I leaue it.

Iehoiakim in impietie was like his brother, in faction he was altogether Ægyptian, as hauing receiued his Crowne at the hand of Pharao. The wickednesſe of theſe laſt Kings, being expreſſed in Scriptures none otherwiſe, than by generall wordes, with reference to all the euill that their Fathers had done; makes it apparent, that the poyſon wherewith Ahaz and Manaſſes had infected the Land, was not ſo expelled by the zealous goodneſſe of Ioſias, but that it ſtill cleaued vnto the chiefe of the people, Yea vnto the chiefe of the Prieſts alſo; and therefore it was not ſtrange; that the Kings had their part therein. The Royall authoritie was much abaſed by the dangers wherein the Countrie ſtood, in this troubleſome age: the Princes did in a manner what they liſted; neither would the Kings forbeare to profeſſe, that they could denie them nothing. Yet the beginning of Iehoiakim had the countenance of the Ægyptian to grace it, which made him inſolent & cruell; as we find by that example of his dealing with Vria the Prophet: though herein alſo the Princes doe appeare to haue beene inſtigators. This Holy man denounced Gods judgements againſt the Citie and Temple, in like ſort as other Prophets had formerly done, and did in the ſame age. The King with all the men of power, and all the Princes, hearing of this determined to put him to death. Hereupon the poore man fled into Ægypt: but ſuch regard was had vnto Iehoiakim, that Vria was deliuered vnto his Embaſſadour, and ſent backe to the death; contrary to the cuſtome vſed, both in thoſe those dayes, and since among all Ciuill Nations of giuing refuge vnto strangers, that are not held guiltie of such inhumane crimes, as for the generall good of mankind should be exempted from all priuiledge.

It concerned Pharao to giue all contentment possible to Ieboiakim: for the Assyrian Lyon, that had not stirred in many yeeres, beganne about these times, to roare so lowd vpon the bankes of Euphrates, that his voice was heard vnto Nilus, threatning to make himselfe Lord of all the Forrest. The causes that hitherto had withdrawne the house of Merodach, from opposing the Ægyptian in his conquest of Syria, require our consideration in this place; before we proceed to commit them together at Charchemish, where shortly after this, the glory of Ægypt is to fall.

§. III.

Of the Kings of Babylon and Media. How it came to passe that the Kings of Babel could not giue attendance on their businesse in Syria; which caused them to loose that Prouince.

MERODACH the sonne of Baladan, who taking the aduantage that Sennacheribs misaduenture and death, together with the dissension betweene his children presented, made himselfe King of Babylon, was eleuen yeeres troubled with a powerfull Enemie Asarhaddon the sonne of Senacherib, raigning ouer the Assyrians in Niniuie; from whom whilest he could not any other way diuert his cares, he was faine to omit all businesse in Syria, and (as hath beene formerly shewed) to make ouer vnto Ezekia, some part of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes. From this molestation, the death of Asarhaddon did not onely set him free, but gaue vnto him some part of Assyria, if not (as is commonly but lesse probably thought) the whole Kingdome. How greatly this was to the liking of the Assyrians, I wil not here stand to enquire: his long raigne following, and his little entermedling in matters of Syria, make it plaine, that he had worke enough at home, either in defending or in establishing that which he had gotten. Iosephus giues him the honour of hauing wonne Niniue it selfe; which we may beleeue; but surely he did not hold it long. For in the times soone following, that great Citie was free, and vanquished Phraortes the Median. Perhaps it yeelded vpon some capitulation: and refused afterwards to continue subject, when the Kings being of the Chaldaan race, preferred Babylon before it.

Some thinke that this was the Assyrian King, whose Captaines tooke Manasses prisoner; but I rather beleeue those that hold the contrarie; for which I haue giuen my reasons in due place. To say truth, I find little cause why Merodach should haue looked into those parts, as long as the Iewes were his friends, and the Ægyptians, that maligned the Northerne Empire, held themselues quiet at home, which was vntill the time of Psammiticus, about the end of this Kings Raigne, or the beginning of his sonne.

Ben Merodach the sonne and successour of this King, is not mentioned in the Scriptures; yet is hee named by good consent of Authours, and that speake little of his doings. The length of his Raigne is gathered by inference to haue beene one and twentie yeeres, for somuch remaineth of the time that passed betweene the beginning of his Fathers and his Nephewes Raignes (which is a knowne summe) deducting the yeeres of his Father, and of his sonne Nabulassar. This (as I take it) was he that had Manasses Prisoner and released him. He sped ill in Syria; where Psammiticus, by the vertue of his Mercinarie Greekes, did much preuaile. This may haue beene some cause that he released Manasses, and did put into his handes some part more of the Kingdome of Samaria: which is made probable by circumſtances alleaged before.

Nabulaſſar that raigned in Babylon after his Father Ben Merodach, had greater buſines in his own Kingdome, than would permit him to looke abroad: inſomuch as it may bee thought to haue beene a great negligence or ouer-ſight of Pſammiticus and Neco, that they did not occupie ſome good part of his Dominions beyond Euphrates. For it was in his time, that Phraortes King of the Medes inuaded Aſſyria, and beſieged Niniue; from whence he was not repelled by any force of Nabulaſſar, but conſtrained to remoue by the comming of Scythians, who in theſe ages did ouer-flow thoſe parts of the World, laying hold vpon all, that they could maſter by ſtrong hand. Of theſe Scythians, and the Lordſhip that they held in Aſia, it is conuenient that I ſpeake in this place; ſhewing briefly afore-hand, how the Medes, vpon whom they firſt fell, were buſied in the ſame times with hopes of conquering Aſſyria.

Phraortes, the ſonne of Deioces, King of the Medes, hauing by many victories enlarged his Dominions, conceiued at length a faire poſſibilitie of making himſelfe Lord of Niniue.

That Citie (as Herodotus reports it) hauing beene a Soueraigne Ladie, was not forſaken of all her dependants; yet remained in ſuch caſe, that of her ſelfe ſhee was well enough. Herod. lib. 1.

This makes it plaine, that howſoeuer Merodach had gotten poſſeſſion of this imperiall ſeat, and made it ſubiect as was the reſt of the Countrie; yet it found the meanes to ſet it ſelfe at libertie: as after this againe he did, when it had been regained by Nabulaſſar his Grand-childe.

Sharpe warre, and the very nouelty of ſuddaine violence, vſe to diſmay any State or Countrie, not inured to the like: but cuſtome of danger hardeneth euen thoſe that are vnwarlike. Niniue had been the Palace of many valiant Kings lately raigning therein; it had ſuffered, and reſiſted, all the furie, wherewith either Domeſticall tumults betweene the ſonnes of Senacherib, or forraigne warre of the Babylonians, could afflict it: and therefore it is the leſſe wonderfull, that Phraortes did ſpeed ſo ill in his iourney againſt it. He and the moſt of his Armie periſhed in that expedition: whereof I find no particular circumſtances (perhaps he vnderualued their forces, and brought a leſſe power than was needfull) It is enough, that we may herein beleeue Herodotus.

Cyaxares the ſonne of Phraortes, a brauer man of warre then his Father, wanne as much of Aſia the leſſe, as lay Eaſtward, from the Riuer of Halys; he ſought reuenge vpon the Aſſyrians for the death of his Father, and beſieged Niniue it ſelfe, hauing a purpoſe to deſtroy it. I rather beleeue EVSEBIVS, That he tooke the Citie, and fulfilled his diſpleaſure vpon it, than HERODOTVS, That the Scythian Armie came vpon him whileſt he lay before it. For where equall authorities are contradictorie (as Euſebius, though farre later then Herodotus, yet hauing ſeene other Authors, that are now loſt, is to be valued according to his great reading) there doe I hold it beſt, to yeeld vnto the beſt likelihoods.

To thinke that the Scythians came vpon Cyaxares, whileſt hee lay before Niniue, were to accuſe him of greater improuidence, then ought to bee ſuſpected in one commended as a good Souldier. But to ſuppoſe that hee was faine to leaue the Towne, when a warre ſo dangerous fell vpon his owne Countrie, doth well agree both with the condition of ſuch buſineſſe as that Scythian expedition brought into thoſe parts, and with the State of the Chaldaan and Aſſyrian affaires enſuing.

The deſtruction of this great Citie is both foretold in the Booke of Tobit, and there ſet downe as happening about theſe times; of which Booke whoſoeuer was the Authour, hee was ancient enough to know the Storie of thoſe ages, and hath committed no ſuch errour in reckoning of times, as ſhould cauſe vs to diſtruſt him in this. As for the Propheſie of Nahum, though it be not limited vnto any certaine tearme, yet it appeares to haue taken effect, in the finall deſtruction of Niniue by Nabuchodonoſor, according to the common opinion. For the Prophet hath mention of a Conqueſt of Ægypt, foregoing this calamitie, whereof we will ſpeake in due place. Some that aſcribe more authoritie then the reformed Churches yeelde, to the Booke of Tobit, are carefull, as in a matter of neceſſitie, to affirme, that about theſe times Niniue was taken; but they attribute (coniecturally) the victorie ouer it, to Ben Merodach: a needleſſe coniecture, if the place of Euſebius be well conſidered. Yet I hold it probable, that Nabulaſſar the ſonne of Ben Merodach, did ſeize vpon it, and place a King or Viceroy therein, about ſuch time as the Countrie of Aſſyria was abandoned by Cyaxares, when the Scythian warre ouerwhelmed Media. For then was the Conqueſt wrought out readie to his hand; the ſwelling ſpirits of the Niniuites were allayed, and their malice to Babylon ſo aſſwaged, that it might be thought a great fauour, if Nabulaſſar, appointing vnto them a peculiar King, took him and them into protection: though afterwards to their confuſion, this vnthankfull people and their King, rebelled againe, as ſhall be ſhewed in the Raigne of Nabuchodonoſor.

§. IIII.

The great expedition of the Scythians, who ruled in Aſia eight and twentie yeeres.

†. I.

The time of this expedition.

NOW that I haue ſhewed what impediment was giuen by the Aſſyrians and the Medes, to the Babylonians, who thereby were much diſabled to performe any action of worth vpon the Ægyptians in Syria; it is time that I ſpeake of that great Scythian expedition, which grieuouſly afflicted not only the Babylonians, but the Medes and Lydians, with the Countries adiacent, in ſuch wiſe, that part of the trouble redounded euen to the Ægyptians themſelues. Of the Scythian people in generall, Herodotus makes very large diſcourſe, but interlaced, as of matter ill knowne, with many Fables; of this expedition he tels many particulars, but il agreeing, with conſent of time. Concerning his fabulous reports, it will be needleſſe to recite them, for they are farre enough diſtant from the buſineſſe in hand. The computation of times which by inference out of his relations, may ſeeme very ſtrange, needeth ſome anſwer in this place: leſt otherwiſe I ſhould either ſeeme to make my ſelfe too bold with an Authour, in citing him after a manner different from his owne tale; or elſe to bee too forgetfull of my ſelfe, in bringing to act vpon the Stage, thoſe perſons, which I had already buried. Eight and twentie yeeres, he ſaith, that the Scythians Raigned in Aſia, before Cyaxares deliuered the Countrie from them. Yet he reports a warre betweene Cyaxares and Halyattes the Lydian, as foregoing the ſiege of Niniue; the ſiege of Niniue being ere the Scythians came. And further he tels, how the Scythians, hauing vanquiſhed the Medes, did paſſe into Syria, and were encountred in Paleſtina by Pſammiticus King of Ægypt, who by gifts and entreatie procured them to depart from him. Theſe narrations of Herodotus may, euery one of them, bee true; though not in ſuch order of time, as hee hath marſhalled them. For Pſammiticus was dead before Cyaxares beganne to Raigne: and Cyaxares had ſpent halfe of his fortie yeeres, ere Halyattes was King of Lydia; ſo that he could not, after thoſe Lydian dian warres, Raigne eight and twentie yeeres together with the Scythians. It is true, that Euſebius doth alſo call Pſammis the ſonne of Pharao Neco, by name of Pſammiticus; and this King Pſammis may, by ſome ſtrained coniecture, bee thought to haue beene he that met with the Scythians: for he liued with both Cyaxares and Halyattes. But Euſebius himſelfe referres all that buſineſſe of the Scythian irruption into Paleſtina, to Pſammiticus the Father of Neco, whom hee leaues dead before the Raigne of Halyattes. Therefore I dare not relie vpon Herodotus, in this matter, otherwiſe then to beleeue him, that ſuch things were in theſe ages, though not in ſuch order as he ſets them downe.

It remaines, that I collect as well as I can, thoſe memorials which I finde of this expedition ſcattered in diuers places: a worke neceſſarie, for that the greatneſſe of this action was ſuch, as ought not to bee omitted in a generall Hiſtorie; yet not eaſie, the conſent of thoſe that haue written thereof, being nothing neere to vniformitie.

I haue noted before, that in the Raigne of Ardys King of Lydia, the Cimmerians ouer-ranne that Kingdome, and were not expelled, vntill Halyattes the Nephew of Ardys got the vpper hand of them. In theſe times therefore of Ardys, Sadiattes, and Halyattes, are we to find the eight and twentie yeeres, wherein the Scythians raigned ouer Aſia. Now foraſmuch as Pſammiticus the Ægyptian had ſome dealings with the Scythians, euen in the height of their proſperitie, wee muſt needs allow more then one or two of his laſt yeeres vnto this their Dominion. But the beginning of Halyattes his Raigne in Lydia, being three and twentie yeeres compleat after the death of Pſammiticus, leaues the ſpace very ſcant, either for the great victories of the Scythians, neceſſarily ſuppoſed before they could meet the Ægyptian in Syria, or for thoſe many loſſes, which they muſt haue receiued ere they could be driuen quite away. To increaſe this difficultie, the victorious Raigne of Nabuchodonoſor in Babylon, is of no ſmall moment. For how may we thinke it poſſible, that he ſhould haue aduentured the ſtrength of his Kingdome againſt the Ægyptians and Iewes, had hee ſtood in daily feare of loſing his owne; to a more mightie Nation, that lay vpon his necke? To ſpeake ſimply as it appeares to me; the victories aſcribed to Cyaxares & Halyattes ouer theſe warlike people, were not obtained againſt the whole body of their Armie, but were the defeatures of ſome troupes, that infeſted their ſeuerall Kingdomes; other Princes, and among theſe, Nabulaſſar hauing the like ſucceſſe, when the pleaſures of Aſia had mollified the courages of theſe hardie Northerne Laddes. Wherefore wee may probably annexe the eight and twentie yeres of the Scythians rule, to as many almoſt the laſt of Nabulaſſars Raigne, in compaſſe whereof their power was at the greateſt. This is all that I can ſay of the time, wherein Aſia ſuffered the violence of theſe oppreſſors.

† II.

What Nations they were that brake into Aſia; with the cauſe of their Iournie.

TOuching the expedition it ſelfe, Herodotus tels vs, that the Cimmerians being driuen out of their Countrie by the Scythians, inuaded and waſted ſome part of Aſia; and that the Scythians not contented with hauing wonne the land of the Cimmerians, did follow them, I know not why, into farre remooued quarters of the world, ſo (as it were by chance) falling vpon Media and Ægypt, in this purſuit of men that were gone another way into Lydia. Hereby we may gather that the Cimmerians were an odious and baſe people; the Scythians, as miſchieuous and fooliſh; or elſe Herodotus, and ſome other of his Countrimen, great ſlanderers of thoſe, by whom whom their Nation had beene beaten, and Ionia, more then once, grieuously ransackt. The great valour of the Cimmerians or Cimbrians is so well known, and their manie Conquests so well testified in Histories of diuers Nations, that the malice of the Greekes is insufficient to staine them with the note of Cowards. These were the posteritie of Gomer, who peopled the greatest part of our Westerne World; and whose reflow did ouerwhelme no small portion of Greece and Asia, as well before and after, as in the age whereof wee doe now entreat. He that would more largely informe himselfe of their originall and actions, may peruse Goropius Becanus his Amazonica; of many things in which Booke, that may be verified, which the learned Ortelius is said to haue spoken, of all Goropius his works, that it is easie to laugh at them, but hard to confute them: There wee find it proued, by such arguments and authorities, as are not lightly to be regarded, that the Cimmerians, Scythians, and Sarmatians, were all of one Linage and Nation; howsoeuer distinguished in name, by reason of their diuers Tribes, professions, or perhaps dialect of speech. Homer indeede hath mention of the Cimmerians; whose Countrie whether he place in the West, as neer vnto the Ocean and boundes of the Earth, Or in the North, as being farre from the Sunne, and couered with eternall darknesse; certaine it is that he would haue them neere neighbours to Hell: for he had the same quarrell to them, which Herodotus had, and therefore belike would haue made them seeme a kinde of Goblins. It was the manner of this great Poet (as Herodotus writing his life affirmes) to insert into his workes the names of such as liued in his owne time, making such mention of them, as the good or ill done by them to himselfe deserued. And for this reason it is proued by Eustathius, that the Cimmerians were so disgraced by him, because they had wasted his Countrie. Perhaps that inuasion of Phrygia by the Amazons, whereof Homer puts a remembrance into Priamus his discourse with Helen, was the very same, which Eusebius noteth to haue happened somewhat before the age of Homer, at what time the Cimmerians with the Amazons, together inuaded Asia.

This is certaine, that both the Amazons and the Cimmerij (who in after-times were called Cimbri) did often breake into Greece and Asia; which though it bee not in expresse tearmes written, that they did with ioynt forces, yet seeing they inuaded the selfe same places, it may well be gathered, that they were companions. One iourney of the Amazons into Greece, mentioned also by Eusebius, was by the straights of the Cimmerians, as we finde in Diodore, who further telleth vs, that the Scythians therein gaue them assistance. The same Authour, before his entrie into those discourses of the Amazons, which himselfe acknowledgeth to bee fabulous, doth report them to haue beene Wiues of the Scythians, and no lesse warlicke than their Husbands; alleadging the example of that Queene, who is said to haue slaine the great Persian Cyrus. That it was the manner of the Cimbri to carrie their wiues along with them to the warres; and how desperate the courage was of those women; the terrible descent of them into Italie, when Marius the Roman ouerthrew them, giues proofe sufficient. I will not here enter into a discourse of the Amazons; other place will giue mee better leisure to speake of them: but seeing that they are noted by diuers Historians to haue belonged vnto the Cimmerians, to the Scythians, and to the Sarmatians, wee may the better approoue Goropius his conclusion, That these three Nations were one, at least that they were neere allies.

Diod. lib. 2. c. 11.

Now concerning the expulsion of the Cimmerians by the Scythians, it appeares to haue beene none other than the sending a Colonie of them forth into Asia, with an Armie of Scythians to helpe them, in purchasing a new seat, and establishing the plantation.

The Sarmatians also were companions in this iournie. For the Citie of Nouogrod in Russia (which Countrie is the same that was called Sarmatia) stood in their way homewards, as shall anon be further shewed. So that all the North was vp in Armes: and therefore it is no maruaile though many Countries felt the weight of this great inundation. Such another voiage was that, which the same people made fiue hundred yeeres and more after this, when they were encountred by the Romans. For they iſſued from the parts about the Lake Mæotis; they were then likewiſe aſſiſted (ſaith Plutarch in the moſt likely report of them) by the Scythians their neighbours; they had in their Armie aboue three hundred thouſand fighting men, beſides a huge multitude of women & children; they wandered ouer many Countries, beating all down before them; and finally, thinking to haue ſetled themſelues in Italie, they diuided their companie, for the more eaſie paſſage thither, and were conſumed in three terrible battailes by the Roman Conſuls. Meere neceſſitie enforced theſe poore Nations, to trouble the World, in following ſuch hard aduentures. For their Countrie, being more fruitfull of men than of ſuſtinance, and ſhut vp on the North ſide with intolerable cold, which denied iſſue that way to their ouerſwelling multitudes; they were compelled to diſcharge vpon the South, and by right or wrong to driue others out of poſſeſſion, as hauing title to all that they had power to get, becauſe they wanted all, that weaker, but more ciuill, people had. Their ſturdie bodies, patient of hunger, cold and all hardneſſe, gaue them great aduantage ouer ſuch as were accuſtomed vnto a more delicate life, and could not be without a thouſand ſuperfluites. Wherefore commonly they preuailed very farre; their next neighbours giuing them free paſſage, that they might the ſooner be ridde of them; others giuing them, beſides paſſage, victuals and guides to conduct them to more wealthie places; others hiring them to depart with great preſents; ſo as the farther they went on, the more pleaſant Lands they found, and the more effeminate people.

Plutarch in the life of Marius.

†. III.

Of the Cimmerians warre in Lydia.

THE firſt Companie of theſe, conſiſting for the moſt part of Cimmerians, held the way of the Euxine Seas, which they had ſtill on the right hand; leauing on the other ſide, and behinde them, the great Mountaines of Caucaſus. Theſe hauing paſſed through the Land of Cholchis, that is now called Mengrelli, entered the Countrie of Pontus, and being arriued in Paphlagonia, fortified the Promontorie whereon Sinope, a famous Hauen Towne of the Greekes, was after built. Here it ſeemes that they beſtowed the weakeſt and moſt vnſeruiceable of their traine, together with the heauieſt part of their carriages, vnder ſome good gard: as drawing neere to thoſe Regions, in conqueſt whereof they were to trie the vtmoſt hazard. For in like ſort afterwards did the Cimbri (of whom I ſpake euen now) diſpoſe of their impediments, leauing them in a place of ſtrength, where Antwerpe now ſtands, when they drew neere into Gaule, vpon which they determined to aduenture themſelues in the purchaſe. From Synope, the way vnto Phrygia, Lydia, and Ionia, was faire and open to the Cimmerians, without any ledge of Mountaines or any deepe Riuers to ſtay their march: for Iris and Halys they had already paſſed. Herod. lib. 4.

What battailes were fought betweene theſe inuaders and the Lydians, and with what variable ſucceſſe the one or other part wanne and loſt, I finde not written nor am able to coniecture. This I find, that in the time of Ardys, the Cimmerians got poſſeſſion of Sardes the Capitall Citie of Lydia; onely the Caſtle holding out againſt them. Further I obſerue, that whereas Herodotus tels of the acts performed by Gyges and Ardys Kings of Lydia, before this inuaſion, and by Halyattes and Crœſus in the times following; all that Ardis did againſt the Cimmerians, and all, ſaue burning the Mileſians Corne fields, that was done in twelue yeres by Sadiattes his Son (who perhaps had his hands ſo full of this buſineſſe, that he could turne them to nothing elſe) is quite omitted: whereby it may ſeeme, that neither of the two did any thing worworthie of remembrance in thoſe warres, but were glad enough that they did not looſe all.

Certainly, the miſeries of warre are neuer ſo bitter and manie, as when a whole Nation, or great part of it, forſaking their owne ſeates, labour to roote out the eſtabliſhed poſſeſſours of another Land, making roome for themſelues, their wiues and children. They that fight for the maſterie, are pacified with tribute, or with ſome ouer ſeruices and acknowledgements, which had they beene yeelded at the firſt, all had beene quiet, and no ſword bloudied. But in theſe migrations, the aſſailants bring ſo little with them, that they need all which the defendants haue, their Lands and Cattell, their houſes and their goods, euen to the cradles of the ſucking infants. The mercileſſe tearmes of this controuerſie arme both ſides with deſperate reſolution: ſeeing the one part muſt either winne, or periſh by famine; the other defend their goods, or looſe their liues without redemption. Moſt of the Countries in Europe haue felt examples thereof; and the mightie Empire of Rome was ouerthrowne by ſuch inuaſions. But our Iſle of Britaine can beſt witneſſe the diuerſitie of Conqueſts; hauing by the happie victorie of the Romans, gotten the knowledge of all Ciuill arts, in exchange of libertie, that was but ſlenderly inſtructed therein before; whereas the iſſue of the Saxon and Daniſh warres, was, as were the cauſes, quite contrarie. For theſe did not ſeeke after the Dominion onely, but the entire poſſeſſion of the Countrie, which the Saxons obtained, but with horrible crueltie, eradicating all of the Britiſh Race, and defacing all memoriall of the ancient inhabitants through the greater part of the Land. But the Danes (who are alſo of the Cimmerian bloud) found ſuch end of their enterpriſe, as it may ſeeme that the Cimmerians in Lydia, and Scythians in the higher Aſia, did arriue vnto. So that by conſidering the proceſſe of the one, we ſhall the better conceiue the fortune of the other. Many battailes the Danes wonne; yet none of ſuch importance, as ſufficed to make them abſolute Conquerours: Manie the Saxons wonne vpon the Danes, yet not ſo great, as could driue them quite away, and backe from hence, after they had gotten firme footing. But in courſe of time, the long continuance euen of vtter enmitie, had bred ſuch acquaintance betweene them, as bowing the natures of both theſe people, made the one more plyant vnto the other. So their diſagreeable qualities, both ill and good, being reduced into one milde temper, no ſmall number of the Danes became peaceable cohabitants with the Saxons, in England, where great ſlaughter had made large roome; others returning home, found their owne Countrie wide enough to receiue them, as hauing disburthened it ſelfe of many thouſands, that were ſent to ſeeke their graues abroad. And ſuch (as I thinke) was the end of the Cimmerian warre in Lydia; whereunto though ſome victorie of Halyattes may haue haſtened the concluſion, yet the weariſome length of time ſeemes to haue done moſt, in compelling them to deſire of reſt. I know not why I ſhould feare to adde hereunto my further coniecture; which is, that the matter was ſo compounded betweene the Cimmerians and Halyattes, that the Riuer of Halys ſhould diuide their Territories. For Halys was henceforth the border of the Lydians, and on the Eaſterne ſide of the Riuer was the Countrie of the Amazons, that is indeed, of the Cimmerians and other Scythian people, whoſe wiues and daughters theſe warlike women are ſuppoſed to haue beene.

And hereunto the quarrell enſuing, betweene Halyattes and Cyaxares the Mede, hath very good reference. For Halyattes (as is ſaid) fought in defence of certaine Scythians, vpon whom the Median ſought reuenge. And it ſtands with reaſon, that the Lydians and Cimmerians, being much weakened with mutuall ſlaughters, ſhould haue joyned in a league of mutuall defence for their common ſafetie: though otherwiſe it had beene dangerous to Halyattes, if he had permitted the Median to extend his Kingdome ſo farre Weſtward, whatſoeuer the pretences might be, of taking reuenge vpon ſuch as had ſpoiled each of their Countries. As for that occaſion of the warre betweene theſe two Kings, which Herodotus relates, I find it of little waight, waight,and leſſe probabilitie. He tels of Scythians, that being chaſed out of their Countrie by faction, came vnto Cyaxares; who committed vnto them certaine Boyes, to be inſtructed in the Scythian tongue, and feate of Archerie. Now it ſo fell out (ſaith he) that theſe Scythians vſing much to hunt, and commonly bringing home ſomewhat with them,did neuertheleſſe otherwhiles miſſe of their game,and come home as they went. Hereupon the King being froward and cholericke, bitterly reuiled them; and they, as impatient as he, killed one of the Boyes that was vnder their charge, whom dreſſing like Veniſon, they preſented vnto him; which done,they fled vnto Halyattes. This Herodotus deliuers, as the ground of a warre that laſted ſixe yeeres betweene the Medes and Lydians; the one King demanding theſe Fugitiues to be deliuered into his hand, the other refuſing to betray ſuch men as were become his ſuppliants. To this I will ſay no more, than that I ſee no cauſe that might induce the Scythians,to betake themſelues to either of theſe Kings, vnto whom their Nation had wrought ſo much diſpleaſure. Particularly they had reaſon to diſtruſt Cyaxares, for the treacherie that he ſhewed in the maſſacring of their Countrie men, that were in his Kingdome; of whom it is now meet that wee ſhould ſpeake.

Herod.lib.1.

†. IIII.

The warre of the Scythians in the higher Aſia.

AS the Cimmerians held their courſe Weſterly, along the ſhores of the Euxine Sea: ſo the Scythians and Sarmatians tooke the other way, and hauing the Caſpian Sea on their left hand, paſſed betweene it and Caucaſus through Albania, Colthene,and other obſcure Nations, where now are the Countries of Seruan and Georgia,and ſo they entered into Media. The Medes encountered them in Armes; but were beaten, and thereupon glad to come to any agreement with them. This was in the time of Phraortes, whileſt Pſammiticus raigned in Ægypt. If it were in the ſixt yeere of Nabulaſſars Raigne ouer Babylon (ſuppoſing him to haue raigned fiue and thirtie;otherwiſe we muſt allow to Ben Merodach what we take from him) then doe the eight and twentie yeeres of their Dominion end, one yeere before the great Nabuchodonoſor was King; ſo giuing him good leaue to prouide ſecurely, for the inuaſion of Syria,which expedition he began while his Father yet liued,as Ioſephus out of Beroſus relates the Hiſtorie.

Now the Medes, deſirous to ſaue themſelues as well as they might, from this terrible Nation, which when they had no luſt to a ſecond triall of the ſword, refuſed not to vndergoe the burthen of a Tribute,but thought nothing diſhonourable, that would ſerue to remooue theſe troubleſome gueſts into ſome other lodging. On the other part, the Scythians finding ſtill the Countries pleaſanter & better,the further that they marched into the South, did ſuffer themſelues to bee perſwaded, that a little more trauaile,would adde a great deale more to their content. For they relied ſo much vpon their owne valour,that they feared no reſiſtance;and being the braueſt men, they thought it reaſon that they ſhould dwell in the beſt Region. That Phraortes perſwaded them into Ægypt, I doe not thinke: Babylon was neere enough; whither if hee could ſend theſe Locuſts to graze, then ſhould not his vnfriendly Neighbours haue cauſe to laugh at his misfortune. What ſhift Nabulaſſar made with them, or that at all he had any dealings with them, I doe not reade. But it is well knowne, that his Dominions lay in the middeſt betweene Media and Ægypt; as alſo, that they made all thoſe parts of Aſia Tributarie; wherefore we may very well beleeue, that they watered their horſes in his Riuers, and that hee alſo was content to giue them prouender.

tooke care that they might not looke vpon Ægypt; leſt the ſight thereof ſhould more eaſily detaine them there, than any force or perſwaſion, that hee could vſe, would ſend them going. Therefore he met them in Syria, preſuming more on the great gifts which he meant to beſtow vpon them, than on his Armie that ſhould keepe them backe. Ægypt was rich; and halfe the riches thereof had not beene ill ſpent in ſauing all. Yet Pſammiticus tooke the moſt likely courſe, whereby to make his part good againſt them by ſtrong hand, in caſe they had beene ſo obſtinate as to refuſe all indifferent compoſition. For hee lay cloſe vpon the edge of the Wilderneſſe in Gaza (as I take it) the Southermoſt border of Paleſtina: whence hee neuer aduanced to meet with the Scythians; but gaue them leaue to feele as much of the ſcalding Sunne-beames, ill agreeing with their temper, as all the length of Syria could beat vpon them. When they were come as farre as Aſcalon, the next Citie to Gaza, then did he aſſay them with goodly words, accompanied with gifts, which were likely to work ſo much the better, by how much the worſe they were pleaſed with the heate of a Climate ſo farre different from their owne. Pſammiticus had at his backe a vaſt wilderneſſe, ouer the ſcorching ſands whereof, the Scythians more patient of cold and wet, than of the contrarie diſtempers, could ill haue indured to purſue him, through vnknowne wayes, had they fought with him and preuailed: eſpecially the Kingdome of Ægypt being ready to entertaine him with reliefe, and them with new trouble at the end of their wearie journie. Wherefore they were content to be intreated, and taking in good part his courteous offers, returned back to viſite their acquaintance in the high Countries. The Ægyptian King (beſids that he preſerued his owne Eſtate from a dangerous aduenture, by hyring this great Armie to depart from him) found all his Coſt well repayed in the proceſſe of his wars in Syria, where the Nations beyond Euphrates had no power to moleſt him, being more then euer troubled themſelues, with the returne of their oppreſſors. For the Scythians, reſoluing now to ſeeke no further, beganne to demaund more than the Tribute formerly impoſed. And not contented to fleece the Naturals with grieuous exactions, they preſumed to liue at diſcretion vpon the Countrie, taking what they liſted from the Owners; and many times (as it were to ſaue the labour of taking often) taking all at once. This Tyrannous Dominion they long vſed ouer the higher Aſia, that is, ouer the Countrie lying betweene the Caſpian and Red Seas; and betweene India and Aſia the leſſe. Happie it was for the poore people, that in ſo large a ſpace of ground, there was roome enough for theſe new comers; otherwiſe the calamitie that fell, as it were by chance, vpon thoſe priuate men, to whoſe wealth any Scythian did beare a fancie, would haue lighted in generall vpon all at one clap, leauing few aliue, and none able to relieue their fellowes. Yet it ſeemes that the heauieſt burthen lay vpon Media; for it was a fruitfull Countrie not farre from their owne home, and lay vnder a Climate well agreeing with the conſtitution of their bodies; there alſo it was that they had the fatall blow, by which their inſolent Rule was taken from them.

Herod. lib. 1. Cyaxares King of the Medes, who in this extremitie was no better then a Rent-gatherer for the Scythians, perceiuing that his Land lay vnmanured and waſte, through the negligence of his people, that were out of heart by daily oppreſſions, and that the matter could not be remedied by open force, reſolued to proue what might be done by ſtratagem. The managing of the buſineſſe is thus deliuered in briefe; That he, and his Medes, feaſted the better part of the Scythians; made them drunke; and ſlew them; recouering heereby the poſſeſſion of all that they had loſt.

Such another ſlaughter was committed vpon the Danes in England; but it was reuenged by their Countrimen, with greater cruelties than euer they had practiſed before. That the Scythians, which eſcaped this bloudy feaſt, made any ſtirre in Media, I doe not find; neither doe I read that either in reuenge hereof, or vpon other pretence, the Medes were troubled by inuaſion from Scythia in time following.

This

This is the more ſtrange, for that the Armie returning home out of Media, was very ſtrong, and encountred with oppoſition (as Herodotus reports it) no leſſe then it had found abroad. Wherefore it may be, that the deuice of Cyaxares to free his Country, tooke good effect, with leſſe bloud-ſhed than hath beene ſuppoſed. For if hee ſurpriſed all the chiefe of them, it was no hard matter to make a good compoſition. Many of them doubtleſſe in eight and twentie yeeres had ſo well ſettled themſelues, that they were deſirous of reſt, and might be permitted, without any danger, to remaine in the Countrie; many (of whom I ſhall ſpeake anon) hauing done what they could in the buſineſſe, for which they came forth, were willing to returne home, with what they had gotten; ſuch as were not pleaſed with either of theſe two courſes, might goe joyne with the Cimmerians in Lydia, or ſeeke their fortunes in other prouinces, among their owne Companions. Whereas all the Families of the North are ſaid to haue beene with Nabuchadnezzar, it may be vnderſtood, that a great part of the Scythians, vpon hope of gaine, or deſire to keepe what they had already gained, were content to become ſubject vnto Nabulaſſar: mens loue of their wealth being moſt effectuall, in taming the more vnquiet loue of inordinate libertie. This is certaine, that Nabuchadnezzar, as euer after, ſo in his firſt beginning of warre, did beate the Ægyptians, who in ages foregoing had beene accuſtomed to deale with the Babylonians after another faſhion: and this new ſucceſſe of that King may be imputed, in regard of humane meanes, to ſuch addition as this of new forces. Herod. lib. 4. Ier. 25. 9.

Of the Scythian Armie returning out of Media, diuers Authours report a Storie, which confirmes mee in the opinion, that this Companie went forth to aſſiſt their kindred and friends, in acquiring a new ſeate, and eſtabliſhing their plantation. For theſe had left their wiues behinde them; a good argument to proue that they meant to come againe. The Scythian women, to comfort themſelues in their husbands abſence, became bed-fellowes to their ſlaues. Theſe got a luſty brood of youths, that were loth to be troubled with Fathers in Law, and therefore prepared to fight with them at their returne. If they were only the children of ſlaues, which compounded an Armie (as Herodotus would haue it, who tels vs, that the Scythians were wont to pull out all their Bond-mens eies) it muſt needs be that they were very Boyes, or elſe that the Women did very little while continue chaſte. Wherefore I rather beleeue that tale as it is told by the Ruſſes themſelues, who agreeing in the reſt with the conſent of Hiſtories, make that report of their Anceſtors returning homewards, which I will ſet downe, as I finde it, in M^r. Doctor Fletcher his exact diſcourſe of the Ruſſe Common-wealth. They vnderſtood by the way, that their Cholopey, or Bond-ſlaues whom they left at home, had in their abſence poſſeſſed their Townes, Lands, Houſes, Wiues, and all. At which newes being ſomewhat amazed; and yet diſdayning the Villanie of their ſeruants, they made the more ſpeed home: and ſo not farre from Nouograd met them in warlike manner marching againſt them. Whereupon aduiſing what was beſt to be done, they agreed alſo to ſet vpon them with no other ſhew of weapon but with their horſe-whips (which as their manner is, euery man rideth withall) to put them in remembrance of their ſeruile condition, thereby to terrifie them, and abate their courage. And ſo marching on, and laſhing all together with their whips in their hands, they gaue the onſet. Which ſeemed ſo terrible in the eares of their Villaines, and ſtrooke ſuch a ſenſe into them of the ſmart of the whip, which they had felt before, that they fled all together like Sheepe before the Druers. In memorie of this victorie, the Nouogradians euer ſince haue ſtamped their Coine (which they call a Dingoe Nouogradskoy, currant through all Ruſsia) with the figure of a Horſeman ſhaking a whip aloft in his hand. It may ſeeme, that all the women of that Countrie, haue fared the worſe euer ſince, in regard of this vniuerſall fault: for ſuch a Pudkey or whip, as terrified thoſe ſlaues, curiouſly wrought by her ſelfe, is the firſt preſent that the Moſcouian Wife, euen in time of wooing, ſends to him that ſhalbe her husband, in token of ſubjection; being well aſſured, to feele it often on her owne loines. But this was a Document vnto the Scythians, or rather Ruſ. Common-w. cap. 4.

Sarmatians,

Sarmatians (for Nouograd stands in the Countrie that was called Sarmatia) to beware of absenting themselues any more so long from their Wiues; which after this, I find not that they did.

Thus much I thought good to set downe of the Scythian expedition; not only because it is the most memorable act performed abroad by that Nation, famous in Histories, and terrible to many Countries; but for that it appeares to haue beene a great cause, of the Ægyptians preuailing hitherto in Syria, and about Iudea, which continues yet a while the centre of our discourse.

§. V.

Of Princes liuing in diuers Countries, in these ages.

HAuing thus farre digressed from the matters of Iuda, to auoide all further occasion of doing the like, I will here insert a note of such Kings and men of marke, as were betweene the death of Manasses, and the ruine of Ierusalem. Of the Ægyptians, Babylonians, Medes, and Lydians, I haue spoken as much, as I thought needfull. In Rome, Tullus Hostilius held the Kingdome, vntill the one and twentieth yeere of Iosias; at which time Ancus Martius succeeding, raigned foure and twentie yeeres. After him L. Tarquinius Priscus, a new-come stranger, but very rich, preuailed so farre by his graciousnesse among the people, that he got the Kingdome to himselfe, disappointing the sonnes of Ancus, ouer whom he was Tutor. He began in the fourth yeere of Zedekia, and Raigned eight and thirtie yeeres. In this time it was, namely, in the second yeere of the thirtieth Olympiad, that the Lacedæmonians, bethinking them how to bee auenged of the Arcadians, who gaue succour to the Messenians against them in the former warre, entred the Territorie, tooke the Citie of Phigalia or Phialia, from whence their Garrisons were soone after beaten out. Cypselus expelling the race of the Bacida, made himselfe Lord of Corinth about these times, and gouerned it in peace thirtie yeeres; leauing for successour his sonne Periander, one of the seuen Sages, but a cruell Tyrant: who among other vile acts, slew his owne wife, and afterwards, as in her honour, stripped all the Corinthian women starke naked, burning their apparell, as an acceptable offering to her Ghost. Hereby we may perceiue, that the wisedome of the Greekes was not excellent in those dayes; when such a one as this could bee admired as excelling all the Countrie.

In these times also were Zaleucus, and Draco, famous Lawgiuers, the one among the Locrians in Italie, the other in the Citie of Athens. The Lawes of Draco were so rigorous, that he was said to haue written them with bloud: for hee rewarded euerie small offence with death. Wherefore his constitutions were soone abrogated, and power giuen to Solon, by the Athenians, to make new in their stead. But the Lawes of Zaleucus were very milde. He forbad any Gentlewoman to walke abroad with more than one Bond-woman attending on her, vnlesse it were when shee was drunke; or to goe forth of the Towne by night, vnlesse it were to some sweet-hearts bed; or to dresse herselfe vp in immodest brauerie, vnlesse it were to inueigle a louer. By which pleasant Ordinances, he effected his desire: for none would seeme, in breaking the Statutes, to be in such case as challenged the dispensation. It is noted in this man as a singular example of justice, that when his owne sonne had committed adulterie, and was therefore to loose both his eyes, he did not cause him to be pardoned, but gaue one eye of his owne to saue the yong man (who also lost one) from vtter blindnesse.

I shall not henceforth need, so farre to wander, as hitherto I often haue done; in pursuing of actions collaterall to the Historie, for inserting them in their order of time.

time. The Chaldæans will ſoone fall vnder the Perſians; the Perſians, ere long, encounter with the Greekes; the Greekes, with the Romans; the Romans, with many Nations. Concerning all theſe, as they ſhall ſucceſſiuely preſent themſelues, in their flouriſhing Eſtate; it will be enough to recapitulate the moſt memorable accidents, that befell them in their Minoritie. But in the long ſpace of more than thirteene hundred yeeres, which paſſed betweene the calling of Abraham, and the deſtruction of Ieruſalem, we finde little matter, wherein the Hiſtorie of Iſrael had any dealing with other Nations, than the very neereſt borderers. Yet reade we of many Kingdomes, that in theſe many ages were erected, and throwne downe; as likewiſe, many memorable acts were performed in Greece and elſewhere, though not following one another at any neere diſtance; all which muſt haue beene quite omitted, or elſe reſerued vnto a very vnſeaſonable rehearſall, had they not beene diſpoſed in this method, whereof he that will not allow the conueniencie, may pardon the neceſſitie.

§. VI.

The oppreſſion of Iudæa, and deſtruction of Ieruſalem by the Chaldæans.

NOW to returne to the Iewiſh Storie, from whence wee haue ſo farre digreſſed. In the third yeere of Iehoiakim, Nabuchodonoſor the ſecond, his Father yet liuing, entred Iudæa with a great Armie, who beſieging and forcing Ieruſalem, made Iehoiakim his Vaſſall in deſpight of Neco, that had eſtabliſhed him King, and tooke with him for pledges Daniel, being as yet a childe, with Ananias, Miſael, and Azarias. Alſo hee tooke a part of the Church treaſures; but ſtaied not to ſearch them throughly; for Necho haſted to the ſuccour of Iehoiakim, hoping to finde Nabuchodonoſor in Iudæa: wherein this great Babylonian had no diſpoſition to hazard himſelfe and his Armie, it being Countrie of an euill affection towards him, as alſo farre off from any ſuccour or ſure place of retrait. If he had, as may be ſuppoſed, any great ſtrength of Scythian horſemen in his Armie; it was the more wiſely done of him, to fall backe, out of the rough, mountainous, and ouer-hot Countrie, into places that were more euen and temperate. But beſides all theſe reaſons, the death of his father, happening at the ſame time, gaue him iuſt occaſion to returne home, and take poſſeſſion of his owne Kingdome, before he proceeded further in the ſecond care, of adding more vnto it. This he did at reaſonable good leiſure: for the Ægyptian was not ready to follow him ſo farre and to bid him battaile, vntill the new yeere came in; which was the fourth of Iehoiakim, the firſt of Nabuchodonoſor, and the laſt of Neco. In this yeere the Babylonian lying vpon the Banke of Euphrates (his owne Territorie bounding it on the North-ſide) attended the arriuall of Necho. There, after a reſolued contention for victorie, Necho was ſlaine, and his Armie remaining forced to ſaue it ſelfe, which full ill it did, by a violent retrait. This victorie Nabuchodonoſor ſo well purſued, as he recouered all Syria, and whatſoeuer the Ægyptians held out of their proper Territorie towards the North. The Ægyptians being in this conflict beaten, and altogether for the preſent diſcouraged, Iehoiakim held himſelfe quiet, as being friend in heart vnto the Ægyptian, yet hauing made his peace with the Chaldæan the yeere before; who contented with ſuch profit as hee could then readily make, had forborne to lay any Tribute vpon Iuda. But this coole reſeruednesse of Iehoiakim, was, on both ſides, taken in ill part. The Ægyptian King Pſammis, who ſucceeded vnto Necho, beganne to thinke vpon reſtoring Iehoahaz, taken Priſoner by his Father, and ſetting him vp, as a Domeſtical Enemie, againſt his vngratefull brother.

Againſt

Against all such accidents, the Iudæan had prepared the vsuall remedy, practised by his fore-fathers: for he had made his owne sonne Iechonia King with him long before, in the second yeere of his owne Raigne, when the Boy was but Eight yeeres olde. As for this rumour of Iehoahaz his returne; the Prophet Ieremie foretold, that it should proue idle, saying: he shall not returne thither, but hee shall die in the place whither they haue led him captiue, and shall see this Land no more. The Ægptians indeed, hauing spent all their Mercinarie forces, and receiued that heauie blow at Carchemish, had not remaining such proportion of sharpe steele, as offaire gold, which without other helpe, is of little effect. The valour of Neco was not in Psammis. Apries who raigned after Psammis, did once aduenture to shew his face in Syria; but after a bigge looke, he was glad to retire, without aduenturing the hazard of a battaile. Wherefore this decaying Nation fought only with braue words, telling such friuolous tales, as men, that meane to doe nothing, vse, of their glorious acts forepassed, against Iosias and Iehoahaz. In this case it was easie for Iehoiakim to giue them satisfaction, by letting them vnderstand the sinceritie of his affection towardes them, which appeared in time following. But Nabuchodonosor went to worke more roundly. He sent a peremptorie message to Iehoiakim, willing him not to stand vpon any nice points, but acknowledge himselfe a Subject, and pay him Tribute: adding hereunto such fearefull threats, as made the poore Iudæan lay aside all thought of Pharaoh, and yeeld to doe, as the more mighty would haue him. So he continued in the obedience of Nabuchodonosor three yeeres. At this time Ieremie the Prophet cried out against the Iewes, putting them in mind that he had now three and twentie yeeres exhorted them to repentance, but because they had stopt their eares against him, and the rest of the Prophets, hee now pronounced their captiuitie at hand, and that they should endure the yoke of bondage full seuentie yeeres. The same calamitie hee threatned to all the neighbouring Nations, to the Ægyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Idumæans, and the rest; foretelling that they should all drinke out of the Babylonian Pitcher, the wine of His furie, whom they had forsaken, and after the seuenty yeeres expired, that the Babylonians themselues should taste of the same cup, and be vtterly subuerted by the Medes, & the Iudæans permitted to return againe into their owne fields and Cities. The first imprisonment of the Prophet Ieremie seemes to haue beene in the fourth yeere of this Iehoiakim, at which time Baruch the Scribe wrote all his Prophecies out of his mouth, whom hee sent to reade them vnto the people, and afterward to the Princes, who offered them to the King: but fearing the Kings furie, they had first set Ieremie at libertie, and aduised him and Baruch to hide themselues.

2. Chron. 36. 9.

Ier. 22. 11. & 12

Ioseph. Antiq. lib. 10. cap. 7.

Ier. 45. 46. 47. 48. 49. 50. 51.

Iehoiakim, after he heard a part of it and perceiued the ill newes therein deliuered, made no more adoe, but did cut the Booke in pieces and cast it into the fire. All which Ieremie caused to be new written, with this addition; that the dead body of Iehoiakim, should be cast out, exposed in the day to the heat, and in the night to the frost, and that there should be none of his seede to sit on the Throne of Dauid.

Time thus running on, while Iehoiakim rested secure of all danger, as Tributarie to the Babylonian, yet well thought of by the Ægyptian; the mightie Citie of Tyre opposed it selfe against the Chaldæan forces; and vpon iust confidence of her owne strength, despised all preparation that could be made against her. Now forasmuch as the terme of seuenty yeeres was prescribed vnto the desolation, as well of Tyre, as of Ierusalem, and other Townes and Countries; it is apparent, that they which referre the expugnation of this Citie vnto the nineteenth yeere of Nabuchodonosor, haue sure authoritie for their warrant. Whereupon likewise it followes of necessitie, that the siege thereof beganne in the seuenth of his Raigne; as hauing lasted thirteene yeeres.

Here I will take leaue to intrude a briefe note, concerning the seuerall beginnings that are reckoned of this great Prince his Rule, whereupon hath risen much disputation. The third yeere of Iehoiakim, was the last of Nabulassar, who being deliuered deliuered from other cares, tooke notice of such as had reuolted from him vnto Pharao Neco, and sent this Noble Prince, his sonne, with an Armie into Syria, to reclaime them. In this expedition was Daniel carried away; who therefore makes mention of the same yeere. The yeere next following, being the fourth of Iehoiakim, was the first of Nebuchadnezzar; which Ieremie affirmeth in expresse wordes; and from this we reckon all his time and actions that follow. In his three and twentieth yeere he conquered Ægypt; and then beganne to raigne as a great Monarch, finding none that durst offend him. The second from this yeere it was, wherein he saw that vision, of the Image consisting of sundrie Metals; which did prefigurate the succession of great Kingdomes, that should rule the Earth, before the comming of Christ. I will not stand to dispute about this, which is the best conclusion that I find, of long disputations: but returne vnto the siege of Tyre, which beganne in the seuenth of his Raigne. Dan.c.1.v.1. Ierem.25.1.

The Citie of Tyre couered all the ground of an Island, that was diuided from the maine, by a deep & broad channell of the Sea. The Chaldæans had no Fleet, and were no Sea-men; the Tyrians, in multitude of goodly Ships, and skill to vse them, excelled all other Nations; and euery wind, from one part or other, brought needfull prouisions into the Citie. Wherefore neither force, nor famine could greatly hurt the place; whereof neuertheleſſe the iudgements of God (denounced against it by Esay, Ieremie, Ezechiel,) had threatned the destruction; and the obstinate resolution of Nabuchodonosor, had fully determined to performe it. This high-minded King, impatient of resistance, vndertooke a vast piece of worke; euen to fill vp the Sea, that parted the Island from the Continent. The Citie of olde Tyrus, that stood opposite to the new, vpon the firme Land, and the mountaine of Libanus neere adioyning that was loaden with Cedars, and aboundance of other trees, might furnish him with materials. Thirteene yeeres were spent, in this laborious, and almost hopelesse businesse. Which needeth not seeme strange: for Alexander working vpon that foundation which was remayning of Nabuchodonosors Peere; and being withall assisted by a strong Fleet, was yet seuen moneths ere he could make way into the Citie. Wherefore, if the raging of the Sea was able to carrie away that wherewith Alexander laboured to couer a shelue; with much more violence could it ouerturne, and as it were consume, the worke of Nabuchodonosor, who laid his foundations in the bottome of the deepe; striuing as it were, to fill the emptie belly of this Cormorant; whereas the Macedonian did only stop the throat of it. Euerie man knowes, God could haue furthered the accomplishment of his owne threats, against this place (though it had not pleased him to vse, eyther miracle, or such of his more immediate weapons, as are Earth-quakes, and the like) by making at least the Seas calme, and adding the fauourable concurrence of all second helpes. But so it pleaseth him oftentimes, in chastising the pride of man, to vse the hand of man; euen the hand of man striuing, as may seeme, against all resistance of nature and fortune. So in this excessiue labour of the Chaldæans, Euerie head was made bald, and euerie shoulder was made bare. Yet Nabuchodonosor would not giue ouer till hee was master of the Towne. Esay 23. Ierem.25. Ezek.26. Ezek.29. Ioseph.Antiq.

When he was entred vpon this desperate seruice; whether it were so, that some losses receiued, some mutinie in his Armie, or (which is most likely; and so Iosephus reports it) some glorious rumours of the Ægyptians, gaue courage to his euill willers; Iehoiakim renounced his subiection, and beganne to hope for the contrarie of that which quickly fell out. For Nabuchodonosor gaue him no leisure to doe much hurt: but with part of his Armie marched directly into Iudæa; where the amazed King made so little resistance (the Ægyptians hauing left him, as it were in a dreame) that he entred Ierusalem, and laied hands on Iehoiakim: whom hee first bound and determined to send to Babylon, but changing counsell, hee caused him to be slaine in the place, and gaue him the Sepulchre of an Asse, to bee deuoured by beasts and rauenous birds, according to the former Prophecies: leauing in his place, Iehoiakim or Iechonias Iud.l.10.c.7.

Iechonias his ſonne; whom after three moneths and ten dayes, Nabuchodonoſor remoued, and ſent Priſoner to Babylon, with Ezekiel, Mardochaus, and Ioſedech, the high Prieſt. The mother of Iechonias, together with his ſeruants, Eunuchs, and all the ableſt men, and beſt Artificers of the Land, were alſo then carryed away Captiues. This Iechonias, following the counſell of Ieremie the Prophet, made no reſiſtance, but ſubmitted himſelfe to the Kings will: wherein hee both pleaſed God, and did that which was beſt for himſelfe; though at the preſent it might ſeeme otherwiſe, to ſuch as conſidered the euill that befell him, rather then the greater euill that he thereby auoided. This onely particular act of his is recorded; which was good. But it ſeemes that he was partaker, at leaſt, of his Fathers faults, if not an inſtigator: which was the cauſe, that his ſubmitting himſelfe to Gods pleaſure did not preſerue his Eſtate: for ſo we reade in generall wordes, that he did euill in the ſight of the Lord, according to all that his Father had done. In his ſtead Nabuchodonoſor eſtabliſhed Mathania his Vncle in the Kingdome of Iuda, and called him Zedechias, which is as much to ſay, as the Iuſtice of God. For like as Neco, King of Ægypt, had formerly diſplaced Iehoahaz, after his Father Ioſias was ſlaine, and ſet vp Iehoiakim, the ſonne of another Mother; ſo Nabuchodonoſor ſlue Iehoiakim, who depended on the Ægyptians, and carrying his ſonne Iechonias Priſoner to Babel, gaue the Kingdome to this Zedechias, that was whole Brother to that Iehoahaz, whom Neco tooke with him into Ægypt. From Zedechias hee required an oath for his faithfull obedience, which Zedechias gaue him, and called the liuing God to witneſſe in the ſame, that he would remaine aſſured to the Kings of Chaldea.

In the firſt yeere of Zedechias, Ieremie ſaw and expounded the Viſion of the ripe and rotten Grapes, the one ſignifying thoſe Iudæans that were carried away captiue, the other thoſe that ſtayed, and were deſtroyed.

In the fourth of Zedechias, Ieremie wrote in a Booke all the euill that ſhould fall vpon Babylon, which Book or ſcrole he gaue to Sheraia, when he went with the King Zedechias to Babylon, to viſit Nabuchodonoſor; willing him firſt to reade it to the Captiue Iewes, and then to bind it to a ſtone, and caſt it into Euphrates, pronouncing theſe wordes: Thus ſhall Babel be drowned, and ſhall not riſe from the euill that I will bring vpon her. This iournie of Zedechias to Babel is probably thought to haue beene in way of viſitation, carrying ſome preſents. But I further thinke, that hee had ſome ſuite there to make, which his Lordly Maſter refuſed to grant, and ſent him away diſcontented. For at his returne all the bordering Princes ſent Meſſengers to him, inciting him (as it ſeemes) to thoſe vnquiet courſes, from which Ieremie dehorted both him and them. The Prophet, by Gods appointment, made bonds and yokes; one of which he wore about his owne neck, others hee ſent vnto the fiue Kings of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, and Zidon, by thoſe Meſſengers which came to viſite Zedechias: making them know, that if they and the Kings of Iuda abode in the obedience of Babylon, they ſhould then poſſeſſe and enioy their owne Countries; if not, they ſhould aſſuredly periſh by the ſword, by fire, and by peſtilence.

Ier.27.

Hee alſo fore-told them, that thoſe Veſſells, which as yet remayned in Ieruſalem, ſhould alſo trauaile after the reſt, and at length they ſhould bee reſtored againe.

The ſame yeere Ananias, the falſe Prophet, tooke off the woodden Chaine which Ieremie ware, in ſigne of the Captiuitie of the Iewes, and brake it: Vaunting, that in like manner, after two yeeres, God would breake the ſtrength of Babel, and the yoke which he layed on all Nations; reſtore Iechonias, and all the Iewes, with the Veſſells and riches of the Temple, and giue an end to all theſe troubles. But Ieremie in ſtead of his woodden Yoke ware a Coller of yron: and in ſigne that Ananias had giuen a deceitfull and falſe hope to the people, hee fore-told the death of this cold Prophet, which ſeized vpon him in the ſecond moneth. After this, when Zedechias had wauered long enough betweene Faith and Paſſion, in the eight yeere of his Raigne he practiſed more ſeriouſly againſt Nabuchodonoſor, with his Neighbours

the Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, Tyrians, and others that were promiſed great aides of the Ægyptians: in confidence of whoſe reſiſtance, he determined to ſhake off the Babylonian yoke. Hereof when Nabuchodonoſor had knowledge, hee marched with his Armie in the dead Winter, toward Ieruſalem, and beſieged it. Ieremie perſwaded Zedechias to render the Citie and himſelfe: but being confident of the helpe from Ægypt, and being perſwaded by his Counſellors, and falſe Prophets, that it was vnpoſſible that the Kingdome of Iuda ſhould bee extirpate, vntill the comming of Silo (according to the Prophecie of Iacob) hee deſpiſed the wordes of Ieremie, and impriſoned him. For Ieremie had told the King, that the Citie ſhould be taken and burnt; that the King ſhould not eſcape, but bee taken Priſoner, and brought to the preſence of Nabuchodonoſor; that he ſhould not periſh by the ſword, but being carried to Babel, die his naturall death. Gen 49.10. Ier.32. & 34.

Ieruſalem being, the following yeere, ſurrounded by Nabuchodonoſors Armie; the King of Ægypt, Pharao Hophra, according to Ieremie (Herodotus calleth him Apries) entred the border of Iuda, with his Armie, to ſuccour Zedechias, of whoſe reuolt he had beene the principall Author. But Ieremie gaue the Iewes faithfull counſell, willing them not to haue any truſt in the ſuccours of Ægypt: for hee aſſured them, that they ſhould returne againe, and in no ſort relieue them. And it fell out accordingly. For when the Chaldeans remoued from Ieruſalem to encounter the Ægyptians, theſe vaunting Patrons abandoned their enterpriſe, and taking Gaza in their way homeward returned into Ægypt, as if they had already done enough; leauing the poore people of Ieruſalem to their deſtined miſeries. Jer.44. Herod.lib.2.

In the meane while the Iewes, who, in their firſt extremitie, had manumiſed their Hebrew Bond-men (as Gods Law required at the yere of Iubile) and made them free, thereby the better to encourage them to fight; did now vpon the breaking vp of the Chaldean Armie, repent them of their Charitie: and thinking all had beene at an end, held them perforce to their former ſlauerie. But the Chaldees being returned to the ſiege, the Prophet Ieremie, when the State of Ieruſalem beganne now to grow to extremitie, counſelled Zedechias to render himſelfe vnto them; aſſuring him of his owne life, and the ſafetie of the Citie, if he would ſo doe. But his obſtinate heart conducted him to that wretched end, which his neglect of God, and his infidelitie and periurie, had prouided for him. Leuit.25.39. 40. &c. Ier.34. Ier.39.

Three and twentie Moneths (as ſome doe reckon it) or according to Ioſephus eighteene; the Babylonian Armie lay before Ieruſalem, and held it exceeding ſtraightly beſieged. For they built Forts againſt it round about, or (as P. Martyr hath it) extruxerunt contra eam turrem ligneam per circuitum: They ſurrounded the Citie with wooden Towers, ſo as the beſieged could neither ſally out, nor receiue into the Citie any ſupply of men or victualls. Ioſephus reports, that they ouer-topped the Walls, with high Towers raiſed vpon mounts; from which they did ſo beat vpon the Wall with their Engines, that the defendants were compelled to forſake their ſtations. Now although it were ſo that the beſieged alſo raiſed Counter-buildings, like vnto theſe, Yet the great King of Babel, who commanded all the Regions thereabouts, and had the Woods and Riuers to obey him, found meanes to ouer-throw all the Citizens endeuours; and to beat downe as faſt from without, as they raiſed from within; the body and foundation of his owne workes being guarded, by the Walls of Ieruſalem interpoſed; and theirs within, layed open to their enemies diſturbance. Beſides, both famine and peſtilence (which commonly accompanie men ſtreightly beſieged) grew on faſt vpon them, whereby, when the number, ſtrength, and courage of the Iewes failed, the Chaldeans made a breach, and forcing an entry, their Princes did ſeat themſelues, as Lords of the Towne, in the middle gate. Zedechias beholding this vncomfortable ſight, and finding no remedie of the danger preſent, loſt both his courage and his hope at once; and ſhifted himſelfe together with his Wiues, Children, Princes, and principall Seruants, out of the Citie, by a way vnder ground, leauing his amazed & guideleſſe people, to the merciles ſwords 2.King.25.1. Ioſeph. Ant.Iud. lib.10.cap.11.

of their enemies. Thus he, who, when Ieremie the Prophet perswaded him to render himselfe, despised both the Counsell of God, and the force of Nabuchodonosor; vsed now that remedie, which Wolphius truly tearmeth: triste, turpe, & infaustum: Woefull, shamefull, and vnfortunate.

By this secret subterrane vault, Zedechias making his stealth, recouered (by the helpe of the darke night) the Plaines or Desarts of Iericho: but by reason of the traine, that followed him and his, (euery one leading with him those whom they held most deare vnto them) hee was easily traced and pursued. How great soeuer the companie was that attended on him, yet, as Iosephus reports it, they on whose fidelitie hee most reposed himselfe, no sooner beheld the Chaldeans approch, but they all abandoned his defence, and shifted themselues into the Desarts as they could. For whom God had forsaken, no man followed, but the Ministers of his vengeance; by whom Zedechias being made Prisoner, with his Children, and Princes, he was conueighed to Rebla or Reblath a Citie (as some thinke) of Nephtalim, where Nabuchodonosor then lay, as a place indifferent betweene Ierusalem and Tyre, with both which at once he had to doe.

Ioseph. Antiq. l. 10. cap. 11.

Now after Nabuchodonosor had laied before Zedekias the many graces and benefits conferred vpon him, together with the notable falsehood and periurie, wherewith he had requited them; he commanded his Children, Princes, and Friends, to be slaine before his face. This being done, to the end that so lamentable a spectacle should be the last, that euer hee should behold in the World, hee caused his eyes to be torne out of his head, and so carried him in a slauish manner to Babel, where hee consumed the rest of his wretched life in perpetuall imprisonment. Herein this most maruailous Prophecie of Ezechiel was performed; Adducam eum in Babylonem & ipsam non videbit. I will bring him into Babylon, and he shall not see it.

Ezech. 12.

Thus in the Eleuenth and last yeere of Zedekias, which was the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, the Chaldeans entred the Citie by force, where sparing no sexe nor age, they committed all to the sword that they therein found.

In the yeere next following, Nabuzaradan, Generall of the Armie, burnt the Kings Palace, and the rest of Ierusalem: and after this fire had lasted from the seuenth to the tenth day, he also burnt the Temple of God to the ground, when it had stood foure hundred thirtie and one yeeres.

After this vpon a second search, Nabuzaradan (not yet satiated with bloud) commanded seuentie and two others to bee slaughtered, which had hidden themselues from the first furie, to wit, the chiefe and the second Priest, two Commanders of Zedechias his men of Warre, fiue of his House-hold seruants, and others to that number; carrying away to Babylon the ablest of the people throughout all Iudea; and leauing the poorest labouring soules, with some that followed the partie of Nabuchodonosor, to till the ground: ouer whom hee left Gouernour, Godolias the Nephew of that Saphan, whom Iosias had formerly employed in the reformation of Religion, who is, for his iustice and equitie, by Iosephus highly commended. This man, a Iew by Nation, left Zedechias, as it seemeth, in the beginning of the warre: and by Ieremies desire to liue with him, it appeareth that he had embraced the same aduice, which the Prophet gaue vnto Zedechias; which was, to submit himselfe altogether to the Babylonian, who being ordayned by God to exercise his iustice, was therefore resistlesse. The Prophet Ieremie being left to his owne choice, either to liue in Chaldea, or elsewhere, he made election of Godoliah, to whom he was recommended; who not onely embraced Ieremie, but gaue comfort to all the other Iewes, that were left vnder his charge, promising them fauour and libertie, so long as they remained obedient Subiects to Nabuchodonosor, by whom hee was established Prouinciall Gouernour of his owne Nation.

4. Kings last.

But ere that yeere was expired, a Prince of the late Kings house (who during the siege of Ierusalem, had kept himselfe out of the storme, with Baalis, King of the Ammonites) being followed by ten other chosen men, while Godoliah feasted them in

Maspha

Maſpha or Mitſpa, the Citie of his reſidence, trayterouſly ſlue him, together with diuers Chaldeans and Iewes that accompanied him. This done, hee made an eſcape, and in his way encountring with eightie perſons, repairing towards Godoliah with preſents, hee ſlue the moſt of them, and ſpared the reſt, becauſe they promiſed to diſcouer vnto him ſome Treaſures, hidden in the fields during the warre. Hee alſo tooke with him a Daughter of Zedechias, committed to the care of Godoliah by Nabuchodonoſor. This practice and intent of Iſmael had beene formerly diſcouered vnto Godolia by Iohanan, one of the Leaders of the few remayning Iewes; but Godoliah was incredulous.

Iudea being now left without a Gouernour (for Iſmael durſt not take it vpon him, but retired himſelfe, or rather fled as faſt as he could to the Ammonites) the reſidue of the Iewes, fearing the reuenge of the Chaldeans, reſolued to flie away into Ægypt, and beſought Ieremie to aske counſell of God for them: who readily made them anſwere, that if they remained in Iudea, God would prouide for them, and ſhew them mercy; but if they ſought to ſaue themſelues in Ægypt, that they ſhould then vndoubtedly periſh. Notwithſtanding this aduice, the Iewes held their determination; and deſpiſing the Oracle of God, and conſtrayning Ieremie and Baruch to accompanie them, they trauailed into Ægypt, and inhabited by the permiſſion of Pharao, neere vnto Taphnes: where, when Ieremie often reprehended them for their Idolatrie, foretelling both the deſtruction of themſelues, and the Ægyptians alſo, he was by theſe his owne hard-hearted and vngratefull Countrimen, ſtoned to death; and by the Ægyptians, who greatly reuerenced him, buried neere the Sepulchre of their owne Kings.

THE FISRT PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE WORLD:

INTREATING OF THE TIMES FROM the destruction of Ierusalem, to the time of PHILIP of Macedon.

THE THIRD BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of the time passing betweene the destruction of Ierusalem, and the fall of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

Of the connexion of Sacred and prophane Historie.

THE course of Time; which in prophane Histories might rather bee discerned through the greatest part of his way, hitherto passed in some out-worne foot-steps, than in any beaten path, having once in Greece by the Olympiads, and in the Easterne Countries by the accompt from Nabonassar, left surer marks, and more appliable to actions concurrent, then were the warre of Troy, or any other token of former date; begins at length in the ruine of Ierusalem to discouer the connexion of antiquitie fore-spent, with the storie of succeeding ages. Manifest it is, that the originall and progresse of things could ill bee sought in those that were ignorant of the first creation: as likewise that the affaires of Kingdomes and Empire afterwards growne vp, are not to be found among those, that haue now no state nor policie remaining of their owne. Hauing therefore pursued the storie of the world vnto that age, from whence the memorie of succeeding accidents is with little interruption of fabulous discourse deriued vnto vs, I hold it now conuenient briefly to shew, by what meanes and circumstances the Historie of the Hebrewes, which of all other is the most ancient, may bee conioyned with the following times, wherein that Image of sundrie metalls, discouered by God vnto Nebuchadnezzar, did raigne ouer the earth, when Israel was either none, or an vnregarded Nation.

Herein I doe not hold it needfull, to insist vpon those authotities, which giue, as it were by heare-say, a certaine yeere of some old Assyrian King vnto some action or euent, whereof the time is found expressed in Scripture: for together with the end of Ninus his line in Sardanapalus, if not before, all such computations were blotted out; the succession of Belochus and his issue that occupied that kingdome afterwards, depending vpon the vncertaine relations of such, as were neither constant in assigning the yeeres of his beginning, nor of credit enough for others to relie vpon. Let it therefore suffice, that the consent and harmonie, which some haue found in the yeeres of those ouer-worne Monarchs, doth preserue their names, which otherwise might haue beene forgotten. Now concerning the later Kings of that Nation, howsoeuer it be true that we find the names of all or most of them in Scriptures, which are recorded by prophane Historians, yet hereby could wee onely learne in what age each of them liued, but not in what yeere his raigne beganne or ended, were it not that the raigne of Nebuchadnezzar is more precisely applyed to the times of Iehoiakim and Zedekia. Hence haue we the first light whereby to discouer the meanes of connecting the sacred and prophane Histories. For vnder Nebuchadnezzar was the beginning of the captiuitie of Iuda, which ended when 70. yeeres were expired; and these 70. yeeres tooke end at the first of Cyrus, whose time being well knowne, affoords vs meanes of looking backe into the ages past, and forwards into the race of men succeeding. The first yeere of Cyrus his raigne in Persia, by generall consent, is ioyned with the first yeere of the 55. Olympiad, where, that he raigned three and twenty yeeres before his Monarchie, and seuen yeeres afterwards, it is apparent, and almost out of controuersie. Giuing therefore foure hundred and eight yeeres vnto the distance betweene the fal of Troy, and the instauration of the Olympiads by Iphitus; we may easily arriue vnto those antiquities of Greece, which were not meerely fabulous. As for Princes ruling the whilest in sundrie parts of the world, S. Augustine and others may be trusted in setting downe their times, which they had by Tradition from authors of wel-approued faith and industrie.

From Cyrus forwards, how the times are reckoned vnto Alexander, and from him to the battaile of Actium, it were (peraduenture) in this place impertinent to set down. But seeing that the beginning and end of the Babylonian captiuitie are the markes whereby wee are chiefely directed, in passing from the first vnto the lateſt yeeres of the world, through any storie, with least interruption, it is very expedient that wee take some paines to informe our selues truely of the 70. yeeres, during which it continued, euen from Nebuchadnezzar vnto Cyrus.

§. II.

§. II.

A briefe rehearſall of two opinions, touching the beginning of the captiuitie: with an anſwere to the cauills of PORPHYRIE, inueighing againſt S. MATTHEW, and DANIEL, vpon whom the later of theſe opinions is founded.

MAny Commentators, and other Hiſtorians, and Chronologers finde, that the captiuitie then beganne, when Iechonias was carried priſoner into Babylon, eleuen yeere before the finall deſtruction of Ieruſalem vnder Zedekias. This they proue out of diuers places in Ezekiel, eſpecially out of the fourteenth chapter, where he makes a plaine diſtinction betweene the beginning of the Captiuitie, and vtter deſtruction of Ieruſalem by Nabuzaradan, in theſe wordes: In the fiue and twentieth yeere of our being in captiuitie, in the beginning of the yeere, in the tenth day of the moneth, in the foureteenth yeere after that the Citie was ſmitten. In which words hee beginneth the captiuitie in plaine termes, eleuen yeeres before the Citie was deſtroyed. Beroaldus is of opinion that it beganne in the firſt of Nabuchodonoſor, and the fourth of Ioakim, which hee endeuours to proue out of the ſecond of Chronicles, but more eſpecially out S. Matthew, and Daniel, whoſe words afford matter of long diſputation, but ſerue not to make good ſo much as Beroaldus would enforce. That place of S. Matthew, and the whole booke of Daniel, haue miniſtred occaſion of ſcoffing and railing at the Chriſtian religion to that wretched man Porphyrie, who, not vnderſtanding how the ſonnes of King Ioſias were called by diuers names, as Epiphanius hath ſhewed at large, thought that the Apoſtle had ſpoken hee knew not what in reckoning the ſonnes, or, according to ſome tranſlations, the Sonne and Nephewes of that good King, begotten about the time of the captiuitie. Vpon Daniel alſo the ſame Porphyrie doth ſpend the twelfth of his malicious books written againſt the Chriſtians, affirming that theſe prophecies & viſions remembred by Daniel, were written long after his death, and at, or neere the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. This fond ſuppoſition of his, Euſebius, Apollonius, and others, haue ſufficiently anſwered. For the ſeuentie Interpreters, who conuerted the old Teſtament about an hundred yeere before Epiphanes, did alſo turne this booke of Daniel out of Hebrew into Greeke, as a part of Scripture receiued. And were there no other argument to confound Porphyrie, than that of Alexander Macedon, it were ſufficient, who liued diuers yeeres before Antiochus Epiphanes. For Iaddus the high Prieſt ſhewed that great Conqueror, when he came towards Ieruſalem to haue deſtroyed it, this booke of Daniel, wherein he beheld his owne glorie foretold, as the ſame was plainely expounded vnto him; which not only ſtaied his hand from the harme of that Citie and people, but his aſſurance and reſolution was ſo confirmed and ſtrengthened thereby, as deſpiſing all future peril and reſiſtance, he conquered Darius, and the Eaſterne Empire in a ſhorter time than Nabuchodonoſor had done one Citie, to wit, Tyre in Phœnicia.

It is true indeed that the Iewes themſelues giue leſſe authoritie to Daniel, than to Moſes, and the Prophets, accompting his booke among thoſe which they call Cetaphim, or Hagiographa, or holy Writings, which they ſay Eſdras and the Seniors of the Synagogue compiled after their returne from Babylon. But firſt, that the booke of Daniel (I meane ſo much as is found in the Hebrew) is Canonicall: ſecondly, that it was written by Daniel himſelfe, and not by Eſdras and the Seniors; we may aſſure our ſelues by teſtimonie of Councels, and Fathers. For in the Councell of Laodicea held about the yeere of our Lord 368. after the death of Iouinian the Emperour, and after the Nicene Councell three and fortie yeeres, this booke of Daniel was re-ceiued, verified and confirmed among the other Canonicall Scriptures, as in the Epitomie of the same Councell it may be seen, and so doth Meliton the most ancient Bishop of Sardis number it, witnesse Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical historie, the fourth booke, and fiue and twentieth chapter, so doth the same Author in the Catalogue of Canonical bookes vpon Origen, so doth Hilarius in his Preface vpon the Psalmes, and Epiphanius in his booke of Waights and Measures, &c. To these I may adde S. Hierome, Gregorie Nazianzene, and others. For the Hagiographa bookes or holy Writings, the Iewes and Rabbines reckon to be these, Daniel, Psalmes, Prouerbs, Iob, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Hester, Esra, Nehemiah, and the Chronicles. And that it was Daniel, and not Esdras, that wrote this booke, Gods commande- 10

ment vnto him by his Angell, to seale vp the same to the time appointed, is an vn-answerable testimonie. Yea that which exceedeth all strength of other proofe, our Math.24.15. Mark.13.14. Sauiour Christ who citeth no Apocryphal Scripture, in Mathew & Marke alleageth Daniel the Prophet, to wit, the last verse of his nineteenth chapter. Further, in the fift of Iohn, Christ distributeth the risen from the dead, as in Daniel the twelfth, verse the second. S. Paul describeth Antichrist out of Daniel, and the Reuelation Dan.12. is wholly an interpretation of Daniels visions.

§. III. 20

That the 70. yeeres of captiuitie are to be numbred from the destruction of Ierusalem; not from the migration of IECHONIA.

HAuing thus farre digressed, in maintaining that authority, which must often be cited in the present argument, it is now conuenient, that wee returne vnto the differences of opinion, concerning the beginning of these 70. yeeres. Neither will I stand to trouble my selfe and others with laying open the grounds or weakenesse of that which Eusebius 30 and some few nameless Authors, haue sometimes held in this point, which is lately reuiued by Beroaldus; but will foorth-with enter into consideration of that opinion, which many both ancient and late Writers haue so earnestly maintained, that it wants not much of being common.

Foure Kings of Iuda were carried away captiues to Babylon: First, Manasses; then Iehoiakim, and with him among others, Daniel the Prophet: thirdly, Iechonias, and with him Ezekiel: lastly, Zedekias, at which time the Citie and Temple were destroyed. To the first of these captiuities the beginning of the 70. yeeres is referred by none that I haue read; to the second by few and with weake proofe; to the third by very many and with much confidence. For besides those places of Ezekiel al- 40 readie cited, there is a strong argument gathered out of Ieremie, which may seeme to make the matter plaine. For the Prophet in comforting the people that were Ierem.29.10. carried away with Iechonias, vseth these words: Thus saith the Lord, After 70. yeeres be accomplished at Babel, I will visit you, and performe my good promise towards you, and cause you to returne to this place.

But it stands indeed with little reason that we should seeke the interpretation of a prophecie out of circumstances, when the prophecie is such as doth sufficiently expound it selfe. Ieremie had alreadie, in the fourth yeere of Iehoiakim, denounced the iudgement of God against the Land, for the sinnes and impœnitencie of that obstinate people, in these wordes: Behold, I will send and take to me all the families of 50 the North, saith the Lord, and Nebuchadnezzar, the King of Babel, my seruant, and will bring them against this Land, and against the Inhabitants thereof, and against all these Nations round about, and I will destroy them, and make them an astonishment, and an hissing, and a continuall deſolation. Moreouer, I will take from them the voice of mirth, and the voice of gladneſſe, the voice of the Bridgroome, and the voice of the Bride, the noiſe of the mill ſtones, and the light of the candle, and this whole Land ſhall be deſolate, and an aſtoniſhment, and theſe Nations ſhall ſerue the King of Babel 70. yeeres. And when 70. yeeres are expired, I will viſit the King of Babel. Here wee ſee preſcribed vnto the captiuitie the terme of 70. yeeres, which were to commence, neither when the prophecie was vttered; nor when Iehoiakim, who then raigned, was taken by Nebuchadnezzar; nor yet in the time of Iechonia; but with the vtter deſolation of the Citie, whereof Ieremie did againe giue notice to thoſe that were alreadie in Babylon, at ſuch time as he ſent them the comfort of deliuerance before rehearſed. And ſo did the people vnderſtand this prophecie, in thoſe times when they ſaw it accompliſhed, beginning the 70. yeeres at the time of the deſolation, as manifeſtly appeares in the end of the Hiſtorie of Iuda, where it is ſaid thus: They burnt the houſe of God, and brake downe the wall of Ieruſalem, and burnt all the Palaces thereof with fire, and all the precious veſſells thereof to deſtroy all: And they that were left by the ſword, carried he away to Babel, and they were ſeruants to him and to his ſonnes, vntill the Kingdome of the Perſians had rule, to fulfill the word of the Lord by the mouth of IEREMIA, vntill the Land had her fill of her Sabbaths: for all the daies that ſhe lay deſolate, ſhe kept Sabbath, to fulfill 70. yeeres. But in the firſt yeere of CYRVS King of Perſia (when the word of the Lord, ſpoken by the mouth of IEREMIA, was finiſhed) the Lord ſtirred vp the ſpirit of CYRVS. Ieremie 29. v. 16. 17. & 18. 2. Chron. 36. 19.

We ſeldome find one piece of Scripture ſo preciſely and plainely expounded by another, as in this prophecie, to haue afterwards beene the ſubiect of altercation. For one can hardly deuiſe, how either the deſolation could haue beene expreſſed more ſenſibly than it was by the Prophet, or the euent of the prophecie haue been more exactly ſet downe, than it was in the place now laſt of all cited. If it bee requiſite that we bring more proofe in ſo euident a caſe, the ninth Chapter of Daniel yeelds teſtimonie ſufficient, vnto this expoſition of Ieremia his prophecie, that Ieruſalem was to lie waſte 70. yeeres. For in the firſt yeere of Darius the Mede, which was the laſt of the 70. Daniel obtained of God the deliuerance that had been promiſed by praier, which he made vpon conſideration of the time that was expired: as he telleth vs in theſe wordes: In the firſt yeere of his raigne, I DANIEL vnderſtood by bookes the number of the yeeres, whereof the Lord had ſpoken vnto IEREMIAH the Prophet, that he would accompliſh 70. yeeres in the deſolation of Ieruſalem. So that howſoeuer the time of Daniel his owne captiuitie bee reckoned from the taking of Iehoiakim, and that the people carried away with Iechonia, did accompt, as well they might, the yeeres of their owne captiuitie; yet with the generall deſolation of the Countrie, wherein were few or none of the Iſraelites left remaining to inhabite, beganne in the nineteenth yeere of Nabuchodonoſor the great captiuitie, which by Gods appointment continued vnto the end of 70. yeeres. This I will not further ſeeke to proue, by the authoritie of Ioſephus and others affirming the ſame; for as much as that which alreadie hath beene produced, is enough to ſatisfie any man that hath not fully determined to hold the contrarie. Dan. 9. 2.

Sundrie opinions of the Kings which raigned in Babylon during the 70. yeeres.

WHat Kings raigned in Babylon, during these 70. yeeres of the captiuity, and how long each of them did weare the Diademe, it is a matter of no great importance to know, for as much as neither their acts were notable in the age wherin they liued, nor the length of their raignes, any way helpefull to the concordance of times, fore-going or succeeding. The conquests recounted by Xenophon of Syria, Arabia, (or rather some part of it) Hyrcania, Bactria, and perhaps of some other Countries, may seeme fruits of the victories obtained by Nebuchadnezzar the Great (or by some of his Ancestors) in the former part of his life, before he betooke himselfe to ease, and to the sumptuous building of his great Babel, for the house of his Kingdome, and for the honor of his Maiestie, where it may seeme that he and his Heires kept a great state, and did very little. The idle behauiour of the Assyrian Souldiers, in such skirmishes as afterwards they had with the Medes, doth argue no lesse. For whereas vnder Nebuchadnezzar, they were so stout and industrious, that (to omit other proofes) they attempted, and finished, that hardie piece of worke, of winning the strong Citie of Tyre, by ioyning it vnto the continent, filling vp the deepe and broad channel of the Sea, diuiding it from the maine with a mole, or peere of earth, and other matter, the reparation whereof, when the Sea had washed it away, was the very greatest of Alexanders works in the times following, they became timorous, that they durst not approach neerer to the enemy than their bowes would carrie, but were readie to turne their backs, as soone as any, though inferiour in numbers, aduenturing within the distance offered to charge them.

Xenophon. cyropag. lib. 1.

Now as their actions from the end of Nebuchadnezzars warres, till the ruine of their Empire, were not worthie to be recorded; so was the distinction of their times, and raigne of their seuerall Kings, vnworthy of the great labour that hath in vaine been taken in that businesse. For when it is granted, that the captiuitie of Iuda, ending with that Empire, lasted 70. yeeres, we may as reasonably forbeare to search into the particular continuance of two or three slouthfull Kings, as we are contented to be ignorant of the ages of the Patriachs, and their children, liuing in the Ægyptian seruitude; resting satisfied in both with the generall assured summe.

Yet for as much as many haue trauelled in this businesse, vpon desire (as I take it) to approue the beginning and end of the 70. yeeres, not only by the raignes of other Princes, ruling elsewhere, but by the times of the Assyrians themselues: I wil not refuse to take a little paines in collecting their opinions, and shewing what I thinke, may best be held for likely, if the certaine truth cannot be found.

The opinions are many, and greatly repugnant, both in recounting the Kings themselues, and in setting downe the yeeres of their seuerall raignes. The first (as I take it) the surest, is theirs, who meerely follow the authoritie of the Scriptures, without borrowing any helpe from others. These name onely three Kings, Nebuchadnezzar, Euilmerodach, and Balthasar. Neither haue they only the silence of Daniel, who names none other to be their warrant, but the prophecie of Ieremie precisely, and in a manner purposely teaching the very same. For God, by the mouth of that Prophet, shewing that he being absolute Lord of all, would dispose of all, according to his owne will, and making it knowne that he had some Countries here named, into the hands of the King of Babel, saith thus: And all Nations shall serue him, and his Sonne, and his Sonnes Sonne, vntill the very time of his Land come also; then many Nations and great Kings shall serue themselues of him. These wordes expressing the continuance of the Chaldæan Empire, and number of the Kings, will hardly be qualified with any distinction. But indeede I finde no other necessitie of qualification to be vſed herein, than ſuch as may grow out of mens deſire to reconcile the Scriptures vnto profane authors. And this deſire were not vniuſt, if the conſent of all hiſtories were on the one ſide, and the letter of the holy Text were ſingle on the other ſide.

But contrariwiſe, the Authors which are cited in this caſe, are ſo repugnant one to the other, and the prooſes of their different reports are ſo ſlender and vnſufficient, that the ſucceſſion of theſe Princes, had it not bin thus deliuered in Scriptures, but onely ſet downe by ſome Author of equall credite with the reſt, might verie well haue found and deſerued as good beliefe, as any of thoſe things which they haue deliuered in this point. For ſome there are, who following Ioſephus, deriue that Empire, as by deſcent from father to ſonne, through fiue generations; beginning with Nabuchodonoſor the great, and giuing to him 43. yeres, to Euilmerodach 18, to Nigliſar the ſonne of Euilmerodach 40, to Laboſardach the ſonne of Nigliſar 9. moneths, and laſtly to Balthaſar (whom Ioſephus intimates to be of the race of Nabuchodonoſor, without naming his father) 17. yeeres. And this opinion (ſaue that he forbeares to reckon the yeeres, and plainely calls Balthaſar the ſonne of Laboſardach) Saint Hierome doth follow, alledging Beroſus, and Ioſephus as a ſectator of Beroſus for his Authors; though Beroſus, as he is cited by Ioſephus, report the matter farre otherwiſe. For he tells vs that Euilmerodach the ſonne of Nabuchodonoſor did raigne but 2. yeeres, being for his wickednes and luſt, ſlaine by his ſiſters husband Nizigliſſoroor, who occupied the kingdome after him 4. yeeres, and left it to his owne ſonne Laboſardach, who being an ill-conditioned boy, was at the end of 9. moneths ſlaine by ſuch as were about him, and the kingdome giuen to one Nabonidus, who held it by the election of the Conſpirators, and left it vnto Cyrus after 17. yeeres. This relation ill agrees with that of Ioſephus, and both of them as bad with the Scriptures, in number either of yeeres, or of generations; yet the particularities which they handle, haue procured vnto them ſome authoritie, ſo that the names which they haue inſerted, are taken as it were vpon truſt. There is a third opinion, which makes the three laſt kings brethren, and ſonnes of Euilmerodach; and this may well enough agree with the Scripture: though I had rather beleeue Xenophon, who ſaith that the laſt king of Babylon was immediate ſucceſſour to his father. But whereas the Author of the Scholaſticall Hiſtorie, who is founder of this opinion, placeth betweene him that tooke Ieruſalem, and Euilmerodath, another Nabuchodonoſor: plaine it is that he hath, out of any Hiſtorie ſacred or profane, as little warrant to guide him, as we haue reaſon to follow him. Euſebius, Sulpitius, Seuerus, and Theodoret, vpon better ground, haue ſuppoſed, that Euilmerodach and Balthaſar were brethren and ſonnes of the great Nabuchodonoſor. This is built on the fift chapter of Daniel, wherein Balthaſar (for of Euilmerodach there is none that euer doubted) is often called Nabuchodonoſor his ſonne. And ſo common grew this explication, that Saint Hierome called it the vulgar opinion. But the place of Ieremie before cited, prooues that Balthaſar was not the ſonne indeede, but the grandchild of that great conquerour, though by the phraſe very common in Scriptures, and familiar in thoſe Eaſterne languages, he was called the ſonne.

Ioſephus antiq. lib. 10. cap. 12.

Ioſ. contr. Appian. lib. 1.

Xenoph. Cyropæd. libr. 4.

Annius his Metaſthenes hits very rightly the 70. yeres of captiuity, giuing to Nabuchodonoſor 45. yeeres, to Euilmerodach 30. yeeres, and to the three ſonnes of Euilmerodach, nephews of Nabuchodonoſor 14. yeeres; that is, to Reg-Aſſar the eldeſt ſonne three yeeres, to Lab-Aſſar Dach the ſecond ſonne ſixe yeeres, and to Balthaſar the third ſonne fiue.

To this accompt agreeing with the Scriptures, both in the whole ſumme of yeeres, and in the number of generations, I haue ſometime ſubſcribed, as not daring to reiect an appearance of truth, vpon no greater reaſon than becauſe the Author was of Annius his edition. Yet could I not ſatisfie my ſelfe heerein; both for that none of the Ancient, and few ſuch of the moderne Writers as deſerue to be regarded, haue conſented with this Metaſthenes; and for that in making Balthaſar

succeede vnto his brother in the kingdome, and not vnto his father, he is wholly against Xenophon, whose Historie of the elder Cyrus in his Assyrian warre I can not slightly value in many respects, and especially because it is very agreeable to the Scriptures, in the taking of Babylon, while the king was at his drunken feast.

Seeking therefore diligently into all circumstances that might giue any light in this obscuritie, I found manifest proofe, that the time allotted vnto Balthasar, by Annius his Metasthenes, was farre short of the truth, which is enough to render all suspected that he hath said in distributing what part of the 70. yeeres hee pleased among the rest. For in the third yeere of Balthasar, Daniel saw a vision, after which he was sicke certaine dayes, but when hee rose vp, he did the kings businesse: from which businesse, that hee did afterwards withdraw himselfe, and liue retired, so long that he was forgotten in the Court, it appeares plainely, both by the many words which the old Queene vsed to set out his sufficiencie, and by the Kings asking of him, when he came into his presence, whether he were Daniel. Now to thinke that a man of such account and place as Daniel had held, could in two yeeres haue beene worne out of remembrance, were in my iudgement a very strange conceipt, which rather than I would entertaine, I can well be contented, to thinke the whole storie (thus related) a part of Annius his impostures.

Dan. cha. 8. verse 1. & 27.

Dan. c. 5. v. 11, 12, & 13.

Dan. 2. 49.

Out of these reports of Iosephus, Berosus, and others, many new opinions are framed, by coniectures of late Writers. For the endurance of the captiuitie being 70. yeeres, and these yeeres extending vnto the first of Cyrus, in which course of time Nebuchadnezzar, his sonne and grand-child, must haue raigned; it hath seemed needfull to supply the yeeres of these three descents, by inserting some, whose raignes might fill vp the whole continuance of the captiuitie, with which the time allotted by Berosus and others, to Euilmerodach and Balthasar, ioyned vnto the yeeres following the nineteene of Nebuchadnezzar, (wherein Ierusalem was laid desolate) are nothing euen.

Therefore Mercator and others following him, fashion the yeeres of Euilmerodach in this sort. They say, that the 18. yeeres giuen to him by Iosephus in the tenth of his Antiquities, should be read and numbred 28. yeeres, and the two yeeres that Berosus hath allowed to Euilmerodach should be written 23. in the first number the figure of (1) is mistaken for the figure of (2) and in the latter there should haue bin added the figure of (3) to that of (2:) this granted (to wit) that Euilmerodach raigned 28. yeeres, whereof fiue together with his father, and 23. after his death, and the same number of 23. added to the 25. which Nabuchodonosor liued after the destruction of Ierusalem, make 49, then 4. yeeres of Nigliſar according to Berosus, 9. moneths of Labassardach his sonne, and 17. yeeres of Labonidus or Balthasar make vp the number of 70. yeeres to the first of Cyrus. But whether by errour in figures, or in words, the numbers be vtterly mistaken, in all copies extant; vpon how weake a foundation doe they build, who haue nothing to helpe them, saue onely the bare names of two vnknowne Kings, found in Authors manifestly corrupted, and such as if they had beene entirely extant, were not worthy, to haue that place of Ieremie called into dispute, in regard of their authoritie?

§. V.

A more particular examination of one opinion touching the number, persons, and raignes of the Babylonian Kings.

OTher suppositions, little different in substance from this of Mercator, I purposely forbeare to rehearse, as falling vnder the same answere. That of Ioseph Scaliger I may not forget, as deseruing to be considered apart from the rest. He giues to Nebuchadnezzar 44. yeres, to Euilmerodach 2, to Belsazer, 5: and to Nabonidus 17. So that from the the 19. of Nabuchadnezzar, in which Ierusalem was destroyed, vnto the time of Cyrus he accompteth onely 59. yeeres; beginning (as many doe) the captiuitie 11. yeeres sooner, from the transportation of Iechonia. But hereof enough hath beene said already. That which we are now to consider, is his distribution of the time running betweene the 19. of Nabuchadnezzar, and the fall of the Caldean Empire: wherein if he haue erred, then is all further inquisition friuolous.

Concerning the length of Nabuchadnezzars raigne, I shall hereafter vpon better occasion deliuer my opinion. The time which he giues to Euilmerodach, is very short, and more precisely agreeing with Berosus than with the Scriptures. For wee find in Ieremie, that this Euilmerodach in the first of his raigne, shewing all fauour to Iechonia, did among other things take order for him at his table; and that he did continually eate bread before him all the dayes of his life. His portion was a continuall portion giuen him of the King of Babel, euery day a certaine, all the dayes of his life vntill he died. The very sound of these words (which is more to be esteemed, than the authoritie of Berosus, were he perfectly extant) imports a farre longer time than two yeeres, wherin Iechonia, vnder this gentle Prince, enioyed the comfort sent by God, whose commaundement he had obeyed in yeelding himselfe to Nabuchadnezzar. Indeed how long Iechonia did liue it can not be proued; but plaine it is hereby, that all his remaining daies hee did eate bread before this King. Now that hee liued not so short a while after this as 2. yeeres, it is more than likely, for he was but 55. yeeres old when he was set at liberty, hauing bin 37. yeeres in the prison, whereinto he was cast at the age of 18. yeeres; after which time it seemes plaine that hee begat Salathiel, as well by the age of Zorobabel, who is said to haue beene but a yong man, and one of Darius his Pages threescore yeeres after this, as by other circumstances of his imprisonment it selfe. Ierem. 52. vers. 33. & 34.

Of Belsazer, to whom Scaliger giues the next fiue yeeres, naming him also Laborosoardoch, I should wonder why he calls him Nabuchadnezzars daughters sonne, were it not that herein I find him very carefull to helpe out Berosus, by shifting in his Nirigliſſoroor, as husband to Nabuchadnezzars daughter, and Protector of his son foure of these yeeres; by which meanes there remaines about one yeere to Belsazer alone, agreeing neerely with the 9. moneths assigned by Berosus to the sonne of Nigliſar. But Ieremie hath told vs that it was to Nabuchadnezzar, and to his son, and to his sonnes sonne (not to his daughters sonne) that the Empire was promised: which difficultie if Scaliger could not helpe, it was well done of him, to passe it ouer with silence.

Nabonidus the last of these (whome others, desirous to reconcile Berosus to the Scriptures) haue iudged to be all one with Balthasar, is by Scaliger thought to bee Darius of the Medes. But herein Scaliger is no firme Berosian: for Berosus makes him of the same stocke or race a Babylonian. I speake not this to disgrace the trauaile of that most learned man (for it highly commends his diligence and iudgement, that he was not so wedded to any author, as affected with the loue of truth) but to shew that he himselfe hauing in some points disliked those Writers, whome in generall he approueth, might with greater reason haue wholly reformed them by the Scriptures, wherein can be no errour. Two things there are which chiefly did breed or confirme this opinion in Scaliger, that hee whome Berosus calls Nabonidus, was the same whom Daniel had called Darius of the Medes: Firſt, the phrase of Scripture, which signifies vnto vs, that Darius tooke the kingdome, not saying that hee wanne it by force of armes; Secondly, a fragment of Megasthenes found in Eusebius, wherein this Nabonidus is called the Median. Touching the word of the Originall, or of the Greeke translation, which expressing no force of armes, doth only signifie, that Darius tooke or receiued the kingdome; I see no reason why we should therupon inferre, that the next king entred by Election: seeing Daniel relateth not the meanes and circumstances of Balthasars death, but onely the swift accomplishment of his owne prophecie. Neither could it indeede haue properly beene said (if Daniel niel had cared to vse the most expressiue termes) that Darius of the Medes breaking into the citie, did win the kingdome; seeing this was performed by Cyrus in the absence of Darius, though by his forces, and to his vse. Now concerning the fragment of Megasthenes, true it is, that in Eusebius his workes printed at Basile, in the yeere 1559. I finde onely thus much of Megasthenes, cited out of Alpheeus; That Nabuchodonosor was more valiant than Hercules; that hee subdued all Lybia, and the rest of Asia as farre as to the Armenians; and that as the Chaldæans report, being returned into his kingdome, and rapt with a diuine furie, he cried with a loude voice: O Babylonians, I foretell yee of a great calamitie that shall come vpon you, which neyther Bel, nor any of the Gods shall auert: There will come a Persian, halfe an Asse, that shall bring 10 slauery vpon yee: and that, this and the like when he had spoken, he vanished. Of all this I beleeue little or nothing, sauing that Nabuchodonosor knew before-hand, that his Empire should be translated, as Daniel had foretold from the golden head, to the siluer brest. But that he wan all Africa or Lybia, I hold it neither true nor probable.

If Scaligers copy of Eusebius were the more perfect, out of which Megasthenes tells vs that Nabuchodonosor wanne both Afrike and Spaine, I beleeue the fragment so much the lesse: and am as little moued with the authoritie of it, where it calls a Median the pride and confidence of the Assyrians, as where it tells of Nebuchadnezzar his owne vanishing away. Indeed that same title of halfe an Asse, by which 20 he calleth Cyrus, makes me to suspect the fable as cunningly forged out of Apollo his Oracle, wherein he termeth him a Mule, because his parentage was more noble on the mothers side, than on the fathers; as Mules are begotten by Asses vpon Mares. And thus much in answer of the two principall foundations whereon this opinion is built. As for the concinnitie and coherence which it hath within it selfe, I easily allow it. But this proues nothing, for meere fictions haue not wanted these commendations: neither can any man beleeue that one so iudicious, industrious and deepely learned as Ioseph Scaliger, would ouer-shoote himselfe in setting downe repugnancies.

It now remaineth to examine the agreement of this with the Scriptures, from 30 which there is no appeale. And herein it seemes that Scaliger, well knowing his owne sufficiencie, hath beene little carefull to satisfie men that would frame Arguments against him. For if the prophecie of Daniel were true, that the kingdome of Balthasar was diuided, and giuen to the Medes and Persians, either wee must thinke that Darius of the Medes was not Nabonidus, or else wee must bethinke our selues what Persian it might be that shared the kingdome with him. For it is not more certaine, that Balthasar lost his life and kingdome, than that his kingdome was diuided and giuen to the Medes and Persians. Neither did the Medes and Persians fall out and fight for it, as by supposing Nabonidus to haue beene Darius, they should be thought to haue done; but these two Nations did compound the body of that 40 Empire, and were accounted as Lords ouer all the subiect prouinces, insomuch that the Greeke Historians did commonly call those warres which Darius, and after him Xerxes, made vpon Greece, The warres of the Medes. Yea to cleare this point, euen Dan. 8. 20. Daniel himselfe resembles that King, with whom Alexander fought, vnto a Ramme with two hornes, calling him the King of the Medes and Persians. Wherefore the whole Nation of Chronologers were not to haue been condemned by Ioseph Scaliger, for maintaining vpon such good grounds, that Darius of the Medes, was partner with Cyrus in his victories, and not a Chaldæan King by him subdued. Neither was Iosephus to be the lesse regarded, for affirming that Balthasar was destroyed by Darius of the Medes, and his nephew Cyrus, though herein hee varied from Berosus, and 50 others, whose authoritie elsewhere he gladly citeth. For Iosephus had no reason to beleeue any mans faith or knowledge of those times, halfe so well as Daniels, whom I beleeue that hee vnderstood as farre as was needefull in this case. Lawfull it was for him to alleage all Authors that had any mention, though vnperfect of the same things that were contained in the writings of the Iewes, to whoſe hiſtories thereby he procured reputation in the Roman world, where they were ſtrangers, and might ſeeme fabulous. Euen ſo doe Euſebius, and other Chriſtian Writers, willingly embrace the teſtimonies of heathen bookes making for the truth in ſome particulars; yet will they not therefore be tried in generall by the ſelfe ſame Ethnicke philoſophers, but leaue them where they are againſt the truth; as Ioſephus in this caſe hath left Beroſus. And thus much I thought it meete to ſay of Scaligers opinion in this point; holding neuertheleſſe in due regard his learning and iudgement, which if in ſome things it had not failed, the miracle had beene very great.

§. VI.

What may be held as probable of the Perſons and Times of NABVCHODONOSOR his ſucceſſors.

IT now remaines that I freely acknowledge mine owne weakneſs, who cannot find how the 70. yeeres of captiuitie are to be diuided among them which raigned in Babylon, though I finde that the diſtribution made of them, in ſuch wiſe as already is rehearſed, be ill agreeable to the holy Scriptures. Wherefore I may truely ſay with Pererius, that wee ought liberally to pardon thoſe whoſe feete haue failed them in the ſlipperie wayes of Chronologie, wherein both learning and diligence are ſubiect to take a fall at one time or other, by ignorance, forgetfulneſſe, or heedeleſſe reckoning. Yet will I aduenture to deliuer my opinion, wherein the iudgement of Lyra and others (holding thoſe onely to haue raigned ouer Chaldæans, whoſe Names are found in the Scriptures) appeares more conformable to reaſon and account of time, than any of the other Sentences or Coniectures before rehearſed. Not that I will take vpon me to defend Lyra his Coniectures, when hee ſuppoſeth by Niglſar and Laboſardach to be meant the ſame perſons which are called in Scriptures Euilmerodach and Balthaſar (for this can by no good colour be maintained) but onely to ſhew that the Kings by him cited, are likely to haue occupied the whole time of ſeuenty yeeres. Firſt therefore let vs conſider the raigne of Nebuchadnezzar, in whoſe eighteenth yere Ieruſalem was taken and ſackt, but in his nineteenth layd vtterly deſolate.

Moſt of Writers haue giuen to him 43. yeeres of raigne, following therein Beroſus. There are who haue added one yeere more; and ſome haue made it vp 45. To diſpute about the certainety were needleſſe: for in ſhewing by what length of time the Scriptures meaſure him, we ſhall ſhew the certaine truth.

Manifeſt it is, that the 19. yeere of Nebuchadnezzar, is ioyned with the 11. of Zedekia; as alſo that his eight yeere, was the firſt yeere of Iechonia his captiuitie; the raigne of Zedekia occupied all the meane ſpace being of 11. yeeres. This is generally agreed vpon, ſo that it needes no further prooſes: As for the beginning of his ſucceſſor Euilmerodach, it was in the ſeuen and thirtieth yeere of Iechonia his captiuitie; ſo that Nebuchadnezzar after his eight yeere (which was the firſt of Iechonia his bondage) raigned 35. whole yeeres, and peraduenture a good part of the ſixe and thirtieth, foraſmuch as Iechonia was inlarged with ſo great fauour, not vntill the end of the yeere. Subſtracting therefore out of theſe foure and forty, which Nebuchadnezzars raigne did wel-neere occupie, thoſe eighteene yeeres of his which paſſed away before the captiuitie of Iuda, and ruine of the citie, we haue remaining ſixe and twenty yeeres of the ſeuentie, that were almoſt wholy ſpent, when his ſonne beganne to raigne.

2. King. 2. 5. 8. & Ierem. 51. 12. 2. King. 24. 12. 2. King. 25. 27. & Ierem. 52. 31.

It is now to be conſidered how the remainder of the ſeuentie yeeres were diuided betweene the kings ruling in Babylon vntill the firſt of Cyrus. A queſtion more difficult (as I ſaid before) than greatly needefull: the whole ſumme being certaine, and the diſtinction of times affording no benefit in knowledge of their actions, who were

were slouthfull Princes. Neither can any man the more iustly suspect the beginning or end of the whole 70. yeeres, for that the distribution of some part of them is only coniecturall; seeing that none who giues any other termes to their beginning or end, hath refused to follow both vnlikely and desperate coniectures in diuiding them. I will therefore be bold to doe as others haue done; knowing well before-hand, that whosoeuer shall discouer my errour, must doe mee the pleasure (which I could rather wish in a case more materiall) of making mee to vnderstand the truth.

Of the foure and forty yeeres remayning in accompt at Nebuchadnezzars death, we are to take away the last, which was the first of Darius the Mede, and then hauing authority good enough to warrant vs from blame of presumption, in giuing vs seuenteene yeeres to Balthasar, we finde left in our hands to bestow vpon Euilmerodach sixe and twenty yeeres. Of the yere belonging to Darius the Mede, I haue already spoken what I thought sufficient, in deliuering my opinion of the beginning & continuance of this captiuity. That Balthasar did raigne seuenteene yeeres, we haue the authority of Iosephus, before cited in expresse words; We haue also the generall consent of all, or the most late Writers, interpreting Berosus his Nabonidus, who raigned so long; and Balthasar to haue beene one. But nothing moueth me so much to beleeue this Tradition, as first those euident places in Daniel, shewing that in the third yeere of Balthasar he followed the Kings businesse, and yet was forgotten ere the end of his raigne, (a proofe sufficient of no few yeeres, passing vnder this man, especially seeing it is no where found that Daniels emploiments tooke end either that yeere or the next.) Secondly, the consideration of Cyrus his warres against the Assyrians, which beginning with the death of this mans father, and being alwaies prosperous, could hardly haue occupied any longer time, though wee make large allowance to his deedes in the lower Asia, which fell out in the mid-way: I haue already shewed, that there appeares in the Scriptures likelihood enough to make it credible, that the raigne of Euilmerodach was not short: and that men of great iudgement haue found it most probable, that he was King three and twentie yeeres. More, I thinke, they would haue allowed him, had not the desire of satisfying Berosus caused them to rest content with this. And surely it were greatly to be wished, that bookes of such antiquitie, as those of Berosus, were extant without corruption; a great light (no doubt) they would yeeld in many darke passages of Antiquitie. I will yet confesse, that were his workes neuer so excellent, and in all things else vnquestionably true, I would not therefore condescend vnto him in some one point, wherein the Scriptures were his open enemie. How much lesse ought I to obey a broken fragment of his, containing only seuen or eight lines, and part euen of the title corrupted, as they beleeue that follow him in the rest? The Scriptures haue told vs that God gaue the Empire to Nebuchadnezzar, to his sonne, and to his sonnes sonne: How long each of them held it, wee finde not expressed; yet would we gladly know it of Berosus, or of any other that would teach vs; prouided alwaies, that helping vs in a particularitie, he destroy not thereby the generall truth. More words are needlesse. It is enough to say with others, that Berosus or Iosephus who cited him, hath bin wronged by the carelesnesse of Scribes; and that it was as easie for those Scribes to erre in writing two for sixe & twentie, as for three and twentie, or perhaps more easie. For the omission of the second figure, was as likely the one way as the other; and the Character 5. signifying 6. hath a neerer resemblance of β that stands for 2. than hath γ which is vsed for 3. So that the numerall notes β 5. expressing 26. were not safe enough from being mistaken in the true copie, and might be altered, as ill written, if some crooked hand, or other mischance not vnusuall, had omitted the first stroke of the former letter, or added a dash to the latter, which might cause them to seeme not two different figures, but the one a correction of the other, which how it could be supposed in $\beta\gamma$ standing for 23. I doe not well perceiue. As for the arithmeticall figures now in vse, they were were long after the time of Ioſephus brought in by the Arabians, and therefore doe not appertaine to this buſineſſe; vnleſſe we ſhould gheſſe that his works were corrupted in that vnlearned age, which following the Saracen conqueſt, was little occupied in the ſtudies of humanitie, but in a ſort wholly giuen ouer to the doctrine of Ariſtotle. If this will ſerue to make Beroſus our friend, ſo let it be; if not, I will not purchaſe the fauour of his authoritie, by forſaking Ieremie and Daniel, when they ſeeme his oppoſites.

Of the victories which NABVCHODONOSOR obtained betweene the deſtruction of Ieruſalem and conqueſt of Ægypt.

WIth what actions this time of 70. yeeres was entertained by the Babylonian Kings, few haue written, or little is remaining in record. Which may peraduenture haue bin ſome cauſe that the time it ſelfe was, and is yet ſought to bee abridged, as not hauing left ſufficient matter to witneſſe the length of it. But by ſuch an argument wee might as well deny to many people euen their being. For euery Nation (I know not whom I ſhould except) betweene the beginning and laſt end of it, hath in ſome ſlothfull age rather dreamt away the time, than ſpent it. It is therefore no maruell, if the poſteritie of Nabuchodonoſor, finding all things readie to their hand, which their hearts could haue deſired, betooke themſelues to their eaſe and pleaſures, thinking perhaps, like the prodigall ſonnes of greedie fathers, their owne wiſedome greater, which knew how to enioy, than that of their Anceſtors, which wearied away their daies in the reſtleſſe trauell of purchaſing? Though indeede the raigne of Nabuchodonoſor was ſo diuided, that his youthfull and ſtronger yeeres hauing beene exerciſed in victorious armes, no ſmall part of his life was remaining to be ſpent in eſtabliſhing what was gotten, and gathering the fruit of his worthie labours paſt. The nineteenth yeere of his raigne it was, when deſtroying vtterly the great and mightie Citie of Ieruſalem, hee enriched himſelfe with abundance of ſpoyle, and terrified all that would offer to reſiſt him, by that fearefull example. From that time forward, he, vntill his three and twentieth yeere, laboured in the conqueſt of thoſe adioyning Regions, which God had expoſed vnto his ſword, & commanded to weare his yoke; namely, the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, Tyrians, Sidonians, and Ægyptians, though ſome of theſe were already become his followers, and ſerued vnder him, when Ieruſalem was beaten down and burnt. But the Tyrians, whoſe Citie was founded on an Iland, ſafe enough from any danger of a Land armie, and whoſe fleet was ſo ſtrong, that they needed not to feare any enemy at ſea, were neither danted with the fall of their neighbour Cities, nor with the obſtinate reſolution of this mightie Prince, imploying all his power to their ſubuerſion.

That the Citie of Tyre was rather well pleaſed, than any way diſcouraged with the fall of Ieruſalem (which had held the ſame courſe that Tyrus did, and endured all that might be in the ſame quarrell againſt the common enemy) it appeares by the words which Ezechiel condemneth as the common voice of Tyrus; AHA, the gate of the people is broken, it is turned vnto me; for ſeeing ſhee is deſolate, I ſhall be repleniſhed. Ezech. 26. 2.

Yet at the length, euen in the nineteenth yeere of Nabuchodonoſor, that great worke of his, whereof we haue alreadie ſpoken, began to appeare aboue the waters, and threaten them with inuitable miſchiefe.

But thoſe prophecies of Ieremie and of Eſay, which appoint vnto this deſolation of Tyre the ſame terme of 70. yeeres, that was preſcribed vnto the raigne of the Chaldæans, doe plainely ſhew, that ſhee followed Ieruſalem, the ſame nineteenth yeere of Nabuchodonoſor, in the ſame, or a very like fortune. The particularities, Ier. 25. Eſai. 23. 15.

which doubtlesse were memorable in the issue of so great and laborious a siege, are in a manner vtterly lost. Thus much we finde, That the Citizens perceiuing the Towne vnable to hold out, embarked themselues, and fled into the Isle of Cyprus. Neuertheless it seemes that this euasion serued only the principall men, who escaping with their goods, abandoned the poorer sort vnto the enemies furie. For not only such people of Tyre as dwelt on the Continent (who are called her Daughters in the field) were put to the sword; but the like execution was done in the streets, into which, with excessiue labour, the Assyrian made way for his Horses and Chariots. Thus NABVCHODONOSOR caused his Armie to serue a great seruice against TYRVS, wherein euery head was made bald, and euery shoulder was made bare, yet had he no wages, nor his Armie; but was faine to rest contented with the Honor of hauing destroied that Citie, which in all mens iudgements had beene held inuincible.

Ezech.c.2.v.8. 10. 11. Ezech.29.18.

The destruction of these two great and powerfull Cities, hauing made the name of the Chaldæans dreadfull in the eares of all the Nations thereabout, Nabuchodonosor vsed the aduantage of that reputation which hee had obtained by victories alreadie gotten, to the getting of more, and more profitable, with lesse paine. The Kingdome of Ægypt was the marke at which he aimed; a Country so abounding in all riches and pleasures, that it might wel haue tempted any Prince, finding himselfe strong enough, to seeke occasion of quarrell against it; and so farre an enemie to the Crowne of Babylon, that had it beene poorer, yet either it must haue beene subdued, or the conquest of Syria could ill haue beene established. Neuertheless it was needfull, that before hee entred into this businesse, the Countries adiacent should be reduced into such termes, that either they should wholly stand at his deuotion, or at least bee vnable to worke him any displeasure. And herein the decree of God concurred, as in all prosperous enterprises, with reason of state. For the people of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damascus, Kedar, Hazor, and other adioyning Regions, whom God for their sins had condemned to fall vnder the Babylonian swords, were such, as regarding onely their owne gaine, had some of them, like Rauens, followed the Chaldæan Armie, to feede vpon the carcasses that fell by the crueltie thereof; others taking aduantage of their neighbours miseries, occupied the Countries which were by his victories belonging to Nabuchodonosor; al of them thinking, that when the Assyrian had satisfied his furie, he should be faine to forsake those desolate parts, and leaue the possession to those that could lay hand vpon it. Particularly the Edomites and Philistims had shewed much malice to the Iewes when their Citie was taken. What good seruice they had done to the Chaldæans, I finde not; if they did any, it is likely to haue been with reference to their own purposes, wherein they were disappointed. The Ammonites were not contented to reioyce at the fall of Ierusalem, but presently they entered vpon the Country of Gad, and took possession, as if not the Assyrians, but they, had subdued Israel. Neither can I perceiue what other ground that practice had of Baalis King of the Ammonites, when he sent Ismael, a Prince of the bloud of Iuda, to murther Gedalia, whom the King of Babel had left Gouernour ouer those that remained in Israel, and to carry captiue into the Ammonites Countrie the people that abode in Mizpah, than a desire of embroiling Nabuchodonosor with so many labours at once, as should make him retire into his owne Country, and abandon those wasted Lands to himselfe and others, for whom they lay conueniently. Such or the like policie the Moabites did exercise; whose pride and wrath were made frustrate by God, and their dissimulation condemned, as not doing right.

All these Nations had the art of rauening, which is familiar to such as liue or border vpon desarts; and now the time afforded them occasion to shew the vttermost cunning of their theeuish wits. But Nebuchadnezzar did cut asunder all their deuices by sharpe and suddaine war, ouer-whelming them with vnexpected ruine, as it were in one night; according to the prophecies of Esay, Ieremie, and Ezekiel, who fore-told, with little difference of words, the greatnesse and swiftnesse of the miserie that should come vpon them. With which of them he first began, I find not; it seemes that Moab was the last which felt his hand: for so doe many good Authors interpret the prophecie of Esay, threatning Moab with destruction after three yeeres, as having reference to the third yeere following the ruine of Ierusalem; the next yeere after it being spent in the Aegyptian expedition. This is manifest, that all the principall Townes in these Regions were burnt, and the people slaine, or made slaues, few excepted, who being preserued by flight, had not the courage to returne to their habitations ouer-hastily, much lesse to attempt any thing against Nabuchodonosor, but liued as miserable out-lawes, or at least, oppressed wretches, vntill the end of the seuentie yeeres, which God had prescribed vnto the desolation of their Countries, as well as of the Land of Iuda.

§. VIII.

That Ægypt was conquered, and the King therein raigning slaine by NABVCHODONOSOR, contrarie to the opinion of most Authors: who following HERODOTVS and DIODORVS, relate it otherwise.

WHen by a long course of victorie Nabuchodonosor had brought into subiection all the Nations of Syria, & the bordering Arabians, in such wise, that no enemie to himselfe, nor friend of the Aegyptian, was left at his back, that might giue impediment vnto his proceeding, or take aduantage of any misfortune; then did hee forth-with take in hand the conquest of Aegypt himselfe, vpon which those other Nations had formerly beene depending. Of this expedition, and the victorious issue thereof, the three great Prophets, Esay, Ieremie, and Ezechiel, haue written so plainely, that I hold it altogether needlesse to looke after more authoritie, or to cite for proofe halfe of that which may be alleadged out of these. Neuertheless, we finde many and good Authors, who following Herodotus, and Diodorus Siculus, are well contented to straine these prophecies with vnreasonable diligence vnto such a sense, as giues to Nabuchodonosor little more than the honour of hauing done some spoile in Aegypt, omitting the conquest of that Land by the Babylonian, and referring the death of Apries or Hophra to a chance long after following, which had no coherence with these times or affaires. So prepostorous is the delight which many men take in the meanes and second helps conducing to their purpose, that often-times they preferre the Commentator before the Author; and to vp-hold a sentence, giuing testimonie to one clause, doe carelesly ouerthrow the historie it selfe, which thereby they sought to haue maintained. The reports of Herodotus and Diodorus, concerning the Kings of Aegypt, which raigned about these times, are already rehearsed in the former book: but that which they haue spoken of Apries, was purposely reserued vnto this place. Herodotus affirmes, that he was a very fortunate King, but wherein he telleth not; Herod. l. 2. & 3. (vnlesse we should vnderstand that he was victorious in the Warre, which he is said to haue made vpon Tyrus and Sidon) that hee raigned fiue and twentie yeeres, and was finally taken and put to death by his owne subiects; who did set vp Amasis, as King, which preuailed against him. The rebellion of the Aegyptians he imputeth to a great losse which they receiued in an expedition against the Cyrenians, by whom almost their whole Armie was destroied. This calamitie the people of Aegypt thought to be well pleasing to their King, who had sent them on this dangerous expedition, with a purpose to haue them consumed, that so he might with greater securitie raigne ouer such as staied at home. So they who escaped, and the friends of such as were slaine, rebelled against Apries, who sent Amasis to appease the tumult; but Amasis became Captaine of the rebells, and was by them chosen King. Finally, the whole Land consented vnto this new Election; whereby Apries was driuen to truſt vnto his forraine Mercenaries, the Ionians and Carians, of whom hee kept in readineſſe thirtie thouſand good Souldiers that fought valiantly for him, but were vanquiſhed by the great numbers of the Ægyptian forces, amounting vnto two hundred and fiftie thouſand, which were all by birth and education, men of warre. Apries himſelfe being taken priſoner, was gently intreated by Amaſis for a while, vntill the Ægyptians, exclaiming vpon him, as an extreme enemie to the Land, got him deliuered into their hands, and ſtrangled him, yet gaue him honourable buriall. Such is the report of Herodotus, with whome Diodorus Siculus neerely agrees, telling vs that Apries did vanquiſh the Cyprians and Phœnicians in battell at Sea, tooke by force and demoliſhed Sidon, wan the other townes of Phœnicia, and the Iſle of Cyprus, and finally, periſhed as is before rehearſed, when he had raigned two and twentie yeeres. This authoritie were enough (yet not more than enough) to informe vs of Apries his hiſtorie, if greater authoritie did not contradict it. But the deſtruction of Ægypt by the Babylonian, fore-told by the Prophets, which hath no coherence with theſe relations, hath greater force to compell our beliefe, than haue the traditions of Ægyptian Prieſts (which the Greeke Hiſtorians followed) and greater probabilities to perſwade thoſe that looke onely into humane reaſons. For Eſay propheſied long before of the ſhameful captiuitie of the Ægyptians, whom the king of Aſſhur ſhould carry away naked, young and old, in ſuch wiſe, that the Iewes, who fled vnto them for deliuerance from the Aſſyrian, ſhould bee aſhamed of their owne vaine confidence in men ſo vnable to defend themſelues.

Eſa. 20. ver. 4, 5. & 6.

But Ezekiel and Ieremie, as their prophecies were neerer to the time of execution, ſo they handled this Argument more preciſely. For Ezekiel telleth plainely, that Ægypt ſhould be giuen to Nebuchadnezzar, as wages for the ſeruice which hee had done at Tyre: Alſo hee recounteth particularly all the chiefe Cities in Ægypt, ſaying, That theſe by name ſhould bee deſtroyed, and goe into captiuitie; yea, that PHARAOH and all his armie ſhould be ſlaine by the ſword. Wherefore it muſt needes be a violent expoſition of theſe Prophecies, which by applying the iſſue of ſuch threatnings to an inſurrection and rebellion, concludes all, without any other alteration in Ægypt, than change of the Kings perſon, wherein Amaſis did ſucceed vnto Apries, by force indeede, but by the vniforme conſent of all the people. Certainely, if that notable place of Ieremie, wherein hee foretelleth how the Iewes in Ægypt ſhould ſee Pharaoh Hophra deliuered into the hand of his enemies, as Zedekia had beene, were to be referred vnto the time of that rebellion, whereof Herodotus hath ſpoken, as the generall opinion hath ouer-ruled it, then was it vainely done of the ſame Prophet (which God forbid that any Chriſtian ſhould thinke, ſeeing hee did it by the appointment of God himſelfe) to hide in the clay of a Brick-hill, thoſe very ſtones, vpon which the throne of Nabuchodonoſor ſhould be ſet, and his pauilion ſpred. Yea then was that prophecie no other than falſe, which expreſſed the end of Pharaoh thus: Behold, I will viſite the common people of No, & PHARAOH, and Ægypt, with their gods and their kings, euen PHARAOH, and all that truſt in him: and I will deliuer them into the hands of thoſe that ſeeke their liues, and into the hand of NEBVCHADNEZZAR, King of Babel, and into the hands of his ſeruants. The clearenes of this prophecy being ſuch as could not but refute that interpretation of many other places, which referred all to the rebellion of Amaſis, it cauſed me to wonder what thoſe Commentators would ſay to it, who are elſewhere ſo diligent in fitting all to the Greeke Hiſtorians. Wherefore looking vpon Iunius, who had in another place taken the enemies of Pharaoh Hophra to be Amaſis, and his followers, I found him heere acknowledging that the Aegyptian Prieſts had notably deluded Herodotus with lies, coined vpon a vaine-glorious purpoſe of hiding their owne diſgrace and bondage. And ſurely it may well be thought, that the hiſtorie of Nebuchadnezzar, was better knowne to the Iewes, whom it concerned, than to the Greekes, that ſcarcely at any time heard of his name. Therefore I ſee no cauſe why we ſhould not rather ther beleeue Ioſephus, reporting that Nabuchodonoſor in the three & twentieth yeere of his raigne, and the fift yeere of the deſtruction of Ieruſalem, did conquer Egypt, kill the King thereof, and appoint another in his ſtead, than Herodotus or Diodore; who being meere ſtrangers to this buſineſſe, had no great reaſon to labor in ſearching out the truth, but might reſt contented with any thing that the Prieſts would tell them. Now if ſetting aſide all aduantage of authoritie, we ſhould only conſider the relations of Ioſephus, and of the Greeke Hiſtorians, as either of them might bee verified of it ſelfe by apparant circumſtances, without reflecting vpon the Hebrew Prophets, or Ægyptian Prieſts; me thinks the death of Apries can no way be approued as hauing beene wrought by conſent of the people, but affords great matter of ſuſpition; yea, though no man had oppoſed the reports of Herodotus and Diodore. For the great loue and honour which the Ægyptians did beare vnto their Kings, is notorious by the vniforme teſtimony of al others that haue handled the matters of that Countrey, as well as by the report of Diodore himſelfe. How then can wee thinke it probable, that Apries hauing wonne great victories, did for one only loſſe fall into the hatred of all his people, or which may ſerue to perſwade vs, that a King of Ægypt would ſeeke, or ſo demeane himſelfe, that he might be thought to ſeeke the deſtruction of his naturall ſubiects? As for that armie of thirtie thouſand ſouldiers, Carians and Ionians, which the King of Ægypt, whom Amaſis tooke priſoner, is ſaid to haue kept for his defence: doth it not argue that hee was a forrainer, and one that armed himſelfe againſt the Aegyptians, wiſhing them few and weake; rather than any of the Pharaohs, who accounted the force of the Country, as aſſuredly their owne, as the ſtrength of their owne bodies? It were more tedious than any way needfull, to vſe all Arguments that might bee alleadged in this caſe. The very death of this ſuppoſed Apries, which the clamours of the people obtained of Amaſis, who ſought to haue kept him aliue, doth intimate that he was ſome forren Gouernour, not a naturall Prince; otherwiſe the people would haue deſired to ſaue his life, and Amaſis to take it quickly from him. I will not labour any further to diſproue that opinion, whereunto I ſhould not haue yeelded, though it had ſtood vpon great apparance of truth, conſidering that the voice of Truth it ſelfe cries out againſt it; but leaue the circumſtances, prouing the Conqueſt of Aegypt by Nabuchodonoſor to bee obſerued, where due occaſion in courſe of the ſtorie following ſhall preſent them.

Ioſephus de Antiq. Iud. lib. 10. c. 11.

How Ægypt was ſubdued and held by NABVCHADNEZZAR.

IT is a great loſſe; that the generall Hiſtorie of the World hath ſuffered, by the ſpoile and waſte which Time hath made of thoſe Monuments, that ſhould haue preſerued the memorie of ſuch famous actions as were accompliſhed by this mightie Prince Nabuchodonoſor; wherein, whether his Vertue, or Fortune were greater, it is now vncertaine. That his victories following the Conqueſt of Syria, and the Neighbour-Prouinces, were ſuch as did more enlarge his dominion, than all his former warres had done, it may eaſily be gathered out of Ezekiel, who reckons vp in his thirtieth chapter (beſides the whole Countrey of Ægypt) Phut and Lud, with other Nations that may ſeeme to haue reached out into Mauritania, as people ſubdued by this great Babylonian. The circumſtances of theſe warres are in a maner vtterly loſt; but that the victorie was eaſie and ſwift, any man ſhall find, who will take the pains to conferre the places, wherein the three great Prophets touch this Argument. Thus much I thinke worthy of more particular obſeruation; that Pharaoh, who (as is already noted in the former Booke) thought himſelfe ſafe in Ægypt by the well defenced ſituation of his Countrey, did very vnwiſely in ſuffering his enemies to sweepe the way cleane vnto his owne doores, by consuming all his friends and adhærents in Syria. For as the labour of this businesse did more harden then wearie the Chaldæan army, so the confidence and vaine securitie of the Ægyptians, relying vpon the difficult passages which the enemie was to make thorow the Arabian desarts, and the much aduantage which the great riuer of Nilus would afford vnto themselues, did little auaile them in prouision for the war, and much astonish them (as may iustly bee thought) in the time of execution: it being vsually seene, that the hearts of men faile, when those helps faile, in which they had reposed more confidence than in their owne vertue. Hitherto the Kingdome of Ægypt had flourished vnder the rule of the Pharaohs, about a thousand fiue hundred & foure score yeeres; but from this time forward it remained forty yeeres without a King, vnder the subiection of the Babylonians; and then at length it began to recouer by little & litle the former greatnes, yet so, that it was neuer dreadful vnto others, God hauing said of that people, I wil diminish them, that they shal no more rule the Nations. For whereas it hath beene said of Pharaoh: I am the sonne of the wise, I am the sonne of the ancient Kings: and whereas he had vaunted, The Riuer is mine, and I haue made it; the Princes of Ægypt now became fooles, the riuer failed them, the King himselfe was taken and slaine, and that ancient linage quite extinguished. This came to passe in the first yeere after the destruction of Ierusalem, and the three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzar, at which time (saith Iosephus) He slew the King then raigning, placed another in his roome, and carried captiues thence to Babylon, the Iewes whome he found in that Countrie. Now concerning the time which Iosephus giues vnto this businesse, and the businesse it selfe, I haue already shewed, that it is warranted by all the prophecies which insinuate the same. As likewise the last destruction of Ierusalem, and carrying away those vnto Babel, who inhabited the miserable ruines of that great city, which was in the same three & twentieth yeere of NEBVCHADNEZZAR, is not vnprobably thought by good authors to haue beene at the returne from this Ægyptian expedition. But whereas Iosephus tels vs, that there was another King put in the roome of Apries by Nebuchadnezzar, wee must vnderstand, that hee was onely a Viceroy, and not (as some haue mistaken it) thinke that this was Amasis. For to place the beginning of Amasis his raigne in the three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzar, were as well repugnant vnto the prophecies before alleadged, as to all Chronologie and historie. Some there are, which to helpe this inconuenience, imagine that there were two successiuely bearing the name of Amasis; others, that there were two Apries, the one slaine by Nebuchadnezzar, the other by Amasis: a question of small importance, because the difference is onely about a name, it being once granted that the person mentioned in Scriptures, was depriued of life and kingdome by the Assyrians. Yet for any thing that I can perceiue, that Apries, of whom the Greeke Historians wrote, could not be the Deputie of Nebuchadnezzar, seeing that hee was the Grand-childe of Pharao Necho, and made warre (as they report) vpon the Phœnicians, who were, before the Ægyptians, become subiect vnto the Crowne of Babylon. I might adde, perhappes, that he whom Nebuchadnezzar left as Gouernour of Ægypt, was more likely to haue had some Chaldæan or Assyrian, than Ægyptian name; vnlesse we should thinke that hee had beene a traytor to his naturall Prince, and so rewarded by the Conquerour with Lieutenantship of the Country: about which it were but friuolous to dispute. Thus much in briefe we ought to beleeue, that Nabuchodonosor made an absolute Conquest of Ægypt; that he was not so fooliish as to giue it away, any man may guesse; that he appointed one to rule the Countrey, it is consequent vnto the former, and hath authoritie of Iosephus; that this Gouernour (or some successour of his) was afterwards taken and slaine by Amasis, I see probabilitie enough to perswade my selfe, and yet can well bee content, that others vse their libertie, and beleeue what they list. As for the armie which this Ægyptian King Apries is supposed to haue kept of Ionians and Carians; I hold them to be none other than the garisons of mercenarie souldiers which were left by the Assyrian for the guard of his Viceroy, and custodie of the new subdued Prouince: as likewise the company returning from Cyrene and Barce; who together with the friends of such as were slaine in that expedition, remembred before out of the Greeke Historians, deposed and slew Apries, I take them to haue beene the Aegyptian fugitiues, which then recouered their owne Countrey. Sure it is that this Prophecie of Ezekiel was verified, At the end of fortie yeeres will I gather the Ægyptians from the people where they were scattered, and I will bring againe the captiuitie of Ægypt, and will cause them to returne into the land of Pathros, into the land of their habitation, and they shall be there a small kingdome. If the Ægyptian Priests alluded hereunto in the tale which they made of Amasis his obtaining the Kingdome, then are they to be helped with this or the like interpretation; if they deuised matter that had no shadow of truth, onely to keepe the Greekes from knowledge of their Countries disgrace; then are they little to be regarded, since we know the truth with them. Ezek. 30. v. 13. & 14.

Of the sundry accompts drawne from sundry acts of NEBVCHADNEZZAR, and of the destruction of Niniue, by him; the time of which action is vncertaine.

THese victories brought the greatnes of the Assyrian Empire to the full, and from them was reckoned the time of Nebuchadnezzar's raigne in sundry places of Scripture. To speake any more of the questions arising about the supputation of Nebuchadnezzar his times, might seeme to be the ouer-handling of one Argument: Yet thus much I will note; that whereas Daniel was carried captiue in the third yeere of Iehoiakims raigne (which ranne along with some part of Nebuchadnezzar's first yeere) and was kept in diet three yeeres more, before he was brought into the Kings presence; it could not be the second of Nebuchadnezzar's kingdome, wherin he interpreted the forgotten dreame of the great Image, foreshewing the succession of Monarchies, but the second of his Empire. The same or the like may be said of diuers places which referre sundry matters vnto their set yeeres; as that of Ezekiel before-cited, where he fore-tells, that Aegypt should be giuen in reward for the seruice done before Tyrus, dating his prophecie in the seuen and twentieth yeere; and that of Daniel, placing the erection of the golden Image in the eighteenth yeere: for these yeeres held no dependance vpon either the beginning of Nebuchadnezzar's kingdome, or of his Empire, nor yet vpon any of the captiuities, but had reference to some memorable action, omitted in Scripture, and therefore not easie to be found, nor worth the labour of vncertaine search. Dan. c. 1. & 2.

Of any warre made by Nebuchadnezzar, after such time as he returned from the Conquest of Aegypt, I doe not read: excepting that against Niniue, the destruction whereof was fore-tolde by the Prophet Naum. Niniue had long before beene taken by Merodach (as in due place hath beene shewed) and together with the rest of Assyria made subiect to Babylon. Yet was it left vnder a peculiar King, who rebelling against the Chaldean, as Iehoiakim & Zedekias, tributary Kings of Iuda, had done, tasted likewise of the same fortune. That the destruction of Niniue followed the Conquest of Aegypt, it appeareth by the comparison which Nahum the Prophet made betweene this Citie, that was to fall, and the Citie of No in Aegypt, that was fallen already. But how long after this came to passe, it is (me thinks) vnpossible to finde out. For whereas it is found in an Hebrew Chronologie, that it was in the first of Nebuchadnezzar's raigne; the place of Nahum last cited is enough to disproue it. Whereas it is referred by some vnto the first of his Monarchie, which began at the end of the Aegyptian warres; the whole Prophecie of Nahum which went betweene the one and the other, argueth strongly, that there was a longer space of time intercurrent. Nahum. 3. 8.

current. So that to enquire into the very yeere of this destruction, or other circumstances of the Warre, whether managed by Nabuchodonosor in person, or by his Lieutenants, were somewhat like vnto the vaine curiositie of Tyberius Cæsar, enquiring who was the Mother of Hecuba; or to the like idle paines which he should take, who would seeke to learne what woman that Huzzab Queen of Niniuie was, whose wofull captiuitie the same Prophet Naum likewise did fore-tell.

§. XI.

Of the later time of NEBVCHADNEZZAR; his buildings, madnesse, and death.

OF the time which this great Monarch spent in quiet, I thinke there are no Monuments extant; saue those which wee finde among the prophecies of Daniel. Among these wee may reckon his great works at Babylon, wherewith he pleased himselfe so well, that he brake out into these glorious words: Is not this great Babel that I haue built for the house of the Kingdome, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my Maiestie? Dan.4.27. Surely if those things bee true that are by Iosephus rehearsed of him out of Berosus and Megasthenes, he might well delight himselfe with the contemplation of such goodly and magnificent buildings. For it is said, That he fortified Babylon with a triple wall; that besides other stately works, he raised those huge arches wherewith were borne vp the high Orchards, hanging as it were in the ayre, and equalling the tops of Mountaines; which most sumptuous frame, that out-lasted all the remainder of the Assyrian, and all the Persian Empire, is said to haue beene reared, and finished in fifteene daies.

But of all this, and other his magnificence, we finde little else recorded, than that (which indeede is most profitable for vs to consider) his ouer-valuing of his owne greatnesse abased him vnto a condition, inferiour to the poorest of men. And not vndeseruedly fell these iudgements of God vpon him. For whereas God had honoured him, not onely with many victories, and much happinesse in his owne life, but with a discouerie of things to come after him, yea and had approoued the certaintie of his dreame, by the miraculous reducing of it into his memorie, and interpretation thereof by Daniel the Prophet: he neuertheless became so forgetfull of God, whose wonderfull power he had seene and acknowledged, that hee caused a golden Image to be set vp and worshipped: ordaining a cruell death as reward vnto them that should dare to disobey his Kingly will and pleasure, which was vtterly repugnant to the law of him that is the King of Kings. Hereof S. Hierome hath well noted; Velox obliuio veritatis, vt qui dudum seruum Dei quasi Deum adorauerat, nunc statuam sibi fieri iubeat, vt ipse quasi Deus in statuâ adoraretur: A hastie forgetfulnesse of the truth, that hee who so lately had worshipped (DANIEL) the seruant of God, as if he had beene God himselfe, should now command a Statua to be erected vnto himselfe, wherein himselfe might bee worshipped as God. From this impietie it pleased God to reclaime him, by the strange and wonderfull deliuerie of those blessed Saints out of the fierie fornace; who being throwne into it bound, for refusing to commit Idolatrie, were assisted by an Angell; preserued from all harme of the fire; loosened from their bands; and finally called out with gracious words, and restored to their former honour, by the King: who amazed at the miracle, made a decree tending to the honour of God, which by erection of his Image he had violated. Yet this deuotion of Nabuchadnezzar was not so rooted in him, that it could bring foorth fruit answerable to his hastie zeale. Therefore was he forewarned by God in a dreame of the terrible iudgement hanging ouer his head, which Daniel expounding, aduised him to breake off his sinne by righteousnesse, and his iniquitie by mercy towards the poore, that there might be an healing of his error. Hereby it seemes that that iniuſtice and crueltie were the faults, for which he was threatned, but this threating ſufficed not vnto his reformation. For that ſo great a Monarch ſhould be driuen from among men, (according to the tenor of the dreame and interpretation) yea, compelled to dwell with the beaſts of the field, and made to eate graſſe as the Oxen, was a thing ſo incredible in mans iudgement, that eaſily it might be thought an idle dreame, and much more eaſily be forgotten at the yeeres end. One whole yeeres leaſure to repent was giuen to this haughtie Prince: which reſpite of the execution may ſeeme to haue bred in him a forgetfulneſſe of Gods ſentence. For at the end of twelue moneths, walking in the royall Palace of Babel, he was ſo ouer-ioyed and tranſported with a vaine contemplation of his owne ſeeming happineſſe, that without all feare of Gods heauie iudgement pronounced againſt him, hee vttered thoſe loftie words before rehearſed, in vaunting of the Maieſticall works which he had reared, as well beſeeming his maieſticall perſon. But his high ſpeeches were not fully ended, when a voice from heauen, telling him that his Kingdome was departed from him, rehearſed ouer vnto him the ſentence againe, which was fulfilled vpon him the very ſame houre.

That Salomon, and many other Princes, and great ones, haue taken delight in their owne buildings, it cannot any way be doubted; yet I doe not remember that euer I haue read of any, that were puniſhed for reioycing in works of this kinde (though it is hard in ioy, or any paſſion of the minde, to keepe a iuſt meaſure) excepting onely this Nabuchadnezzar.

The like may be ſaid of Dauid: for other (and ſome very godly) Kings haue muſtred all their forces to the very laſt man; but few or none haue been known to haue beene puniſhed as Dauid was. Surely I not onely hold it lawfull to reioyce in thoſe good things, wherwith God hath bleſſed vs; but a note of much vnthankfulneſſe to entertaine them with a ſullen and vnfeeling diſpoſition. Yet as all humane affections, wherein due reference to God is wanting, are no better than obſcure cloudes, hindring the influence of that bleſſed light, which clarifies the ſoule of man, and prediſpoſeth it vnto the brightneſſe of eternall felicitie; ſo that inſolent ioy, which man in the pride of his vaine imagination conceiueth of his owne worth, doth aboue all other paſſions blaſt our mindes, as it were with lightning, and make vs to reflect our thoughts vpon our ſeeming inherent greatneſſe, forgetting the whileſt him, to whom wee are indebted for our very being. Wherefore theſe malamentis gaudia; The euill ioyes of the minde, were not vnaptly, by the Prince of Latine Poets, beſtowed in the entrance of Hell, and placed further inward than ſorrowes, cares, and teares; not farre from the yron Cabbins of the Furies. And certainely it is no vnlikely token of vengeance neere at hand, when theſe vnreaſonable fluſhes of proud and vaine ioy, doe rage in a minde, that ſhould haue beene humbled with a iuſt repentance and acknowledgement of ill deſeruing.

This was verified vpon Nebuchadnezzar, whoſe puniſhment was ſingular and vnexampled. For he ranne among beaſts in the fields and woods, where for ſeuen yeeres hee liued, not onely as a ſaluage man, but as a ſaluage beaſt, for a beaſt hee thought himſelfe ſecundum ſuam imaginationem, as Thomas noteth, and therefore fed himſelfe in the ſame manner, and with the ſame food that beaſts doe; Not that he was changed in figure externall, according to Mediana, in ſo much as he appeared a beaſt to other mens eies, as S. Hierome in the life of Hilarius (how true God knows) ſpeakes of a woman that appeared to all other mens ſight a Cow, but to Hilarius onely a woman; neither was he changed as Iphigenia the Daughter of Agamemnon was ſaid to be, into a Hinde, nor made a Monſter, as Dorotheus and Epiphanius dreamed: but according to S. Ieromes expoſition of theſe words: At the ſame time was my vnderſtanding reſtored vnto me &c. Quando dicit (ſaith S. Ierome) ſenſum ſibi redditum, oſtendit non formam ſe amiſiſſe, ſed mentem; When he ſaith that his ſenſe was reſtored vnto him, he ſheweth that he had not loſt his humane ſhape, but his vnderſtanding. Seuen yeeres expired, it pleaſed God to reſtore Nabuchodonoſor, both to his vnderſtanding, ding, and his estate, for which he acknowledged and praised God all the rest of his life, confessing his power, and euerlasting being; that he was the Lord of heauen and earth, and wrought without resistance what he pleased in both; that his works were all truth, and his waies righteous. Which gaue argument to many of the Fathers, and others, not to doubt of his saluation; namely, S. Augustine, Theodoret, Lyra, Carthusianus, and others. And for that place of Esay, the fourteenth, out of which his perdition may be gathered, the aforenamed Authors apply the same to Balthasar, because Isay, both in the thirteenth and fourteenth Chapter, speaketh of the King, and the destruction of Babylon ioyntly.

Of EVILMERODACH.

HAuing already spoken what I could of the succession and yeeres of Nebuchadnezzars posteritie; the most that may be said of him, is said of Euilmerodach, which I will not here againe rehearse.

He lost some part of that which his Father had gotten; and left his Kingdome burning in a warre that consumed it to ashes. He lost Ægypt by rebellion of the people, in the nineteenth yere of his raigne, which was fortie yeeres after his Father had conquered it. But this agrees neither with the accompt of Herodotus, who allowes to Amasis foure and fortie yeeres of raigne; nor with that of Diodorus, who giues him fiue and fiftie, saying that he died in the third yeere of the threescore and third Olympiad, when Cambyses did conquer Ægypt. There were indeed but seuen and thirtie yeeres, which passed betweene the second yeere of the foure and fiftieth Olympiad, (which was the nineteenth of Euilmerodach, and the first of Amasis) and the fift of Cambyses his raigne, wherein hee wanne Ægypt; of which seuen and thirtie yeeres it is credibly held, that Psamennitus, the sonne of Amasis, raigned three: so that Amasis could be no longer King than foure and thirtie yeeres. But seeing that these two Greeke Historians haue beene abused by Aegyptian Priests, in the substance of that which was spoken of Amasis, it is no maruell though they were also deceiued in the length of his raigne. This is the plaine answere to this obiection. For to say either that the numbers were miswritten, and foure and fortie set downe in stead of foure and thirtie, or that Amasis did temporise awhile with the Assyrians, and not beare himselfe as absolute King of Ægypt, vntill the nineteenth of Euilmerodach (at which time, and not before, it hath beene proued out of Ezechiel, that Ægypt became againe a Kingdome) I hold it a superfluous excuse.

Whether these Aegyptian troubles did animate the King of the Medes to deale with Euilmerodach, as with a Prince greater in fame, and reputation, gotten by the decaied valour of his people, than in present forces; or whether (as I rather thinke) some foile receiued by the Assyrian inuading Media, emboldned the Aegyptians to rebell against him: I will neither vndertake, nor seeke to define. Xenophon tels, that the first seruice of young Cyrus in warre, was vnder Astyages King of the Medes, his Grand-father, in a prosperous fight against the Assyrian Prince, who did set vpon him; at which time Cyrus was fifteen or sixteen yeeres old. If therefore Cyrus liued threescore & three yeeres (as he is said to haue died well stricken in yeeres) which is held to be the ordinarie terme of no short life, then was this encounter in the third yeere of Euilmerodach his raigne. Yet by the same reckoning it should follow, that the warre began more early betweene these Nations, for as much as the manner of their fight in former times, with other circumstances insinuating as much, are found in the same place of Xenophon. And it may well be, that the death or destruction of Nabuchodonosor gaue courage vnto those that had felt him a troublesome neighbour, to stand vpon prouder termes with the Assyrians, than in his flourishing estate they durst haue vsed. Howsoeuer the quarrell beganne, wee finde that it ended not before the last ruine of the Assyrian Monarchie. For the Babylonian, being too proud to digest the losses which hee receiued by the Medes and their Allies the Persians, drew vnto his partie the Lydians, and all the people of the lesser Asia, with gifts and strong perswasions, hoping so to ouer-whelme his enemies with a strong inuasion, whome in vaine hee had sought to weary out with a lingring Warre.

This happened after the death of Astyages, who left the World in the nineteenth yeere of Euilmerodach, at which time Amasis tooke possession of Ægypt. So that the Assyrian hauing his hands alreadie full of businesse, which more earnestly did affect him, seemes thereby to haue giuen the better meanes vnto the Aegyptians, of new erecting their Kingdome, which by long distance of place did sundry times finde occasion to rebell in after-ages, and set vp a King within it selfe, against the far more mightie Persian.

The issue of these great preparations made by Euilmerodach against the Medes, was such as opened the way vnto the fulfilling of those prophecies, which were many yeeres before vttered against Babel, by Esay and Ieremie.

For the Assyrians, and their Confederates, who, trusting in their numbers, thought to haue buried the Medes and Persians vnder their thicke shewres of arrowes and darts, were encountred with an armie of stout and well-trained men, weightily armed for close fight, by whom they were beaten in open battell, wherein Euilmerodach was slaine. So that great frame of Empire which Nabuchodonosor had raysed and vp-held, being shaken and grieuously crackt vnder his vnfortunate Sonne, was left to bee sustained by his vnworthy Nephew: a man more likely to haue ouerthrowne it, when it was greatest and strongest, than to repaire it, when it was in way of falling.

§. XIII.

A priuate coniecture of the Author; seruing to make good those things, which are cited out of BEROSVS, concerning the Successors of EVILMERODACH, without wrong to the truth, the qualitie, and death of BALTHASAR.

THough I haue alreadie (as it seemes to mee) sufficiently prooued that Balthasar was the Sonne, and immediate Successour to Euilmerodach, yet considering earnestly the coniectures of those Writers, which following Berosus, insert Nigliſar, or Niriglissoroor, and his sonne Labassardach betweene them: as also that which I finde in Herodotus of Nitocris, a famous Queene of Babylon, who greatly adorned and fortified that Citie; I haue thought it not superfluous here in this place to shew, by what meanes it was possible that some errour might haue crept into the Historie of those times, and thereby haue brought vs to a needlesse trouble of searching out the truth, as it were by candle-light, in the vncertaine fragments of lost Authors, which we might haue found by day-light, had we adhered onely to the Scriptures. First, therefore I obserue, that the time which Berosus dinides betwixt Euilmerodach, and the two next Kings, agrees with the yeeres in which Nebuchadnezzar liued wilde among brute beasts in the open field: Secondly, that the suddainenesse of this accident, which came in one houre, could not but worke much perturbation in that state, wherein doubtlesse the honour of so noble a Prince was highly regarded, his calamitie pitied, and his restitution hoped; the prediction of Daniel finding reputation in that clause which promised his recouerie, as being verified in that which had bin more incredible. Now if we doe in common reason iudge, what course was like to be taken by the great ones of the Kingdome, for settling the gouernment, whilest the King was thus distracted, we shall finde it most likely, that his Sonne and Heire did occupie the royall Throne, with condition to restore it vnto his Father, when God should enable him to repossesse it. In this his rule Euilmerodach being to supplie the vtter want of vnderstanding in his Father, as Protectors doe the vnripenesse of it in young, but reasonable Kings, might easily either commit the insolencies, or fall into the troubles, incident to such an office. That hee had in him very small abilitie of gouernment, it appeares by his ill maintaining the Empire, when hee held it in his owne right. That his Sister Nitocris (if Nitocris were his sister) was a woman of an high spirit, it appeares by that which Herodotus reports of her, saying that shee was more cunning than Semiramis, as appeared in her magnificent and vsefull works about the Riuer of Euphrates, and her fortification of Babylon against the Medes, who had gotten many Townes from the Assyrians, & amongst them Ninuie. Wherfore it were not vnreasonable to think, that such a woman, seeing how the Empire went to decay through her brothers misgouernment, vsed practices to get the rule into her owne hands, and afterwards, as a mother, to leaue it vnto her vngracious sonne. Other time than this, wherein Nitocris could haue raigned, we doe not finde; but we finde in Berosus (as Iosephus hath cited him) that Nigliſſar, who got the Kingdom from Euilmerodach, was his sisters husband; which argues this to haue beene the same woman. As for Labassardach the sonne of Nigliſſar, if at the end of nine Moneths raigne hee were for his lewd conditions slaine by the Nobilitie, as the same Berosus reporteth, it seems that God prepared hereby the way for Nebuchadnezzars restitution (whose terme of punishment was then expired) by raising such troubles as should make him the more desired, both of the Princes and the people. I will not here vse many words to confute that which Berosus hath further set downe of Euilmerodach, telling vs that hee was slaine by his sisters husband: for the plaine words of Scripture, naming the yeere wherein he gaue libertie to Iechonia, do plainly testifie that he out-liued the three or foure and fortieth yeere of his Fathers raigne, which was the last of his life.

Herod. l. 1.

This may suffice to shew, that they who are said to haue succeeded Euilmerodach in the Kingdome, might indeede haue so done, though not when hee held it in his owne right. Of Balthasar, who was his Sonne and Heire, we finde, that he had such conditions, as God permitteth to be in a King for the ruine of the people. He was from his young yeeres of a mischieuous nature; hauing in his Fathers time slaine a Noble yong man that should haue married his sister, onely for spight and enuie to see him kill two wild beasts in hunting, at which himselfe hauing throwne his Iauelin had missed them. Another great Lord he had gelded, because a Gentlewoman commending his beautie, said it were a happie woman that should be his wife. Such barbarous vilanies caused many which had loued his Father (as a good and gracious, though vnfortunate Prince) to reuolt from him vnto the enemie as soone as he was King. Neither doe I finde that hee performed any thing worthy of record, but as a Coward and a Foole hee lost all; sitting still, and not once daring to giue battell to them that daily tooke somewhat from him: Yet carelesly feasting when danger had hemmed him in on euery side, and when death arrested him by the hands of those whom hee had wronged in his Fathers life. So the end of him was base and miserable; for he died as a foole taken in vnexcusable securitie, yet had not that happinesse, such as it is, of a death free from apprehension of feare, but was terrified with a dreadful vision; which had shewed his ruine not many houres before, euen whilest hee was drinking in that wine, which the swords of his insulting enemies drew out of him, together with his lateſt bloud. It is therefore in this place enough to say of him, That after a dishonourable raigne of seuenteene yeres, he perished riſhed like a beaſt, and was ſlaine as he deſerued. The reſt that concerneth him in queſtion of his time, hath beene ſpoken heretofore; in matter of his affaires, ſhall be handled among the acts of Cyrus, to whoſe ſtorie that of Balthazar is but an appendix.

CHAP. II.

Of the originall and firſt greatneſſe of the Perſians.

§. I.

That the Medes were chiefe actors in the ſubuerſion of the Babylonian Empire.

THE Line of Belochus being now extinguiſhed in Balthaſar, the Empire of Babylon, and of Aſſyria, was ioyned firſt to that of Media, which then was gouerned by Cyaxares or Darius Medus, after whom Cyrus became Lord and Monarch, both of Aſſyria and of Media it ſelfe.

Of the race of Phul Belochus there were ten Kings beſides himſelfe, and of Arbaces as many are found by Metaſthenes. Theſe two Prouinciall Gouernours hauing cut downe the laſt branch of Ninus in Sardanapalus, diuided betweene them the Eaſterne Empire: Cyaxares (whom the Scriptures call Darius Medus) the laſt of the race of Arbaces, dying about two yeeres after that the line of Belochus was ended in Balthaſar; the Dominions aſwell of the Conquerour, as of the conquered, fell to a third Familie, namely, to Cyrus of the houſe of Achæmenes, the Princes of which blood raigning in Perſia, had formerly beene dependants on the Medes, and were of as little power at home, as of fame abroad in the World.

Of the Family of the Achæmenes, and Line of the Perſian Kings, we ſhal hereafter finde occaſion in due place to intreat.

The Nation of the Medes deſcended from Madai the third ſonne of Iaphet; that they had Kings ſoone after the floud, Lactantius and Diodorus haue found record; For Lactantius remembreth an ancient King of the Medes called Hydaſpes, and Diodor ſpeaketh of Pharnus with his ſeuen Sonnes, ſlaine by the Aſſyrian in the beginning of their Empire.

But of theſe who ſucceeded Arbaces the firſt, that freed his Nation from the Aſſyrians. I take the liſt and number from Euſebius, adding Darius Medus: of whom I haue ſpoken in their proper places heretofore; and they are theſe.

And though the Greekes ascribe the conquest of Babylon to Cyrus alone, yet the Scriptures teach vs that Darius was not onely King of Media, and had the Persians his followers, but that the Armie victorious ouer Balthazar was his; as the Assyrian and Babylonian Empire also was during his owne life. For wee finde in Daniel, that Darius of the Medes tooke the Kingdome being threescore and two yeres old: And further, what Officers it pleased him to set ouer the Kingdome. And so was it
v.11.& 28. And by IEREMIE; The Lord hath raised vp the Spirit of the King of the Medes: for his purpose is against Babel to de destroy it; and in the eigth and twentieth Verse, Prepare against her the Nations, with the King of the Medes, the Dukes thereof, the Princes thereof, and all the Land of his Dominion. These Scriptures Iulius Affricanus doth well open, who taking authoritie from Diodor, Castor, Thallus, and others, deliuereth that Babylon was taken before Cyrus beganne to raigne, which also agreeth with
Lib. 16. Strabo, where he saith, That as the Medes were subiugated by the Persians, so before that, both the Babylonians and Assyrians were mastered by the Medes. And therfore the reports of Iustine, and Herodotus, are not to be receiued, who attribute the taking of Babylon to Cyrus alone.

By what meanes the Empire was translated from the Medes to the Persians.

NOw the Kingdome of the Medes fell into the hands of Cyrus, it is a doubt not sufficiently cleared by Historians, but rather their different relations of his beginnings haue bred the former opinion of those who giue the conquest of Babel to the Persian only. For some there are who denie that Astyages had any other Successour than Cyrus his Grand-child by Mandane. Whereas Ctesias on the contrarie side affirmeth, that Cyrus was no way descended from Astyages (whom hee calleth Astigas or Apinia) but onely that hauing vanquished him in battaile, and confined him to Bactria, hee married his Daughter Amytis. But I finde the relations of Ctesias often cited and seldome followed, and himselfe sometimes very iustly reproued of wilfull vntruth.

Viginier a diligent and learned Historian of this age, produceth many probable reasons that Astyages had no such sonne as Cyaxares, or Darius Medus; and to confirme his opinion, the more he citeth Diodore, Iustine, Strabo, Plato, Aristotle, Isocrates, and before them Castor, Thallus, and Phlegon, who doe not finde any such Successour. Neither doe Tatianus, Theophilus, Antiochenus, Iulius Affricanus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Iustine Martyr, Lactantius, Eusebius, S. Hierome, or S. Augustine, make report out of any faithfull Author by them read, that hath giuen other Son or Successour to Astyages than Cyrus.

Yet seeing that this manner of argument ab authoritate negatiuè, doth neuer in-force conſent; we may bee the bolder (all this great liſt of noble Writers by him alleaged notwithſtanding) to affirme that either Aſtyages himſelfe muſt haue been Darius of the Medes, which cannot agree with his place in the courſe of time; Or elſe to giue him ſome other Succeſſour, according to Ioſephus, and Xenophon, the ſame whom Daniel calleth Darius. For it is manifeſt, and without diſpute, that the King of the Medes commanded in chiefe, and was abſolute Lord of that Conqueſt, Cyrus during his life, being no other then the Lieutenant of his Armie, and ſubiect to his authoritie; The ſtrength of both Nations, to wit, the Medes and Perſians, with other the Vaſſalls of Darius, being ioyned together to compound it.

Zon. l. 1. c. 19.
Ioſ. an. l. 10. c. 13
Xen. l. 8. Ped.

But it is very certaine that the honour of that great victorie ouer Babylon was wholly giuen to Cyrus, who was the inſtrument preordained and forenamed by God himſelfe, not onely for his action, but for the deliuerie of his Church; a greater worke in the eies of God, than the ſubuerſion of any State or Monarchie, how powerfull ſoeuer.

And it may well be thought, that the Souldiers imployed in that ſeruice did rather aſcribe the glorie to him that was the beſt man of Warre, than to the Median, who was greateſt in riches and power. All which alſo falling vpon Cyrus by ſucceſſion, and continuing in his poſteritie, did much augment the fame of his vertue, which among prophane Hiſtorians ouergrew altogether the honour due to Cyaxares, both becauſe he was old, and did nothing in perſon; as alſo becauſe hee ſoone after quitted the world, and left all to Cyrus, who was poſſeſt of whatſoeuer belonged to Darius, before the fame of any ſuch King or Conquerour was carried farre off.

And for the Greeke Hiſtorians, they tooke all things from the relations of the Perſians, who gaue to Cyrus all the praiſe of a moſt excellent Prince, making none his equall. Only Daniel in the firſt, fift, and ſixt Chapters of his prophecies, makes it plaine, that himſelfe not onely liued a great Officer vnder King Darius, but that hee continued in that eſtate to the firſt of Cyrus; which being the yeere of Daniels death, could not haue bene diſtinguiſhed from the raigne of Darius, if they had begunne together and raigned ioyntly; Neither can it bee imagined that Darius held the Kingdome by Cyrus permiſſion, conſidering that Cyrus beganne after him.

§. III.

XENOPHONS relation of the Warre with the Medes and Perſians, made with ioynt forces vpon the Aſſyrians, and others.

THeſe Teſtimonies of the Scriptures, which neede no other confirmation, yet made more open to our vnderſtanding, by that which Xenophon hath written of theſe warres: The cauſe whereof, according to his report, was this.

When the Aſſyrian had enlarged his Empire with victories, and was become Lord of all Syria, and many other Countries, hee beganne to hope that if the Medes could be brought vnder his ſubiection, there ſhould not then be left any Nation adioyning able to make head againſt him. For the King of the Medes was able to bring into the field threeſcore thouſand foote, and aboue tenne thouſand horſe, to which the forces of Perſia being ioyned, made an exceeding ſtrong Armie.

The Aſſyrian conſidering the ſtrength of ſuch a Neighbour, inuited Cræſus King of Lydia, a Prince very mightie both in men and treaſure, and with him other Lords of Asia the lesse to his assistance, alleaging that those Easterne Nations were very powerfull, and so firmely conioyned by league and many alliances, that it would not bee easie, no not possible, for any one Nation to resist them. With these incitements strengthned with great presents, he drew to himself so many adherents as he compounded an Armie of two hundred thousand foot, and threescore thousand horse, of which, ten thousand horse, and fortie thousand foote were led by Crœsus, who had great cause of enmitie with the Medes, in regard of the Warre made by them against his Father Alyattes; But this great Armie was by Cyaxares King of the Medes, and by Cyrus generall of the Persian forces, vtterly broken; Vpon which defeat the Assyrian King being also slaine, so many of the Assyrians reuolted, as Babylon it self could not longer be assured without the succours of Mercinaries, waged with great summes of money out of Asia the lesse, Ægypt, and elsewhere. Which new gathered forces were also scattered by Cyrus, who following his aduantage, possest himselfe of a great part of the lesser Asia, at which time it was, as I take it, that Crœsus himselfe was also made prisoner.

The attempt of Babylon following soone after, the Armie lying before it being paid by Darius, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, and led by Cyrus his sisters sonne, preuailed against Balthasar, as in due time shall be set downe.

Those Persians which followed Cyrus, and by him leuied, are numbred thirtie thousand foot-men, of which a thousand were armed Gentlemen, the rest of the common sort were Archers, or such as vsed the Dart and the Sling. So farre Xenophon. Of whom in this argument, as it is true, that he described in Cyrus the paterne of a most Heroicall Prince, with much Poeticall addition: So it cannot be denyed, but that the bulke and grosse of his Narration was founded vpon meere Historicall truth.

Neither can it indeed bee affirmed of any the like Writer, that in euery speech and circumstance he hath precisely tyed himself to the phrase of the speaker, or nature of the occasion, but borrowed in each out of his owne inuention, appropriating the same to the times and persons of whom he treated. Putting therefore apart the Morall and Politique discourse, and examining but the Historie of things done, it will easily appeare, that Xenophon hath handled his vnder-taken subiect in such sort, that by beautifying the face thereof, hee hath not in any sort corrupted the bodie.

§. IIII.

The estate of the Medes and Persians in times fore-going this great Warre.

FOr it is commonly agreed vpon, that Achæmenes the sonne of Perses being Gouernour of Persia, did associate himselfe with Arbaces, who commanded in Media in that rebellion against Sardanapalus, and that each of them after the victorie obtained, held for himselfe the Dominion of those Countries, which he had formerly ruled for the Assyrians; as also that they conueyed ouer the same honor and power to their posteritie; which in Media was not absolutely Regall, but with some restraint limited, vntill such time as Deioces tooke vpon him the full authoritie and maiestie of a King. From the death of Sardanapalus to the raigne of Deioces, are vsually accounted about an hundred and forty yeeres, in the last sixtie whereof there raigned in Assyria mightie Princes, namely Salmanasser and his Successours, whose great atchiuements in Syria and elsewhere witnesse, that the Medes and Persians found it not for their aduantage to vnder-take any offensiue warre against those victorious Kings, it being also probable that the league continued as yet betweene these the successours of Belochus, and Arbaces, who had formerly shared the Empire.

Now

Now from the beginning of Deioces to the firſt of Aſtyages, there paſt aboue ninetie yeeres, in which if Herodotus haue written truely, that Phraortes conquered Perſia, and how he and other the Kings of Media by many victories greatly enlarged their dominions, and commaunded many parts of Aſia, it had beene but an vnaduiſed enterpriſe of the Aſſyrians and Babylonians, to haue waſted themſelues againſt the Syrians and Ægyptians, leauing ſo able and victorious a Nation on their backes. But that the Medes had done nothing vpon the South parts of Perſia, and that the Perſians themſelues were not maſters of Suſiana in Nabuchodonoſors time, it is manifeſt in Daniel, who was then Gouernour for the Babylonian in Suſa or Suſan, the chiefe Citie thereof. It is true indeed, that the Medians, either vnder Cyaxares or Aſtiages, or both, had quarrell with Halyattes the father of Cræſus, which after ſome ſixe yeeres diſpute was compounded.

How the affaires of Perſia ſtood in ſo many ages, I doe not find any memorie. It ſeemeth that the roughneſſe of the mountainous Countrey which they then poſſeſt, with the confederacie which they continued with the Medes, gaue them more ſecuritie than fame: For if their Kings, being the poſteritie of Achæmenes, had done any memorable acts, the greatneſſe which they afterward obtained would not haue ſuffered any forgetfulneſſe thereof. But as we find all Xenophons reports, both of theſe Warres and the ſtate of thoſe Countries to be very conſonant and agreeable to the relation of many other good Authors, ſo it appeares, that the race of Achæmenes held the Principalitie of Perſia from father to ſonne for many deſcents. And therefore we may better giue credit to Xenophon, who affirmeth, That Cambyſes the father of Cyrus was King of Perſia: than to thoſe that make him a meane man, and ſay, that Aſtiages gaue him his daughter Mandane in marriage, to the end that her ſonne (whoſe natiuitie he feared) might be diſabled from any great vndertaking by his fathers ignobilitie.

For what cauſe of griefe could it be to Aſtiages, that the ſonne of his daughter ſhould become Lord of the beſt part of Aſia? No; it was more likely, that vpon ſuch a Prophecie his loue to his grand-child ſhould haue encreaſed, and his care beene the greater to haue married her to ſome Prince of ſtrength and eminent vertue.

Yea, the ſame Herodotus, who is the firſt Author, and as I thinke the deuiſer of the miſchiefe intended againſt Cyrus by his grandfather, doth confeſſe, That the line of the Achæmenidæ was ſo renowned, that the great King Xerxes in the height of his proſperitie did thence deriue himſelfe, and vaunt of it: which he would neuer haue done, had they beene ignoble, nor had they been the vaſſals of any other King or Monarch.

For in this ſort Xerxes in the ſeuenth of Herodotus deriueth himſelfe.

Of the Achæmenidæ there were two races: of the firſt was Cyrus the great, whoſe iſſue male fayled in his two ſonnes, Cambyſes and Smerdis. This royall familie is thus ſet downe by the learned Reineccius.

Achæmenes, the sonne of Perses, first King of Persia.
Darius.
Cyrus, the first of that name, had Cambyses and Atossa, who, married to Pharnates, King of Cappadocia, had Artystona and other daughters.
Cambyses had Cyrus the Great, Cyrus had Cambyses, who succeeded him, and Smerdis slaine by his brother Cambyses.

Of the second were those seuen great Princes of Persia, who hauing ouerthrowne the vsurped royaltie of the Magi, chose from among themselues Darius the sonne of Hystaspes King.

This Kingdome of Persia was first knowne by the name of Elam, so called after Elam the sonne of Sem, and the people therein inhabiting, Elamitæ; by Elianus, Elymæ; by Iosephus, Elymi.

Euseb l.6.c.8.d. Præp.Euang. Suidas deriues this Nation sometimes from Assur, sometime from Magog, of whom they were called Magusæi; which Magusæi, according to Eusebius, are not to be taken for the Nation in generall, but for those who were afterward called the Magi or Wise men. So doe the Greekes, among many other their sayings of them, affirme, That the Persians were anciently written Artæi, and that they called themselues Cephenes. But that they were Elamitæ, Moses and the Prophets, Esay, Ieremie, Ezechiel, Daniel, and Esdras in many places confirme: Which also S. Hierome vpon Ieremie the fiue and twentieth, vpon Daniel the eight and twentieth, and in his Hebrew questions approueth, saying: Elam à quo Elamitæ Principes Persidis; ELAM, of whom were the Elamites Princes of Persia.

And that Citie which the Author of the second booke of the Maccabees calleth Persepolis, is by the Author of the first called Elimais, but is now called Siras, being the same which Antiochus, for the great riches thereof, twice attempted in vaine, and to his great dishonour. And yet this Citie, now called Siras, was not the old Persepolis; for Alexander, at the request of Thais the Harlot, burnt it.

The first King of Persia to vs knowne, if wee follow the current of Authors interpreting the foureteenth chapter of Genesis, was Chedorlaomer, who liued with Amraphel or Ninias, and ioyned with him in the warre against those Arabians, who was afterward extinguished by the forces of Abraham.

Of CYRVS.

§. I.

of CYRVS his name and firſt actions.

AS touching the name of Cyrus, Strabo ſayth, That the ſame was taken from a Riuer which watereth Perſia; this great Prince hauing Agradatus for his proper name. But the great Cyrus was not the firſt of that name. Herodotus otherwiſe; and that Cyrus ſignifieth a father in the Perſian Tongue, and therefore ſo intituled by the people. Strab. l. 15.

It is true that for his Iuſtice and other excellent vertues he was indeed called a Father; but that the name of Cyrus had any ſuch ſignification, I thinke it be miſtaken.

Plutarch hath a third opinion, affirming, That Cyrus is as much to ſay as the Sunne, in the ſame Language. Howſoeuer it be, yet the Prophet Eſay, almoſt two hundred yeeres before Cyrus was borne, giues him that name, Thus ſaith the Lord vnto CYRVS his Anointed, &c. Plut. in vit. Artax.

Before the Conqueſt of Babylon, the victories which Cyrus obtained were many and great: among which, the Conqueſt of Lydia, and other Prouinces thereto ſubiect, together with the taking of Cræſus himſelfe, are not recounted by Euſebius, Oroſius, and others, but placed among his latter atchiuements, whoſe opinion for this difference of time is founded vpon two reaſons; namely, That of the Median there is no mention in that laſt warre againſt Cræſus: and that the obtaining of Sardis is referred to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad, and the glorious victory which Cyrus had ouer Babylon, to the fiue and fiftieth Olympiad.

The former of which might haue beene vſed (and was by the Greekes) to exclude the Medes from the honour of hauing wonne Babylon it ſelfe, which in due place I haue anſwered. The latter ſeemes to haue reference to the ſecond Warre which Cyrus made vpon Lydia, when it rebelled; at which time hee ſo eſtabliſhed his former Conqueſt, as after that time theſe Nations neuer offered to reuolt. Wherefore I like better in this particular to beleeue with Herodotus, whome the moſt of Chronologers follow, and finde the enterpriſe of Sardis to præcede that of Babylon.

§. II.

Of CROESVS the King of Lydia, who made warre vpon CYRVS.

I Haue in the laſt Booke ſpoken ſomewhat of Cræſus, of his race and predeceſſors, as alſo of thoſe Kings which gouerned Lydia in more ancient times: of which the firſt (to prophane Authors knowne) was Lydus the ſonne of Atys: Which familie extinguiſhed, the Kingdome was by an Oracle conferred vpon Argon, deſcended from Hercules, whereof there were two and twentie generations, Candaules being the laſt, who by ſhewing his faire wife naked to Gyges his fauorite, he was by the ſame Gyges

(thereto

(thereto vrged vpon perill of his owne life by the Queene) the next day slaine. Which done, Gyges enioyed both the Queene and the Kingdome of Lydia, and left the same to Atys his sonne, who was father to Sadyattes, the father of Halyattes (who thrust the Cimerians out of Asia) and Halyattes begat Cræsus: Which fiue Kings, of a third race, enioyed that Kingdome an hundred and seuentie yeeres. Halyattes the father of Cræsus was an vndertaking Prince, and after hee had continued a warre against Cyaxares the Median, a Prince very powerfull, and maintained it six yeeres: a peace was concluded vpon equall conditions betweene them.

Herod.l.1.p 3. 4 & 5.

Astyages, the sonne of Cyaxares, and grandfather to Cyrus, thought himselfe greatly honoured by obtayning Aryenis, Cræsus sister, whom he married.

But Cræsus so farre enlarged his dominions after his fathers death, as he was nothing inferior in territorie to any King or Monarch of that age: Of which, about that time there were foure in effect of equall strength; to wit, the Median, the Babylonian, the Ægyptian and the Lydian: onely Nabuchodonosor, after he had ioyned Phœnicia, Palestina, and Ægypt to his Empire, had thence-forward no competitor during his owne life.

But Cræsus, notwithstanding the men and treasure spent in the quarrel of the Babylonians, he yet mastred Æolis, Doris, and Ionia, Prouinces possest by the Greekes in Asia the lesse, adioyning to Lydia; gaue law to the Phrygians, Bithinians, Carians, Mysians, Paphlagonians, and other Nations. And that he also inforst the Ephesians to acknowledge him, notwithstanding they compassed their Citie with Dianaes girdle, Herodotus witnesseth. Moreouer, Athæneus out of Berosus (which also Strabo confirmeth) makes report of a Signall victorie which Cræsus obtained against the Sacæans, a Nation of the Scythians, in memorie whereof the Babylonians his allies did yeerely celebrate a Feast, which they called Sacæa: All which hee performed in foureteene yeere.

Her.l.5. Athe.l.14.c.17.

And being now confident in the continuance of his good fortune, and enuious of Cyrus fame, doubting also, that his prosperous vndertakings might in the ende grow perillous to himselfe, he consulted with the Oracle of Apollo, whom he presented with maruellous rich gifts, what successe he might hope for against Cyrus, if he vndertooke him: from whom he receiued this riddle; CROESVS passing ouer the Riuer Halys, shall dissolue a great dominion. For the diuell being doubtfull of the successe, payed him with marchandize of both sides like, and might be inuerted either way to the ruine of Persia, or of his owne Lydia.

§ III.

CROESVS his Expedition against CYRVS.

MEreupon Cræsus being resolued to stop the course of Cyrus fortunes, if he could, despised all the arguments vsed by Sandanes to the contrarie, who desired him to fore-thinke, That he vrged a Nation inhabiting a barren and mountainous Region, a people not couered with the soft silke of wormes, but with the hard skinnes of beasts; not fed with such meat as they fancied, but content with what they found; drinkers of water, not of wine: and in a word, a Nation warlike, enduring, valiant and prosperous; ouer whom if he became victorious, he could thereby enrich himselfe in nothing but fame, in which he alreadie excelled: and if by them beaten, and subiected, so great would his losse appeare of all things which the world hath in account, as the same could neither hastily be told, nor readily conceiued.

Notwithstanding this solide Counsaile, Cræsus hauing prepared a powerfull armie, he led the same towards Media, but in his passage, he was arrested at Pterium, a Citie of great strength in Cappadocia; which while he sought by all meanes to surprise or to force, Cyrus came on, and found the Lydians encamped before it. That each was inferior to other in ſtrength or opinion, I doe not finde: for out of doubt, Cræſus as he excelled any Prince of that age in riches and abilitie; ſo was hee not vnder any in territorie and fame that then liued.

But as Cratippus of Mitylene anſwered Pompey when he complained againſt the gods, becauſe they fauoured a diſturber and vſurper of the Commonweale againſt him who fought for the Romane libertie, That Kingdomes and Commonweales had their encreaſe and period from diuine Ordinance: ſo at this time was the Winter of Cræſus proſperitie at hand, the leaues of his flouriſhing fortune ready to fall, and that of Cyrus but in the flower and firſt ſpring. The God of all power, and not Admetis Herdman, Apollo, had giuen date to the one, and a beginning of glory to the other.

When theſe two Armies were in view of each other, after the entertainement of diuers skirmiſhes, the Perſians and Lydians beganne to ioyne in groſſe troupes: ſupplies from both Kings thruſt on vpon the falling off, and aduauncement of either Nation: and as the Perſians had ſomewhat the better of the day; ſo when the darke vaile of night had hidden each armie from the others view, Cræſus doubting what ſucceſſe the riſing Sunne would bring with it, quitted the field to Cyrus, and with all ſpeede poſſible retyred, and taking the next way into Lydia, recouered Sardis his firſt Citie and Regall Seat, without any purſuite made by Cyrus to retard him. Where being arriued, and nothing ſuſpecting Cyrus approach, or any other warre for that Winter, he diſmiſſed the ſouldiors, and ſent the troupes of his ſundry Nations to their owne Prouinces, appointing them to reaſſemble at the end of fiue moneths, acquainting his Commaunders with his intents for the renewing of the warre at the time appointed.

§. IIII.

The Conqueſt of Lydia by CYRVS.

CYRVS in the following morning finding the Lydians departed, put his armie in order to purſue them, yet not ſo haſtily, and at their heeles, as to be diſcouered. But hauing good intelligence of Cræſus his proceeding, hee ſo meaſured his Marches, as he preſented not himſelfe before Sardis, till ſuch time as Cræſus had diſpoſed his armie to their Wintring garriſons: when being altogether vnlooked for, and vnfeared, he ſurrounded Sardis with his Armie: Wherein Cræſus hauing no other Companies than his Citizens and ordinary Gards, after fourteene dayes ſiege the ſame was entred by aſſault, and all executed that reſiſted. Cræſus hauing now neither armes to fight, nor wings to flye, Sardis being on all parts ſtrongly encompaſſed, thruſt himſelfe into the heape and miſerable multitude of his vaſſals, and had vndergone the common fortune of common perſons vanquiſhed, had not a ſonne of his, who had beene dumbe all his life (by extremitie of paſſion and feare enabled) cried out to the ſouldiors to ſpare Cræſus. Who thereupon being taken and impriſoned, deſpoyled of all things but the expectation of death, he was forthwith tied in fetters, and ſet on the top of a great and high heape of wood, to be conſumed to aſhes thereon. To which when the fire was ſet and kindled, remembring the diſcourſe which he had with the Athenian Law-giuer, he thrice cryed out on his name, Solon, Solon, Solon: and being demaunded what he meant by that inuocation he firſt vſed ſilence: but vrged againe, he told them, That he now found it true which Solon had long ſince told him, That many men in the race and courſes of their liues might well be accounted fortunate, but no man could diſcerne himſelfe for happy indeede, till his end.

In communi calamitate ſuam quiſque habet fortunam, Curt. Memoriam metus perimit: timor vocis eſt incitamentum, &c. Solin. c. 7.

Homo qui in homine calamitoſo miſericors eſt, meminit ſui, Caſſ.

Of which anſwere Cyrus being ſpeedily informed, remembring the changes of fortune and his owne mortalitie, he commaunded his miniſters of Iuſtice to withdraw draw the fire with all diligence to saue Cræsus, and to conduct him to his presence: Which done, Cyrus demaunded of him, Who it was that had perswaded him? Or what selfe reason had conducted him to inuade his territorie, and to make him of a friend an enemie? To whom he thus answered, It was thy prosperous and my vnprosperous destinie (the Grecian God flattering therewithall my ambition) that were the inuerters and conductors of Cræsus warre against Cyrus.

Cyrus being pierst with Cræsus answere, and bewayling his estate, though victorious ouer it, did not onely spare his life, but entertained him euer after as a King and his companion, shewing therein a true effect of mercy indeed, Quæ non causam sed fortunam spectat.

And herein is the reall difference discerned betweene that behauior which wee call Beneficium latronis, & gratiam Principis: A theefe sometime sparing the life of him which is in his power, but vniustly: A King that giueth breath, and a continuance of being, to him that was the cause and author of his owne euill.

The report made by Xenophon is, That Cyrus did friendly entertaine Cræsus at the first sight, not mentioning that which Herodotus deliuers, and is here already set downe, that hee should haue beene burnt aliue. It may well bee, that Xenophon pourtraying (in Cyrus) an heroicall Prince, thought an intent so cruell fitter to be forgotten than rehearsed, as too much misbeseeming a generous nature. And it is very likely, that neereneſſe of alliance might with-hold Cyrus (had he beene otherwise vitious) from so cruell a purpose against his grandmothers brother. Howsoeuer it was, the Morall part of the Storie hath giuen credit and reputation to the report of Herodotus (as to many the like it often doth) and made it passe for currant, though the trust reposed in Cræsus afterwards may seeme to argue, that Cyrus did not vse him inhumanely at the first.

For as Herodotus himselfe telleth vs, when Cyrus past with his armie ouer Araxes into Scythia, he left Cræsus to accompanie and aduise his sonne Cambyses, Gouernour of the Empire in his absence, with whom he liued all the time of Cyrus, and did afterward follow Cambyses into Ægypt, where he hardly escaped his tyrannous hand. What his end was I doe not finde.

But in this time the races of three of the greatest Kings in that part of the world tooke end; to wit, of the Babylonians, Medians, and Lydians; in Balthasar, Cyaxares, and Cræsus.

How CYRVS wonne Babylon.

AFter this Lydian warre ensued the great Conquest of Babylon, which gaue vnto Cyrus an Empire so large and mighty, that he was iustly reputed the greatest Monarch then liuing vpon earth. How long time the preparations for this great action tooke vp, it is vncertaine; onely it seemes, that tenne whole yeeres did passe betweene his taking those two Cities of Sardes & Babylon, which neuertheleſſe I doe not thinke to haue beene wholly occupied in prouision for the Assyrian warre, but rather to haue beene spent in settling the Estate which hee had already purchased. And hereunto perhaps may be referred that which Ctesias hath in his fragments of a warre made by Cyrus vpon the Scythians, though related as foregoing the victory obtained against Cræsus. He telleth vs, That Cyrus inuaded Scythia, and being victorious ouer that Nation, tooke Amorges their King prisoner: but being in a second battaile ouerthrowne by the wife of Amorges, Sparetha, and therein taken, the one King was deliuered for the other.

Likewise it may be thought, that no small part of those troubles which arose in the the lower Aſia, grew ſoone after the departure of the victorious armie, before the Conqueſt was fully eſtabliſhed.

For after Cyrus was returned out of Aſia the leſſe, many Nations, conquered formerly by Cræſus, and now by Cyrus, reuolted from him; againſt whom he imployed Pactias, and then Harpagus, who firſt reduced the Phocians vnder their former obedience: and then the reſt of the Greekes inhabiting Aſia the leſſe, as the Ionians, Carians, Æolians, and Lycians, who reſoluedly (according to the ſtrength they had) defended themſelues. But in the attempt vpon Babylon it ſelfe it is not to be doubted, that Cyrus employed all his forces, hauing taken order before-hand, that nothing ſhould be able to diuert him, or to raiſe that ſiege, and make fruſtrate the worke vpon which he did ſet all his reſt. And great reaſon there was, that he ſhould bend all his care and ſtrength vnto the taking of that Citie, which beſide the fame and reputation that it held, as being head of an Empire thereon depending, was ſo ſtrongly fenced with a treble wall of great height, and ſurrounded with waters vnſoordable, ſo plentifully victualled for many yeeres, that the inhabitants were not onely free from all doubt and feare of their eſtate, but deſpiſed and derided all purpoſes and power of their beſiegers.

The onely hope of the Medes and Perſians, who deſpaired of carrying by aſſault a Citie ſo well fortified and manned, was in cutting off all ſupplies of victuals and other neceſſaries; whereof though the Towne was ſaid to be ſtored ſufficiently for more than twentie yeeres, yet might it well be deemed, that in ſuch a world of people as dwelt within thoſe gates, one great want or other would ſooner appeare, and vanquiſh the reſolution of that vnwarlike multitude. In expecting the ſucceſſe of this courſe, the beſiegers were likely to endure much trauaile, and all in vaine, if they did not keepe ſtraight watch and ſtrong gards vpon all quarters.

This was hard to doe, in regard of the vaſt circuit of thoſe wals which they were to gird in, with numbers neither great enough, nor of men ſufficiently aſſured vnto their Commaunder: The conſideration whereof miniſtred vnto the Babylonians matter of good paſtime, when they ſaw the Lydians, Phrygians, Cappadocians, and others, quartered about their Towne to keepe them in, who hauing beene their auncient friends and allies, were more likely to ioyne with them, if occaſion were offered, than to vſe much diligence on the behalfe of Cyrus, who had, as it were, yeſterday laid vpon their neckes the galling yoake of ſeruitude. Whileſt the beſieged were pleaſing themſelues in this deceitfull gladneſſe, that is the ordinarie fore-runner of ſuddaine calamitie; Cyrus, whom the Ordinance of God made ſtrong, conſtant, and inuentiue, deuiſed by ſo many channels and trenches as were ſufficient and capable of Euphrates, to draw the ſame from the wals of Babylon, thereby to make his approach the more facile and aſſured: which when by the labour of many hands hee had performed, hee ſtayed the time of his aduantage for the execution: for hee had left certaine bankes or heads vncut, betweene the maine riuer which ſurrounded the Citie, and his owne Trenches.

Xenoph. Cyropæd. lib. 7.

Now Balthaſar, finding neither any want or weakeneſſe within, nor any poſſibilitie of approach for his enemies without, prepared an exceeding ſumptuous feaſt, publike Playes, and other Paſtimes, and thereto inuited a thouſand of his Princes or Nobilitie, beſides his wiues, curtizans, and others of that trade. This he did either to let the beſiegers know, that his prouiſions were ſufficient, not onely for all needfull vſes, but euen for iolitie and exceſſe: Or becauſe hee hoped that his enemies, vnder the burthen of many diſtreſſes were well neere broken, or in honour of Bel his moſt reuerenced Idoll: Or that it was his birth or coronation day: Or for many or all theſe reſpects. And he was not contented with ſuch magnificence as no Prince elſe could equall, but (vſing Daniels words) he liſted himſelfe vp againſt the Lord of Heauen: For hee and his Princes, wiues and concubines, made carowſing cuppes of the Veſſels of God, in contempt of whom he praiſed his owne puppets, made made of siluer and Gold, of Brasse, of Iron, Wood, and Stone, Quanta fuit stultitia in vasibus aureis bibentes ligneos & lapideos Deos laudare; How great a foolishnesse was it (sayth S. HIEROME) drinking in golden Cuppes, to praise Gods of Wood and Stone. While Balthasar was in this sort triumphing, and his braines well filled with vapors, he beheld a hand, which by diuine power wrote on the wall opposite vnto him certaine words which he vnderstood not: wherewith so great a feare and amazement Dan.5.v.6. seized him, as the ioynts of his loynes were loosed, and his knees smote one against the other. Which passion when he had in some part recouered, hee cryed out for his Caldeans, Astrologians, and Southsayers, promising them great rewards, and the third place of honour in the Kingdome to him that could reade and expound the writing; but it exceeded their art. In this disturbance and astonishment the Queene hearing what had past, and of the Kings amazement, after reuerence done vsed this speech: There is a man in thy Kingdome, in whom is the spirit of the holy Gods, and in the dayes of thy father, light, and vnderstanding and wisdome, like the wisdome of the Gods, was found in him, whom the King NABVCHODONOSOR thy father, the King (I say) thy father made chiefe of the Inchanters, Astrologians, Chaldeans, and Southsayers, because a more excellent spirit, and knowledge, and vnderstanding, &c. were found in him, euen in DANIEL, &c. Now let DANIEL be called, and he will declare the interpretation.

Orig. & Theod. in Dan. Ioseph. Ant.10. This Queene, Iosephus takes for the grandmother; Origen and Theodoret for the mother of Balthasar; either of which may be true: for it appeareth, that shee was not any of the Kings wiues, because absent from the feast; and being past the age of dauncing and banquetting, she came in vpon the bruit of the miracle, and to comfort the King in his distraction: and whereas Daniel was forgotten and neglected by others of younger yeeres and times, this old Queene remembred well what he had done in the dayes of Nabuchodonosor, grandfather to this Balthasar, and kept in mind both his religion and diuine gifts.

When Daniel was brought to the Kings presence, who acknowledged those excellent graces wherwith God had enriched him, he prayed him, together with promises of reward and honour, to reade and interprete those words miraculously written; to whom Daniel made answere in a farre different style from that he vsed towards his grandfather: for the euill which he foretold Nabuchodonosor, he wished that the same might befall his enemies, but to this King (whose neglect of God and vice he hated) he answered in these words, Keepe thy rewards to thy selfe, and giue thy gifts to another, yet will I reade the writing vnto the King, and shew him the interpretation: Which before he had performed, he gaue him first the cause of Gods just judgement against him, and the reason of this terrible sentence; whereof the King and all his Wisemen were vtterly ignorant: Which being written at large in Daniel, hath Dan.5.v.18, 19,20. this effect, That forgetting Gods goodnesse to his father, whom all Nations feared and obeyed, and that for his pride and neglect of those benefits, as he deprined him of his estate and vnderstanding; so vpon the acknowledgement of Gods infinite power he restored him to both. This King notwithstanding lifted himselfe vp against the same God, and presumed both to abuse those vessels, dedicated to holy vses, and neglecting the Lord of all power, praysed and worshipped the dead Idols of Gold, Siluer, Brasse, Iron, Stone, and Wood: and therefore those wordes, from the Oracle of a true God deliuered, (to wit) Mene Tekel, Vphraisin, gaue the King knowledge, that God had numbred the time of his Kingdome, and finished it: That he was weighed in the ballance of Gods justice, and found too light; and that his Empire was diuided and giuen to the Medes and Persians.

The very euening or night of this day, wherein Balthasar feasted and perished, Cyrus either by his espiall, according to Xenophon, or inspired by God himselfe, whose ensigne he followed in this warre, found the time and opportunitie to inuite him: and therefore while the Kings head, and the heads of his Nobilitie were no lesse filled with the vapours of wine, than their hearts were with the feare of Gods judgement, he caused all the bankes and heads of his trenches to be opened and cut down with that diligence, as by them he drew the great Riuer of Euphrates drie for the preſent, by whoſe channell running, his armie made their entrance, finding none to diſturbe them. All the Towne lay buried (as the Poet ſaith) in ſleepe and wine: ſuch as came in the Perſians way, were put to the ſword, vnleſſe they ſaued themſelues by flight, as ſome did, who ranne away crying, and filling the ſtreets with an vncertaine tumult.

Such Aſſyrian Lords as had reuolted from Balthazar, and betaken themſelues to the partie of Cyrus, did now conduct a ſelected companie to the Kings Palace; which hauing eaſily forced, they ruſhed into the chamber where the King with his Princes were banqueting, ſlew both him and them without any mercie, who ſtrugled in vaine to keepe thoſe liues which God had newly threatned to take away. And now was the prophecie of Ieremie fulfilled, & that of Eſay, two hundred yeeres before this ſubuerſion, who in his three & fortieth Chapter, and elſewhere, writeth this deſtruction ſo feelingly and liuely, as if he had beene preſent both at the terrible ſlaughter committed, and had ſeene the great and vnfeared change and calamitie of this great Empire; yea, and had alſo heard the ſorrowes and bewailings of euery ſuruiuing ſoule thereunto ſubiect. His propheſie of this place he beginneth in theſe words: Come downe, and ſit in the duſt, O virgine daughter of Babel: ſit on the ground, there is no throne, &c. And againe, Sit ſtill and get thee into darkneſſe, O daughter of the Chaldæans, for thou ſhalt no more be called the Ladie of Kingdomes. For though it cannot be doubted, that God vſed Nabuchodonoſor & the Chaldæans, to puniſh the idolatrie of the Iudeans, yet Eſay teacheth vs in this place, That he did not yet forget, that the execution of his iudgements was mixt with a rigorous extremitie. For (ſaith Eſay) in the perſon of God, I was wroth with my people, I haue polluted mine inheritance, and giuen them into thine hand: thou didſt ſhew them no mercie, but thou didſt lay thy very heauie yoke vpon the ancient. I will riſe vp againſt them, ſaith the Lord of Hoſts, and will cut off from Babel the name and the remnant, and the ſonne and the nephew. And in the thirteenth, Euery one that is found, ſhall be ſtricken thorow: and whoſoeuer ioyneth himſelfe, ſhall fall by the ſword, their children alſo ſhall be broken in pieces before their eyes, their houſes ſpoyled, and their wiues raviſhed. So as there is no Hiſtorian who was either preſent at this victorie of Cyrus, or that receiued the report from others truely as it was, that could better leaue the ſame to poſteritie after it happened, than Eſay hath done in many places of his prophecies, which were written two hundred yeeres before any thing attempted.

Ier. c. 27. Eſa. c. 47. Cap. 47. Iſa. 14. To wit, Euilmerodach and Balthaſar.

The greatneſſe and magnificence of Babylon, were it not by diuers graue Authors ſet downe, might ſeeme altogether fabulous: for beſides the reports of Saint Heirome, Solinus, and Oroſius, Ariſtotle in the third of his Politikes, the ſecond Chapter, receiued the report for true, That one part of the Citie knew not that the reſt was taken three daies after. Which is not impoſſible, if the teſtimonie of Diodorus Siculus may be taken; who findes the compaſſe thereof at three hundred and threeſcore Stadia or Furlongs, which makes fiue and fortie miles: the walls whereof had ſo great a breadth, as ſixe chariots might paſſe in front thereon. And of height, according to Cteſias and Clitracus, three hundred threeſcore and fiue foot, garniſhed with an hundred and fiftie Towers. Strabo in the beginning of his ſixteenth Booke of Geographie giues it a greater circuit, adding fiue and twentie furlongs more to the former compaſſe, reckoning the ſame at three hundred foureſcore and fiue furlongs, which makes eight and fortie myle and one furlong: but findes the wall farre vnder that which Diodor reports: and ſo doth Curtius meaſure their thickneſſe but at two and thirtie foot, and their height at an hundred cubits; which is alſo very much: euery cubite containing a foot and halfe of the large meaſure, though to the whole circuit of the Citie hee giues the ſame with Siculus, and eight furlongs more. Herodotus findes a greater content than Strabo doth, namely, foure hundred and foureſcore furlongs in circle; the thick-neſſe of the wall he meaſures at fiftie cubits, and the height at two hundred of the ſame regall cubit. For entrance it had an hundred gates of Braſſe, with poſts and hookes to hang them on of the ſame metall: and therefore did the Prophet Eſay rightly intitle Babylon, The Princeſſe and glorie of Kingdomes.

Her.l.1. Eſa.4.7.& 6.13.

But when Cyrus had wonne her, he ſtript her out of her princely Robes, and made her a ſlaue, diuiding not onely all her goodly houſes, and her whole Territorie, with all the riches therein contained, among his ſouldiers: but beſtowing the inhabitants themſelues as bondſlaues vpon thoſe that had taken poſſeſſion of their goods.

Touching the raigne of Cyrus, and the time which he enioyed in reſt and pleaſure, I can ſay no more of it, than that it is generally agreed by all Chronologers to haue laſted onely ſeuen yeeres: in which time he made ſuch Conſtitutions, as differ little from the Ordinances of all wiſe Kings that are deſirous to eſtabliſh a Royal power in themſelues and their poſteritie.

§. VI.

The end of CYRVS.

THe laſt warre, and the end of this great King Cyrus, is diuerſly written. Herodotus and Iuſtine deliuer, That after the Conqueſt of Aſia the leſſe Cyrus inuaded the Maſſagetes, a very warlike Nation of the Scythians, gouerned by Tomyris their Queene: and that in an incounter betweene the Perſians and theſe Northerne Nomades, Tomyris loſt her Armie, and her Sonne Spargapiſes, that commanded it: In reuenge whereof, this Queene making new leuies of men of warre, and following the warre againſt Cyrus, in a ſecond battaile beat the Perſian armie, and taking Cyrus priſoner, cut off his head from his body, and caſt the ſame into a boule of bloud, vſing theſe wordes; Thou that haſt all thy life time thirſted for bloud, now drinke thy fill, and ſatiate thy ſelfe.

It ſhould hereby ſeeme, that Cyrus knowing the ſtrength and multitude of thoſe frozen Nations, was perſwaded to abate their furie by ſome forcible inuaſion and depopulation, becauſe in the time of Syaxares, father to Aſtyages, thoſe Scythians inuaded Media and Aſia the leſſe, and held the ſame in a ſeruile ſubiection eight and twentie yeeres.

This warre which Metaſthenes calleth Tomyrique, laſted (ſaith he) ſixe yeeres, and tooke end at the death of Cyrus.

But in this particular I beleeue with Viginer, that this Scythian warre was rather the ſame which Cyrus made againſt the Sacians, before the Conqueſt of Lydia, according to Cteſias before cited, who calleth Tomyris, Sparetha, though he deliuer the ſucceſſe of that warre otherwiſe then Herodotus doth: The rather (ſaith Viginer) becauſe Strabo in his eleuenth booke reciteth, That Cyrus ſurpriſed the Sacians by the ſame ſtratageme by which Iuſtine ſaith, he defeated the ſonne of Tomyris. And the ſame Cteſias alſo reporteth, That the laſt warre which Cyrus made was againſt Amorrhæus, King of the Derbicians a Nation (as the reſt) of Scythia; whom though he ouercame, yet he then receiued the wound of his death, which he ſuffered three dayes after.

Strab.l.15.

Strabo alſo affirmeth, That he was buried in his owne Citie of Paſagardes, which himſelfe had built, and where his Epitaph was to be read in his time; which is ſaid to haue beene this: O vir quicunque es, & vndecunque aduenis, neque enim te aduenturum ignorauit: Ego ſum CYRVS qui Perſis imperium conſtitui, puſillum hoc terræ quo meum tegitur corpus mihi ne inuideas; O thou man, whoſoeuer thou art, or whenceſoeuer thou thou commeſt; for I was not ignorant that thou ſhouldeſt come: I am CYRVS that founded the Perſian Empire, doe not enuie vnto me this little earth, with which my bodie is couered.

This Tombe was opened by Alexander, as Qu. Curtius reporteth, either vpon hope of treaſure, ſuppoſed to haue beene buried with him, or vpon deſire to honour his dead body with certaine ceremonies; in which there was found an olde rotten Target, two Scythian Bowes, and a Sword. The Coffin wherein his bodie lay, Alexander cauſed to be couered with his owne garment, and a Crowne of gold to be ſet vpon it. Theſe things well conſidered, as they giue credit to the reports of Xenophon and Zonaras, ſo they derogate much from Herodotus, who leaues his bodie in the hands of Tomyris.

And ſurely, had Cyrus loſt the Armie of Perſia in Scythia, it is not likely, that his ſonne would ſo ſoone haue tranſported all his remaining forces into Ægypt, ſo far off from that quarter: the Scythian Nation then victorious, and bordering Media; neither had Cambyſes beene able in ſuch haſte to haue vndertaken and performed ſo great a Conqueſt. Wherefore I rather beleeue Xenophon, ſaying, That Cyrus died aged and in peace: and that finding in himſelfe, that hee could not long enioy the world, hee called vnto him his Nobilitie, with his two ſonnes, Cambyſes and Smerdis; or after Xenophon, Tanaoxares: and after a long Oration, wherein he aſſured himſelfe, and taught others, of the immortalitie of the Soule, and of the puniſhments and rewards following the good and ill deſeruing of euery man in this life; he exhorted his ſonnes by the ſtrongeſt arguments hee had, to a perpetuall concord and agreement. Many other things hee vttered, which make it probable, that hee receiued the knowledge of the true God from Daniel, when hee gouerned Suſa in Perſia; and that Cyrus himſelfe had read the prophecie of Eſay, wherein hee was expreſſely named, and by God (for the deliuerie of his people) præordained. Which act of deliuering the Iewes from their Captiuitie, and of reſtoring the holy Temple and Citie of Hieruſalem, was in true conſideration the nobleſt worke that euer Cyrus performed. For in other actions he was an inſtrument of Gods power, vſed for the chaſtiſing of many Nations, and the eſtabliſhing of a Gouernement in thoſe parts of the world, which was not long to continue. But herein he had the grace to be an inſtrument of Gods goodneſſe, and a willing aduancer of his Kingdome vpon earth; which muſt laſt for euer, though heauen and earth ſhall periſh.

Of CYRVS his decree for building the Temple of God in Ieruſalem.

HAuing therefore ſpoken of his great victories, mentioned by ſundry Hiſtorians, the glory of all which was as a reward of this his ſeruice done vnto him that was Author of them and of all goodneſſe: I hold it meete at length to ſpeake of the Decree made in the firſt of his Raigne, being perhaps the firſt that euer he made, after his poſſeſſion of the Babylonian Empire: That the captiue Iewes ſhould returne againe into their owne Territorie, and re-build the Houſe of GOD in Ieruſalem, hauing now endured and finiſhed the threeſcore and tenne yeeres captiuitie, by the Prophets foretold. For the accompliſhing whereof, hee gaue order to his Treaſurers to furniſh them with all things neceſſarie and wanting. Hee alſo reſtored vnto them fiue thouſand foure hundred threeſcore and nine Veſſels of Gold and Siluer, whereof Nabuchodonoſor, the grandfather of Balthaſar, had formerly robbed the Temple.

1.*Esd.*2. 2.*Esd.*7. Phil.in hre.

The number of the Iewes which returned out of Chaldæa vnder their leader Zorobabel, the sonne of Salathiel, and nephew to King Iecontas, and Iesus or Iosua the sonne of Iosadak, were about fiftie thousand; where, as soone as they arriued, they built an Altar to the liuing God, and sacrificed thereon, according to their owne Law, and afterward bethought themselues how to prepare materials for the rebuilding of the Temple.

1.*Esd.*2.3.Esd. 5.*Esd.c.*4. & 5. Ios.l.Ant 11.

But no sooner did the Iewes begin to lay any one stone, than the Samaritanes and other idolatrous Nations adioyning gaue all the impediment they could. So did the Gouernours of those Prouinces vnder Cyrus altogether countenance the disturbers, and in no sort fauoured the Iewes, nor the labours and purposes they had in hand. And not onely those which were but Prouinciall Lieutenants and other officers of lesse place, but Cambyses himselfe; who hauing the charge of the whole Empire, while Cyrus was busied otherwise, countermanded the building begun. And whereas some Authors make doubt, that whatsoeuer Cambyses did when himselfe had obtained the Empire, yet during the life of Cyrus there was no such impediment or prohibition: They may herein resolue themselues out of Esdras, That by the conspiracies of the neighbouring Nations the building was hindered all the time of King Cyrus life, &c. And therefore it is true, that the Iewes themselues affirme as it written in the second of Iohn, That the Temple was sixe and fortie yeeres in setting vp, hauing receiued so many hinderances from the first foundation to the second of Darius.

*Esd.*1.*c.*2.*v.*16. *Esd.*2.*v.*16. *Esd.*1.*c.*5.*v.*33. *Esd.*1.*c.*4.*v.*5.

And if wee seeke the naturall and politique causes which moued Cambyses to withstand his fathers decree, as well while he gouerned vnder him, as when himselfe became sole and soueraigne Monarch, we shall finde them in that Epistle remembred by Esdras, written by Belemus, Mithridates, and the rest, Presidents and Counsellors in Phœnicia, wherein they complaine, that the Iewes were euermore rebellious & troublers of Kings; that their Citie being once built, they would then refuse to pay Tribute, and fall from the obedience of the Empire, as they had formerly done in the times of other Kings.

*Esd.*1,*c.*2.

But that which for that present seemed the most forcible impediment was, that Cambyses, hauing it in his resolution to inuade Ægypt, and that it was a common opinion, That the Iewes were descended of those Nations, because they issued thence vnder Moses, when they conquered Iudæa; their Citie being once repaired and fortified, they might returne to their old vomit, and giue the same disturbance to Cambyses Conquest, which they did to Senacherib, Nabuchodonosor, and other Kings of Babylon. For as it is written in EZEKIEL, Ægypt was the confidence of the house of ISRAEL.

*Ezek.c.*29.

But it is to be vnderstood, as Codoman and others haue obserued, that Artaxerxes, to whom the Counsellors & Gouernors of Phœnicia complained against the Iewes, did not præcede, but succeed Darius Hystaspes, as in the sixt and seuenth chapters of Esdras it is made plaine: and also that those Gouernors (whose Epistle sheweth as much) did not withstand the building of the Temple, but the fortifying and inclosing of the Citie, as by the reasons giuen in the said Epistle, and by the Kings answer, it is euident.

Also in the sixt of Ezra, the foure[illegible]verse, the Kings are named in order as they gouerned, and Artaxerxes written after Darius; as: And they built and finished it (to wit, the Temple) by the appointment of the God of Israel, and by the commandement of CYRVS and DARIVS, and ARTAHSHASTE King of Persia. Lastly, in the seuenteenth of Ezra it is written; Now after these things, in the raigne of ARTAHSHASTE King of Persia: which was as much to say as after the finishing of the Temple in Darius time. And therefore Artaxerxes in the second of Esdras is there named by anticipation, not in his owne time and place.

And thus much concerning the rebuilding of the Citie and Temple of Hierusalem. Which action though prospered by the hand of God, was very slowly pursued by by the men whom it moſt concerned, but firſt ſet on foot by Cyrus. The other ordinances of Cyrus, with his forme and manner of gouernment, are to be found in Xenophon. At his death he bequeathed the Empire vnto his eldeſt ſonne Cambyſes, appointing Smerdis or Tanaoxares his younger ſonne to be Satrapa or Lieutenant of Media, Armenia, and Caduſia, and then died, after he had raigned (ſaith Herodotus) one and thirtie yeeres, or (according to Iuſtine) but thirtie.

§. VIII.

Of CYRVS his iſſue: and whether ATOSSA were his daughter, or (as ſome thinke) were the ſame with Queene HESTER.

CYRVS had iſſue two ſonnes, Cambyſes and Smerdis, with three daughters, Atoſſa, Meroe, and Artyſtona: Cteſias addeth to theſe, Amytis. Atoſſa and Meroe their brother Cambyſes married; Artyſtona, Darius Hyſtaſpes obtained; ſo did he Atoſſa, Cambyſes being dead: who (as ſome Writers haue ſuppoſed) inflamed both her husbands Darius, & Xerxes after him, to inuade Greece, to be auenged of the whole Nation for the cruell intent that Aman (whom the old tranſlation calleth a Macedonian) had againſt the Iewes though the opinion of Ioſephus be more probable, who findes Aman to be an Amalekite. But it is hard to bee vnderſtood, how Atoſſa, the daughter of Cyrus, ſhould haue beene Eſther; whoſe Hiſtorie ſeemes rather to appertaine to the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus, than of Darius the ſonne of Hyſtaſpes, or of Xerxes. The deſire of Atoſſa to haue Greece brought vnder the yoke of Perſia, was partly grounded vpon the honour which thereby ſhee thought her husband might obtaine, partly vpon a feminine humor of getting many braue Dames, Corinthians, Athenians, and others of that Nation to be her bond-women. Wherefore I cannot giue aſſent to the opinion of Codoman, who vpon the neere ſound of the two names, Atoſſa and Hadaſſa (by the latter of which Eſther was alſo called) makes them to haue beene one perſon. For though it be true, that Eſther concerning her parentage a while, might be taken for a great Ladie; yet Codomans inference is nothing probable, that ſhe ſhould therefore, and for the great affection which the King bare vnto her, be thought the daughter of Cyrus. Certaine it is, that Eſther did at length diſcouer her Kindred and Nation; whereby if Hyſtories could not be kept free from this error, yet the people, and eſpecially the Nobilitie, muſt needs haue vnderſtood the truth: who neuertheleſſe did ſo well know the parentage of Atoſſa, that for her ſake, as being daughter of Cyrus, her ſonne Xerxes was preferred to the Kingdome before his elder brother, againſt whom alſo he could haue pretended a very weake clayme.

But of theſe things more hereafter in fitter place.

CHAP. IIII.

The estate of things from the death of CYRVS to the Raigne of DARIVS.

§. I.

Of the number and names of the Persian Kings.

OF the successors of Cyrus, and the continuance of the Persian Empire, there are many opinions; As that of Metasthenes, who hath numbred the Persian Kings and their times, as followeth.

Darius Medus, and Cyrus iointly	2
Cyrus alone.	22
Priscus Artaxerxes.	20

Arses, or Arsames.	4
Darius the last, conquered by Alexander.	6

To which Philo agreeth; which number of yeeres added, make in all an hundred ninetie and one. But in this Catalogue Metasthenes hath left out Cambyses and Xerxes, and names Artaxerxes Assuerus for the immediate successor of Cyrus; in place (saith Melancthon) of Darius the sonne of Hystaspes: for Metasthenes, as Melancthon coniectureth, doth not account Cambyses in the Catalogue, because his raigne was confounded with that of Cyrus.

There is a second opinion, though ridiculous, of Seder Olam, who finds but foure Persian Kings from the beginning to the end of that Empire.

Genebrard, Schubert, and Beroaldus haue also a differing account from the Greekes; whom neuertheless Eusebius and most of the Latines follow, and so doth Krentzheim, who hath fully answered, and as I take it, refuted all the former Authors varying from that account: For in this sort doe the Greekes marshall the Persian Kings with the times of their raignes.

yeeres.

Which numbers, put together, make in all two hundred and thirtie.

This account (as I haue said) the most Chronologers and the best learned approue. These Persian Princes being all warranted by the authoritie of the Scriptures, as Peucer in his historicall Animaduersions hath gathered the places; finding first firſt Cyrus in the ſecond of Chronicles, chap.36.verſ.22,23.Ezra 1.chap.1.verſ.1. and often elſewhere.

Secondly Cambyſes in the 11th of Daniel, who may indeede be well eſteemed for one of thoſe three Kings in the ſecond verſe named, and ſo the marginall Commentor vpon the Geneua vnderſtands that place; but, vnder correction, miſtakes the matter greatly, when he ſaith in the ſame note, that Darius Hyſtaſpes was an enemie to the people of God, and ſtood againſt them: his great fauour and liberalitie to the Iewes being elſewhere proued.

Thirdly, is Darius Hyſtaſpes found in Ezra the firſt, c.4.v.5. who in the ſixt verſe is alſo named Ahaſſuerus.

Fourthly, in the eleuenth of Daniel verſe the ſecond, Xerxes is plainely foretold and deſcribed, and the great warre which hee ſhould make againſt the Greekes by Daniel remembred.

Fiftly, Artaxerxes Longimanus in Ezra the fourth, verſe ſeuen, who is alſo called Arthaſaſta, c.4.1.lib.Ezra v.7. and cap.7.v.7.

Sixtly, Darius Nothus, Ezra cap.4. verſ.24. and cap.5. verſ.6. Nehem. cap.12. verſ.22.

Seuenthly, Artaxerxes Mnemon in Nehe.c.2.v.1. who was father to Artaxerxes Ochus, and Arſames: for Darius the laſt he was of another Familie, the Line of Cyrus the Great ending in Ochus, who deſcended from Xerxes the ſonne of Atoſſa, Cyrus his Daughter; and the iſſue male of Cyrus failing with his owne Sonnes.

But to proceede. Euſebius with the Latines, following the Greekes, apply the beginnings and ends of euery Perſian King with their Acts, to ſome certaine Olympiad; As the war of Aſtyages (Cyrus his maternall Grand-father) and Alyattes (Cræſus his father) to the nine and fortieth Olympiad; The beginning of Cyrus raigne to the beginning of the fiue and fiftieth Olympiad; The taking of Sardis by Cyrus to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; The inuaſion of Ægypt by Cambyſes to the third yeere of the threeſcore and third Olympiad, and ſo of the reſt. Which reference with good agreement betweene ſeuerall formes of computation adde the more credit vnto both.

Againe, this hiſtoricall demonſtration is confirmed by the Aſtronomicall computation of Ptolomie, who refers the death of Alexander the Great, who died the 12. of Nouember, in the beginning of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad, to the foure hundred and foure & twentieth yeere after Nabonaſſar. And the Æra of Nabonaſſar beganne on the ſixe and twentieth of Februarie: which conferred with the Olympiad, was in the ninth Moneth of the firſt yeere of the eighth Olympiad; So that whether we follow the accompt of the Olympiads, as doe the Greeke Hiſtorians, or that of Nabonaſſar with Ptolomie, we ſhall finde euery memorable accident to fall out right with each computation. Ptol.in Alm. lib.3.cap.8.

For Ptolomie reckons the time anſwerable to two hundred and foure and twentie Iulian yeeres, and an hundred and fortie daies from Nabonaſſar, to the ſixteenth of Iulie in the ſeuenth yeere of Cambyſes.

The Greekes, and namely Diodorus Siculus, place the taking of Ægypt by Cambyſes in the ſecond or third yeere of the threeſcore and third Olympiad, and the beginning of Cambyſes ſeuenth yeere in the firſt of the threeſcore and fourth Olympiad: which firſt of the threeſcore and fourth Olympiad runnes along with part of the two and twentieth of Nabonaſſar. The like agreement is conſequently found about the beginning and end of Cyrus.

Likewiſe the twentieth of Darius, who ſucceeded Cambyſes, is according to Ptolomie the two hundred and ſixe and fortieth of Nabonaſſar, which (obſeruing the differences of Nabonaſſars Æra and the Olympiad, viz. eight and twentie yeeres) it agrees with the third of the threeſcore and ninth Olympiad, wherein it is placed by the Greekes. In this Ioſephus agrees with the Greekes throughout, ſauing that he ioyneth Darius Medus, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, with Cyrus, in the deſtruction of of Babylon, which is true, and not contrarie to the Greeke computation, but may very well stand with it.

Lastly, the disagreements and confused accompts of those that follow the other Catalogue of the Persian Kings formerly rehearsed, doth giue the greater credit to this of the Greekes, which being constant in it selfe, accordeth also with the computation of other Historians, and Astronomers, and likewise with the holy Scriptures.

§. II.

Of CAMBYSES, and the conquering of Ægypt by him.

WE will therefore according to the truth giue the Empire of Persia to Cambyses, the sonne of Cyrus, though degenerate in all things, sauing the desire to increase the greatnesse of his Empire: whereof hee was possest in his Fathers time while Cyrus made warre in the North. Ctesias with others giue him a longer raigne than agreeth with the Grecian accompt before receiued.

In the fifth yeere of his sole raigne, and in the third yeere of the threescore and third Olympiad, according to Diodor and Eusebius, he inuaded Ægypt, and hauing ouerthrowne the King thereof, Psammenitus, he not only caused him to bee slaine, but also did put to death all his kindred and dependants, with the most of his children.

Lib.2.c.2. Her.l.3.pag.83. 84.85.

Herodotus and Ctesias giue for cause of this Warre (being no other indeede than the Ambition of Cambyses) that when he sent to Amasis King of Ægypt, to haue his daughter in marriage, Amasis presented him with Nitetis the daughter of Apries his predecessour, which Cambyses disdained.

Howsoeuer it were; true it is, that Cambyses gathered an Armie fit for such an enterprise, and caused the same to march. But before they entred Ægypt, Amasis died and left Psammenitus, whom Ctesias called Amyrtæus, his successour; who inioyed Ægypt after his father; (according to the best copies of Herodotus) but sixe Moneths, though other Chronologers giue him sixe yeeres.

But how long soeuer he held the Crowne, in one battaile hee lost it, and was himselfe taken prisoner.

It is said that Cambyses following therein the example of Cyrus, did not only spare life to the conquered King, but that hee also trusted him with the gouernement of Ægypt, and that vpon some reuolt, or the suspition thereof, hee caused him to bee slaughtered. But the race of this King was not so extirpated, if wee may beleeue Herodotus and Thucydides, but that he left a Sonne called Inarus, who caused the Ægyptian to reuolt both from Xerxes and Artaxerxes.

That Psammenitus was at the first entreated gently by Cambyses, I hold it very improbable, if it be true which is also written of him, That he so much hated Amasis the King of Ægypt, who died before his arriuall, that hee caused his body to be drawne out of the graue, and after diuers indignities vsed, commanded the same to bee burnt, contrarie to the custome both of the Ægyptians and Persians. For the Ægyptians vsed to powder their dead bodies with salt, and other drugges, to the end the wormes might not deuoure them. The * Persians durst not consume them with fire, which they esteemed as a God, and therefore feared to feede it with Carrion.

* Neither did the Romanes euer consume their dead to ashes, till the time of Sylla Dictator, who caused his owne to be deuoured by that element, fearing the Law called Talionis, or like for like, because himselfe had vntombed the carkasse of Caius Marius after his death, Her.l.3. Plin.l.7.c.54.

§. III.

§. III.

The reſt of CAMBYSES his acts.

AFter this victorie obtained in Ægypt, Cambyſes ſent an Armie into Cyprus, and conſtrained Euelthon King thereof to acknowledge him, who before held that Iland of the Ægyptians.

While Cambyſes yet buſied himſelfe in Ægypt, he ſo much deteſted the Idolatry of that Nation, as he cauſed the Images themſelues, with the Temples wherein they were worſhipped, to bee torne downe and defaced. That done, he directed a part of his Armie into Lybia, to ouer-turne the Temple of Iupiter Ammon; but the Deuill in defence of his Oratorie raiſed ſuch a tempeſt of Sand, wherewith the greateſt part of that Countrey is couered, as the Perſians were there-with choked and ouer-whelmed. Strab. & Iuſt. L. 1. Pag. 87. 88.

Notwithſtanding which miſaduenture, Herodotus and Seneca report, that diſdayning to be reſiſted, he prepared the reſt of his Armie, which himſelfe meant to conduct into thoſe parts, but that finding a beginning of thoſe incommodities, which his firſt-ſent troupe had tried, hee changed his purpoſe. For though conquering Kings haue power ouer men, yet the Elements doe not obey them, according to that old Engliſh prouerbe, Goe, ſaith the King. Stay, ſaith the Tide. Herod. 3. Sen. l. 7.

After his returne from the attempt of Æthiopia, hee cauſed Apis the Ægyptian Bull, worſhipped by that Nation as God, to be ſlaine: a deed very commendable, had it proceeded from true zeale, and beene executed as in ſeruice of him that only is, and liueth. But ſoone afterwards, when in a dreame it ſeemed vnto him that Smerdis did ſit in the royall Throne of Perſia (which apparition was verified in Smerdis the Magus) hee gaue it in charge to his fauourite Praxaſpes, to murther Smerdis his brother. And hauing married his owne ſiſters, contrarie to the Perſian Lawes, hee committed a moſt cauſeleſſe and moſt deteſtable murder vpon the one of them, called Meroe, then by himſelfe with child, becauſe ſhee bewailed the death of her brother Smerdis. I find it written of this Cambyſes, That becauſe his Predeceſſors obſerued religiouſly the ordinances of their Empire, he aſſembled his Iudges and enquired of them, whether there were any law among the Perſians that did permit the brother to marry his owne ſiſter: it being his owne intent ſo to doe. The Iudges (who had alwaies either lawes or diſtinctions in ſtore to ſatisfie Kings and times) made anſwere, that there was not any thing written allowing any ſuch coniunction, but they notwithſtanding found it in their cuſtomes, that it was alwaies left to the will of the Perſian Kings to doe what beſt pleaſed themſelues; and ſo, as Nauclerus termes it, inuenerunt occaſionem: That is as much to ſay, as the Iudges found a ſhift to pleaſe the King, and to ſecure themſelues. And yet, where it concerned not the Kings priuate ſatisfaction, he cauſed Siſamnus one of his Iudges, and perchance one of thoſe which fauoured his inceſtuous match, to be flayed a-liue for an vniuſt iudgement giuen, and the ſame his hide to bee hung vp ouer the iudgement ſeate. After which beſtowing the fathers Office on his ſonne, hee willed him to remember, that the ſame partialitie deſerued the ſame puniſhment. Her. pag. 89. 90.

Among other his cruelties, that which he exerciſed againſt the ſonne of his beloued Praxaſpes was very ſtrange and vngratefull. For when he deſired to bee truely informed by him what the Perſians thought of his conditions, Praxaſpes anſwered, That his vertues were followed with abundant praiſe from all men; only it was by many obſerued, that he tooke more than vſuall delight in the taſte of Wine. With which taxation inflamed, hee vſed this replication: And are the Perſians double-tongued, who alſo tell me that I haue in all things excelled my Father Cyrus? thou Praxaſpes ſhalt then witneſſe, whether in this report they haue done mee right: for if at the firſt ſhot I pierce thy ſonnes heart with an arrow, then is it falſe that hath beene ſpoken; but if I miſſe the marke, I am then pleaſed that the ſame be accounted true, true,and my subiects beleeued. This being spoken, hee directed an arrow towards the innocent child, who falling dead with the stroke,Cambyses commanded his body to be opened,and his heart being broched on the arrow,this monstrous Tyrant greatly reioycing, shewed it to the Father with this saying,in stead of an Epitaph: Now PRAXASPES, thou maiest resolue thy selfe that I haue not lost my wits with Wine, but the Persians theirs,who make such report.

Many other barbarous cruelties hee exercised, till at the last, according to the phrase of our Law, he became felon de soy. For when he was informed that Patizites, and Smerdis the Magi, (Cedrenus writeth them Sphendanes and Cimerdius) Ministers of his domesticall affaires, taking aduantage of the great resemblance betweene Smerdis the Kings brother, and Smerdis the Magus, possest themselues of the Empire,he made all haste towards Persia, and in mounting hastily on horsebacke, his sword dis-sheathing pierced his owne thigh, where-with deadly wounded, falling into an ouer-late and remedilesse repentance of the slaughter which hee had executed vpon his owne brother, he soone after gaue vp his wicked ghost, when hee had raigned eight yeeres, accounting therein those seuen Moneths in which the Magi gouerned, while he was absent.

In Cambyses the Male line of Cyrus failed. For he had no issue either by Atossa or Meroe: yet Zonaras out of Hierome giues him a Daughter called Pantaptes, and a sonne called Orontes,who being drowned in the Riuer Ophites by Antioch,the same was afterward in memorie of the Princes death called Orontes.

Zonaras Com.3. pag.117.

He built the Citie of Babylon in Ægypt,in the place where Latopolis was formerly seated, and that of Meroe in the Iland of Nilus, calling it by the name of his sister Meroe.

§. IIII.

Of the inter-regnum betweene CAMBYSES and DARIVS.

CYRVS and his two sonnes beeing now dead, and the Kingdome in the possession of one of the Magi, the counterfait of Smerdis, the Princes, or Satrapes, or Prouinciall Gouernours of the Empire (to wit,Otanes,Intaphernes, Gobrias, Megabysus, Asphatines, Hidarnes, and Darius, who were all descended from Achæmenes the first Persian King,hauing discouered the fraud of this imposture, ioyned their forces together, surprised and rooted out the Conspirator with his Companions, and assistants. In which action (saith Iustine) Intaphernes and Asphalines were slaine; but Herodotus otherwise, that they were only wounded,for he auoweth, that all the seuen Princes were present at the election following.

For the Empire being now without a Gouernour, these Princes grew into consultation how the same might be ordered from thence-forth. Otanes one of the seuen did not fancie any election of Kings, but that the Nobilitie and Cities should confederate,and by iust lawes defend their liberty in equality,giuing diuers reasons for his opinion, being as it seemed greatly terrified by the cruelties of Cambyses; As first, that it was not safe to giue all power to any one, seeing greatnesse it selfe, euen in good men,doth often infect the minde with many vices, and the libertie and freedome in all things is most apt to insult, & to commit all manner of wicked outrage. Againe,that tyrants do commonly vse the seruices of wicked men,and fauour them most; they vsurpe vpon the lawes of their Countrey; take other mens wiues by force,and destroy whom they please without iudgement.

Megabysus was of another opinion, affirming that the tyrannie of a multitude was thrice more intolerable, than that of one. For the multitude doe all things without without iudgement runne into buſineſſe and affaires with precipitation, like raging and ouer-bearing flouds.

He therefore thought it ſafeſt to make election of a few, and thoſe of the beſt, wiſeſt, and moſt vertuous; becauſe it is euer found, that excellent Counſailes are euer had from excellent men.

Darius gaue the third iudgement, who perſwaded the creation of a King, becauſe euen among few diuturnitie of concord is ſeldome found, and in great Empires it doth euer happen that the diſcord of many Rulers hath inforſt the election of one Supreme. It were therefore, ſaith Darius, farre ſafer to obſerue the Lawes of our Countrie, by which Kingly gouernement hath beene ordained.

The other foure Princes adhered to Darius, and agreed to continue the ſame Imperiall gouernement by God eſtabliſhed, and made proſperous. And to auoide partialitie, it was accorded, that the morning following theſe ſeuen Princes ſhould mount on Horſe-back, and on him the Kingdome ſhould be conferred, whoſe horſe after the Sunne-riſing ſhould firſt ney or bray. In the euening after this appointment was made, it is ſaid that Darius conſulted with the Maſter of his horſe Oebarus, who in the Suburbs of the Citie when the election was reſolued of, cauſed the ſame Horſe, whereon in the morning Darius was mounted, to couer a Mare, who as ſoone as he came into the ſame place was the firſt horſe that brayed. Whereupon the other ſixe Princes deſcended from their horſes, and acknowledged Darius for their Lord and King. Her. l. 3. p. 100. 101.

Plato in the third of his Lawes affirmeth, that in memorie of the ſeuen Princes, whereof Darius himſelfe was one, that deliuered the Empire from the vſurpation of the Magi, hee diuided the whole into ſeuen gouernements; Herodotus ſaith into twentie Satrapies.

Of DARIVS his Linage.

DARIVS was deſcended of the ancient Perſian Kings, to wit, of the Achæmenidæ, of which, Cyrus the Great was the lineall Succeſſour. For in this ſort Herodotus deriues him as before.

Hyſtaſpes accompanied Cyrus the Great in the warres againſt the Scythians, at which time Cyrus being made jelous of Darius by a dreame of his owne, cauſed him

Hystaspes, according to * Herodotus, had besides Darius these three sonnes, who were great Commanders in the warre which Darius made in Asia the lesse, Thrace, Macedon, and Greece; Atarnes, Artaphernes; and Artabanus, who dissuaded Xerxes from the second Grecian warre. Hystaspes had also a Daughter married to Gobryas the Father of Mardonius, who commanded the Armie of Darius in Macedon, and married the Daughter of Darius, Artozostre his Cosen germaine.

Reineccius giues to Hystaspes fiue sonnes, Darius who succeeded Cambyses, Artabanus, Artaphernes, Otanes, and Atarnes, with two daughters.

§. II.

Of DARIVS his Gouernment, and suppressing the rebellion of Babylon.

DARIVS deuised equall lawes whereby all his subiects might be gouerned, the same being formerly promised by Cyrus. He gaue accesse to all his subiects, and behaued himselfe so mildly to al men, that many Nations desired and offered themselues to become his Vassalls: Only hee laied diuers payments and taxes on the people, which had not beene accustomed in Cyrus time, to the value of foureteene thousand fiue hundred and threescore talents, saith Herodotus.

The warre which Cambyses made a farre off in Ægypt, and the contention betweene the Magi, and the Princes of Persia, for the Empire, gaue heart to the Babylonians to recouer their libertie, and to shake off the Persian yoke, wherof Darius being aduertised, he prepared an Armie to recouer that Citie and State reuolted. But finding the same a difficult worke, he vsed the seruice of Zopirus, who for the loue he bare Darius, did cut off his owne Eares and Nose, and with other wounds yet fresh bleeding, he seemed to flie to the Babylonians for succour, to whom he accused the cruelty of Darius: who, for hauing giuen him aduice to giue ouer the siege of their Citie, had in this sort dismembred and deformed him; whereupon the Babylonians gaue him that credit, as they trusted him with the disposition & commandement of their greatest forces: which when Zopirus had obtained, after some small
Her. lib. 3. colourable ouer-throwes giuen to the Persians vpon sallies, hee deliuered the Citie into Darius his hands, who had lyen before it twentie Moneths.

§. III.

Of DARIVS his fauour to the Iewes in building the Temple.

IN the second yeere of Darius, he gaue order that the building of the Temple at Hierusalem should goe on, and commanded that the same should be finished at his own charge, and out of the reuennues of the Crowne. And whereas the Gouernors of those Prouinces which are situate betweene Euphrates, and the Phœnician, and mid-land Sea, Ezra. c. 6. (whom Ezra calleth the Captaines beyond the Riuer) had hindred the worke in Cambyses his time, Darius gaue commandement that they should not thence-forth come neere vnto Ierusalem, to giue any impediment to the building, but that they should should with-draw themselues, and get them farre off till all were finished and at an end. In the old Latine it is written, Procul recedite ab illis; With-draw your selues farre from them; In our English, Be yee farre from thence, to wit, from the Citie, and Temple, now in building.

Hee also made a decree, which concerned his owne Subiects, That whosoeuer should thenceforth hinder the setting vp of the Temple of God, that his house should be torne downe, and the disturber hanged on a Gallowes made of the Timber thereof. He also in the same decree maketh inuocation to God, That hath caused his name to dwell there, (to) destroy all Kings and People that put their hands to alter, and to destroy this house of God which is in Ierusalem, &c. In foure yeeres after which decree (the Iewes being really furnished with money and all things necessarie from Darius) the Temple was in all finished, to wit, in the beginning of the Spring, in the sixth yeere of Darius Hystaspes, and in the two and fortieth after their first returne. Ezr.6.11. Ezr.6.

of DARIVS his Scythian Warre.

AFter the recouerie of Babylon he inuaded the Scythians, whose King Iustine calleth Lauthinus; and saith, that Darius vnder-tooke this warre against him, because he refused him his Daughter in marriage. The better to conuoy his Armie into Scythia, hee built a Bridge of small Vessels ouer the Riuer Ister or Danubius, and gaue the custodie of the same in charge (among others of Asia the lesse) to the Ionians, and Æolians, among whom was Miltiades, who perswaded the Asian Græcians to breake downe the bridge, to the end Darius might not returne thereby, and if by any other way, then not without great difficultie; but the same was resisted by Histiæus Prince of Milet, a Citie of Ionia, which Nation being a Colonie of the Greekes, Diodorus calleth Traitors to their Countrie, because they ioyned themselues to Darius. But the Scythians more elegantly termed them good slaues, for as much as they would not runne away from their Master, but were more mindfull of doing their duties, than of shaking off their bondage, when they were presented with as faire an occasion of libertie as could haue beene desired. For the great Armie of Darius entring the desart Countrie called Bessarabia, found in it neither people to resist them, nor any sustenance to relieue them. For the Scythians were then, as are the Chrim Tartars, their posteritie, at this day, all horse-men, vsing the Bow and Sword. They were not Plough-men, but Graziers, driuing their Heards from one place to another as opportunitie of pasture led them. Standing Townes they had none, but vsed for Houses the Waggons wherein they carried their wiues and children. These Waggons they place at euery Station in very good order, making Streets and Lanes in the manner of a great Towne, remoueable at their pleasure. Neither hath the Emperour himselfe, called now the great Chrim, any other Citie than such an Agora, (as they name it) or Towne of Carts. When as therefore Darius had wearied himselfe, and wasted his prouision in those desolate Regions, wherein he found neither waies to direct him, victualls to refresh him, nor any houses, fruitfull trees, or liuing creatures, nor any thing at all, which either hee himselfe might make vse of, or by destroying it might grieue his enemies; he beganne to perceiue his owne folly, and the danger into which he had brought him. Yet setting a good face vpon a badde game, he sent braue messages to the Scythian, bidding him to cease his flight, and either to make triall of his valour and fortune in plaine battaile, Or if he acknowledged himselfe the weaker, then to yeeld by faire meanes, and become his Subiect, giuing him Earth and Water, which the Persians vsed to demand as a signe, that all was yeelded vnto them. To this challenge the Scythian returned an Hieroglyphicall answere; sending a Bird, a Frog, a Mouse, and fiue Arrowes: which dumbe shew Her.l.4. Iust.l.2. Diod.l.11.

Darius interpreting by his owne wish, thought that hee did yeeld all the Elements wherein those creatures liue, and his weapons withall into his hands. But Gobryas, one of the seuen Princes, who had slaine the Magi, construed their meaning a-right, which was thus; O yee Persians, get yee wings like Birds, or diue vnder the water, or creepe into holes in the earth, for elseyee shall not escape our arrowes. And this interpretation was soone verified by the Scythians themselues, who assailed the Persian camp, draue the horse-men into the trenches, and vexing the Armie with continuall Alarums day and night, were so fearelesse of this great Monarch, and so little regarded him, that within his hearing, and euen in his sight, they did not forbeare the pastime of coursing a Hare, which they had started by chance. By this boldnesse of theirs, Darius was so discouraged, that he forsook his Camp by night, making many fires, and leauing all that were sicke and weake behinde him, and so with all speede marched away towards the Riuer Ister. He was pursued hardly by the Scythians who mist him, yet arriuing at the Bridge before him, perswaded the Ionians to depart, assuring them that the Persian King should neuer more be able to doe them either good or harme. Which words had certainely beene proued true, had not Hystiæus the Milesian preuailed with his people, to attend the comming of Darius, whom the Scythians did likewise faile to meete, when they returned from Ister to seeke him out.

§. V.

Some actions of the Persians in Europe, after the Scythian Warre.

DARIVS hauing thus escaped out of Scythia, determined the inuasion of Thrace and Macedon, in which Warre hee imployed Megabasus, who mastered the Pæonians, and transplanted them, & possest Perinthus, Chalcedon, Bizantium, and other places, being also soone after subiected, and added to the Persian Empire by Otanes, the sonne of Syssamnes, whom Cambyses had excoriated for false iudgement. So were the Cities of Selybria and Cardia likewise taken in for the Persian, who hauing now reduced vnder his obeysance the best part of Thrace, did send his Embassadours to Amintas King of Macedon adioyning, demanding of him by the Earth & Water, the Soueraignetie ouer that Kingdome. Amintas doubting his owne strength, entertained the Embassadours with gentle wordes, and afterward inuiting them to a solemne and magnificent feast, the Persians greatly desired that the Macedonian Ladies might bee present: which being granted, the Embassadours who were well filled with wine, and presumed vpon their greatnesse, and many victories, beganne to vse such imbracings, and other lasciuious behauiour towards those Noble Ladies, as Alexander the Kings Sonne, great Grand-father to Alexander the Great, disdaining the Persians barbarous presumption, besought his father to with-draw himselfe from the assembly, continuing notwithstanding all honourable respect towards the Embassadours, whom withall hee entreated that the Ladies might refresh themselues for a while; promising their speedy returne. This being obtained, Alexander caused the like number of well-fauoured yong-men to clothe themselues in the same garments, & to vse the same attires which the Ladies had worne at the feast, giuing them in charge, That when the Persians offered to abuse them, they should forthwith transpierce them with their long kniues, of which they were prouided for that purpose, which was accordingly performed. Charge was soone after giuen by Darius for a seuere reuenge of this murder. But Alexander, somewhat before the death of Amintas, gaue his sister Gygea in marriage to Bubaris, a principall Commander of Darius forces on that side, who perswading her husband how helpfull the Alliance of Macedon would proue for the inuasion of Attica intended, so preuailed, as Alexander

§. VI.

The firſt occaſion of the Warre which DARIVS made vpon Greece, with a rehearſall of the gouernment in Athens, whence the the quarrell grew.

NOw the better to vnderſtand the reaſon and motiues of that great Warre, which followed ſoone after, betweene the Perſians and Græcians, it is neceſſarie to make a ſhort repetition of the ſtate of Athens, which Citie indured the hardeſt and worſt brunt of Darius inuaſion on that ſide the Sea with admirable ſucceſſe. Neither doe I hold it any impertinencie, to be large in vnfolding euery circumſtance of ſo great a buſineſſe as gaue fire to thoſe warres, which neuer could be throughly quenched, vntill in the ruine of this great Perſian Monarchie, Perſepolis the capitall Citie of the Empire, was at the requeſt of an Athenian Harlot conſumed with a flame, as dreadfull as in the pride of their greatneſſe, the Perſians had raiſed in Athens.

Now therefore as out of the former bookes it may be gathered, how Athens, and other parts of Greece, were anciently gouerned, the ſame being alreadie ſet downe, though ſcatteringly, and in ſeuerall times, among other the Contemporarie occurrents of the Eaſterne Emperors, and the Kings of Iudæa; ſo I thought it very pertinent in this place to remember againe the two laſt changes in the State of Athens. As for the Lacedæmonians, they maintained ſtill their ancient policie vnder Kings, though theſe alſo after ſome fifteene deſcents bridled by the Ephori.

Codrus King of the Athenians in the former bookes remembred, who willingly died for the ſafetie of his people, was therefore ſo honored by them, as (thinking none worthy to ſucceed him) they changed their former gouernment from Monarchicall to Princes for terme of life, of which Medon the ſonne of Codrus was the firſt, after whom they were called Medontidæ; and of theſe there were twelue Generations beſides Medon, to wit.

Solon, and others, who are the leſſe to bee regarded, by reaſon of the yeerely change.

This Solon being a man of excellent wiſdome, gaue lawes to the Athenians, which were publiſhed according to Gellius, in the three and thirtieth yeere of Tarquinius Priſcus, and were in after-ages deriued vnto the Romanes, and by the Decemviri (Magiſtrates in Rome created for that purpoſe) reduced into twelue Tables, which were the ground of the Romane lawes. But theſe goodly ordinances of Solon, were in his owne daies violated, and for a while almoſt quite extinguiſhed. For whereas they were framed vnto the practice and maintenance of a popular gouernement; the eſtate of Athens was very ſoone changed into a Monarchie by Piſiſtratus the ſon of Hippocrates: who finding the Citizens diſtracted into two factions, whereof Megacles and Lycurgus two Citizens of noble Families were become the heads, tooke occaſion by their contention and inſolencie to raiſe a third faction more powerfull than the other two, and more plauſible, for that he ſeemed a Protector of the Citizens in generall. Hauing by this meanes obtained loue and credit, he wounded himſelfe, and faining that by malice of his enemies he had like to haue beene ſlaine for his loue to the good Citizens, he procured a guard for his defence, and with that band of men ſurpriſing the State-houſe, or Cittadell of Athens, hee made himſelfe Lord of the Towne; Hegeſiſtratus being then Gouernour. But the Citizens, who in euery change of gouernement had ſought to remoue themſelues further and further from the forme of a Monarchie, could ſo ill brooke this vſurpation of Piſiſtratus, that he was driuen for lack of helpe to flie the Towne, as ſoone as Megacles and Lycurgus ioyning their forces attempted his expulſion. Yet as the building of his tyranny founded vpon the diſſenſion of the Citizens, was ruined by their good agreement; ſo was it ſoone after well reedified by the new breaking out of the old factions. For when Megacles found the power of Lycurgus to grow greater than his owne, he did (as is the vſuall practice of the weaker ſide) call in the common enemie Piſiſtratus, to whom he gaue his Daughter in marriage; by which alliance the Familie of the Alcmæonidæ, whereof Megacles was chiefe, became very powerfull, yet ſo that Piſiſtratus by their power was made Maſter both of them and all the reſt. But this agreement held not long; the Alcmæonidæ, and eſpecially Megacles being incenſed againſt Piſiſtratus for his miſdemeanour towards his Wife. Wherefore they practiſed with the Souldiers of the Towne, proceeding in their treaſon ſo ſecretly, and ſo farre, that Piſiſtratus vpon the firſt diſcouerie of their intent, perceiued no other remedie for his affaires, than to with-draw himſelfe to Eretria, where he remained eleuen yeeres. Which time being expired, hauing hired Souldiers out of many parts of Greece, hee againe recouered the principalitie of Athens: after which third obtaining his eſtate, hee gouerned Athens ſeuenteene yeeres, according to Ariſtotle, and raigned in all thirtie and three yeeres, ſaith Elianus, but as Iuſtine hath it, foure and thirtie, accounting the time belike as well before before as after his ſeuerall expulſions. Herodotus giues the father and the Sonne ſixe and thirtie yeeres; Ariſtotle fiue and thirtie. But Thucidides affirmeth, that hee died very old, leauing for his Succeſſours his two Sonnes Hippias and Hipparchus, who gouerned the Athenians with ſuch moderation, as they rather ſeemed the Lineall ſucceſſors of a naturall Prince than of a Tyrant. But in the end, and ſome three yeeres before Hippias was expelled out of Athens, his brother Hipparchus was murdered by Harmodius and Ariſtogiton. The cauſe why, and the manner how performed, Thucidides hath written at large. And though Hipparchus were charged with vnnaturall luſt after Harmodius, yet Plato in his Dialogue, intituled Hipparchus, doth greatly magnifie him, affirming that hee was a Prince of as many eminent vertues as that Age had any, altogether condemning the murderers and authors of that ſcandall. Hippias fearing that this enterpriſe vpon his brother had more and deeper rootes than were apparent, firſt ſought to diſcouer the further intents of Harmodius and Ariſtogiton, by a Harlot of theirs called Lemnia: who becauſe ſhee would not reueale her Companions, did cut out her owne tongue. Then did Hippias, the better to ſtrengthen himſelfe, enter into a ſtrait amitie with Æantides, Tyrant of the Citie Lampſacus, whom he knew to bee greatly fauoured by Darius, to whoſe ſonne Hypoclus hee gaue one of his Daughters in marriage. But ſome three yeeres after the death of his brother, doubting I know not what ſtrong practice againſt himſelfe, hee beganne to vſe the Citizens with great ſeueritie, which neither Piſiſtratus the Father, nor Hippias himſelfe had euer exerciſed during their vſurpations till this time. And therefore the Athenians fearing leſt that this diſeaſe might rather increaſe, than diminiſh in Hippias, they ſtirred vp Cliſtines one of the nobleſt and beſt able of their Citie, to practiſe their deliuerie: who calling to his aſſiſtance the baniſhed Alcmanida, together with an Armie of the Lacedæmonians, ledde by Cleomenes their King, ſo affrighted Hippias, as by compoſition he gaue ouer his eſtate, and the poſſeſſion of Athens, and from thence imbarking himſelfe tooke land at * Sigeum, whence hee went to Lampſacus in Myſia gouerned by Æantides, who preſented him to Darius. Hee was depriued of his eſtate, as Herodotus and Thucidides agree, twentie yeeres before the battel of Marathon: all which time he continued, partly with Æantides, at other times with Artaphernes Lieutenant for Darius in Sardis, the Metropolis of Lydia; perſwading and practiſing the enterpriſe vpon Athens, which Darius in the ende to his great diſhonour vnder-tooke, twentie yeeres after Hippias had reſigned his eſtate.

Of the Ionian Rebellion, which was the principall cauſe of the warres enſuing betweene Greece and Perſia.

ANother, and a ſtrong motiue to this expedition, was the Ionick warre, breaking out in Aſia about the ſame time. The Colonies tranſported out of Greece into Aſia, which occupied the greateſt part of the Sea-coaſt, hauing enioyed their libertie about 500. yeeres, euen from the Ionick migration, to the time of Cræſus, were by this Lydian King made Tributaries, and afterwards as parcell of his Dominions, were taken in by Cyrus, and left as hereditarie Seruants to the Crowne of Persia.

But as it is the custome of Nations halfe conquered (witnesse Ireland) to rebell againe vpon euery aduantage and opportunitie: so did the Ionians, and other Græcians, both in Cyrus his life, and after him, seeke by all meanes possible to free themselues.

At this time they found such men readie to spurre them into Rebellion, as had by the Persian been giuen vnto them for bridles to hold them in subiection. Euery one of those Townes had a Lord to rule it, whom they (abhorring the gouernment of one man) called their Tyrants. These Lords were very true to the Persian, by whose onely might they held the people in subiection. And this their dutifull affection they had well declared, when, Darius being in great extremitie, they vsed all meanes to deliuer him and his Armie (that otherwise had beene lost) out of the Scythians hand. Of this great piece of seruice Histiæus the tyrant of Miletus expected the chiefe thankes, as hauing beene chiefe Author of their expecting Darius, when the rest, either perswaded by the Scythians, or carried away with their owne desires, were readie to haue abandoned him. But it came so to passe, that Darius being more fearefull of the harme that Histiæus (being powerfull and craftie) might doe to him in the future, than mindfull of the good which he had alreadie receiued at his hand, found meanes to carry him a-long to Susa, where hee detained him with all kind vsage of a friend, yet kept such good espiall vpon him, as an enemie, he could not start away. Histiæus had subtiltie enough to discouer the Kings purpose; which ill agreed with his owne desires. For he thought it more pleasant, and more honourable to rule as Prince in one faire Citie, hauing a smal Territorie, than to sit and feast at the great Kings table, and heare the counsailes by which a large Empire was menaged; being himselfe an idle beholder, and enioying with much restraint of libertie, none other pleasures than a priuate man might bestow vpon himselfe.

Wherefore he bethought himselfe of raising of some tumults in the lower Asia, to pacifie which if he might be sent, as one that had great experience and authoritie in those quarters, it would afterwards be in his power to stay at home, and either satisfie the King with excuses, or deale as occasion shall require. Resoluing vpon this course, he sent very secret instructions to Aristagoras his kinsman, whom he had left his Deputie at Miletus, aduising him to stirre vp some Rebellion. These directions came seasonably to Aristagoras, who hauing failed in an enterprise vpon the Isle of Naxos, through the false dealing of a Persian his Associate, stood in feare of disgrace, if not of some further ill that might befall him, as one that that had wasted the Kings treasures to no good purpose.

Therefore he readily embraced the counsaile: and the better to draw the whole Countrie of Ionia into the same course which he determined to runne, hee abandoned his tyrannie, and did set Miletus at libertie. This plausible beginning wanne vnto him the hearts of the Milesians: and his proceeding with other Ionian Tyrants (of whom some he tooke and sold as slaues to their citizens, others he chased away) caused the whole Nation to bee at his command. The Persian fleet, whereof hee lately had beene Admirall in the enterprise of Naxos, hee had surprised in his first breaking out, together with the principall Officers, and Captaines, so that now hee thought himselfe able to deale with the great Kings forces, lying thereabout, either by Land or Sea. But likely it was that the power of all Asia would shortly be vpon his neck, and crush both him and his assistants to pieces, vnlesse that he were able to raise an Armie that might hold the field, which the Ionians alone were insufficient to performe. Therefore he tooke a iourney to Sparta, where hauing assayed in vaine with many arguments, and the offer of fiftie talents, to win to his partie Cleomenes King of the Lacedæmonians: hee went from thence to Athens, and with better successe besought the people to lend him their assistance. The Athenian Embassadors which had been sent to the Persian Kings Lieutenants in the lower Asia, desiring them not to giue countenance to Hippias, now a banished man, and lately their Tyrant, were a while before this returned with ill answeres, hauing found very churlish entertainement. So that the euill which they were to expect in all likelyhood from the Persian, made them willing to begin with him. To which purpose, their consanguinitie with the Ionians, and the perswasions of Aristagoras, drew them on apace, if perhaps his treasure were not helping. Twentie shippes the Athenians furnished for this voyage; to which the Eretrians added fiue more, in regard of ancient kindnesse that had passed betweene the Ionians and them. With these and their owne forces joyned, the Ionians entred the Riuer Caistrus, which falleth into the Sea by Ephesus; by which aduantage they surprised Sardis when no enemie was heard of or suspected; insomuch, as Artaphernes, who ruled as Vice-roy in those parts, had no other hope of safetie, than by retreating himself into the Castle; which the Grecians could not force: from whence he beheld the slaughter of the Citizens, and the Citie flaming.

The Persians at length, mixt with the Burgers, began to encourage them to defence, and recouered the Market place, strengthened by the Riuer Pactolus, which ran through it, and borrowing courage from desperation, they both defended themselues, and charged their enemies; who well aduising themselues, made all the haste they could toward the Sea side. But Artaphernes hauing gathered all the strength he could, pursued the Grecians, and found them neere Ephesus; where setting resoluedly vpon them, he slaughtered a great part of their Armie; the rest saued themselues in Ephesus. In this fight Eualcides, Captaine of the Eretrians, perished: but his fame and memorie was by that excellent Poet Simonides preserued. After this ouerthrow, the Athenians, which were sent to Aristagoras and to the Ionians, could by no arguments of theirs, no not by their teares, be perswaded to make any second triall of their fortunes, on that side the Sea.

Yet the burning of Sardis made a greater noyse in the world, than the good successe which the Persians had in one or two skirmishes, could raise. Wherefore the Ionians brauely proceeding, woon a great part of Caria; and sending their Fleet into the Hellespont, got Bizantium and other Townes into their hands. Yea, the Cyprians, lately subdued by Cambyses, beganne hereupon to take heart; and entring into confederacie with the Ionians, who were able to giue them aide by sea, rebelled against the Persians.

These newes comming to the eare of Darius, filled him with great indignation, and with an extreme hatred of the Athenians, vpon whome hee vowed to take sharpe reuenge. As for the Ionians, his contempt of them, and their knowledge of his power, made him to thinke, that they would not haue dared to attempt such things, but by the instigation of those, to whom their ignorance of his great might had afforded the courage to prouoke him. This was the maine ground of the Warre commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against Athens: To which, the solicitation of Hippias, before remembred, gaue onely some forme and assistance: the businesse, when once it was thus farre on foot, being like ynough to haue proceeded, though he had perished ere it were aduanced any further.

Some other occurrents in this Ionian commotion extended the quarrell of Darius against many of the Ilanders, if not against the whole Nation of the Greekes; for all of them gaue to his Rebels free harbour: the Ilanders moreouer did helpe to furnish out a Nauie of three hundred and sixtie saile against him. These prouocations did rather breede in him a desire to abate their pride, than any feare of harme that they were like to doe him. For what they had done at Sardis, was but by surprise. In euery fight they were beaten by the Persians, who had not yet lost the fruits of their discipline, wherein Cyrus had trained them, nor all their ancient Captaines. In one sea-fight by the Isle of Cyprus, the Ionians indeed had the vpper hand; but they were Phœnicians, Ægyptians, and Cilicians, whom they vanquished: neither was that victorie of any vse to them; the Cyprians, in whose aid they came; being vtterly beaten by the Persian Armie at Land, and reduced into their old subjection. So had the Persians likewise by open warre and faire force ouerthrowne the Carians in two battailes, and reclaimed that Nation; as also they had recouered the Townes vpon Hellespont, with some Æolian & Ionian Cities: when Aristagoras with his friends quitting Miletus, fled into Thrace, desirous to seat himselfe in Amphipolis, a Colonie of the Athenians. But the Edonians, on whose Territorie belike he landed, ouerthrew him, and cut his troupes in pieces.

About the same time, Histiæus the first mouer of this insurrection came downe into those quarters; who hauing vndertaken the performance of great matters to Darius, was glad to flye from his Lieutenants, by whome his double dealing was detected.

But this euasion preserued him not long. For after many vaine attempts that he made, hee was taken in fight by the Persians, and hastily beheaded, lest the King should pardon him vpon remembrance of old good turnes; as it seemes that hee would haue done, by the buriall which he commanded to be giuen to his dead body that was crucified, and by his heauie taking of his death.

Histiæus had sought to put himselfe into Miletus; but the Citizens doubting his condition, chose rather to keepe him out, and make shift for themselues, without his helpe. The strength of their Citie by land, which had in old time withstood the Lydian Kings, and their good Fleet which promised vnto them the libertie of an open sea, emboldened them to trie the vttermost, when very few friends were left vpon that Continent to take their part. But their Nauie was broken as much by threatnings as by force; many of their companions and fellow-rebels forsaking them vpon hope of pardon; and many being daunted with the causelesse flight of those that should haue assisted them. Neither was it long before the Towne it selfe being assaulted both by Land and Sea, was taken by force, the Citizens slaine, their wiues and children made slaues, and their goods a bootie to the Persians, whome for sixe yeeres space they had put to so much trouble.

§. VIII.

The Warre which DARIVS made vpon Greece, with the battaile of MARATHON, and DARIVS his death.

THis warre with good successe finished by the Persians, and some attempts made on Europe side with variable successe; Darius obstinate in the enterprise and conquest of Greece (though at first he pretended to make the warre but against the Athenians and Eritreans, who jointly assisted the Ionians against him, and burnt Sardis in Lydia) did now by his embassadours demaund an acknowledgement from them all: among whome, some of them not so well resolued as the rest, submitted themselues, as the Æginets and others. Against these, the Athenians being inflamed (by the assistance of the Lacedæmonians) after diuers encounters forst them to giue pledges, and to relinquish the partie of the Persians. Cleomenes led the Lacedæmonians in this warre, and caused his companion King Demaratus to be deposed: who thereupon fled to Darius, farre the more confident of victorie, by reason of these discords, alienations, and ciuill warres among the Greekes. He therefore gaue order to Hippagoras to prepare a Fleet of shippes fit to transport his Armie ouer the Hellespont: the same consisting of an hundred thousand foot, and tenne thousand horse. The charge in chiefe of his Armie he committed to Datis, accompanied and assisted by Hippias, the sonne of Pisistratus, expelled out of Athens twentie yeres before, and by Artaphernes his brother, Gouernour of Sardis, and the Sea-coast of Asia the lesse. These Commaunders hauing their Companies brought downe to the Sea-side, imbarked themselues in sixe hun-

Herod. lib. 6. Whether this Citie or People were of Peloponnesus in Sicyonia, or of Ægea, between Thessalia and Macedon, I do not know: but those borderers, & next the enemie, were more likely to compound than the rest farre off. There is also a Citie called Æginium, not farre from Aegea. Liuie 32. 33. &c hundred Gallies and other Veſſels; and firſt of all attempted the Iſlands called Cyclades, which lay in the mid-way betweene Aſia the leſſe, and Greece. For (obtaining thoſe places) the Perſians had then nothing to hinder the tranſportation of their forces ouer the Ægean Sea; but on the contrarie they might alwayes both relieue themſelues in their paſſage, and ſhrowd themſelues from all ſuddaine tempeſts and outrage.

To this end they firſt poſſeſt themſelues of Samos, ſecondly, they attempted Naxos: Which Iſland, the inhabitants deſpairing of their owne forces, abandoned. So did the people of Delos, of which Apollo was natiue: Which Iſland Darius did not onely forbeare to ſacke, but recalling the inhabitants, he gaue order to beautifie the places and Altars of Sacrifice, to Apollo erected. And hauing recouered theſe and other Iſlands, the Perſians directed their courſe for Eretria in Eubœa: for that Citie (as already hath beene ſhewed) had aſſiſted the Ionians at the taking and firing of Sardis. In this Iſland the Perſians tooke ground, and beſieged Eretria very ſtraitly, and after ſixe dayes aſſault, partly by force, and in part by the treaſon of Euphabius and Philagius; they tooke it, ſackt it, and burnt it to the ground. Thus farre the winds of proſperous fortune filled their ſayles. From Eubœa the Perſians paſt their Armie into Attica, conducted and guided by Hippias, late Prince of Athens, and marching towards it, they encamped at Marathon, in the way from the Sea, where they landed, towards Athens. In Herod.

The Athenians finding the time arriued, wherein they were to diſpute with their owne vertue againſt Fortune, and to caſt lots for their libertie, for their wiues, their children, and their liues, put themſelues in the beſt order they could to make reſiſtance, and withall ſent away with ſpeed to the Lacedæmonians for ſuccour, imploying in that Negotiation one Phidippides; who paſſing through Arcadia, encountred in the way a familiar Diuell, which he ſuppoſed to be Pan, who willed him to aſſure the Athenians of victorie, promiſing that ſome one of the Gods ſhould be preſent at the battaile to aſſiſt them and defend them againſt the multitude of their enemies. Phidippides at his returne ſeeing he could not bring with him any preſent ſuccours from Sparta, yet he thought it greatly auailing to bring newes from the Gods, and promiſe of aſſiſtance from Heauen, which no doubt (though the deuice was likely to be his owne) yet it greatly encouraged the multitude and common people, who in all ages haue beene more ſtirred vp with fond Propheeies and other like ſuperſtitious fooleries, than by any juſt cauſe or ſolid reaſon. The Athenians being now left to themſelues, with one thouſand onely of the Plateans (who hauing beene formerly defended by the Athenians againſt the Thebans, did in this extremitie witneſſe their thankefulneſſe and gratefull diſpoſition) began to diſpute, Whether it were moſt for their aduantage to defend the wals of Athens, or to put themſelues into the field with ſuch forces as they had, the ſame conſiſting of tenne thouſand Athenians, and one thouſand of the Plateans. In the end, and after great diuerſitie of opinions, Miltiades, who perſwaded the triall by battaile, preuailed. The Armies being now in view, and within a myle of each other, the Athenians diſpoſed themſelues into three troupes: two wings or hornes, as they tearme them, and the body of a battaile. The Perſians, when they perceiued ſo ſmall a Troope aduauncing towards them, thought the Athenians rather diſpoſſeſt of their vnderſtanding, than poſſeſt with the reſolution whereof they made ſhew. So inuincible and reſiſtleſſe the Perſians eſteemed their owne numbers to be, and that ſmall troupe of their enemies then in view, rather to be deſpiſed than to be fought withall: But in concluſion, the victory being doubtfully ballanced for a while, ſometime the vertue of the Græcians, and ſometimes the number of the Perſians preuailing, the Græcians fighting for all that they had, the Perſians for that they needed not, theſe great forces of Darius were diſordered and put in rout; the Athenians following their victorie euen to the Sea-ſhore; where the Perſians, ſo many of them as loſt not their wits with their courage, ſaued themſelues in their ſhippes.

The

The Persian Armie consisted of an hundred thousand foot and tenne thousand horse; of which there were slaine in the place sixe thousand three hundred, and of the Græcians an hundred fourescore and twelue. For howsoeuer it came to passe, either by strange visions, which were afterward called Panici terrores, or by some other affright, it seemeth, that the inuading Armie, after the first encounter, fought with their backes towards their enemie, and lost that number, by Herodotus set downe, in their disorderly retreat, or rather in their flat running away. As for Iustines report, That two hundred thousand of the Persian Armie were slaine, the same hath no apparance nor possibilitie of truth. In this fight Hippias the perswader of the enterprise was slaine, sayth Iustine and Cicero; but Suidas tels vs, That he escaped and died most miserably in Lemnos.

Ad Att.

The greatest honour of this victory was cast vpon Miltiades, who both perswaded the triall by battaile, and behaued himselfe therein answerably to the counsell which he gaue. Themistocles had his first reputation in this fight, being but young and of the first beard. Those of the Græcians, of marke and commandement, that fell in the first encounter, were Callimachus and Stesileus. It is also said, That Cynegyrus following the Persians to their embarking, layd hands on one of their Gallies, to haue held it from putting off the shore, and hauing his right hand cut off, he yet offered to arrest it with his left; of which being also depriued, he tooke hold of it with his teeth. This encounter happened in the first yeere of the threescore and twelfth Olympiad, about the time of the Warre made by Coriolanus against his fellow-Romanes: Alexander the sonne of Amintas being then King of Macedon, and Phanippus then Gouernour of Athens, according to Plutarch; or Hybilides, after Halycarnasseus.

In vita Arist.

This great fray thus parted, and the Persians returned backe into the lesser Asia, Miltiades sought and obtained an imployment against the Ilanders of Paros, one of the Cyclades, and passing ouer his Companies in threescore and tenne Gallies, after sixe and twentie dayes assault he brake his thigh, in seeking to enter it by the Temple of Ceres, wherewith himselfe being made vnable, and his companies discouraged, he returned to Athens; where those vngratefull Citizens forgetting all his seruices past, and that of all other the most renowned at the battaile of Marathon, did by the perswasion of Xantippus, the father of Pericles (who enuied his fame) cast him into prison, and set on him a fine of fiftie Talents; where his weake and wounded body being not able to endure the one, nor his estate to pay the other, he after a few dayes ended his life.

Which enuie of the better sort to each other, with their priuate Factions, assisted by the vnthankfull and witlesse people, brought them, not many yeeres after, from a victorious and famous Nation, to base subjection and slaueric. Miltiades left behind him one sonne called Cymon, begotten on Hegisipila, daughter of Olorus King of Thrace, who (saith Plutarch) was neither inferior to his father in valour, nor to Themistocles in vnderstanding, but exceeded them both in justice and good gouernment.

Now Darius taking greater care how to recouer his honour, than sorrow for the losse receiued in Greece, gaue order for new leuies of men, and all other warlike prouisions. But the Ægyptians reuolting from his obedience (a Kingdome of great strength and reuenue) greatly distracted his resolution for the reinuasion of Greece. The dissension also among his sonnes; of whom, the yonger being borne after he was King, and by so great a mother as Atossa, disdained to giue place to his elder brother, borne before Darius obtained the Empire, greatly vexed him. And lastly, death, who hath no respect of any mans affaires, gaue end to all his consultations and enterprises, and joyned him to the earth of his auncestors, about a yeere after the battaile of Marathon, and after that he had raigned sixe and thirty yeres. He left behind him fiue sonnes, namely Artabasanes, born before he obtained the kingdome, Xerxes who succeeded him, Achemenes gouernor of Ægypt, Masistes and Anabignes.

CHAP. VI.

Of XERXES.

§. I.

The preparation of XERXES against Greece.

XERXES receiued from his father, as hereditarie, a double Warre; one to be made against the Ægyptians, which he finished so speedily, that there is nothing remaining in writing how the same was performed: the other against the Gracians; of which it is hard to judge, whether the preparations were more terrible, or the successe ridiculous. In the consultation for the prosecution of this Warre, which was chiefely bent against the Athenians, the Princes of Persia were diuided in opinion. Mardonius, who had formerly commaunded in Thrace and Macedon, vnder Darius, and had also Hystaspes for his grandfather, as Xerxes had, and married Xerxes his sister Artozostres, perswaded by many arguments the European warre. But Artabanus, brother to the late Darius, and vncle to Xerxes, maintained the contrarie counsell, laying before Xerxes the lamentable and ridiculous successe of the two late inuasions, which Darius had made contrarie to his counsell: The one in person vpon the Scythians, the other by his Lieutenants vpon the Greekes; in each of which Darius left to his enemies both his Armie and his honour.

He therefore besought Xerxes to be right well aduised before he did too farre imbarke himselfe in this businesse. For whatsoeuer vndertaking hath deliberate and sound counsell for conductor, though the successe doe not alwayes answere the probabilitie, yet hath Fortune nothing else thereof to vaunt, than the variablenesse of her owne nature, which only the diuine Prouidence, and not any humane power, can constraine.

But so obstinate was the resolution of Xerxes in prosecution of his former intent, that Artabanus, whether terrified by Visions (as it is written of him) or fearing the Kings hatred, which hee made knowne to all those that opposed his desire to this Warre (changing opinion & counsell) assisted the Gracian Expedition with all the power he had.

After the Warre of Ægypt was ended, foure yeeres were consumed in describing and gathering an Armie for this inuasion: which being compounded of all Nations subject to the Persian Empire, consisted of seuenteene hundred thousand foot, Her. l. 7. and eightie thousand horsemen, besides Chariots, Camels, and other Beasts for Carriage, if we may beleeue Herodotus: for of this multitude, Trogus findes the numberlesse by seuen hundred thousand footmen.

The Commaunders of the seuerall Nations were the Princes of the bloud of Persia, either by marriage in the Kings house, or otherwise: for to these were all commaundements of this nature giuen, some few people excepted, who had of their owne leaders.

The charge of the whole Armie was bestowed on Mardonius, the sonne of Gobryas by a sister of Darius, to whom were joyned some others of Xerxes his neerest kindred, as Generals ouer all; sauing that the charge of tenne thousand select Persians, called the immortall Regiment (because if any one of the whole number died or were slaine, there was another presently chosen in his stead) was giuen to Hydarnes; the eighty thousand horsemen were led by the sonnes of Datis, who commaunded the late Armie of Darius in Greece.

The Fleet of Gallies were two thousand two hundred and eight, furnished by the Phœnicians, who had Commaunders of their owne Nation, and by the Cypriotes, Cilicians, Pamphilians, Lycians, Dorians, Carians, Ionians, Æolians, and Hellespontines; who were trusted with the furnishing of their owne Vessels, though commaunded by the Princes of Persia, as by Ariabignes the sonne of Darius, and others. The rest of the Vessels for transportation were three thousand. There were also certaine Gallies furnished by Artemisia, the daughter of Lygdames, Princesse of Halycarnassus, and the Islands adioyning, which her selfe commaunded. Those Gallies by her prepared and furnished, exceeded all the rest of the Fleet, excepting those of Zidon, in which Xerxes himselfe was imbarked.

§. II.

XERXES Armie entertained by PYTHIVS: His cutting off Mount Athos from the Continent: his bridge of Boates ouer the Hellespont: and the discourse betweene him and ARTABANVS vpon the view of his Armie.

WHen this world of an Armie was throughly furnished, he caused all the Nations of which it was compounded, to make their Rendez-vous and repaire at Sardis in Lydia. And when hee had assembled to the number of seuenteene hundred thousand foot, as he entred the body of Celænas, he was by one Pythius the Lydian entertained, who out of his Flocks and Heards of Cattell gaue food to Xerxes and his whole Armie. The Feast ended, hee also presented him with two thousand Talents of siluer, and in Gold foure Millions, wanting seuen thousand of the Persian Darici, which make so many of our markes.

The King ouercome with the exceeding liberalitie of Pythius, did not only refuse his treasure offered, but commaunded that seuen thousand Darici should be giuen him to make vp his foure Millions; of which, so many thousands were wanting when he made the present. But soone after, when Pythius besought him to spare one of his fiue sonnes from his attendance into Greece (because himselfe was old, and had none whom he could so well trust as his owne sonne) Xerxes most barbarously caused the young man, for whom his father sought exemption, to be sundered into two parts, commaunding, that the one halfe of his carkasse should be layed on the right, and the other halfe on the left hand of the common way by which the Armie marched.

Two things he commanded to be done before he came to the Sea side. The one was a passage for Gallies to be cut behind Mount Athos, making the same (which the halfe Island or Headland, whereon it stood) to be an entire Island, sundring thereby from the Continent of Thrace fiue Cities, besides the Mountaine and the Chersonesus or Necke of Land it selfe: a worke of more ostentation than of vse, and yet an enterprise of no great wonder, the Valley which held it to the Continent hauing but twelue furlongs (which make about a mile and halfe) to cut through, and the ditch being broad enough onely for two Gallies to passe in front. The Cities so seuered from the maine, were Dion, Olophyxus, Acrothoon, Thyssus, and Cleonæ.

He also gaue order, that a Bridge vpon Boats should be made ouer the Hellespont betweene Abidus and Sestos, the Sea there hauing a mile of breadth, wanting an eight part; which after the finishing, was by a Tempest torne asunder and disseuered: wherewith Xerxes being more enraged than discouraged, commaunded those to be slaine that were masters of the worke, and caused sixe hundred threescore and foureteene fourteene Gallies to be coupled together, thereon to frame a new Bridge; which by the art and industry of the Phœnicians was so well anchored to resist both windes blowing into and from the Euxine Sea, as the same being well boorded and rayled, the whole Armie of seuenteene hundred thousand foot, and fourescore thousand Horse, with all the Moyles and Carriages, past ouer it into Europe in seuen daies and seuen nights, without intermission. This transportation of Armies did Cæsar afterward vse. And Caligula that mad Emperour, in imitation of Xerxes his Bridge, did build the like.

The Bridge finished, and the Armie brought neere to the Sea side, Xerxes tooke a view of all his Troupes, assembled in the Plaines of Abidus, being carried vp, and seated on a place ouer-topping the Land round about it, and the Sea adioyning: and after he had gloried in his owne happinesse, to behold and commaund so many Nations, and so powerfull an Armie and Fleet, he suddenly (notwithstanding) burst out into teares, moued with this contemplation, That in one hundred yeeres there should not any one suruiue of that maruellous multitude: the cause of which sudden change of passion when he vttered to Artabanus his vncle, Artabanus spake to the King to this effect: That which is more lamentable than the dissolution of this great Troupe within that number of yeeres by the King remembred, is, That the life it selfe which we enioy is yet more miserable than the end thereof: for in those few daies giuen vs in the world, there is no man among all these, nor elsewhere, that euer found himselfe so accompanied with happinesse, but that he oftentimes pleased himselfe better with the desire and hope of death, than of liuing; the incident calamities, diseases, and sorrowes whereto mankind is subiect, being so many and ineuitable, that the shortest life doth oftentimes appeare vnto vs ouerlong; to auoide all which, there is neither refuge nor rest but in desired death alone.

With this melancholy discourse, Xerxes being not much pleased, prayed Artabanus not to ouer-cast those ioyes which they had now in pursuit with sad remembrances. And holding stil a doubtful conceit, that Artabanus vtterly condemned the inuasion of Greece, against which he had formerly giuen many strong reasons, desired him to deale freely with him, Whether he were returned to his first resolution, that the enterprise of Greece could not be prosperous? Or whether, according to the change of mind put into him by his late Vision, he was confident of good successe? Artabanus, notwithstanding that he assured himselfe of the Kings resolution to go on, and dared not by any new Arguments to batter the great purpose it selfe, yet he told the King, That there were two things which maruellously affrighted him, and which the King should finde, as he feared, to be most aduerse; to wit, the Sea and the Land: The Sea, because it had no where in that part of the world any Port capable of so great a Fleete: insomuch, as if any tempest should arise, all the Continent of Greece could hardly receiue them, nor all the Hauens thereof affoord them any safetie: and therefore when such shelter shall bee wanting vnto them, he prayed him to vnderstand, that in such a case of extremitie, men are left to the will and disposition of Fortune, and not Fortune to the will and disposition of men. The Land, besides other incommodities, will be found by so much the more an enemie, by how much the vnsatiate desire of man to obtaine more and more thereof, doth leade him forward: for were there no man found to giue resistance, yet the want of meanes to feede such an Army, and the Famine, which cannot bee preuented, will without any other violence offered diuinable and consume it. By these Arguments Artabanus hoped to haue diuerted Xerxes, not daring perchance to vtter what indeed he most feared; to wit, the ouerthrow of the Armie it selfe both by Sea and Land, which soone after followed. These Cautions were exceeding weightie, if Xerxes his obstinacie had not misprised them. For to inuade by Sea vpon a perillous Coast, being neither in possession of any Port, nor succored by any party, may better fit a Prince presuming on his fortune, than enriched with vnderstanding. Such was the enterprise of Philip the second vpon England in the yeere 1588. who had belike neuer heard of this Counsell of Artabanus to Xerxes, or forgotten it.

Now concerning the second point, it was verie likely, that Xerxes his Armie, which could not haue lesse in it than two millions of Soules, besides his beastes for Seruice and Carriage, should after a few dayes suffer famine, and vsing Machiauels words, Mourire sans coustea; die without a knife. For it was impossible for Greece, being a ragged, strait and mountainous Countrey, to yeeld food (besides what serued themselues) for twenty hundred thousand strangers, whom they neuer meant to entertaine but with the sharpened points of their weapons, destroying withall whatsoeuer they could not well inclose and defend. Nay, if we may beleeue Herodotus, the Armie of Xerxes, being reuiewed at Thermopyla, consisted of fiue millions, two hundred eightie three thousand, two hundred twentie men, besides Laundresses, Harlots and Horses, and was therefore likely to endure a speedy famine.

Lib. 3.

The effect of Xerxes his answere was, That it was impossible to prouide for all things; and that whosoeuer should enterprise any great matter, if he gaue the hearing to all that could be obiected of accidentall inconueniences, hee should neuer pursue the same farther, than the dispute and consultation: which if his Predecessors, the Persian Kings, had done, they had neuer growne to that greatnesse, or possest so many Kingdomes and Nations as now they did, and therefore concluded, That great enterprises were neuer vndertaken without great perils. Which resolution of Xerxes was not to be condemned, if any necessity had enforst him to that warre. But seeing the many Nations newly conquered, which hee already commaunded, were more than could be constrained to obedience any longer than the powerfull prosperity of the Persians endured, and that Greece was separated by the Sea from the rest of Xerxes Dominions (of whose resolution his father Darius had made a deare experience) the fruit of this warre was answerable to the plantation, and the successe and end agreeable to the weake counsell whereon it was grounded. Furthermore, those millions of men which he transported, and yet in his owne iudgement not sufficient (for he gathered in marching on, all the strength of Thrace and Macedon) were an argument, that he rather hoped to feare the Greekes by the fame of his numbers, than that he had any confidence in their valour and resolution, whom he conducted. For it is wisely said of those vncountable multitudes: Non vires habent sed pondus, & impedimenta potiùs sunt quàm auxilium; They are great in bulke, but weake in force, and rather a luggage than an aide.

Besides, as it was impossible to marshal such a world of men in one Armie, so the diuers Nations, speaking diuers languages, bred the same confusion among the Persian commaunders when they came to fight, as it did to the builders of Babel, when they came to worke. Whereas if Xerxes had of his fiue millions compounded tenne Armies of fiftie thousand chosen souldiors in each, and sent them yeerely into Greece well victualed and furnished, he had eyther preuayled by the sword, or forst them to forsake their territorie, or brought them in obedience by necessity and famine, which cannot be resisted. But while Xerxes, resolued to cut down the bankes of Greece, and to let in a sea of men vpon them, he was deceiued both in his owne hopes, and in their hearts whom he imployed, and beaten by the Greekes, both by Land and Sea; yea, he himselfe, conducted by his feare, fled shamefully into Asia. A great part of his Armie was buried in Greece: the remainder wherof, which wintred in Thessalie, and led by Mardonius, who perswaded the Enterprise, was in the Summer following vtterly defeated, and himselfe slaine.

§. III.

§. III.

Of the fights at Thermopylæ and Artemiſium.

AFter ſuch time as Xerxes had tranſported his Armie ouer the Helleſpont, and landed in Thrace, (leauing the deſcription of his paſſage alongſt that Coaſt, and how the Riuer of Liſſus was drunke drie by his multitudes, and the Lake neere to Piſſyrus by his cattell, with other accidents in his marches towards Greece) I will ſpeake of the encounters he had, and the ſhamefull and incredible ouerthrowes which he receiued: As firſt at Thermopylæ, a narrow paſſage of halfe an acre of ground, lying betweene the Mountaines which diuide Theſſalie from Greece, where ſometime the Phocians had rayſed a wall with gates, which was then forthe moſt part ruined. At this entrance Leonidas, one of the Kings of Sparta, with three hundred Lacedæmonians, aſſiſted with one thouſand Tegeatæ and Mantineans, one thouſand Arcadians, and other Peloponneſians, to the number of three thouſand one hundred in the whole, beſides one thouſand Phocians, foure hundred Thebans, ſeuen hundred Theſpians, and all the forces (ſuch as they were) of the bordering Locrians, defended the paſſage two whole daies together againſt that huge Armie of the Perſians. The valour of the Greekes appeared ſo excellent in this defence, that in the firſt dayes fight, Xerxes is ſaid to haue three times leaped out of his Throne, fearing the deſtruction of his Armie by one handfull of thoſe men, whom not long before he had vtterly deſpiſed: and when the ſecond dayes attempt vpon the Greekes had prooued vaine, hee was altogether ignorant how to proceede further, and ſo might haue continued, had not a run-agate Græcian taught him a ſecret way, by which part of his Armie might aſcend the ledge of Mountaines, and ſet vpon the backs of thoſe who kept the Straits. But when the moſt valiant of the Perſian Armie had almoſt incloſed the ſmall forces of the Greekes, then did Leonidas, King of the Lacedæmonians, with his three hundred, and ſeuen hundred Theſpians, which were all that abode by him, refuſe to quit the place which they had vndertaken to make good, and with admirable courage not onely reſiſt that world of men which charged them on all ſides; but iſſuing out of their ſtrength, made ſo great a ſlaughter of their enemies, that they might well bee called vanquiſhers, though all of them were ſlaine vpon the place. Xerxes hauing loſt in this laſt fight, together with twentie thouſand other Souldiers and Captaines, two of his owne brethren, began to doubt what inconuenience might befall him by the vertue of ſuch as had not beene preſent at theſe battailes, with whome hee knew that hee ſhortly was to deale. Eſpecially of the Spartans he ſtood in great feare, whoſe manhood had appeared ſingular in this tryall, which cauſed him very carefully to enquire what numbers they could bring into the field. It is reported of Dieneces the Spartan, that when one thought to haue terrified him by ſaying, That the flight of the Perſian arrowes was ſo thicke as would hide the Sunne: he anſwered thus; It is very good newes: for then ſhall we fight in the coole ſhade.

Such notable reſolution hauing as freely beene expreſſed in deedes, as it was vttered in words, cauſed the Perſian to ſtand in great doubt, when he heard that the Citie of Sparta could arme well-nigh eight thouſand men of the like temper, and that the other Lacedæmonians, though inferiour to thoſe, were very valiant men. Wherefore he asked counſell of Demaratus, a baniſhed King of the Spartans, who had alwaies well aduiſed and inſtructed him in the things of Greece, what courſe were fitteſt to bee taken in his further proceedings. The opinion of Demaratus was, That all the Land-forces would aſſemble together to defend the Iſthmus, that ſtraight necke of ground which joyneth Peloponneſus to the Continent. For which cauſe he aduiſed, That three hundred ſhippes well manned ſhould be ſent vnto the Coaſt of Laconia, to ſpoyle the Countrie, and to hold the Lacedæmonians and their neighbours busied at home; whilest Xerxes at his leasure hauing subdued the rest, might afterward bring his whole power vpon them, who remaining destitute of succour, would be too weak alone to make resistance. To this purpose also the same Demaratus further aduised, that the said fleet of three hundred ships should seize vpon the Iland then called Cythera, now Cerigo, which lying neere to the Coast of Laconia, might serue as a fit place of Rendez vous vpon all occasions either of their own defence or endamaging the enemie: whereby that ancient speech of Chilon the Lacedemonian should be verified, that it were better for his Countrie-men to haue that Ile drowned in the sea, than stand so inconueniently as for them it did. What effect this counsell might haue taken had it been followed it is not easie to 10 guesse. But a contrarie opinion of Achæmenes brother to King Xerxes was preferred as the safer. For the Persian fleet had bin sorely vexed with a grieuous tempest which continued three whole dayes together, wherein were lost vpon the coast of Magnesia foure hundred ships of war, besides other vessels innumerable, accordingly as Artabanus had foreseene, that if any such calamity should ouertake them, there would not be found any Harbor wide enough to giue them succour. Therefore Achæmenes perswaded his brother not to disperse his fleet; for if (said he) after the losse of foure hundred shippes we shall send away other three hundred to seeke aduentures, then will the Greekes be strong enough by sea to encounter the rest of the Nauie, which holding altogether is inuincible. To this counsel Xerxes yeelded, 20 hoping that his Land-armie and fleet should each of them stand the other in good stead, whilest both held one course, and lay not farre asunder. But herein he was farre deceiued; for about the same time that his armie had felt the valour of the Greekes by Land, his Nauie likewise made a sorrowfull proofe of their skill and courage at Sea. The Grecian fleet lay at that time at Artemisium in the straits of Eubœa, where the Persians thinking to incompasse them, sent two hundred sayle about the Iland to fall vpon them behind, vsing a like strategem to that which their King did practise against Leonidas in a case not vnlike, but with far different successe. For that narrow channell of the sea which diuideth Eubœa from the maine, was in 30 the same sort held by a Nauy of two hundred threescore and eleuen saile against the huge Persian Armada, as the straits of Thermopylæ had formerly been maintained by Leonidas, till he was so circumuented as this Nauie might haue been, but was not. The departure of those two hundred ships that were sent about the Iland, and the cause of their voiage, was too well knowne in the Persian fleete, and soone enough disclosed to the Greekes, who setting saile by night, met them with a counter-surprise, taking and sinking thirtie vessels, inforcing the rest to take the Sea, where being ouertaken with foule weather, they were driuen vpon the rocks & cast al away. Contrariwise, the Nauie of the Greekes was increased by the arriuall of fiftie three 40

Athenian ships, and one Lemnian, which came to their partie in the last fight. As these new forces incouraged the one side: so the feare of Xerxes his displeasure stirred vp the other to redeeme their losse with some notable exploit. Wherefore setting aside their vnfortunate policie, they resolued in plaine fight to repaire their honour, and casting themselues into the forme of a Crescent, thought so to include the Greekes, who readily did present them battell at Artemisium.

The fight endured from noone till night, and ended with equall losse to both parts. For though more of the Persians ships were sunke and taken, yet the lesser losse fell altogether as heauie vpon the Greekish fleet, which being small could worse beare it. Herein onely the Barbarians may seeme to haue had the worse, that they forsooke the place of fight, leauing the wracke and spoyles to the enemie, who neuertheless were faine to abandon presently euen the passage which they had vn- 50 dertaken to defend, both for that many of their ships were sorely crusht in the battaile, and especially because they had receiued aduertisement of the death of Leonidas at Thermopylæ. Before they waied anchors, Themistocles general of the Athenians engraued vpon stone at the watering place an exhortation to the Ionians, that either they they should reuolt vnto the Greekes or stand neutrall; which perswasion, he hoped would either take some place with them, or at the least make them suspected by the Persians.

§. IIII.

The attempt of XERXES vpon APOLLOE's temple: and his taking of Athens.

WHen Xerxes had passed the straites of Thermopyla, he wasted the country of the Phocians, and the regions adioyning: as for the inhabitants, they chose rather to flie, and reserue themselues to a day of battell, than to aduenture their liues into his hands, vpon hope of sauing their wealth by making proffer vnto him of their seruice. Part of his armie he sent to spoile the temple of Delphi; which was exceeding rich by meanes of many offerings that had there beene made by diuers Kings and great personages; Of all which riches it was thought that Xerxes had a better Inuentorie than of the goods left in his owne Palace. To make relation of a great astonishment that fell vpon the companies which ariued at the Temple to haue sacked it, and of two Rocks, that breaking from the mount Parnassus, ouerwhelmed many of the Barbarians, it were peraduenture somewhat superstitious. Yet Herodotus, who liued not long after, saith, That the broken Rocks remained euen to his memorie in the Temple of Minerua, whither they rowled in their fall. And surely this attempt of Xerxes was impious; for seeing hee beleeued that Apollo was a god, hee should not haue dared to entertaine a couetous desire of inriching himselfe by committing sacriledge vpon his Temple. Wherefore it may possibly be true, that licence to chastise his impietie, in such manner as is reported, was granted vnto the Diuel, by that Holy one, who saith, Will a man spoile his gods? and elsewhere; Hath any nation changed their gods, which yet are no gods? Go to the Iles of Kittim, and behold, and send to Kedar, and take diligent heed, and see whether there be any such things. Now this impietie of Xerxes was the more inexcusable, for that the Persians alleadged the burning of Cybeles Temple by the Athenians, when they set fire on the Citie of Sardis in Asia, to be the ground and cause of the waste which they made in burnings of Cities and Temples in Greece. Whereas indeed, in the enterprise against Delphos, this Vizzor of holy and zealous reuenge falling off, discouered the face of couetousnesse so much the more vglie, by how much the more themselues had professed a detestation of the offence which the Athenians had committed in that kind by meere mischance.

Malac. c. 3. v. 8. Ierem. c. 2. v. 9. & 10.

The remainder of that which Xerxes did, may be expressed briefly thus: He came to Athens, which finding forsaken, he took & burnt the Cittadel & temple which was therein. The Cittadel indeed was defended a while by some of more courage than wisedome, who litterally interpreting Apollo's Oracle; that Athens should be safe in woodden walls, had fortified that place with boords and Palissadoes: too weake to hold out long, though by their desperate valour so well maintained at the first assault, that they might haue yeelded it vpon tolerable conditions, had they not vainely relied vpon the prophecie: whereof (being somewhat obscure) it was wisely done of Themistocles, to make discretion the interpreter, applying rather the words to the present neede, than fashioning the businesse to words.

§. V.

How THEMISTOCLES the Athenian drew the Greekes to fight at Salamis.

THe Athenians had, before the comming of Xerxes, remooued their wiues and children into Træzene, Ægina, & Salamis, not so highly prizing their houses and lands, as their freedome, and the common libertie of Greece. Neuertheless, this great zeale, which the Athenians did shew for the generall good of their Countrie, was ill requited by the other Greekes, who with much labour were hardly intreated to stay for them at Salamis, whilest they remooued their wiues and children out of the Citie. But when the Citie of Athens was taken, it was presently resolued vpon, that they should forsake the Ile of Salamis, and with-draw the fleet to Isthmus: which neck of land they did purpose to fortifie against the Persians, and so to defend Peloponnesus by Land, and Sea, leauing the rest of Greece, as indefensible, to the furie of the enemie. So should the Ilands of Salamis and Ægina haue beene abandoned, and the Families of the Athenians (which were there bestowed as in places of securitie) haue beene giuen ouer into mercilesse bondage. Against this resolution Themistocles, Admirall of the Athenian fleet, very strongly made opposition; but in vaine. For the Peloponnesians were so possessed with feare of losing their owne, which they would not hazard, that no perswasions could obtaine of them, to regard the estate of their distressed friends and Allies. Many remonstrances Themistocles made vnto them, to allure them to abide the enemie at Salamis; As first in priuate vnto Eurybiades the Lacedæmonian, Admirall of the whole fleet; That the selfe same feare which made them forsake those coasts of Greece, vpon which they then anchored, would afterward (if it found no check at the first) cause them also to dissener the fleet, and euery one of the Confederates to with-draw himselfe to the defence of his owne Citie and estate: Then to the Councell of Warre which Eurybiades vpon this motion did call together (forbearing to obiect what want of courage might worke in them hereafter) he shewed that the fight at Isthmus would be in an open Sea, whereas it was more expedient for them, hauing the fewer ships, to determine the matter in the straights; and that, besides the safeguard of Ægina, Megara, and Salamis, they should by abiding, where they then were, sufficiently defend Isthmus, which the Barbarians should not so much as once looke vpon, if the Greekes obtained victorie by sea; which they could not so well hope for else where, as in that present place which gaue them so good aduantage. All this would not serue to retaine the Peloponnesians, of whom one, vnworthie of memorie, vpbraided Themistocles with the losse of Athens, blaming Eurybiades for suffering one to speake in the Councell, that had no Countrie of his owne to inhabite. A base and shamefull obiection it was, to lay as a reproch that losse, which being voluntarily sustained for the common good, was in true estimation by so much the more honourable, by how much it was the greater. But this indignitie did exasperate Themistocles, and put into his mouth a reply so sharpe, as auailed more than all his former perswasions. Hee told them all plainely, That the Athenians wanted not a fairer Citie, than any Nation of Greece could boast of; hauing well-neere two hundred good ships of Warre, the better part of the Grecian fleet, with which it was easie for them to transport their Families and substance into any part of the World, and settle themselues in a more secure habitation, leauing those to shift as well as they might, who in their extremitie had refused to stand by them. Herewithall he mentioned a towne in Italie belonging of old to the State of Athens, of which towne hee said an Oracle had fore-told, That the Athenians in processe of time should build it a-new, and there (quoth he) will we plant our selues, leauing vnto you a sorrowful remembrance of my words, and of your owne vnthankfulneſſe. The Peloponneſians hearing thus much, began to enter into better conſideration of the Athenians, whoſe affaires depended not, as they well perceiued, vpon ſo weake termes, that they ſhould bee driuen to crouch to others; but rather were ſuch, as might inforce the reſt to yeeld to them, and condeſcend euen to the vttermoſt of their owne demands.

For the Athenians, when they firſt embraced that Heroical reſolution of leauing their grounds and houſes to fire and ruine, if neceſſitie ſhould inforce them ſo far, for the preſeruation of their libertie; did imploy the moſt of their priuate wealth, and all the common treaſure, in building a great Nauie. By theſe meanes they hoped (which accordingly fell out) that no ſuch calamitie ſhould befall them by land, as might not well be counterpoiſed be great aduantages at ſea: Knowing well, that a ſtrong fleet would either procure victorie at home, or a ſecure paſſage to any other Countrie. The other States of Greece held it ſufficient, if building a few new ſhips, they did ſomewhat amend their Nauie. Whereby it came to paſſe, that, had they been vanquiſhed, they could not haue expected any other fortune than either preſent death, or perpetuall ſlaueries neither could they hope to be victorious without the aſſiſtance of the Athenians, whoſe forces by ſea did equall all theirs together; the whole conſiſting of more than three hundred and foureſcore bottomes. Wherefore theſe Peloponneſians beginning to ſuſpect their owne condition, which would haue ſtood vpon deſperate points, if the fleet of Athens had forſaken them; were ſome perſwaded, by the greater feare of ſuch a bad euent, to forget the leſſer, which they had conceiued of the Perſians: and laying aſide their inſolent brauerie, they yeelded to that moſt profitable counſaile of abiding at Salamis.

§. VI.

How the Perſians conſulted about giuing battaile: and how THEMISTOCLES by policie held the Greekes to their reſolution; with the victorie at Salamis thereupon enſuing.

IN the meane ſeaſon the Perſians had entred into conſultation, whether it were conuenient to offer battell to the Greekes, or no. The reſt of the Captains giuing ſuch aduice as they thought would beſt pleaſe the King their Maſter, had ſoon agreed vpon the fight: but Artemiſia Queene of Halicarnaſſus, who followed Xerxes to this war in perſon, was of contrarie opinion. Her Counſell was, that the King himſelfe directly ſhould march toward Peloponneſus, whereby it would come to paſſe, that the Greeke Nauie (vnable otherwiſe to continue long at Salamis for want of prouiſion) ſhould preſently be diſſeuered, and euery one ſeeking to preſerue his owne Citie and goods, they ſhould, being diuided, proue vnable to reſiſt him, who had wonne ſo far vpon them when they held together. And as the profit will bee great in forbearing to giue battell; ſo on the other ſide, the danger will bee more (ſaid ſhee) which wee ſhall vnder-goe, than any need requireth vs to aduenture vpon; and the loſſe in caſe it fall vpon vs, greater than the profit of the victory which we deſire. For if we compell the enemies to flie, it is more than they would haue done, we ſitting ſtill: but if they, as better Sea-men than ours, put vs to the worſt, the iourney to Peloponneſus is vtterly daſht, and many that now declare for vs, will ſoone reuolt vnto the Greekes. Mardonius, whom Xerxes had ſent for that purpoſe to the fleet, related vnto his Maſter the common conſent of the other Captaines, & withall this diſagreeing opinion of Artemiſia. The King well pleaſed with her aduice, yet reſolued vpon following the more generall, but farre-worſe counſaile of the reſt; which would queſtionleſſe haue beene the ſame which Artemiſia gaue, had not feare and flatterie made all the Captaines vtter that, as out of their owne iudgement, which they thought most conformable to their Princes determination. So it was indeede that Xerxes had entertained a vaine perswasion of much good, that his owne presence vpon the shore to behold the conflict, would worke among the Souldiers. Therefore he incamped vpon the Sea-side, pitching his owne Tent on the mount Ægaleus, which is opposite vnto the Ile of Salamis, whence at ease hee might safely view all which might happen in that action, hauing Scribes about him to write downe the acts and behauiour of euery Captaine. The neere approch of the Barbarians, together with the newes of that timorous diligence, which their Countrimen shewed in fortifying the Isthmus, and of a Persian Armie, marching a-pace thither, did now againe so terrifie and amaze the Peloponnesians, that no intreatie, nor contestation would suffice to hold them together. For they thought it meere madnesse to fight for a Countrey alreadie lost, when they rather should endeuour to saue that which remained vnconquered; propounding chiefly to themselues what miserie would befall them, if losing the victorie, they should be driuen into Salamis, there to be shut vp, and besieged round in a poore desolate Iland.

Hereupon they resolued forth-with to set saile for Isthmus: which had presently beene done, if the wisedome of Themistocles had not preuented it. For he perceiuing what a violent feare had stopt vp their eares against all good counsaile, did practise another course, & forth-with labour to preuent the execution of this vnwholsome decree; not suffering the very houre of performance to find him busie in wrangling altercation. As soone as the Councell brake vp, hee dispatched secretly a trustie Gentleman to the Persian Captaines, informing them truely of the intended flight, and exhorting them to send part of their Nauie about the Iland, which incompassing the Greekes, might preuent their escape; giuing them withall a false hope of his assistance. The Persians no sooner heard than beleeued these good newes, well knowing that the victorie was their owne assured, if the Athenian fleet ioyned with them; which they might easily hope, considering what abilitie their Master had to recompence for so doing, both the Captaines with rich rewards, and the People with restitution of their Citie, and Territories. By these meanes it fell out, that when the Greekes very early in the morning were about to waigh Anchor, they found themselues incloſed round with Persians, who had laboured hard all night, sending many of their ships about the Ile of Salamis, to charge the enemie in reare, and landing many of their men in the Isle of Psyttalea, which lyeth ouer-against Salamis, to saue such of their owne, and kill such of the Grecian partie, as by any misfortune should be cast vpon the shore. Thus did meere necessitie enforce the Grecians to vndertake the battaile in the Straights of Salamis, where they obtained a memorable victorie, stemming the formost of their enemies, and chasing the rest, who falling foule one vpon another, could neither conueniently fight nor flie. I do not finde any particular occurrances in this great battaile to be much remarkable. Sure it is that the Scribes of Xerxes had a wearisome taske of writing downe many diſasters that befell the Persian fleet, which ill acquited it selfe that day, doing no one peece of seruice worthie the presence of their King, or the registring of his Notaries. As for the Greekes, they might wel seeme to haue wrought out that victorie with equall courage, were it not that the principall honour of that day was ascribed to those of Ægina, and to the Athenians, of whom it is recorded, That when the Barbarians did flie towards Phalerus, where the Land-armie of Xerxes lay, the ships of Ægina hauing possessed the Straights, did sinke or take them, whilest the Athenians did valiantly giue charge vpon those that kept the Sea, and made any countenance of resisting.

Of things following after the battaile of Salamis: and of the flight of XERXES.

AFter this victorie, the Greekes intending, by way of ſcrutinie, to determine which of the Captaines had beſt merited of them, in all this great ſeruice; euery Captaine, being ambitious of that honour, did in the firſt place write downe his owne name, but in the ſecond place as beſt deſeruing next vnto himſelfe, almoſt euery Suffrage did concur vpon Themiſtocles. Thus priuate affection yeelded vnto vertue, as ſoon as her own turne was ſerued. The Perſian King, as not amazed with this calamitie, began to make new preparation for continuance of warre; but in ſuch faſhion, that they which were beſt acquainted with his temper, might eaſily diſcerne his faint heart, through his painted lookes. Eſpecially Mardonius, Author of the warre, began to caſt a warie eye vpon his Maſter, fearing leſt his counſell ſhould be rewarded according to the euent. Wherefore purpoſing rather to aduenture his life in purſuite of the victorie, than to caſt it away by vnder-going his Princes indignation; he aduiſed the King to leaue vnto him three hundred thouſand men, with which forces he promiſed to reduce all Greece vnder the ſubiection of the Perſian Scepter. Herewithall he forgot not to ſooth Xerxes with many faire words; telling him, that the cowardiſe of thoſe Ægyptians, Phœnicians, and Cilitians, with others of the like mettall, nothing better than ſlaues, who had ſo ill behaued themſelues in the late Sea-ſeruice, did not concerne his honour, who had alwaies been victorious, and had alreadie ſubdued the better part of Greece, yea taken Athens it ſelfe, againſt which the Warre was principally intended. Theſe words found very good acceptance in the Kings eare, who preſently betooke himſelfe to his iourney homewards, making the more haſte, for that he vnderſtood, how the Greekes had a purpoſe to ſaile to Helleſpont, and there to breake downe his bridge, and intercept his paſſage. True it was that the Greekes had no ſuch intent, but rather wiſhed his haſtie departure, knowing that hee would leaue his Armie not ſo ſtrong, as it ſhould haue beene, had he in perſon remained with it. And for this cauſe did Eurybiades giue counſel, that by no meanes they ſhould attempt the breaking of that bridge, leſt neceſſitie ſhould inforce the Perſians to take courage, and rather to fight like men, than die like beaſts. Wherefore Themiſtocles did, vnder pretence of friendſhip, ſend a falſe aduertiſement to this timorous Prince, aduiſing him to conuay himſelfe into Aſia with all ſpeed, before his bridge were diſſolued: which counſell Xerxes tooke verie kindly, and haſtily followed, as before is ſhewed. Whether it were ſo that hee found the bridge whole, and thereby repaſſed into Aſia; or whether it were torne in ſunder by tempeſts, and he thereby driuen to imbarke himſelfe in ſome obſcure veſſel, it is not greatly materiall; though the Greekes did moſt willingly imbrace the later of theſe reports. How ſoeuer it were, this flight of his did well eaſe the Countrie; that was therby disburdened of that huge throng of people, which, as Locuſts, had before ouerwhelmed it.

§. VIII.

The negotiations betweene MARDONIVS and the Athenians, as alſo betweene the Athenians and Lacedæmonians; after the flight of XERXES.

MArdonivs with his three hundred thouſand had withdrawn himſelfe into Theſſalie, whence he ſent Alexander, the ſonne of Amyntas King of Macedon, as Embaſſadour to the Athenians, with promiſe of large amends for all their loſſes receiued; and of extending their Territories as farre as their owne deſires; allowing them to retaine their

their libertie and lawes, if they would make peace with Xerxes, and assist him in that Warre.

The Athenians had now reentred their Citie, but not as yet brought backe their wiues and children; for as much as they well perceiued that the place could not be secure, till the Armie of Mardonius were broken and defeated. Wherefore the Lacedemonians, vnderstanding what faire conditions this Embassadour would propound, were perplexed with very great feare, lest hee should finde good and ready acceptance. Hereupon, they likewise very speedily dispatched their Embassadours for Athens, who arriuing, before the Macedonian had audience, vsed the best of their perswasion to retaine the Athenians firme. They alleadged, that neither Xerxes nor Darius had any pretence of Warre against the rest of Greece, but had onely threatned the subuersion of Athens, till they and all their Confederates arming themselues in defence of that Citie, were drawne into the quarrell, wherein the Athenians without much crueltie of injustice could not leaue them. Wee know, said they, that yee haue indured great calamities, losing the fruit of the grounds, and being driuen to forsake the Towne, the houses whereof bee ruined, and vnfit for your habitation; in regard whereof, we vndertake to maintaine as our owne, your wiues and children amongst vs, as long as the war shall continue, hoping that yee, who haue alwaies procured libertie to others, will not now goe about to bring all Greece into slauerie and bondage. As for the Barbarians, their promises are large, but their words and oathes are of no assurance. It was needlesse to vse many arguments to the Athenians, who gaue answere to Alexander in presence of the Spartan Embassadours; That whilest the Sunne continued his course, they would be enemies to Xerxes, regarding neither gold nor any riches, with which he might seek to make purchase of their libertie. Concerning the maintenance of their wiues and children, it was a burden which they promised to sustaine themselues, only desiring the Lacedemonians, that with all speede they would cause their Armie to march, for as much as it was not likely, that Mardonius would long sit still in Thessalie, hauing once receiued such a peremptorie answere. In this their opinion of Mardonius his readinesse to inuade Attica, they found themselues nothing deceiued. For hee, as soone as Alexander had returned their obstinate purpose of resistance, did foorthwith leade his Armie towards them, and their Citie: they hauing now the second time quitted it, and conueyed themselues into places of more securitie abroad in the Countrie, where they expected the arriuall of their Confederates.

From Athens he sent his Agent vnto them with instructions, not only to perswade them to acceptance of the conditions before to them propounded, but with great promises to allure the principall of them to his partie. His hope was that either the people, wearied with forsaking their houses so often, would be desirous to preserue them from fire, and to haue those which were alreadie laid waste, reedified at the Kings charges: Or if this affection took no place with them, but that needes they would relie vpon their old Confederates, whose succours did very slowly aduance forwards, yet perhaps the Leaders might bee wonne with great rewards, to draw them to this purpose; all which projects if they should faile, the destruction of Athens would be a good meane to please his Master, King Xerxes, who must thereby needes vnderstand, that Mardonius kept his ground, and feared not to confront the whole power of Greece, in the strongest part of their owne Countrie. But his expectation was beguiled in all these. For the Athenians so little regarded his offers, that when one Lycidas, or (as Demosthenes calls him) Cyrcilus, aduised the Senate to accept the conditions, and propound them to the people; all the Senators, and as many as abiding without the Counsaile-house heard what he had said, immediately set vpon him, and stoned him to death; not examining whether it were feare or money, that had mooued him to vtter such a vile sentence. Yea, the women of Athens, in the Ile of Salamis, hearing of his bad counsaile, and bad end, assembling together, did enter his house there, & put his wife and children to the like execution.

All

All this brauerie notwithſtanding, when they perceyued the ſlackneſſe of the Peloponneſians in giuing them aide, they were faine to betake themſelues to Salamis againe, the old place of their ſecuritie. Remaining there, and ſeeing little forwardneſſe in thoſe whom it moſt concerned to aſſiſt them, they ſent verie ſeuere meſſages to Sparta, complaining of their ſlacknes, & threatning withal, to take ſuch courſe as might ſtand beſt with their owne good, ſeeing that the common eſtate of all was ſo little regarded. Theſe meſſengers were at the firſt entertained with dilatorie anſweres, which euery day grew colder, when as the Peloponneſian Wall, builded athwart the Iſthmus, was almoſt finiſhed. But as the Lacedæmonians waxed careleſſe and dull, ſo the Athenians hotely preſſed them to a quicke reſolution, giuing them plainely to vnderſtand, that if they ſhould hold on in thoſe dilatorie courſes, it would not be long ere the Citie of Athens tooke a new courſe, that ſhould little pleaſe them. All this while the Perſian fleet lay vpon the coaſt of Aſia, not daring to draw neerer vnto Greece, as being now too weake at Sea. Likewiſe the Greekiſh Nauie contained it ſelfe within the Harbours vpon Europe ſide; both to doe ſeruice where neede ſhould require at home; and withall to ſhunne the danger which might haue befallen any part of it, that being diſtracted from the reſt, had aduentured ouer far. So mutuall feare preſerued in quiet the Ilands lying in the middeſt of the Ægæan Seas. But it was well and ſeaſonably obſerued by a Counſellour of Sparta, that the wall vpon Iſthmus would ſerue to little purpoſe for the defence of Peloponneſus, if once the Athenians gaue eare to Mardonius: conſidering that many dores would be opened into that Demie-Iland, as ſoone as the Enemie ſhould by winning the friend ſhip of Athens, become the Maſter of the Seas about it. The Lacedæmonians vpon this admonition, making better perʋſall of their own dangers, were very careful to giue ſatisfaction to the Athenian Embaſſadors, who not brooking their delaies, were vpon point of taking leaue, yea as it ſeemed, of renouncing their alliance. Wherefore diſpatching away fiue thouſand Spartans in the euening, vnder conduct of Pauſanias; they gaue audience the next day to the Embaſſadours, whoſe complaints they anſwered with vehement proteſtations of their readineſſe; deeply ſwearing that the Armie of Sparta was already farre vpon the iourney; and giuing them leaue to take vp other fiue thouſand Lacedæmonians, out of the Region adioyning, to follow after them.

The Athenians, though diſtaſting ſuch want of grauitie, in a matter ſo important, were neuertheleſſe contented with the finall concluſion; and leuying the number appointed of Lacedæmonian Souldiers, made what haſte they could to incampe in Attica. The other Gracians were nothing ſlacke in ſending forth Companies, whoſe neere approch cauſed Mardonius to forſake Attica as a rough Country, and therefore of much diſaduantage to Horſe, wherein conſiſted the beſt of his power. Before his departure he burnt the Citie of Athens, beating downe the wals of it, and ruining all that had formerly eſcaped the fury of Warre.

The great battaile of Plataa.

IT were too long a rehearſall to ſhew all that hapned in many skirmiſhes betweene the Greekes and him, in the Countrie of Bœotia, which Mardonius had choſen to bee the ſeate of that Warre. Much time was ſpent before the quarrell was decided by trial of one maine battaile: for both parties did ſtand vpon their guard, each expecting when the other ſhould aſſaile them.

The Armie of Mardonius contained about three hundred thouſand, which were by him choſen out of Xerxes his Armie; to whom were adioyned the forces of Thebes, Macedonie, Theſſalie, and other parts of Greece, that now ſiding with the Perſian, furniſhed furnished his Campe with fiftie thousand men. Against these the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, and their Confederates, had leauied an Armie of one hundred and ten thousand, of which fortie thousand were waightily armed, the rest were only assistants to these fortie thousand, being armed more slightly, as rather to make excursions and giue chase, than to sustaine any strong charges.

These two Armies hauing eleuen daies confronted one the other, without performing any memorable piece of seruice; Mardonius, whose victualls beganne to faile, resolued to begin the fray. The Greekes were promised victorie by an Oracle, if they fought in the Land of the Athenians, and in the plaine of Ceres & Proserpina, making prayers vnto certaine gods, Demi-gods, and Nymphs. But it was hard to finde the certaine place which the Oracle designed. For the plaine of Ceres was indeede in the Territorie of Athens; but there was also an old Temple of Ceres and Proserpina, neere vnto the place where they lay at that time encamped, as likewise the memorialls of those Nymphs, and Demi-gods, were in the same place, vpon Mount Citharon, and the ground serued well for foot-men against horse; onely the Land belonged vnto the Plataans, and not vnto the Athenians.

Whilest the Greekes were perplexed about the interpretation of this doubtfull Oracle; the Plataans, to make all cleere, did freely bestow their land on that side the Towne vpon the Athenians.

This magnificence of the Plataans caused Alexander the Great, many ages after, to reedifie their Citie, which was ruined in the Peloponnesian warres.

All things being readie for battaile; the Lacedæmonian Generall thought it most meete, that the Athenians should stand opposite that day to the Medes and Persians, whom they had formerly vanquished at Marathon; and that he, with his Spartans, should entertaine the Thebans and other Greekes which followed Mardonius, as better acquainted with their fight, and hauing beaten them often-times before. This being agreed vpon, the Athenians changed place with the Lacedæmonians; which Mardonius vnderstanding (whether fearing the Athenians, of whose valour the Medes and Persians had felt heauie proofe, or desiring to encounter the Spartans, as thinking them the braueſt Souldiers of Greece) hee did also change the order of his battaile, and oppose himselfe to Pausanias. All the Greekes might well perceiue how the Enemie did shift his wings, and Pausanias thereupon returned to his former Station; which Mardonius noting, did also the like. So one whole day was spent in changing to and fro. Some attempt the Persians made that day with their Archers on horse-back, who did so molest the Greekes at their watering place, that they were faine to enter into consultation of retiring; because they could not without much losse to themselues, and none to the enemie, lie neere to that Fountaine which did serue all the Camp. Hauing therefore concluded among themselues to dislodge; and part of the Armie being sent away before day-light; Mardonius perceiued their departure in the morning, and thereupon being encouraged by their flight, (which to him seemed to proceede out of meere cowardise) he charged them in reare with great violence. It may well be recorded as a notable example of patient valor, That the Lacedæmonians being ouer-taken by the Enemies horse, and ouer-whelmed with great flights of Arrowes, did quietly sit stil, not making any resistance or defence, til the Sacrifices for victory were happily ended, though many of them were hurt and slaine, and some of especiall marke lost, before any signe of good successe appeared in the entrailes.

But as soone as Pausanias had found in the Sacrifice those tokens, which the superstition of that Age and Countrie accounted fortunate; hee gaue the Signall of battaile: and thereupon the Souldiers, who till then did sit vpon the ground, as was their manner, arose altogether, and with excellent courage receiued the charge of the Barbarians, that came thronging vpon them without any feare of such notable resistance. The rest of the Greeke Armie that was in march, being reuoked by Pausanias, came in a-pace to succour the Lacedæmonians: onely that part of the Armie which which was led by the Athenians, could not arriue vnto the place of the great battaile, becauſe the Thebans, and other Greeks confederated with the Perſians, gaue them checke by the way. Neuertheleſſe, the Spartans with other their Aſſiſtants, did ſo well acquite themſelues, that the Perſians were vanquiſhed, and Mardonius with many thouſands more ſlaine in the field; the reſt fledde into the Campe, which they had fortified with woodden walls, and there defended themſelues with ſuch courage as deſperate neceſſitie inforced them vnto, holding out the longer, becauſe the Lacedæmonians were not acquainted with the manner of aſſaulting Fortreſſes, and Walls. In the meane ſeaſon, the Athenians hauing found ſtrong oppoſition of the Thebans and Theſſalians, did with much labour and courage obtaine victorie, which hauing not long purſued, they came to helpe the Lacedæmonians, whom they found wearily buſied in aſſaulting the Campe, with more valour than skill. Wherefore they themſelues vnder-tooke it, and in ſhort ſpace forced a paſſage through the Wall, at which breach firſt, and then on all ſides, the Greekes entred with ſuch furie, and iuſt deſire of vengeance, that of three hundred thouſand they are ſaid not to haue left three thouſand aliue, excepting thoſe who fled away with Artabazus, when the Perſian Armie firſt fell to rout.

If the execution were ſo great, as is reported, an eſpeciall cauſe of it was the fooliſh retrait, or rather flight into the Campe. For though it were ſo, that the place was well fortified, and the number of thoſe who caſt themſelues into it, greater than of the Aſſailants; yet they being of ſeuerall Nations and Languages, and hauing loſt their Generall with other principall Commanders, it was vnpoſſible that they in ſuch a terrour and aſtoniſhment ſhould make good that piece of ground, lying in the heart of an Enemie Countrie, againſt an Armie of men, farre more valiant then themſelues, and enflamed with preſent victorie. Therefore the ſame wall which for a few houres had preſerued their liues, by holding out the Enemie, did now impale them, and leaue them to the ſlaughtering furie of vnpittifull Victors. Artabazus fled into Thrace, telling the people of Theſſalie, and other Countries in his way, that hee was ſent by Mardonius vpon ſome piece of ſeruice: For hee well knew, that had they vnderſtood any thing of that great diſcomfiture, all places would haue been hoſtile vnto him, and ſought with his ruine to purchaſe fauour of the vanquiſhers. Therefore making ſo large marches, that many of his Souldiers being feeble were left behinde and loſt, hee came to Byzantium, whence hee ſhipped his men ouer into Aſia. Such was the end of the vaine-glorious expedition, vnder-taken by Xerxes againſt the Greekes, vpon hope of honour, and great Conqueſt, though ſorting otherwiſe, accordingly as Artabazus had fore-ſeene, and rather worſe, for as much as it began the quarrell, which neuer ended, before the ruine of the Perſian Empire was effected by that Nation of the Greekes, deſpiſed and ſought to haue beene brought into ſlauerie. Hereby it may ſeeme, that the viſion appearing to Xerxes, was from God himſelfe, who had formerly diſpoſed of thoſe things, ordaining the ſubuerſion of the Perſian Monarchie by the Greekes, who, thus prouoked, entred into greater conſideration of their owne ſtrength, and the weakeneſſe of their Enemies.

The battaile of Mycale, with a strange accident that fell out in the beginning of it: and examples of the like.

THe same day on which the battaile was fought at Plataæ, there was another battaile fought at Mycale, a Promontorie, or Head-land in Asia, where the Persian fleet rode.

Leutychides the Spartan, with Xantippus the Athenian, Admiralls of the Greeke Nauie, at the request of some Ilanders and Ionians, did saile into those parts, to deliuer the Samians, and procure the Ionians to reuolt from the Persian. Xerxes himselfe at this time lay at Sardis, a Citie in Lydia, not farre from the Sea-side, hauing left threescore thousand vnder the command of Tigranes for defence of Ionia and the Sea-coast. Therefore when Artayntes and Ithramitres, Admiralls of the Persian fleet, vnderstood that the Greekes bent their course towards them; they did forth-with draw their ships a-ground, fortifying with Palissadoes and otherwise, as much ground as did seem needfull for the encamping of al their Land and Sea-forces. Leutychides at his arriuall, perceiuing that they meant to keepe within their strength, and resoluing to force them out of it, rowed with his Gallie close aboord the shore, and called vpon the Ionians (who more for feare then good wil were encamped among the Persians) exhorting them in the Greeke tongue to remember libertie, and vse the faire occasion which they now had to recouer it. Herein he did imitate Themistocles, who had done the like at Eubœa; trusting that either these perswasions would preuaile; or if the Persians did happen to vnderstand them, that it would breed some ielousie in them, causing them to fight in feare of their owne Companions. It neede not seeme strange, that this very same stratageme, which little or nothing auailed Themistocles, did now very happily succeede. For Xerxes being in his full strength, it was a matter of much difficultie, to perswade those Inhabitants of Asia to reuolt; who now, in his declining estate, gaue a willing eare to the sweet sound of libertie. The Persians likewise, who in their former brauerie, little regarded and lesse feared any treason, to be contriued by their Subiects, were now so warie, that from the Samians which were amongst them, they tooke away their armes; the Milesians, whom they did suspect, but would not seeme to mistrust, they placed farre from them, as it were for defence of the straight passages of Mycale; pretending that these Milesians did best of all others know those places. But these deuices little auailed them. For the Samians perceiuing that they were held as Traitors, tooke courage in the heate of the fight, and laying hold vpon such weapons as came to hand, assailed the Persians manfully within the Campe; which example the Ionians presently followed, being very glad to haue found some that durst beginne. It is said that while the Greeks were yet in a march towards the Enemies campe, a rumour suddenly ranne in the Armie, that Mardonius was ouerthrowne in Greece, which (though perhaps it was giuen out by the Captaines to encourage the Souldiers) was very true. For the battaile of Plataa was fought in the morning, and this of Mycale in the euening of the same day.

The like report of that great battaile, wherein Paulus Æmylius ouerthrew Perseus the last king of Macedon, was brought to Rome in foure daies, as Liuie with others doe record. And Plutarch hath many other examples of this kinde. As that of the battaile by the Riuer Sagra in Italie, which was heard of the same day in Peloponnesus: That of the battaile against the Tarquinians and the Latines, presently noised at Rome: And (which is most remarkable) the victorie obtained against Lucius Antonius, who was Rebell to Domitian the Emperour. This Lucius Antonius being Lieutenant of the higher Germanie, had corrupted his Armie with gifts and promises, promiſes, drawing the barbarous people to follow him, with great hope to make himſelfe Emperour; which newes much troubling the Citie of Rome, with feare of a dangerous Warre; it was ſuddainely reported that Antonius was ſlaine, and his Armie defeated.

Hereupon many did offer ſacrifice to the gods, and ſhew all manner of publique ioy, as in ſuch caſes was accuſtomed. But when better inquirie was made, and the Author of theſe tidings could not be found; the Emperour Domitian betooke himſelfe to his iourney againſt the Rebell; and being with his Armie in march, hee receiued aduertiſement by Poſte, of the Victorie obtained, and the death of Antonius: whereupon remembring the rumour noiſed before in Rome, of the ſelfeſame victorie, hee found that the report and victorie were borne vpon one day, though twentie thouſand furlongs (which make about fiue and twenty hundred miles) a-ſunder. It is truely ſaid of Plutarch, that this laſt example giues credit vnto many the like. And indeede it were very ſtrange, if among ſo many rumours, begotten by forgerie or miſtakings, and foſtered by credulous imagination, there ſhould not be found (as happens in dreames among many thouſand vaine and friuolous) a fewe preciſely true. Howbeit wee may finde, that God himſelfe doth ſometimes vſe to terrifie thoſe who preſume vpon their owne ſtrength, by theſe light meanes of tumultuous noiſes; as hee raiſed the ſiege of Samaria, by cauſing a ſound of Horſes and Chariots to affright the Aramites; and as he threatned Senacherib, ſaying: Behold, I will ſend a blaſt vpon him, and hee ſhall heare a noiſe, and returne to his owne Land. Wherefore it may well haue beene true, that God was pleaſed by ſuch a meane as this, to animate the Greekes; who (as Herodotus notes) went towards the Enemies with heauie hearts, being in great feare, leſt their owne aduenture ſhould by no meanes fall out well; conſidering in what danger they had left their Countrie of Greece, which was readie to be ſubdued by Mardonius, whileſt they went wandring to ſeeke out enemies a-far-off, vpon the coaſt of Aſia. But the fame of the battaile fought at Platæa being noiſed among them; euery man deſired that his owne valour in the preſent fight, might be ſome helpe to worke out the full deliuerance of Greece. In this alacritie of ſpirit, they diuided themſelues into two Battalions, whereof the Athenians led the one, by the way of the plaine, directly towards the enemies campe; the Lacedæmonians conducted the other, by the Mountaines and ſtraight paſſages, to winne the higher ground. The Athenians did firſt ſet vpon the Campe (ere the Lacedæmonians could arriue on the other part) and being deſirous to get all the honour of the day to themſelues, did ſo forcibly aſſault it, that they brake way through the Paliſſadoes and Gabions, and made themſelues Maſters of the place, ſlaying all that could not ſaue themſelues by flight. In this fight the Samians did good ſeruice, as is formerly mentioned.

Eſai. c. 37. v. 7.

But the Miletians, who vpon the like iealouſie, were placed by the Perſians on the tops of Mycale, to defend the paſſages; did now (as if they had beene ſet of purpoſe to keepe them from running away) put as many to the ſword as fell into their hands, letting none eſcape, except a very few, that fled through by-pathes. The Lacedæmonians that day did little ſeruice, for the buſineſſe was diſpatched ere they came in: Only they broke ſuch companies as retyred in whole troups; making them flie diſperſed in very much diſorder, whereby the Mileſians were enabled to doe the greater execution vpon them. This was the laſt fight of that huge Armie leauied againſt Greece, which was now vtterly broken, and had no meanes left to make offenſiue Warre.

§. XI.

Of the barbarous qualitie of XERXES: with a transition from the Persian affaires to matters of Greece, which from this time grew more worthie of regard.

XERXES lay at Sardis, not farre from the place of this battaile; but little minde had hee to reuenge either this or other his great losses, being wholly giuen ouer to the loue of his Brothers Wife: with whom when he could not preuaile by intreatie, nor would obtaine his desire by force, because he respected much his Brother her husband, hee thought it best to make a match betweene his owne Sonne Darius, and the Daughter of this Woman; hoping by that meanes to finde occasion of such familiaritie as might worke out his desire. But whether it were so, that the chastitie of the Mother did still reiect him, or the beauty of her Daughter allure him; he soone after fell in loue with his owne Sonnes wife, being a vicious Prince, and as ill able to gouerne himselfe in peace, as to guide his Armie in Warre. This yong Ladie hauing once desired the King to giue her the Garment which hee then wore, being wrought by his owne Wife; caused the Queene thereby to perceiue her husbands conuersation with her, which shee imputed not so much to the beautie of her Daughter-in-law, as to the cunning of the Mother, against whom thereupon shee conceiued extreme hatred. Therefore at a Royall feast, wherein the custome was that the King should grant their request, shee craued that the Wife of Masistes, her husbands Brother, the yong Ladies Mother, might bee giuen into her disposition. The barbarous King, who might either haue reformed the abuse of such a custome, or haue deluded the importunate crueltie of his Wife, by threatning her selfe with the like, to whatsoeuer shee should inflict vpon the innocent Ladie, granted the request; and sending for his brother, perswaded him to put away the Wife which he had, and take one of his Daughters in her stead. Hereby it seemes, that hee vnderstood how villainously that poore Ladie should be intreated, whom hee knew to bee vertuous, and whom himselfe had loued. Masistes refused to put her away; alleaging his owne loue, her deseruing, and their common Children, one of which was married to the Kings Sonne, as reasons important to moue him to keepe her. But in most wicked manner Xerxes reuiled him; saying, That hee now should neither keepe the Wife which hee had, nor haue his Daughter whom hee had promised vnto him. Masistes was much grieued with these wordes, but much more, when returning home, hee found his Wife most butcherly mangled by the Queene Amestris, who had caused her Nose, Lippes, Eares, and Tongue to be cut off, and her Brests in like manner, which were cast vnto Dogges. Masistes enraged with this vilanie, tooke his way with his children, and some Friends, towards Bactria, of which Prouince hee was Gouernour, intending to rebell and auenge himselfe. But Xerxes vnderstanding his purpose, caused an Armie to bee leauied, which cut him off by the way, putting him and all his Company to the sword. Such was the Tyrannicall condition of the Persian Gouernement; and such are generally the effects of Luxurie, when it is ioyned with absolute power.

Yet of Xerxes it is noted, that he was a Prince of much vertue. And therefore Alexander the Great, finding an Image of his ouer-throwne, and lying vpon the ground, said, That hee doubted, whether in regard of his vertue, hee should againe erect it, or, for the mischiefe done by him to Greece, should let it lie.

But

But ſurely whatſoeuer his other good qualities were, he was fooliſh, and was a coward, and conſequently mercileſſe.

Therefore wee may firmely beleeue, that the vertue of Cyrus was very great, vpon which the foundation of the Perſian Empire was ſo ſurely laid, that all the wickednesſe and vanities of Xerxes, and other worſe Princes, could not ouerthrow it, vntill it was broken by a vertue almoſt equall to that which did eſtabliſh it. In warres againſt the Ægyptians, the fortune of Xerxes did continue, as at the firſt it had beene very good; but againſt the generall eſtate of Greece, neither hee, nor any of his poſteritie, did euer make offenſiue warre, but receiued many loſſes in Aſia, to which the laſt at Mycale ſerued but as an introduction; teaching the Greekes, and eſpecially the Athenians, that the Perſian was no better Souldier at his owne dores, than in a forraine Countrie: whereof good triall was made forth-with, and much better proofe as ſoone as the affaires of Athens were quietly ſettled and aſſured.

From this time forward I will therefore purſue the Hiſtorie of Greece, taking in the matters of Perſia, as alſo the eſtate of other Countries, collaterally, when the order of time ſhall preſent them. True it is, that the Perſian eſtate continued in her greatneſſe, many Ages following, in ſuch wiſe that the knowne parts of the World had no other Kingdome, repreſenting the Maieſtie of a great Empire.

But this greatneſſe depended only vpon the riches and power that had formerly beene acquired, yeelding few actions or none that were worthy of remembrance, excepting ſome Tragedies of the Court, and examples of that exceſſiue Luxurie, where-with both it, and all, or the moſt of Empires that euer were, haue beene eneruated, made vnweldie, and (as it were) fattened for the hungrie ſwords of poore and hardie Enemies. Hereby it came to paſſe, that Xerxes and his ſucceſſours were faine to defend their Crownes with money and baſe policies; very ſeldome or neuer (vnleſſe it were with great aduantage) daring to aduenture the triall of plaine battaile with that little Nation of Greece, which would ſoone haue ruined the foundations laid by Cyrus, had not priuate malice and ielouſie vrged euery Citie to enuie the height of her Neighbours walls, and thereby diuerted the ſwords of the Greekes into their owne bowels, which after the departure of Xerxes beganne very well, and might better haue continued, to hew out the way of conqueſt, on the ſide of Aſia.

CHAP. VII.

Of things that passed in Greece from the end of the Persian Warre, to the beginning of the Peloponnesian.

§. I.

How Athens was rebuilt and fortified.

AFTER that the Medes and Persians had receiued their last blow, and were vtterly beaten at Mycale: Leotychides, who then commanded the Grecian Armie, leauing the pursuit of the warre to the Athenians, assisted by the reuolted Iones, returned with the Lacedæmonians and other Peloponnesians to Sparta and other places, out of which they had been leauied. The Athenians in the meane while besieged Sestos, a Citie on the strait of the Hellespont, betweene which and Abydus, Xerxes had lately fastned his Bridge of Boats: where the inhabitants, desperate of succour, did not long dispute the defence thereof, but quitted it to the Greekes, who entertained themselues the Winter following on that side the Hellespont. In the Spring they drew homeward, and hauing left their wiues and children, since the inuasion of Attica, and the abandoning of Athens, in diuers Islands, and at Troezen, they now found them out, and returned with them to their owne places.

And though the most part of all their houses in Athens were burnt and broken downe, and the walls of the Citie ouer-turned, yet they resolued first on their common defence, and to fortifie their City, before they cared to couer themselues, their wiues and children, with any priuate buildings: Whereof the Lacedæmonians being aduertised, and misliking the fortifying of Athens, both in respect that their owne Citie of Sparta was vnwalled, as also because the Athenians were growne more powerfull by Sea, than either themselues, or any other State of Greece, they dispatched messengers to the Athenians to disswade them; not acknowledging any priuat mislike or ielousie, but pretending, that if the Persians should returne to inuade Greece a third time, the Athenians being in no better state to defend themselues than heretofore, the same would serue to receiue their enemies, and to bee made a Seate for the Warre, as Thebes had lately beene. To this the Athenians promised to giue them satisfaction by their owne Embassadors very speedily. But being resolued to goe on with their workes by the aduice of Themistocles, they held the Lacedæmonians in hope of the contrarie, till they had raysed their wals to that height, as they cared not for their mislikes, nor doubted their disturbance; and therefore (to gaine time) they dispatched Themistocles towards Lacedæmon, giuing him for excuse, that he could not deliuer the Athenians resolutions, till the arriuall of his fellow-Commissioners, who were of purpose retarded. But after a while, the Lacedæmonians expectation being conuerted into ielousie (for by the arriuall of diuers persons out of Attica, they were told for certaine, That the walls of Athens were speedily growne vp beyond expectation) Themistocles prayed them not to beleeue reports and vaine rumors, but that they would be pleased to send some of their own trustie Citizens to Athens, from whose relation they might resolue themselues, and determine mine accordingly. Which requeſt being graunted, and Commiſſioners ſent, Themiſtocles diſpatched one of his owne, by whome hee aduiſed the Athenians, firſt to entertaine the Lacedæmonians with ſome ſuch diſcourſe as might retaine them a few dayes, and in concluſion to hold them among them, till himſelfe and the other Athenian Embaſſadors, then at Sparta, had their libertie alſo to returne. Which done, and being alſo aſſured by his aſſociates and Ariſtides, that Athens was already defenſible on all parts, Themiſtocles demaunding audience, made the Lacedæmonians know, That it was true that the wals of Athens were now rayſed to that height, as the Athenians doubted not the defence of their Citie; praying the Lacedæmonians to beleeue, That whenſoeuer it pleaſed them to treat with the Athenians, they would know them for ſuch, as right well vnderſtood what appertained to a Commonweale and their owne ſafetie, without direction and aduice from any other: That they had in the warre of Xerxes abandoned their Citie, and committed themſelues to the woodden wals of their ſhippes, from the reſolution of their owne counſels and courage, and not thereto taught or perſwaded by others: and finally, in all that perillous warre againſt the Perſians they found their owne judgements and the execution thereof in nothing inferior, or leſſe fortunate, than that of any other Nation, State, or Commonweale among the Greekes; And therefore concluded, that they determined to be Maſters and Iudges of their owne affaires, and thought it good reaſon, that either all the Cities confedered within Greece ſhould be left open, or elſe that the wals of Athens ſhould be finiſhed and maintained.

The Lacedæmonians finding the time vnfit for quarrell, diſſembled their miſlike, both of the fortifying of Athens, and of the diuiſion, and ſo ſuffered the Athenians to depart, and receiued backe from them their owne Embaſſadors.

The wals of Athens finiſhed, they alſo fortified the Port Pyreus, by which they might vnder couert imbarke themſelues vpon all occaſions.

§. II.

The beginning of the Athenian greatneſſe, and proſperous warres made by that State vpon the Perſian.

THe Athenians hauing ſettled things in good order at home, prepared thirtie Gallies for the purſuit of the warre againſt the Perſians, to which the Lacedæmonians added other twentie; and with this Fleet, ſtrengthened by the reſt of the Cities of Greece confederated, they ſet ſayle for Cypres, vnder the conduct of Pauſanias the Lacedæmonian; where after their landing hauing poſſeſt themſelues of many principall places, they imbarked the Armie againe, and tooke land in Thrace, recouering from the Perſians by force the Citie Bizantium, now Conſtantinople: from whence Pauſanias, behauing himſelfe more like a Tyrant than a Captaine, eſpecially towards the Ionians lately reuolted from Xerxes, was called backe by the counſell of Lacedæmon, and not onely accuſed of many inſolent behauiors, but of intelligence with the Medes, and Treaſon againſt his Countrey. In his ſtead they imployed Docres, who either gaue the ſame cauſe of offence; or elſe the Athenians, who affected the firſt commaundement in that warre, practiſed the ſouldiors to complaine, though indeed the wiſe and vertuous behauior of Ariſtides, Generall of the Athenian forces, a man of rare and incomparable ſinceritie, had beene able to make a good Commaunder ſeeme ill in compariſon of himſelfe; and therfore was much more auaileable, in rendring thoſe deteſted, whoſe vices affoorded little matter of excuſe. Howſoeuer it were, the Lacedæmonians being no leſſe wearie of the warre, than the Athenians were eagre to purſue it, the one obtained their eaſe, and the other the execution and honor which they deſired: for all the Greekes (thoſe of Peloponneſus excepted) willingly ſubjected themſelues to the commandement of the Athenians, which was both the beginning of

of their greatnesse in that present age, and of their ruine in the next succeeding. For the charge of the warre being now committed vnto them, they began to rate the confederated Cities, they appointed Receiuers and Treasurers, and beganne to leuie money, according to their discretion, for the maintenance of the generall defence of Greece, and for the recouering of those places on Europe side, in Asia the lesse, and the Islands, from the Persians. This tribute (the first that was euer payed by the Greekes) amounted to foure hundred and threescore Talents; which was raysed easily by the honest care of that just man Aristides, to whose discretion all the confederates referred themselues, and no one man found occasion to complaine of him. But as the vertue of Aristides, and other worthy Citizens, brought vnto the Athenians great commoditie; so the desire which they conceiued of encreasing their commoditie, corrupted their vertue, and robbing them of the generall loue, which had made them powerfull, abandoned their Citie to the defence of her treasure, which with her in the next age perished. For it was not long ere these foure hundred & threescore Talents were raysed to sixe hundred, nor long, after that, ere their couetous Tyrannie had conuerted their followers into slaues, and extorted from them yeerely thirteene hundred Talents. The Isle of Delos was at the first appointed for the Treasure-house wherein these summes were layd vp; and where, at the generall assemblie, the Captaines of those forces, sent by the confederates, were for forme sake called to consultation. But the Athenians, who were stronger by sea than all Greece besides, had lockt vp the common treasure in an Island, vnder their owne protection, from whence they might transport it at their pleasure, as afterward they did.

The generall Commaunder in this Warre was Cimon, the sonne of Miltiades, who first tooke Eiona, vpon the Riuer Strimon; then the Isle of Sciros, inhabited by the Dolopes: they mastered the Carystij, and brought into seruitude the Naxij, contrarie to the forme of the confederacie: So did they other the inhabitants of Greece, if at any time they fayled of their contribution, or disobeyed their commaundements; taking vpon them and vsurping a kind of soueraigne authority ouer the rest: which they exercised the more assuredly, because they were now become Lords of the Sea, and could not be resisted. For many of the confederated Cities and Nations, wearie of the warre in their owne persons, and giuen vp altogether to their ease, made choise rather to pay their parts in money, than either in men of warre, or in shippes; leauing the prouision of both to the Athenians. Heereby the one grew weake in all their Sea-defences, and in the exercise of the Warres; the other greatly strengthened their Nauie and their experiences, being alwayes armed and imployed in honourable Seruices, at the cost of those, who hauing lifted them into their Saddles, were now enforced to become their footmen. Yet was the Tribute-money, leuied vpon these their confederates, employed so well by the Athenians at the first (as ill proceedings are often founded vpon good beginnings) that no great cause of repining was giuen. For they rigged out a great Fleet of Gallies, very well manned, wherewith Cimon the Admirall scouring the Asiaticke Seas, tooke in the Citie of Phaselis; which hauing formerly pretended neutralitie, and refused to relieue, or any way assist the Greekes, were enforced to pay tenne Talents for a fine, and so to become followers of the Athenians, paying yeerely contribution.

From thence hee set sayle for the Riuer Eurymedon in Pamphylia, where the Persian Fleet rode, being of sixe hundred sayle, or (according to the most sparing report) three hundred and fiftie, and hauing a great Land-Armie, encamped vpon the shoare; all which forces hauing beene prouided for aduauncing the Kings affaires in Greece, were vtterly defeated in one day, and two hundred shippes taken by the Athenians, the rest being broken to pieces, or sunke, ere euer they had swomme in the Greekish Seas. Cimon hauing in one day obtained two great victories, the one by the Sea, and the other by Land, was very soone presented with a third.

third. For foureſcore ſayle of Phœnicians (who were the beſt of all Sea men, vnder the Perſian commaund) thinking to haue joyned themſelues with the Fleet before deſtroyed, arriued vpon the ſame Coaſt, ignorant of what had paſſed, and fearing nothing leſſe than what enſued. Vpon the firſt notice of their approach, Cimon weighed anchor, & meeting them at an head-Land, called Hydra, did ſo amaze them, that they only ſought to runne themſelues on ground; by which meane preſeruing few of their men, they loſt all their ſhippes. Theſe loſſes did ſo breake the courage of the Perſian, that, omitting all hope of preuailing vpon Greece, he condiſcended to whatſoeuer Articles it pleaſed the Athenians to propound, graunting liberty vnto all the Greekes inhabiting Aſia; and further couenanting, That none of his ſhippes of Warre ſhould ſayle to the Weſtward of the Iſles, called Cyanea and Chelidoniæ.

This was the moſt honourable peace that euer the Greekes made; neither did they in effect, after this time, make any warre that redounded to the profit or glory of the whole Nation, till ſuch time as, vnder Alexander, they ouerthrew the Empire of Perſia; in which Warre few, or perhaps none of them, had any place of great commaund, but ſerued altogether vnder the Macedonians.

§. III.

The death of XERXES by the treaſon of ARTABANVS.

BEſides theſe loſſes, which could not eaſily haue beene repaired, the troubles of the Empire were at this time ſuch, as gaue juſt cauſe to the Perſian of ſeeking peace vpon any tearmes not altogether intolerable. For Artabanus, the vncle of Xerxes, perceiuing, that the King his maſter did eaſily take ſmall occaſions to ſhead the bloud of ſuch, as in kindred or place were neere vnto him, beganne to repoſe leſſe hope of ſafetie in remaining faithfull, than of obtaining the Soueraignetie, by deſtroying a Prince that was ſo hated for his crueltie, and deſpiſed for his cowardiſe and misfortunes. Hauing conceiued this Treaſon, he found meanes to execute it by Mithridates an Eunuch, in ſuch cloſe manner, that (as if he himſelfe had beene innocent) he accuſed Darius the ſonne of Xerxes, and cauſed him to ſuffer death as a Parricide. Whether it be true, that by this great wickednesſe he got the Kingdome, and held it ſeuen moneths; or whether intending the like euill to Artaxerxes the ſonne of Xerxes, he was by him preuented and ſurpriſed, it were hard to affirme any certainetie. But all Writers agree vpon this, That taken he was, and with his whole familie put to death by extreme torments, according to the ſentence, whereof the truth is more auncient than the Verſe.

§. IIII.

The baniſhment of THEMISTOCLES: His flight to ARTAXERXES newly raigning in Perſia; and his death.

ARTAXERXES being eſtabliſhed in his Kingdome, and hauing ſo compounded with the Athenians, as the preſent neceſſitie of his affaires required, began to conceiue new hopes of better fortune againſt the Greekes, than he or his predeceſſors had euer hitherto found. For the people of Athens, when the Perſians were chaſed out of Greece, did ſo highly value their owne merites in that ſeruice, that they not onely thought it fit for themſelues to become the Commanders ouer many Townes and Iſlands of the Greekes, but, euen within their owne wals, they would admit none other forme of Gouernment than meerely Democraticall. Herein they were ſo inſolent, that no integritie nor good deſert was able to preſerue the eſtate of any ſuch as had borne great office, longer than, by flattering the raſcall multitude, he was contented to frame all his words and deedes to their good liking.

This their intolerable demeanour much offended Themiſtocles; who, though in former times he had layed the foundations of his greatneſſe vpon popularitie, yet now preſuming vpon his good ſeruices done to the State, hee thought that with great reaſon they might graunt him the libertie to checke their inordinate proceedings. But contrariwiſe, they were ſo highly offended with his often rehearſing the benefits which they had receiued from him, that they layed vpon him the puniſhment of Oſtraciſme, whereby he was baniſhed for tenne yeeres, as a man ouer-burthenſome to the Commonwealth.

Before the time of his returne was halfe expired, a new accuſation was brought againſt him by the Lacedæmonians, who charged him of conſulting with Pauſanias, about betraying the whole Countrey of Greece vnto Xerxes. Hereupon Themiſtocles finding no place of ſecuritie againſt the malice of two ſuch mightie Cities, was driuen, after many troubleſome flights, and dangerous remouings, to aduenture himſelfe into Perſia; where he found Artaxerxes newly ſettled, and was by him very honourably entertained. But the great hope which Artaxerxes had conceiued of aduauncing his affaires by the counſell and aſſiſtance of Themiſtocles, proued altogether fruitleſſe. For when the Athenians, in fauour of Inarus the Lybian, (who infeſted Ægypt, cauſing it to rebell againſt the Perſian) had ſent a Fleet to Sea, landing an Armie in Ægypt, and ſcowring thoſe Eaſterne Seas, to the great hinderance of Artaxerxes, and (for ought that I can vnderſtand) to the manifeſt breach of that peace, which to their great honour they had concluded with Xerxes; then did the King ſend his Letters to Themiſtocles, requiring him to make good the hopes which he had giuen, of aſſuring the Perſian eſtate againſt the Greekes.

But whether Themiſtocles perceiued much vnlikelineſſe of good ſucceſſe, in leading a great Armie of daſtardly Perſians againſt the warlike people of Greece; or elſe (as in fauour of his vertue it is more commonly reported) the loue of his Countrey would not permit him to ſeeke honour by the ruine of it: ſure it is, that being appointed by Artaxerxes to vndertake the conduct of great forces againſt the Athenians, hee decided the great conflict betweene thankfulneſſe to his well-deſeruing Prince, and naturall affection to his owne ill-deſeruing people, by finiſhing his life with a cup of poyſon.

§. V.

§. V.

How the Athenians, breaking the peace, which to their great honour they had made with the Perſian, were ſhamefully beaten in Ægypt.

WHich was Artaxerxes driuen to vſe the ſeruice of his owne Captaines in the Ægyptian warre, wherein it appeared well, That a juſt cauſe is a good defence againſt a ſtrong enemie. An Athenian Fleet of two hundred ſaile ſtrong was ſent forth vnder Cimon, to take in the Iſle of Cyprus: which conqueſt ſeemed eaſie both to make and to maintaine, the Perſian being vtterly broken at Sea, and thereby vnable to relieue the Iſland. Now although it were ſo, that a peace had beene concluded, which was likely to haue beene kept ſincerely by the Perſian, who had made ſo good proofe of the Grecian valour, that he was nothing deſirous to build any ſhippes of Warre (without which the Greekes could receiue no harme from him) whereof if any one ſhould be found ſayling towards Greece, the peace was immediately broken, and if not, his whole eſtate; yet all the Sea-coaſt (no ſmall part of his Dominions) expoſed to the waſte of an enemie too farre ouer-matching him. Yet whether the Athenians were in doubt, leſt the league which in his owne worſer fortunes hee had made with them, he would breake in theirs; and therefore ſought to get ſuch aſſurance into their hands, as might vtterly diſable him from attempting ought againſt them; or whether the increaſe of their reuenues and power, by adding that rich and great Iland to their Empire, cauſed them to meaſure honour by profit; they thought it the wiſeſt way, to take whileſt they might, whatſoeuer they were able to get and hold, and he vnable to defend.

The Ile of Cypres lying in the bottome of the ſtraights betweene Cilicia, Syria and Ægypt, is very fitly ſeated for any Prince of State, that being mighty at Sea, doth either ſeeke to enrich himſelfe by trade with thoſe Countries, or to infeſt one or more of them when they are his enemies. And this being the purpoſe of the Athenians, their Ambition which had already deuoured, in conceit, this Iland, was on the ſodaine well-nigh choaked with a greater morſell, to ſmatch at which, they let Cyprus alone, which they might eaſily haue ſwallowed and digeſted. For Inarus King of the Lybians confining Ægypt, hauing found how greatly the Country was exhauſted by the late warres, and how weakely defended by very ſlender Perſian garriſons, conceiued rightly, that if ſuch ſmall forces as the Satrapa or Viceroy could make on the ſodaine of his owne Gardes, or leuie out of the ordinarie Garriſons, were by him defeated; the naturalls of the Countrey, not long ſince oppreſſed by Cambyſes, and after a reuolt very lately ſubdued by Xerxes, would ſoone breake faith with him who had no other title to that kingdome than a good ſword. Further, he perſwaded himſelfe that the people, vnable to defend themſelues againſt the Perſian without his aſſiſtance; would eaſily be drawne to accept him, the author of their deliuerance for king. Neither did this hope deceiue him. For hauing taken and cruelly ſlaine Achæmenes the Viceroy; diuers Cities forthwith declared themſelues for him, and proclayming him king, ſhewed the moſt of their endeuour for proſecution of the warre. But hee conſidering his owne weakeneſſe, and that the meanes of the Ægyptians his adherents were not anſwerable to their deſires, perceiued wel, that to reſiſt the power of Artaxerxes, farre greater forces than his and theirs were to be procured, at what price ſoeuer he obtained them. Therefore hearing of the great Athenian fleete, and knowing well the vertue of the ſouldiers therein embarqued; he inuited the Commaunders to ſhare with him the kingdome of Ægypt, as a farre greater reward of their aduenture, than ſuch an addition as that of Cyprus could be to their eſtate. Whether hee orthey (if things had wholy ſorted according to their expectation) would haue beene contented with an equall ſhare, and not haue fallen out in the partition, were perhaps a diuination vnneceſſarie. Hee was poſſeſſed of the peoples loue, they were of moſt power. But the iſſue of thoſe affaires was ſuch as left them nothing to cõmunicate but misfortunes, which they ſhared ſomewhat equally. Yet had the beginnings of their enterpriſe very good and hopefull ſucceſſe: For they entred the Land as farre as to Memphis, the principall Citie; and of the Citie it ſelfe they tooke two parts: to the third part, which was called the White wall, they layd ſuch hard ſiege, that neither thoſe forces of the Perſians, which then were in Ægypt, were ſtrong enough to remoue them; neither could Artaxerxes wel deuiſe what meanes to vſe for the recouery of that which was loſt, or for the preſeruation of the remainder. The beſt of his hope was by ſetting the Lacedæmonians vpon Athens, to enforce the Athenians to looke homewards to their owne defence. This was the firſt time that the Perſian ſought to procure aſſiſtance of the Greekes one againſt the other, by ſtirring them vp with gold to the entertainement of priuate quarrels, for the good of their common enemie. To this purpoſe he ſent Megabazus to Sparta with much Treaſure; who, after great expence, finding that the Lacedæmonians were nothing forward in imploying their whole force againſt the Athenians, whome in many conflicts of great importance they had found to be their matches, notwithſtanding the abſence of their Armie in Ægypt; he thought it his wiſeſt way to imploy the reſt of his money & meanes to their reliefe, who had now the ſpace of ſixe yeeres defended his maſters right in Ægypt. Therefore he haſtily diſpatched another of his name, the ſonne of Zopyrus, who arriuing in Ægypt, was firſt encountred by the reuolted people; ouer whome he obtained a victorie, which made him maſter of the Countrey, whileſt the Athenians lay buſied about Memphis the great Citie. It cannot be doubted, that long abode in a ſtrange ayre, and want of ſupply, had much enfeebled the Athenians: ſure it is, that when Megabazus, hauing reduced the Countrey to obedience, attempted the Citie it ſelfe, whether his former ſucceſſe had amended the courage of the Perſians, or want of neceſſaries made the Athenians inferior to themſelues, he chaſed them out of Memphis, and purſued them ſo neere, as they were forſt to fortifie themſelues in the Iſle of Proſopites, where Megabazus, after eighteene moneths ſiege, turning away one part of the Riuer by diuers Trenches, aſſaulted the Athenian without impediment of waters, tooke their Gallies, and put all to the ſword, ſaue a few that ſaued themſelues by flight into Lybia; the ſame entertainement had fiftie other Gallies which they ſent to the ſuccour of the firſt two hundred. For thoſe Athenians hauing heard nothing that their Fleet and Armie was conſumed, entred by the branch of Nilus, called Mendeſium, and fell vnawares among the Phœnician Gallies and the Perſian Armie; ſo as the Perſians recouered all Ægypt, but that part held by Amyrteus, and Inarus the King of Lybia, being by them taken and hanged. This was the end of the Athenians ſixe yeeres warre in Ægypt, and the reward of their vanitie and indiſcretion to vndertake many enterpriſes at once.

§. VI.

Of other Warres made by the Athenians for the moſt part with good ſucceſſe, about the ſame time.

NOtwithſtanding theſe ouerthrowes in Ægypt, yet the Athenians in their home-warres waded through many difficulties, and held the reputation of their forces againſt the Lacedæmonians, Corinthians, and others, rather to their aduantage than otherwiſe. For as they were beaten neere vnto Halia by the Corinthians & Epidaurians, ſo they obtained two great victories ſoone after; the one ouer the Peloponneſians, neere vnto Cecryphalia; the other ouer the Æginets, neere vnto Ægina; where they ſunke and carried carried away threeſcore and ten Gallies of their Enemies. Furthermore, they landed their forces on the ſuddaine, and beſieged Ægina, from whence they could not be moued, notwithſtanding that the Corinthians, to diuert them, inuaded Megara; where, after a great fight, with equall loſſe, the Corinthians, when they returned againe to ſet vp their Trophie, as Victors in the former battaile, were vtterly broken and ſlaughtered by the Athenian Garriſons, and Megarians, to their great loſſe and diſhonour.

Againe, as the Athenians were diſcomfited neere to Tanagra, by the Lacedæmonians, who returned from the ſuccour of the Dorians againſt the Phocians, (at which time the Theſſalian horſe-men turned from their Allies the Athenians, and fought againſt them) ſo about threeſcore daies after, the Athenians entred Bœotia vnder the conduct of Myronides, where beating that Nation, they wanne Phocis on the gulfe Oeteus, and euened the walls of Tanagra to the ground. Finally, they enforced Ægina to render vpon moſt baſe conditions; as to beat downe the walls of their Citie, and to giue them hoſtages for Tribute; the ſiege whereof they had continued, notwithſtanding all their other brabbles and attempts elſewhere. Beſides theſe victories they ſackt and ſpoiled many places vpon the Sea-coaſt of Peloponneſus, belonging to the Lacedæmonians; wan vpon the Corinthians, and ouerthrew the Sicyonians that came to their ſuccour. Theſe were the vndertakings of the Athenians, and their Allies, during the time of thoſe ſixe yeeres that a part of their forces made warre in Ægypt. In the end whereof they attempted Theſſalie, perſwaded thereunto by Oreſtes, but were reſiſted by the King Pharſalus, who had chaſed Oreſtes out of his Dominions. They alſo landed in Sicyonia, and had victorie ouer thoſe that reſiſted, after which they made truce with the Peloponneſians for fiue yeeres, and ſent Cimon into Cyprus with two hundred ſhips, but they were againe allured by Amyrtæus one of the race of their former Kings, who held the Mariſh & Wooddie parts of Ægypt from the Perſians, to whom they ſent ſixtie of their ſhips. The reſt of their Armie failing in their enterpriſe of Cyprus, and their fortunate and victorious Leader Cymon dying there, as they coaſted the Iland, incountred a fleet of the Phœnicians and Cilicians, ouer both which Nations they returned victorious into Greece: as alſo thoſe returned ſafe which were ſent into Ægypt.

Of ARTAXERXES LONGIMANVS, that he was AHASHVEROSH the husband of Queene HESTER.

THeſe Ægyptian troubles being ended, the raigne of Artaxerxes continued peaceable, wherof the length is by ſome reſtrained into twentie yeeres, but the more and better Authors giue him fortie, ſome allow vnto him foure and fortie. He was a Prince of much humanitie, and noted for many examples of gentleneſſe. His fauour was exceeding great to the Iewes, as appeareth by the Hiſtories of Eſdras and Nehemias, which fell in his time.

To proue that this was the King who gaue countenance and aide to that great worke of building the Temple, it were a needeleſſe trauaile; conſidering that all the late Diuines haue taken very much paine, to ſhew that thoſe two Prophets were licenſed by him, and ſuccoured in that building, in ſuch ſort as appeares in their writings.

This was likewiſe that King Ahaſhueroſh who married Heſter. Wherof if it be needfull to giue proofe, it may ſuffice; That Ahaſhueroſh liued in Suſa, raigning from India to Æthiopia, and therefore muſt haue beene a Perſian; That he liued in peace, as appeares by the circumſtances of the Hiſtorie, and vſed the counſaile of the ſeuen Princes, the authoritie of which Princes beganne vnder Darius, the sonne of Hystaspes, wherefore he could be neither Cyrus nor Cambyses.

The continuall Warres which exercised King Darius the sonne of Hystaspes, together with the certainety of his marriages with sundry wiues, from none of whom he was diuorced, but left his first wife Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, aliue in great honour, shee being mother to Xerxes the succeeding King; doe manifestly prooue that Hester was not his. Whereunto is added by Philo the Iew, That at the perswasion of Mardochæus, Ioiachim the high Priest the sonne of Iesua, caused the feast of Purim to be instituted in memorie of that deliuerance. Now the time of Ioiachim was in the raigne of Artaxerxes, at the comming of Esdras, and Nehemias: Iesua his father dying about the end of Darius.

The same continuance of warres, with other his furious and tragicall loues, wherewith Xerxes did consume such little time, as hee had free from warre, are enough to proue, that the storie of Hester pertained not vnto the time of Xerxes, who liued but one and twentie yeeres, whereas the two & thirtieth of Ahasuerus or Artasastha is expressed by Nehemias. Againe, it is well knowne, that Xerxes in the seuenth yeere of his raigne (wherein this marriage must haue been celebrated) came not neere to Susa. Of the Princes that succeeded Artaxerxes Longimanus, to prooue that none of them could be Ahashueroth, it is enough to say, that Mardochæus hauing beene carried from Hierusalem captiue, with Iechonia, by Nebuchadnezzar, was vnlikely to haue liued vnto their times.

But of this Artaxerxes it is true, that he liued in Susa, raigned from India to Æthiopia, liued in peace, was contemporarie with Ioiakim the high Priest: and further he had happily by his Lieutenants reclaimed the rebellious Ægyptians in that seuenth yeere of his raigne; which good fortune might well giue occasion to such a Royall feast, as is described in the beginning of the booke of Hester. This is the summe of the arguments, brought to proue the age of Hesters storie by the learned and diligent Krentzhemius, who addes the authorities of Iosephus, affirming the same, and of Philo, giuing to Mardochæus eighteene yeeres more than Isaac the Patriarch liued, namely, one hundred foure score and eighteene yeers in all, which expire in the fiue and thirtieth of yeere of this Artaxerxes, if we suppose him to haue beene carried away captiue, being a Boy of ten yeeres old.

§. VIII.

Of the troubles in Greece, foregoing the Peloponnesian Warre.

BVt it is fit that we now returne to the affaires of the Greekes, who from this time forward, more vehemently prosecuting their ciuill warres, suffered the Persians for many ages to rest in peace: this Ægyptian expedition being come to nought. Soone after this, the Lacedæmonians vndertooke the warre called, Sacred, recouered the Temple and Ile of Delphos, and deliuered both to the inhabitants; but the Athenians regained the same, and gaue it in charge to the Phocians. In the meane while the banished Bœotians reentred their owne Land, and mastred two of their owne Townes possest by the Athenians, which they soone recouered againe from them; but in their returne towards Athens, the Bœotians, Eubœans, and Locreans, (Nations oppresst by the Athenians) set vpon them with such resolution, as the Athenians were in that fight all slaine or taken, whereby the Bœotians recouered their former libertie, restoring to the Athenians their prisoners. The Ilanders of Eubœa tooke such courage vpon this, that they reuolted wholly from the Athenians, whom when Pericles intended to reconquer, he was aduertised that the Megarians, (who first left the Lacedæmonians, and submitted themselues to Athens) being now wearie of their yoke, had slaine the Athenian Garrisons, and ioyned themselues with the Corinthians, Sicyonians, and Epidaurians. Theſe newes haſtened Pericles homeward with all poſſible ſpeede; but ere he could recouer Attica, the Peloponneſians, led by Pliſtoanax, the ſonne of Pauſanias, had inuaded it, pillaged, and burnt many parts thereof; after whoſe returne Pericles went on with his firſt intent and recouered Eubœa. Finally, the Athenians beganne to treat of peace with the Peloponneſians, and yeelded to deliuer vp all the places which they held in the Country of Peloponneſus: and this truce was made for thirtie yeeres. After ſixe of theſe yeeres were expired, the Athenians (fauouring the Myleſians againſt the Samians) inuaded Samos by Pericles, and after many repulſes, and ſome great loſſes, both by Sea and Land, the citizens were forc't to yeeld themſelues vpon moſt lamentable conditions; Namely, to deliuer vp all their ſhips, to breake downe their own walls, to pay the charge of the warre, and to reſtore whatſoeuer had beene taken by themſelues, or by their practice, from the Athenians. In the necke of which followed that long and cruell Peloponneſian Warre, whereof I haue gathered this briefe following: the ſame contention taking beginning fiftie yeeres after the flight of Xerxes out of Greece. But becauſe there was no Citie thereof, which either in the beginning of this warre, or in the continuance of it, was not drawne into the quarrell: I hold it conuenient now at the firſt to ſhew briefly the eſtate of the Countrie at that time, and eſpecially the condition of thoſe two great Cities, Athens, and Sparta, vpon which all the reſt had moſt dependance.

Epi-

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Peloponneſian Warre.

Vpon what termes the two principall Cities of Greece, Athens and Sparta, ſtood, at the beginning of the Peloponneſian Warre.

GREECE was neuer vnited vnder the gouernement of any one Prince or Eſtate; vntill Philip of Macedon, and after him Alexander, brought them rather to a Vnion and League againſt the Perſian, whereof they were Captaines, than into any abſolute ſubiection. For euery Eſtate held their owne, and were gouerned by Lawes farre different, and by their owne Magiſtrates, notwithſtanding the power of the Macedonians, to whom they did yeld obedience no otherwiſe than as to ſuch, who were (perforce) their leaders in the Perſian warre (deemed the General quarrell of Greece) and tooke the profit and honor of the victorie, to their owne vſe and increaſe of greatneſſe. But the Kings which afterwards raigned in Macedonia, did ſo farre enlarge their authoritie, that all Greece was by them brought vnder ſuch obedience, as differed little from ſeruitude; very few excepted, who could hardly, ſometimes with armes, and ſometimes with gifts, preſerue their liberty; of whom the Lacedæmonians and Athenians were chiefe: which two people deſerued beſt the plague of tyrannie, hauing firſt giuen occaſion thereunto, by their great ambition, which wearied and weakened all the Countrie by perpetuall Warre. For vntill theſe two Cities of Athens and Sparta diſtracted all Greece, drawing euery State into the quarrell, on the one or other side, and so gaue beginning to the Peloponnesian warre (the effects whereof in true estimation ceased not, before the time that Philip had ouer-mastred all, forasmuch as euery conclusion of one warre afforded hencefoorth matter to some new distraction of the whole Countrie) the warres, commenced betweene one Citie of Greece and an other, were neither great, nor of long continuance. All controuersies were soone decided, either by the authoritie of the Amphictiones, who were the generall Councel of Greece; or by the power of the Lacedæmonians, whose aide was commonly held as good as the assurance of victorie.

These Lacædemonians had liued about foure hundred yeeres vnder one forme of Gouernment, when the Peloponnesian warre beganne. Their education was onely to practise feates of Armes; wherein they so excelled, that a very few of them were thought equall to very great numbers of any other people. They were poore, and cared not much for wealth; euery one had an equall portion of the common field, which sufficed to maintaine him in such manner of life as they vsed. For brauery they had none, and curious building or apparell they regarded not. Their diet was simple, their feasts and ordinarie meales being in common Halls, where all fared alike. They vsed money of yron, whereof they could not be couetous nor great hoarders. Briefly, they liued Vtopian-like, saue that they vsed no other occupation than Warre, placing all their felicitie in the glory of their valour. Heereby it came to passe that in all enterprises, whereof they were partakers, the leading and high command was granted to them, and all Greece followed their conduct. But the Athenians were in all points contrarie to this. For they sought wealth, and measured the honors of their victories by the profit; they vsed mercenarie Souldiers in their warres, and exacted great tribute of their Subiects, which were for the most part Ilanders, compelled to obey them, because the Athenian fleet was great.

As in forme of policy, and in course of life, so in conditions naturall, the difference betweene these two people was very much. The Athenians were eager and violent, suddaine in their conclusions, and as hastie in the execution; The Lacedæmonians very slow in their deliberations, full of grauitie, but very resolute, and such as would in cold bloud performe what the Athenians did vsually in flagrant. Wherby it came to passe, that the Lacedæmonians had all the Estates of Greece depending vpon them, as on men firme and assured, that sought honour and not riches; whereas the Athenians were followed by such as obeyed them perforce, being held in straight subiection. But the Signorie of the Athenians was nothing large, vntill such time as the Persian Xerxes had inuaded Greece, pretending onely a quarrel to Athens: For then the Citizens perceiuing well, that the Towne of Athens could not be defended against his great Armie of seuenteene hundred thousand men, bestowed all their wealth vpon a Nauie, and (assisted by the other Grecians) ouerthrew the fleet of Xerxes, whose Land-forces were soone after discomfited by them, and the Greekes, who all serued vnder conduct of the Spartans. After these victories, the Athenians being now very mightie in fleet, reduced al the Ilands of the Greekish Seas vnder their obedience; imposing vpon them a hard tribute, for maintenance (as they pretended) of warre against the Persian; though indeede they imploied their forces chiefly, to the conquest of such Ilands, and hauen-Townes, of their owne Countrimen, as stood out against them. All which was easily suffered by the Lacedæmonians, who were In-landers, and men that delighted not in expeditions to be made farre from home. But afterwards perceiuing the power of the Athenians to grow great, they held them in much ielousie, and were very apt to quarrell with them; but much more willing to breed contention betweene them and other Estates. Wherefore at such time as the Thebans would haue oppressed the Plateans, when they of Platea repaired to Sparta for succour, they found there no other aide, than this aduice, That they should seeke helpe at Athens. Hereby it was thought, was thought, that the Athenians ſhould be intangled in a long and tedious Warre, with their neighbours of Thebes. But it prooued otherwiſe; for their force was now ſo great, that all ſuch occaſions did onely ſerue to increaſe their honour and puiſſance.

§. II.

How Sparta and Athens entred into Warre.

NEuertheleſſe many Eſtates of Greece were very ill affected to Athens, becauſe that Citie grew very inſolent vpon ſuddaine proſperitie, and maintaining the weaker Townes againſt the ſtronger, incroched apace vpon their Neighbours, taking their dependants from them. Eſpecially the Corinthians were much inraged, becauſe the people of the Iland Corcyra, their Colonie which had rebelled againſt them, and giuen them a great ouerthrow by Sea, was by the Athenians (who deſired to increaſe their fleet by adioyning that of Corcyra vnto it) taken into protection, and the Corinthians thereby impeached of that reuenge which elſe they would haue taken. Now howſoeuer it were ſo, that theſe dealings of the Athenians were not directly againſt the conditions of peace agreed vpon among the Greekes, yet were the complaints made at Sparta ſo vehement, that (though with much a-doe) they concluded to redreſſe by warre the iniuries done to their Allies.

Firſt therefore ſeeking religious pretences, they required the Athenians to expiate certaine offences committed againſt the gods; whereto hauing for anſwere, That they themſelues ſhould expiate other the like offences, committed in Sparta; they beganne to deale plainely, and required that the people of ſome Townes, oppreſſed by the Eſtate of Athens, ſhould be ſet at libertie; and that a decree made againſt thoſe of Megara, whereby they were forbidden to enter any Port of the Athenians, ſhould be reuerſed. This laſt point they ſo earneſtly preſſed, that if they might obtaine it, they promiſed to abſiſt from their purpoſe of making Warre.

This they deſired, not as a matter of any great importance (for it was a trifle) but only that by ſeeming to haue obtained ſomewhat, they might preſerue their reputation without entring into a warre, which threatned them with greater difficulties apparent, than they were very willing to vnder-goe.

But the Athenians would yeeld to nothing; for it was their whole deſire that all Greece ſhould take notice, how farre they were from feare of any other Citie. Hereupon they prepared on both ſides verie ſtrongly, all that was needfull to the Warre; wherein the Lacedamonians were Superiour, both in number and qualitie, being aſſiſted by moſt of the Cities in Greece; and hauing the generall fauour, as men that pretended to ſet at libertie ſuch as were oppreſſed: but the Athenians did as farre exceede them in all prouiſions of Money, Shipping, Engines, and abſolute power of command among their Subiects; which they held; and afterward found of greater vſe in ſuch neede, than the willing readineſſe of friends, who ſoone grow wearie, and are not eaſily aſſembled.

§. III.

The beginning of the Peloponnesian warre.

THe first and second yeeres expedition was very grieuous to the Citie of Athens. For the fields were wasted, the Trees cut downe; the Countrie people driuen to flie, with Wiues, Children, and Cattaile, into the Towne; whereby a most furious pestilence grew in the Citie, such as before they had neither felt, nor heard of. Hereunto was added the reuolt of the Mytilenians, in the Ile of Lesbos, and the siege of Platæa their confederated Citie, which they durst not aduenture to raise, besides some small ouerthrowes receiued. The Lacedæmonians assembling as great forces as they could raise out of Peloponnesus, did in the beginning of Summer enter the Countrie of Attica, and therein abide, vntill victuals beganne to faile, wasting and destroying all things round about: The Gouernours of the Athenians would not suffer the people to issue into the field against them; for they knew the valour of their Enemies; but vsed to send a fleet into Peloponnesus, which wasted as fast all the Sea-coast of their Enemies, whilest they were making warre in Attica. So the Peloponnesians being the stronger by Land, wanne the Towne of Platæa, which wanted rescue; the Athenians likewise being more mightie by Sea, did subdue Mytilene which had rebelled, but could not be succoured from Sparta. By these proceedings in that warre, the Lacedæmonians beganne to perceiue how vnfit they were to deale with such enemies. For after that Attica was throughly wasted, it lay not greatly in their power to doe any offence equall to such harme as they themselues might, and did receiue. Their Confederates beganne to set forward very slowly in their expeditions into Attica; perceiuing well that Athens was plentifully relieued with all necessaries, which came by the Sea from the Ilands that were subiect vnto that Estate; and therefore these inuaders tooke small pleasure in beholding the walls of that mightie Citie, or in wasting a forsaken field, which was to them a patterne of the calamities, with which their owne Territorie was the whilest afflicted. Wherefore they beganne to set their care to build a strong Nauie, wherein they had little good successe, being easily vanquished by the Athenians, who both had more and better ships, and were so skilfull in Sea-fights, that a few Vessels of theirs durst vndertake a great number of the Peloponnesians.

§. IIII.

Of the great losse which the Spartans receiued at Pylus.

AMong other losses which the Spartans had felt by Sea; they receiued at Pylus a verie sore blow, that compelled them to sue for peace. A fleet of Athenian ships bound for Corcyra, wasting in that passage, as their manner was, the coast of Laconia, and all the halfe Ile of Peloponnesus, was by contrarie windes detained at Pylus, which is a ragged Promontorie, ioyning to the maine, by a strange necke of Land. Before it there lies a small barren Iland of lesse than two miles compasse, and within that a creeke, which is a good harbour for ships, the force of weather being borne off by the head-Land and Isle. This Promontorie the Athenians fortified, as well as in haste they might; and what was wanting in their artificiall fortification, was supplied by the naturall strength and site of the place. By holding this piece of ground, and hauen, they in reason expected many aduantages against their enemies. For the Countrie adioyning was inhabited by the Messenians, who in ancient time had held very strong and cruell warre with Sparta; and (though quite subdued) they were held in straight subiection, yet was not the old hatred so extinguished, that by the neere neighbourhood and aſſiſtance of the Athenians, it might not bee reuiued. Furthermore it was thought, that many ill-willers to the Lacedæmonians, and as many of their bond-ſlaues as could eſcape from them, would repaire to Pylus, and from thence make daily excurſions into Laconia, which was not farre off: Or if other hopes failed, yet would the benefit of this hauen, lying almoſt in the midway betweene them and Coreyra, make them able to ſur-round all Peloponneſus, and waſte it at their pleaſure. The newes of theſe doings at Pylus, drew the Peloponneſians thither in all haſt out of Attica, which they had entred a few daies before with their whole Armie: but now they brought not only their Land-forces, but all their Nauie, to recouer this peece, which how bad a neighbour it might proue in time, they well foreſaw, little fearing the grieuous loſſe at hand, which they there in few daies receiued. For when they in vaine made a generall aſſault on all ſides, both by Sea and Land; finding that ſmall Garriſon which the Athenians had left, very reſolute in the defence: they occupied the hauen, placing foure hundred and twentie choice men all of them, Citizens of Sparta, in the Iland before mentioned, at each end whereof is a channell, that leades into the Port; but ſo narrow, that only two ſhips in front could enter betweene the Iſle and Pylus; likewiſe but ſeuen or eight ſhips could enter at once by the further channell, betweene the Iland and the Maine. Hauing thus taken order to ſhut vp this new Towne by Sea, they ſent part of their fleet to fetch wood, and other ſtuffe, wherewith to fortifie round about, and blocke vp the piece on all ſides. But in the meane ſeaſon, the Athenian fleet, hearing of their danger that were left at Pylus, returned thither, and with great courage entring the hauen, did breake and ſinke many of their Enemies veſſels; tooke fiue, and inforced the reſidue to runne themſelues a ground.

Now was the Towne ſecure, and the Spartans abiding in the Iland as good as loſt. Wherefore the Magiſtrates were ſent from Sparta to the camp (as was their cuſtome in great dangers) to aduiſe what where beſt for the publike ſafetie; who when they did perceiue that there was no other way to reſcue their Citizens out of the Ile, then by compoſition with their enemies, they agreed to entreat with the Athenians about peace, taking truce in the meane while with the Captaines at Pylus. The conditions of the truce were, That the Lacedæmonians ſhould deliuer vp all the ſhips which were in the coaſt, and that they ſhould attempt nothing againſt the Towne, nor the Athenians againſt the camp: That a certaine quantitie of Bread, Wine, and Fleſh, ſhould be daily carried into the Iſle, but that no ſhips ſhould paſſe into the Iland ſecretly: That the Athenians ſhould carrie the Lacedæmonian Embaſſadors to Athens, there to treat of peace, and ſhould bring them backe, at whoſe returne the truce ſhould end, which if in the meane time it were broken in any one point, ſhould be held vtterly void in all: That when the truce was expired, the Athenians ſhould reſtore the Peloponneſian ſhips, in as good caſe as they receiued them. The Embaſſadors comming to Athens, were of opinion, that as they themſelues had begunne the warre, ſo might they end it when they pleaſed. Wherefore they told the Athenians how great an honour it was that the Lacedæmonians did ſue to them for peace, aduiſing them to make an end of warre, whileſt with ſuch reputation they might. But they found all contrarie to their expectation: For in ſtead of concluding vpon euen termes, or deſiring of meete recompence for loſſe ſuſtained; the Athenians demanded certaine Cities to bee reſtored to them, which had beene taken from them by the Lacedæmonians long before this warre beganne, refuſing likewiſe to continue the treatie of peace, vnleſſe the Spartans which were in the Iſe, were firſt rendred vnto them as priſoners. Thus were the Embaſſadours returned without effect; at which time the truce being ended, it was deſired from the Athenian Captaines, that they ſhould, according to their couenant, reſtore the ſhips, which had beene put into their handes. Whereto anſwere was made, that the condition of the truce was, That if any one article were broken, all ſhould be held void; now (ſaid the Athenians) yee haue aſſaulted our Garriſons, and thereby are we acquited of our promise to restore the ships. This and the like friuolous allegations which they made, were but meere shifts; yet profit so farre ouer-weighed honour, that better answere none could be got. Then were the Lacedæmonians driuen to vse many hard meanes, for conueiance of victuals into the Isle; which finally was taken by force, and the men that were in it carried prisoners to Athens, where it was decreed, that when the Peloponnesians next inuaded Attica, these prisoners should all be slaine. Whether fearing the death of these men, or with-held by the troubles, which (according to the Athenians hope) fell vpon them; the Lacedæmonians were now so farre from wasting Attica, that they suffered their owne Countrie to be continually ouer-runne, both by the Athenians, who landed on all parts of their coast, and by those which issued out of Pylus; which became the Rendeuous of all that were ill-affected vnto them.

§. V.

How the Lacedæmonians hardly, and to their great disaduantage, obtained a peace, that was not well kept.

THerefore they indeuoured greatly to obtaine peace; which the Athenians would not harken vnto. For they were so puffed vp with the continuance of good successe, that hauing sent a few bands of men into Sicilie, to hold vp a faction there, and make what profit they might of the Sicilians quarrells; when afterward they heard that the differences in that Ile were taken away, and their bands returned without either gaine or losse, they banished the Captaines, as if it had beene meerely through their default, that the Ile of Sicilie was not conquered; which (besides the longer distance) was in power to offend others, or defend it selfe, no whit inferiour vnto Peloponnesus. Yet was this their ouer-weening much abated shortly after, by some disasters receiued, especially in Thrace, where in a battaile which they lost at Amphipolis, Cleon, and Brasidas, Generalls of the Athenian and Lacedæmonian forces, were both slaine; which two had most beene aduersaries to the peace. As the Athenians by their losses were taught moderation; so the Lacedæmonians, who not only felt the like wounds, but through the great Nauie which they had receiued at Pylus, were faine to proceede lamely in the warre, against such as, through commoditie of their good fleet, had all aduantage that could be found in expedition, were feruently desirous to conclude the businesse, ere Fortune by any new fauour should reuiue the insolence, which was at this time well mortified in their Enemies. Neither was it only a consideration of their present estate, that vrged them to bring the treatie of peace to good and speedy effect; but other dangers hanging ouer their heads, and ready to fall on them, which vnlesse they compounded with the Athenians, they knew not how to auoide. The estate of Argos, which had ancient enmitie with them, was now, after a truce of thirtie yeeres well-nigh expired, ready to take the benefit of their present troubles, by ioyning with those who alone found them worke enough. Argos was a rich and strong Citie, which though inferiour to Sparta in valour, yet was not so vnwarlike, nor held such ill correspondence with the neighbouring Estates, that the Lacedæmonians could euer farre preuaile vpon it, when they had little else to doe. This was a thing that in the beginning of this Warre had not beene regarded. For it was then thought, that by wasting the Territorie of Athens with sword and fire, the quarrell should easily and in short time haue beene ended, whereby not only the Athenians should haue beene brought to good order, but the Corinthians and others, for whose sake the warre was vnder-taken, haue beene so firmely knit to the Lacedæmonians, that they should for loue of them haue abandoned the Argiues, to their owne fortunes. But now the vanitie of those hopes appeared, in that the Athenians abounding in ready money, and meanes

to raiſe more, were able to ſecure themſelues by a ſtrong fleet, from any great harme, that the Peloponneſians wanting wherewith to maintaine a Nauie, could doe vnto them, yea as Maſters of the Sea, to wearie them out, as in effect alreadie they had done. As for the Confederates of Sparta, they could now endure neither warre nor peace; their daily trauailes, and many loſſes had ſo wearied and incenſed them. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians were glad to vſe the occaſion, which the inclination of their enemies did then afford, of making a ſmall peace, which with much a-doe they procured, as ſeemed equall and eaſie; but were indeede impoſſible to be performed, and therefore all their trauaile was little effectuall.

The reſtitution of priſoners and places taken being agreed vpon; it fell out by lot, that the Lacedæmonians ſhould reſtore firſt. Theſe had won more townes vpon the continent from the Athenians, than the Athenians had from them; but what they had wonne, they had not won abſolutely. For they had reſtored ſome Towns to ſuch of their Allies, from whom the State of Athens had taken them; ſome, and thoſe the moſt, they had ſet at libertie (as reaſon required) which had opened their gates vnto them, as to their friends and deliuerers, & not compelled them to breake in as Enemies. Now concerning the Townes which were not in their owne hands, but had beene rendred vnto their Confederates, the Spartans found meanes to giue ſome ſatisfaction, by permitting the Athenians to retain others, which they had gotten in the warre; as for the reſt, they promiſed more than afterwards they could performe. The Cities which they had taken into protection, could not endure to heare of being abandoned, neither would they by any meanes yeeld themſelues into the hands of their old Lords the Athenians, whom they had offended by reuolting, notwithſtanding whatſoeuer articles were drawne, and concluded, for their ſecuritie, and betterance in time to come. This dull performance of conditions on the ſide of the Spartans, made the Athenians become as backward in doing thoſe things which on their part were required; ſo that reſtoring only the priſoners which they had, they deferred the reſt, vntill ſuch time as they might receiue the full ſatisfaction, according to the agreement. But before ſuch time as theſe difficulties brake out into matter of open quarrell, the Lacedæmonians entred into a more ſtraight alliance with the Athenians; making a league offenſiue and defenſiue with them. Hereunto they were moued by the backwardneſſe of the Argiues, who being (as they thought) likely to haue ſued for peace at their hands, as ſoone as things were once compounded betweene Athens and Sparta; did ſhew themſelues plainly vnwilling to giue eare to any ſuch motion. Thinking therefore, that by cutting from Argos all hope of Athenian ſuccour, they ſhould make ſure worke, the Spartans regarded not the affections of other States, whom they had either bound vnto them by well-deſeruing in the late warre, or found ſo troubleſome, that their enmitie (if perhaps they durſt let it appeare) were little worſe than friendſhip. It bred great jelouſie in all the Cities of Greece, to perceiue ſuch a conjunction betweene two ſo powerfull Signories: eſpecially one clauſe threatning euery one, that was any thing apt to feare, with a ſecret intent that might be harboured in their proud conceipts, of ſubduing the whole Countrie, and taking each what they could lay hold on. For beſides the other articles, it was agreed, That they might by mutuall conſent adde new conditions, or alter the old at their owne pleaſures. This impreſſion wrought ſo ſtrongly in the Corinthians, Thebans, & other ancient Confederates of Sparta, that the hate which they had borne to the Athenians their profeſſed Enemies, was violently throwne vpon the Lacedæmonians their vnjuſt friends: whereby it came to paſſe, that they who had lately borne chiefe ſway in Greece, might haue beene abandoned to the diſcretion of their Enemies, as alreadie in effect they were, had the Enemies wiſely vſed the aduantage.

§. VI.

Of the negotiations, and practices, held betweene many States of Greece, by occasion of the peace that was concluded.

THE admiration wherein all Greece held the valour of Sparta as vnresistable, and able to make way through all impediments, had beene so excessiue, that when by some sinister accidents, that Citie was compelled to take and seeke peace, vpon termes not sounding very honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as happens vsually in things extreme) was changed into much contempt. For it was neuer thought that any Lacedæmonian would haue endured to lay downe his weapons and yeeld himselfe prisoner, nor that any misfortune could haue beene so great, as should haue drawne that Citie to relieue it selfe otherwise than by force of Armes. But when once it had appeared that many of their Citizens, among whom were some of especiall marke, being ouer-laied by enemies, in the Iland before Pylus, had rather chosen to liue in captiuitie, than to die in fight; and that Pylus it selfe, sticking as a thorne in the foot of Laconia, had bred such anguish in that Estate, as vtterly wearying the accustomed Spartan resolution, had made it sit downe, and seeke to refresh it selfe by dishonourable ease: then did not only the Corinthians and Thebans beginne to conceiue basely of those men which were vertuous, though vnfortunate; but other lesser Cities joyning with these in the same opinion, did cast their eies vpon the rich and great Citie of Argos, of whose abilitie, to doe much, they conceiued a strong beliefe, because of long time it had done nothing. Such is the base condition, which through foolish enuie is become almost naturall in the greater part of mankinde. We curiously search into their vices, in whom, had they kept some distance, we should haue discerned only the vertues; and comparing injuriously our best parts with their worst, are justly plagued with a false opinion of that good in strangers which we know to be wanting to our selues.

The first that published their dislike of Sparta were the Corinthians, at whose vehement entreaty (though moued rather by enuie at the greatnesse of Athens dayly encreasing) the Lacedæmonians had entred into the present warre. But these Corinthians did only murmure at the peace, alleadging as grieuances, that some townes of theirs were left in the Athenians hands. The Mantineans, who during the time of warre, had procured some part of the Arcadians to become their followers, and forsake their dependency vpon the State of Sparta, did more freely & readily discouer themselues; feare of reuenge to come working more effectually, than indignation at things already past. The Argiues feeling the gale of prosperous Fortune that began to fill their sailes, prepared themselues to take as much of it as they could stand vnder; giuing for that purpose vnto twelue of their citizens, a full and absolute commission to make alliance betweene them and any free cities of Greece (Athens and Sparta excepted) without any further trouble of propounding euery particular businesse to the multitude. When the gates of Argos were set thus open to all commers; the Mantineans began to lead the way, and many Cities of Peloponnesus following them entred into this new confederacy; some incited by priuate respects, others thinking it the wisest way to doe as the most did. What inconuenience might arise to them by these courses, the Lacedæmonians easily discerned, and therfore sent Embassadors to stoppe the matter at Corinth, where they well perceiued that the mischiefe had beene hatched. These Embassadors found in the Corinthians a very rough disposition, with a grauity expressing the opinion which they had conceiued of their present aduantage ouer Sparta. They had caused all Cities which had not entred yet into the alliance with Argos, to send their Agents to them, in whose presence they gaue audience to the Lacedæmonians; the purport of whose Embassie was this:

this: That the Corinthians, without breach of their oath, could not forſake the alliance, which they had long ſince made with Sparta, and that reaſon did as well binde them to hold themſelues contented with the peace lately made, as religion enforced them to continue in their auncient confederacy, foraſmuch as it had bin agreed betweene the Spartans and their aſſociates, that the conſent of the greater part, (which had yeelded vnto peace with Athens) ſhould binde the leſſer number to performe what was concluded, if no Diuine impediment withſtood them. Heereunto the Corinthians made anſwere, that the Spartans had firſt begun to do them open wrong, in concluding the warre wherein they had loſt many places, without prouiſion of reſtitution; & that the very clauſe, alledged by the Embaſſadors, did acquite them from any neceſſity of ſubſcribing to the late peace, foraſmuch as they had ſworne vnto thoſe people whom they perſwaded to rebell againſt Athens, that they would neuer abandon them, nor willingly ſuffer them to fall againe into the tyrannous hands of the Athenians. Wherefore they held themſelues bound both in reaſon and religion to vſe all meanes of vpholding thoſe, whom by common conſent they had taken into protection; for that an oth was no leſſe to be accounted a Diuine impediment, than were peſtilence, tempeſt, or any the like accident, hindering the performance of things vndertaken. As for the alliance with Argos, they ſaid that they would doe as they ſhould finde cauſe. Hauing diſmiſſed the Embaſſadors with this anſwere, they made all haſt to ioyne themſelues with Argos, and cauſed other States to doe the like; ſo that Sparta and Athens were in a manner left to themſelues, the Thebans and Megarians being alſo vpon the point to haue entred into this new confederacie. But as the affections were diuers, which cauſed this haſtie confluence of ſudden friends to Argos, it ſo likewiſe came to paſſe that the friendſhip it ſelfe, ſuch as it was, had much diuerſitie both of ſinceritie & of continuance. For ſome there were that hated or feared the Lacedæmonians: as the Mantineans and Eleans: theſe did firmly betake themſelues to the Argiues, in whom they knew the ſame affection to be inueterate; others did only hate the peace concluded; & theſe would rather haue followed the Spartans than the Argiues in warre, yet rather the Argiues in war than the Lacedæmonians in peace. Of this number were the Corinthians, who knowing that the Thebans were affected like vnto themſelues, dealt with them to enter into the ſocietie of the Argiues, as they had done: but the different formes of gouernment, vſed in Thebes and Argos, cauſed the Thebanes to hold rather with Sparta, that was ruled by the principall men, than to incurre the danger of innouation, by joyning with ſuch as committed the whole rule to the multitude.

This buſineſſe hauing ill ſucceeded, the Corinthians beganne to bethinke themſelues of their owne danger, who had not ſo much as any truce with Athens, and yet were vnprepared for warre. They ſought therefore to come to ſome temporarie agreement with the Athenians, and hardly obtained it. For the Athenians, who had dealt with all Greece at one time, did not greatly care to come to any appointment, with one citie that ſhewed againſt them more ſtomach than force; but gaue them to vnderſtand that they might be ſafe enough from them, if they would claime the benefit of that alliance, which Athens had lately made with Sparta and her dependants; yet finally they granted vnto theſe Corinthians (which were loth to acknowledge themſelues dependants of Sparta) the truce that they deſired; but into priuate confederacie they would not admit them, it being an article of the league betweene them and the Spartans, That the one ſhould not make peace nor warre without the other.

Heerein, as in many other paſſages, may clearely be ſeene the great aduantage which abſolute Lords haue as well in peace as in warre, ouer ſuch as are ſerued by voluntaries. We ſhall hardly finde any one Signorie, that hath beene ſo conſtantly followed as Sparta was by ſo many States, and ſome of them little inferior to it ſelf, being all as free: whereas contrariwiſe, the Athenians had lately, and by compulſiue meanes gotten their Dominion, wherein they demeaned themſelues as Tyrants.

But

But in performance of conditions agreed vpon, the Athenians were able to make their wordes good, by excluding any State out of their Confederacie, and giuing vp such places as were agreed vpon: of which the Lacedæmonians could doe neither the one nor the other. For such Townes as their old Allies had gotten by their meanes in the late warre, could not bee restored without their consent, which had them in present possession; and particularly the Towne of Panacte, which the Thebans held, could by no meanes be obtained from them by the Lacedæmonians (who earnestly desired it, that by restitution thereof vnto the Athenians, as earnestly demanding it, themselues might recouer Pylus) vnlesse they would agree to make a priuate alliance with Thebes; which thereupon they were faine to doe, though knowing it to be contrarie to the last agreement betweene them and Athens.

The Lacedæmonians hauing broken one article of the league made between them and the Athenians, that by so doing they might enable themselues to the performance of another, were shamefully disappointed of their hopes by the Thebans, who did not giue vp the Towne of Panacte, till first they had vtterly demolished it, and made it of no worth to the Athenians. This was sought to haue beene excused by the Lacedæmonian Embassadours, who comming to Athens (whither they had sent home all prisoners that had beene detained at Thebes) hoped with gentle words to salue the matter; saying, That from henceforth no enemie to Athens should nestle in Panacte, for it was destroied. But these Embassadours had not to deale with tame fooles. For the Athenians told them in plaine termes, That of three principall conditions agreed vpon in their late League, they had not performed any one, but vsed such base colluſion as stood not with their honour: hauing made priuate alliance with the Thebans; hauing destroied a Towne that they should haue restored; and not hauing forced their dependants by warre, to make good the couenants of the late concluded peace. Hereupon they dismissed the Embassadors with rough words, meaning with as rough deedes to anger those that sent them.

There were at that time, both in Athens and Sparta, many that were ill-contented with the peace: among whom were the Ephori, chosen for that yeere, in Sparta; and Alcibiades a powerfull yong Gentleman in Athens. But the Ephori, though desiring to renew the warre, yet wished that first they might get from the Athenians as much as was to bee rendred to them by couenant, especially Pylus that had so sorely troubled them. Alcibiades, whose Nobilitie, riches, and fauour, with the people, made him desire warre, as the meanes, whereby himselfe might procure some honourable emploiment, vsed all meanes to set the quarrell on foot, whilest the Athenians had yet both aduantage enough, as not hauing rendred ought saue their prisoners, and pretence enough to vse that aduantage of breaking the peace, by reason that the Lacedæmonians (though indeede against their wills) had broken all couenants with them. Now the State of Athens had fully determined to retaine Pylus, and to performe nothing that the Lacedæmonians should, and might require, vntill they had first, without any longer halting, fulfilled all articles wherunto they were bound, euen to the vtmost point. This was enough to make them sweat, who hauing already done the most that they could, had as yet got nothing in recompence, except the deliuerie of their Citizens, which were prisoners. But Alcibiades wishing a speedie beginning of open warre, sent priuily to the Argiues, and gaue them to vnderstand how fitly the time serued for them to associate themselues with Athens, which was enough to giue them securitie against all Enemies.

The Argiues vpon the first confluence of many Estates vnto their societie, had embraced great hopes of working wonders, as if they should haue had the conduct of all Greece against the Athenians, robbing Sparta of that honour, as hauing ill vsed it, and thereby leauing their old enemies in case of much contempt and disabilitie. But these suddaine apprehensions of vaine joy, were suddainely changed into as vaine feare; which ill agreed with the great opinion that had lately beene conceiued of Argos. For when the Thebans had refused their alliance; when the Corinthians thians had sought securitie from Athens; and when a false rumour was noised abroad, Athens, Thebes, and Sparta, were come to a full agreement vpon all points of difference; then beganne the Argiues to let fall their crests, and sue for peace vnto the Lacedæmonians, who needing it as much as they, or more, yet held their grauity, and were not ouer-hastie to accept it. At this time, and in this perturbation, the message of Alcibiades came very welcome to the Argiues, which were not now consulting how to become the chiefe of all others, but how to saue themselues. Wherefore they sent away presently to Athens, their owne Embassadours, accompanied with the Mantineans and Eleans, to make a league offensiue, and defensiue, between their Estates and the Athenians.

Of this businesse the Lacedæmonians knew not what to thinke: for well they saw, that such a combination tended to their great hurt, and therefore were desirous to prevent it; but to keepe the loue of the Athenians, the new Ephori thought that more was alreadie done, than stood with their honour, or profit; others held it the wisest way, hauing done so much, not to stick vpon a little more, but rather by giuing full satisfaction, to retaine the friendship of that State, which was more to bee valued then all the rest of Greece. This resolution preuailing, they sent away such of their Citizens as were best affected to the peace, who comming to Athens with full commission to make an end of all controuersies, did earnestly labour in the Councell-house, to make the truth of things appeare, saying; that their Confederacie with the Thebans had tended to none other end than the recouerie of Panactæ: concerning which Towne, or any other businesse, that it much grieued the Lacedæmonians, to see things fall out in such wise as might giue to the Athenians cause of displeasure; but that all should be done which in reason might bee required for making matters euen betweene them; to which purpose they shewed that themselues had absolute commission. Wherefore they desired that Pylus might be restored vnto them, and especially for the present, that the negotiation with the Argiues might be called a-side. Fauourable audience was giuen to this proposition, the rather because they which promised amends, had power to make their words good. But all this faire likelihood of good agreement was dasht on the suddaine, by the practice of Alcibiades, who, secretly dealing with the Lacedæmonian Embassadours, perswaded them well of his friendship towards their Citie, and aduised them to take all care that their absolute power to conclude what they pleased in the name of Sparta, might not be knowne to the Communaltie of Athens, lest the insolent multitude should thereupon grow peremptorie and yeelde to nothing, vnlesse they could draw them to vnreasonable conditions. The Embassadours beleeued him, and fashioned their tale in the assembly of the people, as hee had aduised them. Hereupon the same Alcibiades taking presently the aduantage, which their double dealing affoorded, inueighed openly against them, as men of no sinceritie, that were come to Athens for none other purpose, than to hinder the people from strengthning themselues with friends, meaning to draw the Argiues and their Adherents to their owne alliance, as (contrarie to their oath) already they had the Thebans. The people of Athens, whom a pleasing errand would hardly haue satisfied, or brought into a good opinion of the Lacedæmonians, (whose honest meanings had so ill beene seconded with good performance) were now so incensed with the double dealing of the Embassadours, and the strong perswasions of Alcibiades, that little wanted of concluding the league with Argos. Yet for the present so farre did Nicias, an honourable Citizen, and great friend to the peace, preuaile with them, that the businesse was put off, till he himselfe with other Embassadours might fetch a better answere from Sparta.

It may seeme a great wonder, how so poore a tricke of Alcibiades was able to carrie a matter of such importance, when the Spartan Embassadours might haue cast the loade vpon his owne shoulders, by discouering the truth:

But the grauitie which was vsually found in the Lacedæmonians, hindred them (perhaps) from playing their game handsomely against so nimble a wit; and they might wel haue been thought vntrusty men, had they professed themselues such as would say and vn-say for their most aduantage.

Nicias and his Companions had a sowre message to deliuer at Sparta, being peremptorily to require performance of all conditions, and among the rest, that the Lacedæmonians should take the paines to rebuild Panacte, and should immediately renounce their alliance made with the Thebans; letting them vnderstand that otherwise the Athenians, without further delay, would enter into confederacie with the Argiues, and their Adherents. The Ephori at Sparta had no minde to forsake the Thebans, assured friends to their State; but wrought so hard, that the anger of the Athenians was suffered to breake out what way it could, which to mitigate, they would doe no more, than only (at the request of Nicias their honourable friend, who would not seeme to haue effected nothing) sweare a-new to keepe the articles of the league betweene them and Athens. Immediately therefore vpon returne of the Embassadours, a new league was made between the Athenians, Argiues, Mantineans, & Eleans, with verie ample prouision for holding the same common friends and enemies; wherein, though the Lacedæmonians were passed ouer with silence, yet was it manifest that the whole intent of this confederacy did bend it selfe chiefly against them, as in short while after was proued by effect.

At this time the Lacedæmonians were in ill case, who hauing restored all that they could vnto the Athenians, and procured others to doe the like, had themselues recouered nothing of their owne (prisoners excepted) for default of restoring all that they should. But that which did most of all disable them, was the losse of reputation, which they had not more impaired in the late warre by misfortunes, than in sundrie passages betweene them and the Athenians: to procure and keepe whose Amitie, they had left sundrie of their old friends to shift for themselues. Contrariwise the Athenians, by the treatie of peace, had recouered the most of that which they lost in warre; all their gettings they had retained; and were strengthned by the accesse of new Confederates.

How the peace betweene Athens and Sparta was ill kept, though not openly broken.

IT was not long ere the Argiues and their fellowes had found busines wherewith to set the Athenians on worke, and make vse of this coniunction. For presuming vpon the strength of their side, they began to meddle with the Epidaurians, whom it concerned the State of Sparta to defend. So, many acts of hostilitie were committed, wherein Athens and Sparta did (as principals) infest each the other, but came in collaterally, as to the aide of their seuerall friends.

By these occasions the Corinthians, Bœotians, Phocians, Locrians, and other people of Greece, beganne a-new to range themselues vnder the Lacedæmonians, and follow their ensignes. One victorie which the Lacedæmonians obtained by their meere valour in a set battaile, neere to Mantinea, against the Argiue-side, helped well to repaire their decaied reputation, though otherwise it yeelded them no great profit. The ciuill dissension arising shortly after within Argos it selfe, betweene the principall Citizens and the Commons, had almost throwne downe the whole frame of the new combination. For the chiefe Citizens getting the vpper hand, made a league with Sparta, wherein they proceeded so farre as to renounce the amity of the Athenians in expresse words, and forced the Mantineans to the like. But in short space of time the multitude preuailing, reuerſed all this, and hauing chaſed away their ambitious Nobilitie, applied themſelues to the Athenians as cloſely as before.

Beſide theſe vprores in Peloponneſus, many aſſaies were made to raiſe vp troubles in all parts of Greece, and likewiſe in Macedon, to the Athenians; whoſe forces and readineſſe for execution, preuented ſome things, reuenged other, and requited all with ſome proſperous attempts. Finally, the Athenians wanting matter of quarrell; and the Lacedæmonians growing wearie, they beganne to be quiet, retaining ſtill that enmitie in their hearts, which they had ſufficiently diſcouered in effects, though not as yet breaking out into termes of open warre.

§. VIII.

The Athenians ſending two fleets to ſacke Siracuſe, are put to flight and vtterly diſcomfited.

DVring this intermiſſion of open warre, the Athenians re-intertained their hopes of ſubduing Sicil, whither they ſent a fleet ſo mighty as neuer was ſet forth by Greece in any Age before or after.

This fleet was very well manned, and furniſhed with all neceſſaries to ſo great an expedition. All which came to nought; partly by the factions in Athens, whence Alcibiades Author of that voyage, & one of the Generalls of their fleet, was driuen to baniſh himſelfe, for feare of ſuch iudgement, as elſe he was like to haue vnder-gone, among the incenſed people; partly by the inuaſion which the Lacedæmonians made vpon Attica, whileſt the forces of that State were ſo farre from home. Hereunto was added the aide of the King of Perſia, who ſupplied the Peloponneſians with money.

Neither was the ſucceſſe of things in Sicilia ſuch, as without helpe from Athens, could giue any likelyhood of a good end in that warre. For although in the beginning, the enterpriſe had ſo well ſucceeded, that they beſieged Siracuſe, the chiefe Citie of the Iland, and one of the faireſt Townes which the Greekes inhabited, obtayning the better in ſundry battailes by Land and Sea; yet when the Towne was relieued with ſtrong aide from Peloponneſus, it came to paſſe that the Athenians were put to the worſe on all ſides, in ſuch wiſe that their fleet was ſhut vp into the hauen of Siracuſe, and could not iſſue out.

As the Athenian affaires went very ill in Sicil, ſo did they at home ſtand vpon hard termes, for that the Lacedæmonians, who had beene formerly accuſtomed to make wearieſome yeerely iournies into Attica, which hauing pilled and foraged, they returned home; did now by counſell of Alcibiades, (who ſeeking reuenge vpon his owne Citizens was fled vnto them) fortifie the Towne of Decelea, which was neere to Athens, whence they ceaſed not with daily excurſions to harrie all the Countrie round about, and ſometimes giue alarme vnto the Citie it ſelfe.

In theſe extremities, the peruerſe obſtinacie of the Athenians was very ſtrange; who leaning at their backes, and at their owne doores, an enemie little leſſe mighty than themſelues, did yet ſend forth another fleet into Sicil, to inuade a people no leſſe puiſſant, which neuer had offended them.

It often happens, that proſperous euent makes fooliſh counſaile ſeeme wiſer than it was, which came to paſſe many times among the Athenians, whoſe vaine conceits Pallas was ſaid to turn vnto the beſt. But where vnſound aduice, finding bad proofe, is obſtinately purſued, neither Pallas nor Fortune can be iuſtly blamed for a miſerable iſſue. This ſecond fleet of the Athenians, which better might haue ſerued to conuey home the former, that was defeated; after ſome attempts made to ſmall purpoſe againſt the Siracuſans, was finally (together with the other part of the Nauie, which was there before) quite vanquiſhed, and bard vp into the hauen of Siracuſe, cuse, whereby the campe of the Athenians, vtterly deprived of all benefit by Sea, either for succour or departure, was driuen to breake vp, and flie away by Land, in which flight they were ouer-taken routed, and quite ouerthrown in such wise that scarce any man escaped.

This mischiefe well deserued fell vpon the Athenians, who had wickedly condemned into exile Sophocles and Pthiodorus Generalls, formerly sent into that Ile, pretending that they had taken money for making peace in Sicil, whereas indeede there was not any meanes or possibilitie to haue made warre. Hereby it came to passe, that Nicias, who had the chiefe command in this vnhappie enterprise, did rather choose to hazard the ruine of his Countrie by the losse of that Armie, wherin consisted little lesse then all the power of Athens; then to aduenture his owne estate, his life, and his honour, vpon the tongues of shameleſse accusers, and the sentence of Iudges before his triall resolued to condemne him, by retiring from Syracuse, when wisdome and necessitie required it. For (said he) they shall giue sentence vpon vs, who know not the reason of our doings, nor would giue eare to any that would speak in our behalfe, but altogether harken to suspicious and vaine rumours that shall be brought against vs, yea these our Souldiers who now are so desirous to returne in safetie, will in our danger be well contented to frame their tales to the pleasure of the lewd and insolent multitude.

This resolution of Nicias, though it cannot be commended (for it is the part of an honest and valiant man to doe what reason willeth, not what opinion expecteth, and to measure honour or dishonour by the assurance of his well-informed conscience, rather than by the malicious report and censure of others) yet it may bee excused; since he had before his eies the iniustice of his people; and had well vnderstood that a wicked sentence is infinitely worse than a wicked fact, as being held a president and patterne, whereby oppression beginning vpon one, is extended as warrantable vpon all. Therefore his feare of wrongfull condemnation was such, as a constant man could not easily haue ouer-mastered; but when afterwards the Armie, hauing no other expectation of safetie then the faint hope of a secret flight, he was so terrified with an Eclipse of the Moone, happening when they were about to dislodge, that he would not consent to haue the camp break vp till seuen and twentie daies were past. His timorousnesse was euen as foolish and ridiculous, as the issue of it was lamentable. For he should not haue thought that the power of the Heauens, & the course of Nature, would be as vniust as his Athenians, or might pretend lesse euill to the slothfull, than to such as did their best. Neither doe I thinke that any Astrologer can alleage this Eclipse, as either a cause or prognostication of that Armies destruction, otherwise then as the follie of men did, by application, turne it to their owne confusion. Had C. Cassius the Roman, he, who slew Iulius Cæsar, imitated this superstition of Nicias, he had surely found the same fortune in a case very like. But when, he retyring, the broken remainder of Crassus his Armie defeated by the Parthian Archers was aduised, vpon such an accident as this, to continue where he then was, till the Sunne were past the signe of Scorpio; he made answere that hee stood not in such feare of Scorpio, as of Sagittarius. So aduenturing rather to abide the frowning of the Heauens, then the neerer danger of Enemies vpon earth, hee made such a safe and honourable retrait, as did both shew his noble resolution, and giue a faire example to that good rule;

Thus we see that God, who ordinarily works by a concatenation of meanes, deprives the Gouernours of vnderstanding, when he intends euill to the multitude; and that the wickednesse of vniust men is the readie meane to weaken the vertue of those who might haue done them good.

Of the troubles where-into the State of Athens fell, after the great loſſe of the Fleet, and Armie, in Sicilia.

THe loſſe of this Armie was the ruine of the Athenian Dominion, and may bee well accompted a very little leſſe calamitie to that Eſtate, than was the ſubuerſion of the walls, when the Citie about ſeuen yeeres after was taken by Lyſander. For now began the ſubiects of the Athenian Eſtate to rebell, of whom, ſome they reduced vnder their obedience; others held out; ſome for feare of greater inconuenience were ſet at libertie, promiſing only to be their good friends, as formerly they had beene their Subiects; others hauing a kind of libertie offered by the Athenians, were not therewith contented, but obtained a true and perfect libertie by force. Among theſe troubles it fell out very vnſeaſonably, that the principall men of Athens being wearied with the peoples inſolencie, tooke vpon them to change the forme of that Eſtate, and bring the gouernement into the hands of a few. To which purpoſe conſpiring with the Captaines which were abroad, they cauſed them to ſet vp the forme of an Ariſtocratie in the Townes of their Confederates; and in the meane time, ſome that were moſt likely to withſtand this innouation, being ſlaine at Athens, the Commonaltie were ſo diſmaid, that none durſt ſpeake againſt the Conſpirators, whoſe number they knew not, but euerie man was afraid of his Neighbour, leſt he ſhould be a member of the league. In this generall feare the Maieſtie of Athens was vſurped by 400. men, who obſeruing in ſhew the ancient forme of proceeding, did cauſe al matters to be propounded vnto the people, and concluded vpon by the greater part of voices: but the things propounded were onely ſuch as were firſt allowed in priuate among themſelues; neither had the Commonaltie any other libertie, than only to approue and giue conſent: for whoſoeuer preſumed any further, was quickly diſpatched out of the way, and no inquirie made of the murder. By theſe meanes were many decrees made, all tending to the eſtabliſhment of this new Authoritie, which neuertheleſſe indured not long. For the Fleet and Armie which then was at the Ile of Samos, did altogether deteſt theſe dealings of the foure hundred vſurpers, and held them as Enemies; whereupon they reuoked Alcibiades out of baniſhment, & by his aſſiſtance procured that the ſupplies which the Perſian King had promiſed vnto the Lacedæmonians, were by Tiſſaphernes his Lieutenant, made vnprofitable, through the ſlow and bad performance. Alcibiades had at the firſt beene very well entertained in Sparta, whileſt his ſeruice done to that State was not growne to be the obiect of enuie. But when it appeared that in counſaile and good peformance he ſo farre excelled all the Lacedæmonians, that all their good ſucceſſe was aſcribed to his wit and valour, then were all the principall Citizens wearie of his vertue; eſpecially Agis one of their Kings, whoſe wife had ſo far yeelded her ſelfe to the loue of this Athenian, that among her inward friends ſhee could not forbeare to call her yong child by his name. Hereupon order was taken, that Alcibiades ſhould be killed out of the way. But he diſcouering the Spartan trecherie, conueighed himſelfe vnto Tiſſaphernes, whom he ſo bewitched with his great beautie, ſweet conuerſation, and ſound wit, that he ſoone became the Maſter of that barbarous Vice-roies affections, who had free power to diſpoſe the great Kings treſures and forces in thoſe parts. Then beganne he to aduiſe Tiſſaphernes, not ſo farre foorth to aſſiſt the Lacedæmonians, that they ſhould quite ouerthrow the State of Athens, but rather to helpe the weaker ſide, & let them one conſume another, whereby all ſhould fall at length into the hands of the Perſian. By this counſaile he made way to other practices, wherein by ſtrength of his reputation (as the only fauourite of so great a Potentate) hee played his owne game, procuring his restitution. At length his banishment being repealed by the Armie, but not by the Citizens (who then were oppressed by the foure hundred) hee laboured greatly to reconcile the Souldiers to the Gouernors; or at least to diuert their heat another way, and turne it vpon the Common Enemie. Some of the foure hundred approued his motion, as being wearie of the tyrannie whereof they were partakers, partly because they saw it could not long endure, & partly for that themselues, being lesse regarded by the rest of their companions, than stood with their good liking, sought to acquit themselues of it as honestly as they might. But the most of that Faction laboured to obtaine peace of the Lacedæmonians, desiring chiefly to maintaine both their owne authoritie, and the greatnesse of their Citie, if they might: but if this could not be, they did rather wish to preserue their owne power, or safetie at least, then the good Estate of the Common-wealth. Therefore they made sundrie ouertures of peace to the Lacedæmonians, desiring to compound in as good termes as they might, and affirming that they were fitter to be trusted than the wauering multitude; especially considering that the City of Sparta was gouerned by an Aristocratie, to which form they had now reduced Athens. All these passages betweene the foure hundred (or the most and chiefe of them) and the Lacedæmonians, were kept as secret as might be. For the Citie of Athens, hoping, without any great cause, to repaire their losses, was not inclined to make composition; from which vpon iuster ground the enemie was much more auerse, trusting well that the discord of the Athenians (not vnknowne abroad) might yeeld some faire opportunitie to the destruction of it selfe, which in effect (though not then presently) came to passe. And vpon this hope King Agis did sometimes bring his forces from Decelea to Athens, where doing no good, hee receiued some small losses. Likewise the Nauie of Peloponnesus made shew of attempting the Citie, but seeing no likelihood of successe, they bent their course from thence to other places, where they obtained victories, which in the better Fortune of the Athenians might more lightly haue beene regarded, then in this their decaied estate. Yet it seemes, without any disparagement to their wisdome, they should rather haue forborne to present vnto the Citie, or to the Countries neere adioyning any terrour of the warre. For the dissension within the walls might soone haue done more good then could be receiued from the Fleet or Armie without, which indeed gaue occasion to set the Citizens at vnitie, though it lasted not very long. The foure hundred, by meanes of these troubles, were faine to resigne their authoritie, which they could not now hold, when the people hauing taken armes to repel forraigne enemies, would not lay them downe, till they had freed themselues from such as oppressed the State at home. Yet was not this alteration of gouernment a full restitution of the soueraigne command vnto the people, or whole body of the Citie, but onely to fiue thousand; which company the foure hundred (when their authoritie beganne) had pretended to take vnto them as assistance: herein seeming to doe little wrong or none to the Commonalty, who seldome assembled in greater number. But now when the highest power was come indeede into the handes of so many, it was soone agreed that Alcibiades and his Companions should bee recalled from exile, and that the Armie at Samos should be requested to vndertake the gouernement: which was forthwith reformed according to the Souldiers desire.

How ALCIBIADES wanne many important victories for the Athenians; was recalled from exile; made their Generall, and againe depoſed.

THis eſtabliſhment of things in the Citie, was accompanied with ſome good ſucceſſe in the warres. For the Lacedæmonians were about the ſame time ouerthrowne at Sea, in a great battaile, by the Athenian fleet, which had remained at Samos, to which Alcibiades afterwards joyning ſuch forces as he could raiſe, obtained many victories. Before the Towne of Abydus, his arriuall with eighteene ſhips, gaue the honour of a great battaile to the Athenians; he ouerthrew and vtterly deſtroyed the fleet of the Lacedæmonians, commanded by Mindarus, tooke the Townes of Cyzicus, and Perinthus, made the Selymbrians ranſome their Citie, and fortified Cryſopolis. Hereupon letters were ſent to Sparta, which the Athenians, intercepting, found to containe the diſtreſſe of the Armie in theſe few words: All is loſt; MINDARVS is ſlaine; the Souldiers want victualls; we know not what to doe.

Shortly after this, Alcibiades ouerthrew the Lacedæmonians in fight by Land at Chalcedon, tooke Selymbria, beſieged and wanne Byzantium, now called Conſtantinople, which euen in thoſe dayes was a goodly, rich, and very ſtrong Citie. Hereupon he returned home with very great welcome, and was made high Admirall of all the Nauie.

But this his honour continued not long; for it was taken from him, and he driuen to baniſh himſelfe againe; only becauſe his Lieutenant, contrarie to the expreſſe command of Alcibiades, fighting with the enemies in his abſence, had loſt a great part of the fleet.

The ſecond baniſhment of Alcibiades was to the Athenians more harmeful than the firſt; and the loſſe which thereupon they receiued, was (though more heauie to them, yet) leſſe to be pitied of others, than that which enſued vpon his former exile. For whereas at the firſt, he had ſought reuenge vpon his owne Citie; now, as inured to aduerſitie, he rather pitied their furie, who in time of ſuch danger had caſt out him that ſhould haue repaired their weake eſtate, than ſought by procuring or beholding the calamitie of his people, to comfort himſelfe after injurie receiued. Before they, who were inſtituted in the place of Alcibiades, arriued at the fleet, he preſented battaile to Lyſander the Lacedæmonian Admirall, who was not ſo confident vpon his former victorie, as to vndertake Alcibiades himſelfe, bringing ſhips more in number (notwithſtanding the former loſſe of fifteene) than his enemies had, and better ordered than they had beene vnder his Lieutenant. But when the decree of the people was publiſhed in the Nauie, then did Alcibiades with-draw himſelfe to a Towne vpon Helleſpont, called Bizanthe, where hee had built a Caſtle.

§. XI.

The battaile at Arginuſa, and condemnation of the victorious Athenian Captaines by the people.

AFter this time, the Athenians receiuing many loſſes & diſcomfitures, were driuen to flie into the Hauen of Mytelene, where they were ſtraightly beſieged both by Land and Sea. For the raiſing of this ſiege neceſſity inforced them to man all their Veſſells, and to put the vttermoſt of their forces into the hazzard of one battaile. This battaile was fought at Arginusa, where Callicraditas, Admirall of the Lacedæmonians, losing the honor of the day, preserued his owne reputation by dying valiantly in the fight. It might well haue beene expected, that the ten Captaines, who joyntly had command in chiefe ouer the Athenian fleet, should for that good daies seruice, and so happy a victorie, haue receiued great honour of their Citizens. But contrariwise they were forth-with called home, and accused, as if wilfully they had suffered many of the Citizens, whose ships were broken and sunke, to be cast away, when by appointing some Vessels to take them vp, they might haue saued them from being drowned. Hereto the Captaines readily made a very iust answere; That they pursuing the victorie, had left part of the fleet, vnder sufficient men, to saue those that were wrackt; which if it were not well accomplished, it was, because a tempest arising about the end of the fight, had hindred the performance of that, and other their intendments. This excuse availed not: For a lewd fellow was brought forth, who said, That he himselfe escaping in a meale-tubbe, had beene intreated by those who were in perill of drowning, to desire of the people reuenge of their deaths vpon the Captaines. It was very strange, that vpon such an accusation maintained with so slender euidence, men that had well deserued of their Countrie should bee ouerthrowne. But their enemies had so incensed the rascall multitude, that no man durst absolue them, saue only Socrates the wise and vertuous Philosopher, whose voice in this judgement was not regarded. Sixe of them were put to death, of whom one had hardly escaped drowning, and was with much a-doe relieued by other vessells in the storme: but the Captaines which were absent escaped; for when the furie of the people was ouer-past, this judgement was reuersed, and the accusers called into question for hauing deceiued and peruerted the Citizens. Thus the Athenians went about to free themselues from the infamie of injustice; but the diuine justice was not a-sleepe, nor would be so deluded.

§. XII.

The battaile at Ægos-Potamos, wherein the whole State of Athens was ruined; with the end of the Peloponnesian Warre.

THe Peloponnesian fleet vnder Lysander, the yeere next following, hauing scowred the Ægean Seas, entred Hellespont, where (landing Souldiers) it besieged and tooke the Towne of Lampsacus. Hereupon all the Nauie of Athens, being an hundred and fourescore saile, made thither in haste, but finding Lampsacus taken before their comming, they put in at Sestos, where hauing refreshed themselues, they sailed to the Riuer called, Ægos-Potamos, which is (as we might name it) Goates-brooke, or the Riuer of the Goate; being on the Continent, opposite to Lampsacus: and there they cast Anchors, not one whole league off from Lysander, who rode at Lampsacus in the harbour. The next day after their arriuall they presented fight vnto the Peloponnesians, who refused it, whereupon the Athenians returned againe to Ægos-Potamos, and thus they continued fiue dayes, brauing euery day the Enemie, and returning to their owne harbour when it drew towards euening.

The Castle of Alcibiades was not farre from the Nauie, and his power in those places was such as might haue greatly availed his Countrimen, if they could haue made vse of it. For he had waged Mercinaries, and making warre in his owne name vpon some people of the Thracians, had gathered much wealth, and obtained much reputation among them. He perceiuing the disorderly course of the Athenian Commanders, repaired vnto them, and shewed what great inconuenience might grow, if they did not soone fore-see and preuent it. For they lay in a roade subject to euery ry weather, neither neere enough to any Towne where they might furniſh themſelues with neceſſarie, nor ſo farre off as had beene more expedient. Seſtus was the next Market-Towne; thither both Souldiers and Mariners reſorted, flocking away from the Nauie euerie day, as ſoone as they were returned from braiuing the Enemie. Therefore Alcibiades willed them either to lie at Seſtus, which was not farre off, or at the leaſt to conſider better how neere their enemie was, whoſe feare proceeded rather from obedience to his Generall, than from any cowardiſe. This admonition was ſo farre deſpiſed, that ſome of the Commanders willed him to meddle with his owne matters, and to remember that his authoritie was out of date. Had it not beene for theſe opprobrious words, hee could (as hee told his familiars) haue compelled the Lacedæmonians, either to fight vpon vnequall termes, or vttetly to quit their Fleet. And like enough it was that hee might ſo haue done by tranſporting the light-armed Thracians his Confederates, and others his Followers ouer the Straights, who aſſaulting the Peloponneſians by Land, would either haue compelled them to put to Sea, or elſe to leaue their ſhips to the mercy of the Athenians. But finding their acceptance of his good counſaile no better than hath beene rehearſed, he left them to their fortune, which how euill it would be he did prognoſticate.

Lyſander all this while defending himſelfe by the aduantage of his Hauen, was not careleſſe in looking into the demeanour of the Athenians. When they departed, his manner was to ſend forth ſome of his ſwifteſt Veſſels after them, who obſeruing their doings, related vnto him what they had ſeene. Therefore vnderſtanding in what careleſſe faſhion they romed vp and downe the Countrie; he kept all his men a-boord after their departure, and the fift day gaue eſpeciall charge to his Scouts, That when they perceiued the Athenians, diſembarking, as their cuſtome was, and walking towards Seſtos, they ſhould forth with returne, and hang vp a braſen ſhield in the Prow, as a token for him to weigh Anchor.

The Scouts performed their charge, and Lyſander being in a readineſſe, made all ſpeed that ſtrength of Oares could giue, to Ægos Potamos, where he found very few of his enemies a-boord their Ships, not many neere them, and all in great confuſion vpon the newes of his approch.

Inſomuch that the greateſt induſtrie which the Athenians then ſhewed, was in the eſcape of eight or nine ſhips; which knowing how much that loſſe imported, gaue ouer Athens as deſperate, and made a long flight vnto the Ile of Cyprus, all the reſt were taken, and ſuch of the Souldiers as came in to the reſcue cut in pieces. Thus was the warre which had laſted ſeuen and twentie yeeres, with variable ſucceſſe concluded in one houre, and the glory of Athens in ſuch wiſe eclipſed, that ſhe neuer afterward ſhone in her perfect light.

Immediately vpon this victorie Lyſander, hauing taken ſuch Townes as readily did yeeld vpon the firſt fame of his exploit, ſet ſayle for Athens, and ioyning his forces with thoſe of Agis and Pauſanias, Kings of Sparta, ſummoned the Citie, which finding too ſtubborne to yeeld, and too ſtrong to bee wonne on the ſudden, hee put forth againe to Sea, and rather by terrour than violence, compelling all the Ilands, and ſuch Townes of the Ionians, as had formerly held of the Athenians, to ſubmit themſelues to Sparta, hee did thereby cut off all prouiſion of victuals, and other neceſſaries, from the Citie, and inforced the people by meere famine to yeeld to theſe conditions: That the long walles, leading from the Towne to the Port, ſhould bee throwne downe; That all Cities ſubiect to their Eſtate, ſhould be ſet at libertie; That the Athenians ſhould bee Maſters only of their owne Territories, and the fields adioyning to their Towne; And that they ſhould keepe no more then twelue Ships; That they ſhould hold as Friends or Enemies, the ſame, whom the Lacedæmonians did, and follow the Lacedæmonians as Leaders in the Warres.

Theſe

These articles being agreed vpon, the walls were throwne downe with great rejoycing of those who had borne displeasure to Athens; and not without some consultation of destroying the Citie, and laying waste the Land about it. Which aduice, although it was not entertained, yet were thirtie Gouernours, or rather cruell Tyrants, appointed ouer the people, who recompensed their former insolencie and injustice ouer their Captaines, by oppressing them with all base and intolerable slauerie.

The only small hope then remaining to the Athenians, was, that Alcibiades might perhaps repaire what their owne folly had ruined. But the thirtie Tyrants perceiuing this, aduertised the Lacedæmonians thereof, who contriued, and (as nowe domineering in euery quarter) soone effected his suddaine death.

Such end had the Peloponnesian Warre. After which the Lacedæmonians abusing the reputation, and great power, which therein they had obtained, grew very odious to all Greece, and by Combination of many Cities against them, were dispossessed of their high authoritie, euen in that very Age, in which they had subdued Athens. The greatest foile that they tooke was of the Thebans, led by Epaminondas, vnder whom Philip of Macedon, Father to Alexander the Great, had the best of his education. By these Thebans, the Citie of Sparta (besides other great losses receiued) was sundrie times in danger of being taken. But these haughtie attempts of the Thebans came finally to nothing; for the seuerall Estates and Signories of Greece, were growne so jealous one of anothers greatnesse, that the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, Argiues, and Thebans, which were the mightiest, associating themselues with the weaker partie, did so counterpoize the stronger, that no one Citie could extend the limits of her jurisdiction so farre as might make her terrible to her Neighbours. And thus all parts of the Countrie remained rather euenly ballanced, than well agreeing, till such time as Philip, and after him Alexander, Kings of Macedon, (whose forefathers had beene dependants, and followers, yea almost meere Vassalls to the Estates of Athens and Sparta) found meanes, by making vse of their factions, to bring them all into seruitude, from which they neuer could be free, till the Romanes presenting them with a shew of libertie, did themselues indeede become their Masters.

CHAP. IX.

Of matters concurring with the Peloponneſian Warre, or ſhortly following it.

§. I.

How the affaires of Perſia ſtood in theſe times.

DVRING the times of this Peloponneſian Warre, and thoſe other leſſe expeditions foregoing it, Artaxerxes Longimanus, hauing peaceably injoyed a long raigne ouer the Perſians, left it by his death either to Darius, who was called Darius Nothus, or the Baſtard, whom the Greeke Hiſtorians (lightly paſſing ouer Xerxes the ſecond, and Sogdianus, as Vſurpers, and for their ſhort raigne little to be regarded) place next vnto him, or to Xerxes the ſecond, who, and his brother Sogdianus after him (ſeeming to haue bene the ſonnes of Heſter) held the Kingdome but one yeere betweene them, the yonger ſucceeding his elder brother. It is not my purpoſe (as I haue ſaid before) to purſue the Hiſtorie of the Perſians from henceforth, by rehearſall of all the particulars, otherwiſe then as they ſhall be incident to the affaires of Greece. It may therefore ſuffice to ſay, That Xerxes the ſecond, being a vicious Prince, did periſh after a moneth or two, if not by ſurfeit, then by treachery of his as riotous brother Sogdianus. Likewiſe of Sogdianus it is found, that being as ill as his brother, and more cruell, he ſlew vnjuſtly Bagorazus a principall Eunuch, and would haue done as much to his brother Darius the Baſtard, had not hee foreſeene it; and by raiſing a ſtronger Armie than this hated King Sogdianus could leauie, ſeized at once vpon the King and Kingdome. Darius hauing ſlaine his brother, held the Empire nineteene yeeres. Amyrtæus of Sais an Ægyptian rebelled againſt him, and hauing partly ſlaine, partly chaſed out of the Land the Perſian Garriſons, allied himſelfe ſo firmely with the Greekes, that by their aide he maintained the Kingdome, and deliuered it ouer to his poſteritie, who (notwithſtanding the furie of their ciuill Warres) maintained it againſt the Perſian, all the daies of this Darius, and of his ſonne Artaxerxes Mnemon. Likewiſe Amorges, a ſubject of his owne and of the Roiall bloud, being Lieutenant of Caria, rebelled againſt him; confederating himſelfe with the Athenians. But the great calamitie, before ſpoken of, which fell vpon the Athenians in Sicil, hauing put new life into the Spartans, and giuen courage to the Ilanders and others, ſubject to the State of Athens, to ſhake off the yoke of their long continued bondage: It fell out well for Darius, that the Lacedæmonians being deſtitute of money, wherewith to defray the charge of a great Nauie, without which it was impoſſible to aduance the warre againſt the State of Athens, that remained powerfull by Sea, were driuen to craue his aſſiſtance, which he granted vnto them, firſt vpon what conditions beſt pleaſed himſelfe, though afterwards the articles of the league betweene him and them were ſet downe in more preciſe termes; wherein it was concluded, That he and they ſhould make warre joyntly vpon the Athenians, and vpon all that ſhould rebell from either of them, and (which was highly to the Kings honour and profit) that all the Cities of Aſia, which had formerly beene his, or his Predeceſſours, ſhould returne to his obedience. By this Treatie, and the warre enſung suing (of which I haue already spoken) he recouered all that his Grand-father and Father had lost in Asia. Likewise by assistance of the Lacedæmonians he got Amorges a-liue into his hands, who was taken in the Citie of Iasus; the Athenians wanting either force or courage to succour him. Neuertheless Ægypt still held out against him; the cause whereof cannot bee the employment of the Persian forces on the parts of Greece, for he abounded in men, of whom he had enough for all occasions, but they wanted manhood, which caused him to fight with gold, which effected for him by Souldiers of other Nations, and his naturall enemies, what the valour of his owne Subjects was insufficient to performe. Darius had in marriage Paryſatis his owne sister, who bare vnto him (besides other children) Artaxerxes called Mnemon, that is to say, the Mindfull, or the Rememberer, who succeeded him in the Kingdome; and Cyrus the yonger, a Prince of singular vertue, and accounted by all that knew him, the most excellent man that euer Persia bred after Cyrus the Great. But the old King Darius, intending to leaue vnto his elder sonne Artaxerxes the inheritance of that great Empire, did cast a jealous eye vpon the doings of yong Cyrus, who being Lieutenant of the lower Asia, tooke more vpon him than befitted a Subject: for which cause his father sent for him, with intent to haue taken some very sharpe course with him, had not his owne death preuented the comming of his yonger sonne, and placed the elder in his Throne. Of the warre betweene these brethren, and summarily of Artaxerxes, we shall haue occasion to speake somewhat in more conuenient place.

§. II.

How the thirtie Tyrants got their Dominion in Athens.

I Hold it in this place most conuenient to shew the proceedings of the Greekes, after the subuersion of the walls of Athens, which gaue end to that warre called the Peloponnesian warre, but could not free the vnhappy Countrie of Greece from ciuill broiles. The thirtie Gouernours, commonly called the thirtie Tyrants of Athens, were chosen at the first by the people to compile a body of their Law, and make a collection of such ancient Statutes, as were meetest to be put in practice: the condition of the Citie standing as it did in that so sodaine alteration. To this charge was annexed the supreme authoritie, either as a recompence of their labours, or because the necessitie of the times did so require it, wherein the Law being vncertaine, it was fit that such men should giue judgement in particular causes, to whose judgement the Lawes themselues, by which the Citie was to bee ordered, were become subiect. But these thirtie hauing so great power in their hands, were more carefull to hold it, than to deserue it, by faithfull execution of that which was committed to them in trust.

Therefore apprehending such troublesome fellowes, as were odious to the citie, though not punishable therefore by law, they condemned them to death; which proceeding was by all men highly approued, who cõsidered their lewd conditions, but did not withall bethinke themselues, how easie a thing it would be vnto these thirtie men, to take away the liues of Innocents, by calling them perturbers of the peace, or what else they listed, when condemnation without due triall and proofe had beene once well allowed. Hauing thus plausibly entred into a wicked course of gouernement, they thought it best to fortifie themselues with a sure guard, ere they brake out into those disorders, which they must needes commit for the establishing of their authoritie. Wherefore dispatching two of their owne companie to Sparta, they informed the Lacedæmonians, that it was the full intent of the thirtie, to keepe the City free from all rebellious motions, to which purpose it behoued them to cut off such as were seditious; and therefore desired the Lacedæmonians to send them them a Garrison, which they promised at their owne cost to maintaine. This motion was well approued, and a guard sent, the Captaine of which was so well entertained by the thirtie, that none of their misdeedes could want his high commendations at Sparta. Hereupon the Tyrants beganne to take heart, and looking no more after base and detested persons, inuaded the principall men of the City, sending armed men from House to House, who drew out such as were of great reputation, and likely, or able to make any head against this wicked forme of gouernement: whereby there was such effusion of bloud, as to Theramenes (one of the thirtie) seemed very horrible, and vnable to escape vengeance. His dislike of their proceedings being openly discouered, caused his fellowes to bethinke themselues, and prouide for their owne security, and his destruction, lest he should make himselfe a Captaine of the discontented (which were almost the whole Citie) and redeeme his owne peace with their ruine. Wherefore they selected three thousand of the Citizens, whom they thought meetest, and gaue vnto them some part of publike authority, the rest they disarmed; and hauing thus increased their owne strength, and weakened their opposites, they began a-fresh to shead the bloud, not only of their priuat enemies, but of such whose money, or goods, might inrich them, and enable them for the paiment of their guard. And to this purpose they concluded, that euery one of them should name one man, vpon whose goods he should seize, putting the owner to death. But when Theramenes vttered his detestation of so wicked intent; then did Critias, who of all the thirtie was most tyrannicall, accuse him to the Councell, as a treacherous man, and (whereas one maine priuiledge of the three thousand was, that none of them should suffer death at the appointment of the thirtie, but haue the accustomed trial) he took vpon him to strike out of that number the name of Theramenes, and so reduced him vnder the triall and sentence of that order. It was well alleaged by Theramenes, that his name was not more easie to be blotted out of the Catalogue, than any other mans, vpon which consideration, he aduised them all to conceiue no otherwise of his case, than as of their owne, who were liable to the same forme of proceeding: but (euery man choosing rather to preserue his owne life by silence, than presently to draw vpon him selfe the danger, which as yet concerned him little, and perhaps would neuer come neere him) the Tyrants interpreting silence as consent, condemned him forthwith, and compelled him to drinke poyson.

§. III.

The conspiracie against the thirtie Tyrants, and their deposition.

AFter the death of Theramenes, the thirtie began to vse such outrage, as excelled their former villanies. For hauing three thousand (as they thought) firme vnto them, they robbed all others without feare or shame, despoiling them of lands and goods, and causing them to flie into banishment, for safeguard of their liues. This flight of the Citizens procured their libertie, and the generall good of the City. For the banished Citizens, who were fled to Thebes, entred into consultation, and resolued to hazard their liues in setting free the Citie of Athens. The very thought of such a practice had been treason at home, which had no other danger abroad, than might be found in the execution. Seuentie men, or thereabout, were the first vndertakers, who with their Captaine Thrasybulus tooke Phyla, a place of strength in the Territorie of Athens. No sooner did the thirtie heare of their exploit, than seeke meanes to preuent further danger; assembling the three thousand, and their Lacedæmonian guard, with which force they attempted Phyla, but were with some losse of their men repelled. Finding the place too strong to be taken by assault, they intended to besiege it; which purpose came to nought by meanes of snow that fell, and other stormie weather, against which they had not made prouision. Retiring therefore to the Citie, which aboue all they were to make good, they left the most of their guard, and two companies of Horse, to wearie out them which lay in Phyla, with a flying siege. But it was not long ere the followers of Thrasybulus were encreased from seuenty to seuen hundred, which aduentured to giue charge vpon those guards, of whom they cut off aboue an hundred & twenty. These small, but prosperous beginnings, added more to the number of those in Phyla, who now with a thousand men got entrance into Piræus, the suburbe of Athens, lying on the Port. Before their comming, the thirtie had resolued to fortifie the Towne of Eleusine, to their owne vse, whereinto they might make an easie retrait, and saue themselues from any sudden perill. It may well seeme strange, that whereas their barbarous manner of gouernement had brought them into such danger, they were so farre from seeking to obtaine mens good wil, that contrariwise, to assure themselues of Eleusine, they got al of the place who could beare armes into their hands by a traine, and wickedly (though vnder forme of iustice) murthered them all. But, Sceleribus tutum per scelera est iter, the mischiefes which they had alreadie done were such, as left them no hope of going backward, nor any other apparant likelihood of safetie, than by extending their crueltie vnto all, seeing few or none were left, whom they could trust. When Thrasybulus and his fellowes, who as yet were termed conspirators, had taken the Piræus, then were the three thousand armed againe by the Tyrants, and brought to assault it; but in this enterprise Thrasybulus had the better, and repelled his enemies, of whom although there were slaine to the number of seuentie, onely yet the victory seemed the greater, because Critias, & one other of the thirty, perished in that fight. The death of Critias, and the stout defence of Piræus, together with some exhortations vsed by Thrasybulus to the Citizens, wrought such effect, that the thirtie were deposed. Neuertheless there were so many of the three thousand, who hauing communicated with the thirty in their misdeeds, feared to be called to a sharpe account, that no peace, nor quiet forme of gouernement could be established. For Embassadors were sent to Sparta, who crauing aide against Thrasybulus, and his followers, had fauourable audience, and a power sent to their assistance, both by Land and Sea, vnder the conduct of Lysander, and his Brother; whom Pausanias the Spartan King did follow, raising an Armie of the Cities confederate with the Lacedæmonians. And here appeared first the iealousie, wherein some people held the State of Sparta. The Bœotians, and Corinthians, who in the late warres had been the most bitter enemies to Athens, refused to follow Pausanias in this expedition; alleaging that it stood not with their othes, to make warre against that people, who had not hither to broken any one article of the league: but fearing, indeede, lest the Lacedæmonians should annexe the Territorie of Athens to their owne Demaines. It is not to bee doubted, that Pausanias tooke this answere in good part. For it was not his purpose to destroy those against whom he went, but only to crosse the proceedings of Lysander, whom he enuied. Therefore hauing in some small skirmishes against them of Thrasybulus his party, made a shew of warre, finally wrought such meanes, that all things were compounded quietly: the thirtie men, and such others, as were like to giue cause of tumult, being sent to Sparta. The remainder of that tyrannicall faction, hauing with-drawne themselues to Eleusine, were shortly after found to attempt some innouation; whereupon the whole City rising against them, took their Captaines, as they were comming to Parlie, and slew them: which done, to auoide further inconuenience, a law was made, that all iniuries past should be forgotten, and no man called into question for wrongs committed. By which order, wisely made, and carefully obserued, the Citie returned to her former quietnesse.

Of the expedition of CYRVS the younger.

The grounds of CYRVS his attempt against his brother.

HE matters of Greece now standing vpon such termes, that no one Estate durst oppose it selfe against that of Lacademon; young Cyrus, brother to Artaxerxes, King of Persia, hauing in his fathers life time very carefully prosecuted the warre against Athens, did send his messengers to Sparta, requesting that their loue might appeare no lesse to him, than that which he had shewed towards them in their dangerous warre against the Athenians. To this request, being generall, the Lacedæmonians gaue a sutable answere, commanding their Admirall to performe vnto Cyrus all seruice that hee should require of him. If Cyrus had plainely discouered himselfe, and the Lacedæmonians bent their whole power to his assistance, very like it is, that either the Kingdome of Persia should haue been the recompence of his deserts, or that he perishing in battaile, as after he did, the subuersion of that Empire had forthwith ensued. But it pleased God, rather to shew vnto the Greekes the waies, which vnder the Macedonian Enfignes, the victorious foot-steps of their posteritie should measure; and opening vnto them the riches, and withall the weakenesse of the Persian, to kindle in them both desire and hope of that conquest, which he reserued to another generation; than to giue into their hands that mightie Kingdome, whose houre was not yet come. The loue which Paryfatis, the Queene-Mother of Persia bare vnto Cyrus her yonger sonne, being seconded by the earnest fauour of the people, and ready desires of many principall men, had moued this yong Prince, in his fathers old age, to aspire after the succession. But being sent for by his Father (as hath before beene shewed) whose meaning was to curbe this ambitious youth; hee found his elder brother Artaxerxes established so surely by the old Kings fauour, that it were not safe to attempt any meanes of displanting him, by whose disfauour, himself might easily lose the place of a Viceroy, which he held in Asia the lesse, and hardly bee able to maintaine his owne life. The neerest neighbour to Cyrus of all the Kings Deputies in the lower Asia, was Tissaphernes, a man compounded of cowardise, trecherie, craft, and all vices which accustomably branch out of these. This man accompanied Cyrus to his Father, vsing by the way all faire shewes of friendship, as to a Prince, for whom it might well be thought, that Queene Paryfatis had obtained the inheritance of that mightie Empire. And it was very true, that Paryfatis had vsed the best of her endeuour to that purpose, alleaging that (which in former ages had bin much auaileable to Xerxes, in the like disceptation with his elder brother) Artaxerxes was borne whileft his father was a priuate man, but Cyrus, when he was a crowned King. All which not sufficing; when the most that could bee obtained for Cyrus, was the pardon of some presumptuous demeanour, and confirmation of his place in Lydia, and the parts adioyning: then did this Tissaphernes discouer his nature, and accuse his friend Cyrus to the new King Artaxerxes, of a dangerous treason intended against his person. Vpon this accusation, whether true or false, very easily beleeued, Cyrus was arrested, and by the most vehement intreatie of his Mother very hardly deliuered, and sent back into his owne Prouince.

§. II.

The preparations of CYRVS, and his first entrie into the Warre.

THe forme of gouernement which the Persian Lieutenants vsed in their seuerall Prouinces, was in many points almost Regall. For they made Warre and Peace, as they thought it meete, not onely for the Kings behoofe, but for their owne reputation; vsually indeede with the Kings enemies, yet sometimes one with another: which was the more easily tolerated, because their owne heads were held only at the Kings pleasure, which caused them to frame all their doings to his will, whatsoeuer it were, or they could coniecture it to be. Cyrus therefore being settled in Lydia, began to consider with himselfe, the interest that he had in the Kingdome; the small assurance of his brothers loue, held only by his Mothers intercession; the disgrace endured by his late imprisonment; and the meanes which he had by loue of his owne people, and that good neighbourhood of the Lacedæmonians, whom he had bound vnto him, to obtaine the Crowne for himselfe. Neither was it expedient that he should long sit idle, as waighting till occasion should present it selfe: but rather enterprise somewhat whilest yet his Mother liued, who could procure a good interpretation to all his actions, if they were no worse than only questionable. Hereupon he first beganne to quarrell with Tissaphernes, and seized vpon many Townes of his iurisdiction, annexing them to his owne Prouince; which displeased not Artaxerxes at all, who (besides that hee was of condition somewhat simple) being truly paid by Cyrus the accustomable Tributes out of those places, was well contented to see his brothers hot spirit exercised in priuate quarrels. But Tissaphernes, whose base conditions were hated, & cowardise despised, although he durst not aduenture to take armes against Cyrus, yet perceiuing that the Milesians were about to giue vp themselues into the hands of that yong Prince, as many other townes of the Ionians had done, thought by terrour to preserue his reputation, and keepe the Towne in his owne hands. Wherefore he slew many, and many he banished, who flying to Cyrus, were gently entertained, as bringing faire occasion to take armes, which was no small part of his desire. In leuying Souldiers he vsed great policie; for he took not only the men of his owne Prouince, or of the Countries adioyning, whose liues were readie at his will; but secretly he furnished some Gracian Captaines with money, who being very good men of warre, entertained Souldiers therewith, some of them warring in Thrace, others in Thessalie, others elsewhere in Greece; but all of them ready to crosse the Seas, at the first call of Cyrus, till which time they had secret instructions to prolong their seuerall warres, that the Souldiers might bee held in continuall exercise, and readie in armes vpon the sudden. Cyrus hauing sent a power of men to besiege Miletus, forthwith summoned these bands of the Greekes, who very readily came ouer to his assistance, being thirteene thousand very firme Souldiers, and able to make head (which is almost incredible) against the whole power of Artaxerxes. With this Armie, and that which he had leuied before, hee could very easily haue forced Miletus, and chased away Tissaphernes out of Asia the lesse: but his purpose was not so to lose time in small matters, that was to be imploied in the accomplishment of higher designes. Pretending therefore that the Pisidians, a people of Asia the lesse, not subiect to the Persian, had inuaded his Territorie, he raised the siege of Miletus, and with all speed marched Eastward, leauing Tissaphernes much amazed, who had no leisure to reioyce that Cyrus had left him to himselfe, when he considered, that so great an Army, and so strong, was neuer leuied against the Rouers of Pisidia, but rather against the great King his Master. For which cause cauſe taking a band of fiue hundred horſe, hee poſted away to carrie tidings to the Court, of this great preparation.

§. III.

How CYRVS tooke his iourney into the higher Aſia, and came vp cloſe to his Brother.

THe tumult which his comming brought was very great, and great the exclamations of the Queen Statira, againſt Paryſatis, the Queene-Mother, whom ſhe called the Author and occaſioner of the warre. But whileſt the King in great feare was arming the high Countries in his defence, the danger haſtned vpon him very faſt. For Cyrus made great marches, hauing his numbers much increaſed, by the repaire of his Countrimen, though moſt ſtrengthned by the acceſſe of ſeuē hundred Greeks, and of other foure hundred of the ſame Nation, who reuolted vnto him from the King. How terrible the Greekes were to the Barbarians, he found by triall in a Muſter, which (to pleaſe the Queene of Cilicia, who had brought him aide) he made in Phrygia; where the Greekes by his direction making offer of a charge vpon the reſt of his Armie, which contained a hundred thouſand men, the whole Campe (not perceiuing that this was but a brauerie) fled a-maine, the victuallers and baggagers forſaking their cabbins, and running all away for very feare. This was to Cyrus a ioyfull ſpectacle, who knew very well, that his brother was followed by men of the ſame temper, and the more vnlikely to make reſiſtance, becauſe they were preſt to the warre againſt their will and diſpoſitions, whereas his Armie was drawne a-long by meere affection and good will. Neuertheleſſe he found it a very hard matter to perſwade the Greekes to paſſe the Riuer of Euphrates. For the very length of the way which they had troden, wearied them with conceit of the tedious returne. Therefore he was driuen, being yet in Cilicia, to ſeeke excuſes, telling them, that Abrocomas, one of the Kings principall Captaines, and his owne great enemy, lay by the Riuer, againſt whom he requeſted them to aſſiſt him. By ſuch deuices, and exceſſiue promiſe of reward, he brought them to Euphrates, where ſome of the Greekes conſidering, That whoſo paſſed the Riuer firſt, ſhould haue the moſt thankes, and might ſafely returne if the reſt ſhould refuſe to follow them, they entred the Foords, whereby were all finally perſwaded to doe as ſome had begunne, and being allured by great hopes, they reſolued to ſeeke out Artaxerxes, where ſoeuer he was to be found. The King in the meane time hauing raiſed an army of nine hundred thouſand men, was not ſo confident vpon this huge multitude, as to aduenture them in triall of a plaine battaile. Abrocomas, who with three hundred thouſand men, had vnder-taken to make good the Straights of Syria, which were very narrow, and fortified with a ſtrong wall, and other defences of nature, and art, which made the place to ſeeme impregnable, had quitted the paſſage, and retired himſelf toward the Kings forces, not daring to look Cyrus in the face, who deſpairing to finde any way by Land, had procured the Lacedæmonian fleete, by the benefit whereof to haue tranſported his Armie. I doe not finde that this cowardiſe of Abrocomas, or of his Souldiers, who arriued not at the Campe, till fiue daies were paſt after the battaile, receiued either puniſhment, or diſgrace; for they, toward whom he with-drew himſelfe, were all made of the ſame metall.

Therefore Artaxerxes was vpon the point of retiring to the vttermoſt bounds of his Kingdom, vntill by Teribazus, one of his Captaines, he was perſwaded not to abandon ſo many goodly Prouinces to the Enemie, who would thereby haue gathered addition of ſtrength, and (which in the ſharpe diſputation of Title to a Kingdome is moſt auaileable) would haue growne ſuperior in reputation. By ſuch aduice, the King reſolued vpon meeting with his brother, who now began to be ſecure,being fully perſwaded,that Artaxerxes would neuer dare to abide him in the field. For the King hauing caſt vp a Trench of almoſt fortie miles in length,about thirtie foot broad , and eighteene foote deepe, intended there to haue encamped: but his courage failing him, he abandoned that place,thinking nothing ſo ſafe, as to be farre diſtant from his enemies.

§. IIII.

The battaile betweene CYRVS and ARTAXERXES.

THe Armie of Cyrus hauing ouercome many difficulties of euil waies, and ſcarcitie of victuals, was much encouraged by perceiuing this great feare of Artaxerxes,& being paſt this trench,marched careleſly in great diſorder, hauing beſtowed their Armes in Carts, and vpon Beaſts of carriage; when on the ſudden one of their Vaunt-currors, brought newes of the Kings approch. Hereupon with great tumult they armed themſelues,and had ranged their battailes in good order vpon the ſide of the Riuer Euphrates,where they waited for the cõming of their enemies, whom they ſaw not till it was after-noone. But when they ſaw the cloud of duſt raiſed by the feete of that huge multitude,which the King drew after him, and perceiued by their neere approch how well they were marſhalled, comming on very orderly, in ſilence, whereas it had beene expected, that ruſhing violently with loude clamours, they ſhould haue ſpent all their force vpon the firſt brunt;and when it appeared that the fronts of the two Armies were ſo vnequall in diſtent, being all embattailed in one bodie and ſquare,that Cyrus taking his place (as was the Perſian maner) in the middeſt of his owne,did not with the corner,and vtmoſt point therof,reach to the halfe breadth of Artaxerxes his battaile,who carried a front proportionable to his number,exceeding nine times that of Cyrus: then did the Greekes begin to diſtruſt their owne manhood,which was not accuſtomed to make proofe of it ſelf,vpon ſuch exceſſiue oddes. It was almoſt incredible,that ſo great an Armie ſhould bee ſo eaſily chaſed. Neuertheleſſe, it quickly appeared, that theſe Perſians, hauing learned (contrary to their cuſtome) to giue charge vpon their enemies with ſilence; had not learned(for it was contrary to their nature)to receiue a ſtrong charge with courage. Vpon the very firſt offer of on-ſet,made by the Greekes,all that beaſtly rabble of cowards fled amaine,without abiding the ſtroke, or ſtaying till they were within reach of a Dart. The Chariots armed with hookes and ſithes (whereof Artaxerxes had two hundred,and Cyrus not twentie) did ſmall hurt that day, becauſe the driuers of them leaping downe, fled away on foot. This baſe demeanour of his enemies gaue ſo much confidence to Cyrus, and his Followers, that ſuch as were about him forth-with adored him as King. And certainely, the Title had beene aſſured vnto him that day,had not he ſought how to declare himſelfe worthy of it,ere yet he had obtained it For, perceiuing that Artaxerxes, who found that part of the field which lay before him voide, was about to encompaſſe the Greeks,and to ſet vpon them in the reare,he aduanced with ſixe hundred Horſe, and gaue ſo valiant a charge vpon a ſquadron of ſixe thouſand,which lay before the King, that he brake it,ſlaying the Captaine thereof, Artagerſes,with his owne hands,and putting all the reſt to flight. Hereupon his whole companie of ſixe hundred,very few excepted, began to follow the chaſe, leauing Cyrus too ill attended, who perceiuing where the King ſtood in troupe,vncertaine whether to fight,or leaue the field, could not containe himſelfe,but ſaid; I ſee the man: and preſently with a ſmall handfull of men about him ranne vpon his brother, whom he ſtrake through the Curace, and wounded in the breſt. Hauing giuen this ſtroke,which was his laſt,he receiued immediately the fatall blow,which gaue period at once to his ambition and life,being wounded vnder the eye with a dart,throwne by a baſe-fellow,wherewith aſtonied, he

he fell dead from his horſe, or ſo hurt, that it was vnpoſsible to haue recouered him, though all which were with him, did their beſt for his ſafety; not caring afterwards for their owne liues, when once they perceiued that Cyrus their Maſter was ſlaine. Artaxerxes cauſed the head and right hand of his brother to bee forthwith ſtricken off, and ſhewed to his people, who now purſuing them, fled apace, calling vpon the name of Cyrus, and deſiring him to pardon them. But when this great accident had breathed new courage into the Kings troupes, & vtterly diſmaied ſuch Perſian Captaines, as were now, euen in their owne eies, no better than rebels; it was not long ere the Campe of Cyrus was taken, being quite abandoned, from whence Artaxerxes, making all ſpeede, arriued quickly at the quarter of the Greekes, which was about three miles from the place where Cyrus fell. There hee met with Tiſſaphernes, who hauing made way through the battaile of the Greekes, was readie now to joyne with his Maſter in ſpoiling their Tents. Had not the newes, which Artaxerxes brought with him of his brothers death, beene ſufficient to counteruaile all diſaſters receiued; the exploit of Tiſſaphernes in breaking through the Greekes would haue yeelded little comfort. For Tiſſaphernes had not ſlaine any one man of the Greekes, but contrariwiſe, when hegaue vpon them, they opening their battaile, draue him with great ſlaughter through them, in ſuch wiſe, that he rather eſcaped as out of an hard paſſage, than forced his way through the ſquadron of the Greekes. Hereof the King being informed by him, and that the Greekes, as Maſters of the field, gaue chaſe to all that came in their ſight; they ranged their Companies into good order, and followed after theſe Greekes, intending to ſet vpon them in reare. But theſe good Souldiers perceiuing the Kings approch, turned their faces, and made head againſt him; who not intending to ſeeke honour with danger of his life, wheeled about and fled, being purſued vnto a certaine Village, that lay vnder a Hill, on the top whereof he made a ſtand, rather in a brauerie, than with purpoſe to attempt vpon theſe bold-fellowes any further. For he knew well that his brothers death had ſecured his eſtate, whom he would ſeeme to haue ſlaine with his owne hand, thinking that fact alone ſufficient to giue reputation to his valour; and this reputation he thought that he might now preſerue wel enough, by ſhewing a manly looke, halfe a mile off. On the top of this Hill therefore he aduanced his Standard, a golden Eagle diſplaied on the top of a Speare. This enſigne might haue encouraged his people, had not ſome of the Greekes eſpied it, who not meaning that he ſhould abide ſo neere them, with all their power marched toward him. The King diſcouering their approch, fled vpon the ſpurre; ſo that none remained in the place of battaile, ſaue only the Greekes, who had loſt that day not one man, nor taken any other harme, than that one of them was hurt with an arrow. Much they wondred that they heard no newes of Cyrus, but thinking that hee was purſuing the Armie, they thought it was fitteſt for them, hauing that day done enough, to returne to their quarter, and take their Supper, to which they had good appetite, becauſe the expectation of the Kings comming had giuen them no leiſure to dine.

§. V.

The hard eſtate of the Greekes after the fight; and how ARTAXERXES in vaine ſought to haue made them yeeld vnto him.

IT was now about the ſetting of the Sunne, and they bringing home darke night with them, found their Campe ſpoiled, little, or nothing being left, that might ſerue for food: ſo that wanting victualls to ſatisfie their hunger, they refreſhed their wearie bodies with ſleepe. In the meane ſeaſon Artaxerxes returning to his Camp, which he entred by Torch-light, could not enjoy the pleaſure of his good fortune entire, becauſe he perceiued perceiued that the baſeneſſe of his people, and weakeneſſe of his Empire, was now plainely diſcouered to the Greekes: which gaue him aſſurance, that if any of theſe who had beheld the ſhamefull demeanor of his Armie, ſhould liue to carry tidings home, it would not be long, ere with greater forces they diſputed with him for his whole Signorie. Wherefore hee reſolued, to trie all meanes, whereby hee might bring them to deſtruction, and not let one eſcape to carrie tidings of that which he had ſeene: to which purpoſe hee ſent them a braue meſſage the next morning; Charging them to deliuer vp their Armes, and come to his Gate, to awaite there vpon his Mercie. It ſeemes that he was in good hope to haue found their high courages broken, vpon report of his brothers death: but he was greatly deceiued in that thought. For the Greekes being aduertiſed that morning from Arieus, a principall Cõmander vnder Cyrus, that his Maſter being ſlaine, he had retired himſelfe to the place of their laſt encamping, about eight miles from them, whence intending to returne into Ionia, his meaning was to diſlodge the next day, awaiting for them ſo long if they would joyne with him, but reſoluing to ſtay no longer: they ſent anſwere back to Arieus, that hauing beaten the King out of the field, and finding none that durſt reſiſt them, they would place Arieus himſelfe in the Kings Throne, if he would joyne with them, and purſue the victorie. Before they receiued any reply to this anſwere, the Meſſengers of Artaxerxes arriued at the Campe, whoſe errand ſeemed to the Captaines very inſolent: One told them that it was not for the Vanquiſhers to yeeld their Weapons; another, that he would die ere hee yeelded to ſuch a motion; a third asked, whether the King, as hauing the victorie, required their Weapons; if ſo, why did he not fetch them? or, whether he deſired them in way of friendſhip; for then would they firſt know, with what courteſie hee meant to requite their kindneſſe. To this queſtion Phalinus a Grecian, waiting vpon Tiſſaphernes, anſwered; That the King hauing ſlaine Cyrus, knew no man that could pretend any Title to his Kingdome, in the middeſt whereof he held them faſt encloſed with great Riuers, being able to bring againſt them ſuch numbers of men, as they wanted ſtrength to kill if they would hold vp their throats, for which cauſe he accounted them his priſoners. Theſe words, to them, who knew themſelues to be free, were nothing pleaſant. Therefore, one told Phalinus, that hauing nothing left, but their Armes & Valour, whileſt they kept their Armes, their Valour would be ſeruiceable, but ſhould they yeeld them, it was to be doubted, that their bodies would not long remaine their owne. Hereat Phalinus laughed, ſaying; This yong man did ſeeme a Philoſopher, and made a pretty ſpeech; but that his deepe ſpeculation ſhewed his wits to be very ſhallow, if he thought with his Armes, and his Valour, to preuaile againſt the great King. It ſeemes that Phalinus being a Courtier, and imploied in a buſineſſe of importance, thought himſelf too profound a Statesman, to be checkt in his Embaſſage by a bookiſh diſcourſer. But his wiſdome herein failed him. For whatſoeuer he himſelfe was (of whom no more is knowne than that he brought an vnhoneſt meſſage to his owne Countrimen, perſwading them baſely to ſurrender their Weapons, & Liues, to the mercileſſe Barbarians) this yong Scholler by him deſpiſed, was that great Xenophon, who, when all the principall Commanders were ſurpriſed by treacherie of the Perſians, being a priuate Gentleman, and hauing neuer ſeene the warres before, vnder-tooke the conduct of the Armie, which he brought ſafe into Greece, freeing it from all thoſe, and from greater dangers than Phalinus could propound. Some there were who promiſed to be faithfull to the King, as they had beene to Cyrus, offering their ſeruice in Ægypt, where they thought Artaxerxes might haue vſe of them. But the finall anſwere was, That without Weapons they could neither doe the King good as Friends, nor defend themſelues from him as Enemies. Hereupon Phalinus deliuered the Kings further pleaſure, which was to grant them Truce, whileſt they abode where they thẽ were, denouncing Warre if they ſtirred thence; Whereunto hee required their anſwere. Clearchus the Generall told him, they liked it. How (ſaith Phalinus) muſt I vnderſtand ſtand you? as chooſing peace if we ſtay, otherwiſe warre, ſaid Clearchus. But whether warre or peace? quoth this politique Embaſſadour. To whom Clearchus (not willing to acquaint him with their purpoſe,) Let our doings tell you; and ſo diſmiſſed him, no wiſer than he came. All that day the Greekes were faine to feede vpon their Horſes, Aſſes, and other Beaſts, which they roſted with arrowes, darts, and woodden targets, throwne away by the Enemies.

§. VI.

How the Greekes beganne to returne home-wards.

AT night they tooke their way towards Arieus, to whom they came at mid-night; being forſaken by foure hundred foot, and forty horſe, all Thracians, who fled ouer the King, by whom how they were entertained, I doe not finde. Like enough it is that they were cut in pieces; for had they been kindly vſed, it may well bee thought that ſome of them ſhould haue accompanied Tiſſaphernes, and ſerued as Stales to draw in the reſt. Arieus being of too baſe a temper, and birth, to thinke vpon ſeeking the Kingdome for himſelfe, with ſuch aſſiſtance as might haue giuen it vnto Cyrus, was very well pleaſed to make couenant with them for mutuall aſſiſtance vnto the laſt: Wherunto both parts hauing ſworne, he aduiſed them to take another way homeward, which ſhould bee ſomewhat longer, yet ſafer and fitter to relieue them with victuals, than that by which they came. The next day, hauing made a weariſome march, and tired the Souldiers, they found the Kings Armie which had coaſted them, lodged in certaine Villages, where they purpoſed themſelues to haue encamped: towards which Clearchus made directly, becauſe hee would not ſeeme by declining them to ſhew feare, or weakeneſſe. That the Kings men were contented to remoue, and giue place to their betters, it cannot be ſtrange to any that hath conſidered their former behauiour; Nor ſtrange, that the Græcians being wearie and hungrie, and lying among enemies in an vnknowne Countrie, ſhould be very fearefull: but it is almoſt paſt beliefe, that the noiſe which was heard of theſe poore men, calling one to another tumultuouſly, as the preſent condition inforced them to doe, ſhould make the Perſians flie out of their Campe, and ſo affright the great King, that in ſtead of demanding their Armes, he ſhould craue peace of them. The next day very early, came meſſengers from Artaxerxes, deſiring free acceſſe for Embaſſadours, to entreat of peace. Were it not that ſuch particulars doe beſt open the qualitie of the perſons, by whom things were managed, I ſhould hold it fitter, to runne ouer the general paſſages of thoſe times, than to dwel among circumſtances. But ſurely it is a point very remarkeable, That when Clearchus had willed the Meſſengers to bid the King prepare for battaile, becauſe the Greekes (as he ſaid) wanting whereupon to dine, could not endure to heare of truce till their bellies were full; Artaxerxes diſſembling the indignitie, was contented ſweetly to ſwallow downe this pill, ſending them guides, who conducted them to a place where was plentie of victuals to relieue them.

HItherto the Greekes, relying vpon their owne vertue, had rather aduanced their affaires, than brought themselues into any straights or termes of disaduantage. But now came vnto them the subtile Fox Tissaphernes, who circumuenting the chiefe Commanders by fine sleights, did mischieuously entrappe them, to the extreme danger of the Armie. He told them, that his Prouince, lying neere vnto Greece, had caused him greatly to desire, that their deliuerance might be wrought by his procurement; knowing well that in time to come, both they, and their Countrimen at home, would not be vnthankefull for such a benefit. Herewithall hee forgot not to rehearse the great seruice that he had done to his Master, being the first that aduertised him of Cyrus his intent, and hauing not only brought him a good strength of men, but in the day of battaile shewed his face to the Greekes, when all others turned their backs: that he, together with the King, did enter their Campe, and gaue chase to the Barbarians that stood on the part of Cyrus. All this (quoth hee) did I alledge to the King, entreating that he would giue me leaue to conduct you safe into Greece; in which suite I haue good hope to speede, if you will send a milde answere to him, who hath willed me to aske you, for what cause yee haue borne Armes against him. The Captaines hearing this, were contented to giue gentle words, which Tissaphernes relating to the King, procured (though very hardly as he said) that peace should bee granted: the conditions whereof were; That they should passe freely through all the Kings Dominions, paying for what they tooke, and committing no spoile: yet that it should be lawfull for them to take victuals by force, in any place that refused to affoord them an open Market. Hereunto both parties hauing sworne, the League was concluded, and Tissaphernes returning to the King to take leaue, and end all businesse, came vnto them againe after twentie daies, and then they set forward. This interim of twenty daies, which Tissaphernes did spend at the Court, ministred great occasion of mistrust to his new Confederates. For besides his long absence, which alone sufficed to breede doubt; the Brethren, and Kindred of Arieus, repairing daily to him, and other Persians to his Souldiers, did work him and them so with assurance of pardon, and other allurements, that hee daily grew more strange to the Greekes, than formerly he had beene. This caused many to aduise Clearchus, rather to passe forward as well as he might, than to relie vpon couenants, and sit still whilest the King laied snares to entrap them. But he on the contrarie perswaded them, to rest contented whilest they were well, and not to cast themselues againe into those difficulties, out of which they were newly freed by the late Treatie; reciting withall their owne wants, and the Kings meanes, but especially the Oathes mutually giuen and taken, wherewith hee saw no reason why the enemie should haue clogged himselfe if hee meant mischiefe, hauing power enough to doe them harme by a faire and open Warre.

Tissaphernes was a very honourable Man (if honour may bee valued by greatnesse and place in Court) which caused his Oath to bee the more esteemed; for as much as no inforcement, or base respect, was like to haue drawne it from him. But his falshood was such, both in substance and in succesſe, as may fitly expound that saying, which proceeded from the fountaine of Truth, I hate a rich man a lyar. A lye may finde excuse when it growes out of feare, for that passion hath his originall from weakenesse. But when Power, which is a Character of the Almightie, shall be made the supporter of vntruth, the falshood is most abominable; for the offender, like proud Lucifer, aduancing his owne strength against the diuine Iustice, doth commit that sinne with an high hand, which commonly produceth lamentable table effects, and is followed with ſure vengeance. It was not long ere Tiſſaphernes found meanes to deſtroy all the Captaines, whom hee ſubtilly got into his power by a traine; making the Generall Clearchus himſelfe the meane to draw in all the reſt. The buſineſſe was contriued thus: Hauing trauailed ſome daies together in ſuch wiſe, that the Perſians did not encampe with the Greekes, who were very jealous of the great familiaritie, appearing betweene Tiſſaphernes, and Arieus; Clearchus thought it conuenient to roote out of Tiſſaphernes his braines all cauſes of diſtruſt, whereof many had growne in that ſhort time. To which purpoſe obtaining priuate conference with him, he rehearſed the oath of Confederacie, which had paſt betweene them, ſhewing how religiouſly he meant to keepe it, and repeating the benefits, which the Greekes did receiue by the helpe of Tiſſaphernes, he promiſed that their loue ſhould appeare to him not vnfruitful, if he would make vſe of their ſeruice againſt the Myſians or Piſidians, who were accuſtomed to infeſt his Prouince, or againſt the Ægyptians, who were then Rebels to the great King. For which cauſe he deſired him, that whereas al diuine and humane reſpects had linked them together, he would not giue place to any cloſe accuſation or ſuſpition, whereby might grow ſudden inconuenience to either of them, vpon no juſt ground. The faithleſſe Perſian was very much delighted with this ſpeech, which miniſtred faire occaſion to the execution of his purpoſe. Therefore he told Clearchus, that all this was by him wiſely conſidered, wiſhing him further to call to minde how many waies hee could haue vſed to bring them to confuſion, without perill to himſelfe, eſpecially by burning the Countrie, through which they were to paſſe, whereby they muſt needes haue periſhed by meere famine. For which cauſe hee ſaid that it had beene great folly, to ſeeke by perjurie, odious to God and Man, the deſtruction of ſuch as were alreadie in his hands; But the truth was, that his owne loue to them had moued him to worke their ſafetie, not onely for thoſe ends which Clearchus had recounted, of pleaſures that might redound to himſelfe, and the King, by their aſſiſtance: but for that he might by their friendſhip, hope to obtaine what Cyrus had miſt. Finally, he inuited the credulous Gentleman to Supper, and ſent him away ſo well aſſured of his good will, that he promiſed to bring all the Captaines with him to the ſame place, where, in preſence of them all, Tiſſaphernes likewiſe promiſed to tell openly, which of them had by ſecret information ſought to raiſe diſſenſion between them. Clearchus himſelfe being thus deceiued, with great importunitie drew all the chiefe Commanders, and many of the inferiour Leaders, to repaire with him to the camp of Tiſſaphernes, whither followed them about two hundred of the common Souldiers as it had beene to ſome common Faire. But being there arriued, Clearchus with other the fiue principall Coronels, were called into the Tent, the reſt ſtaying without, where they had not waited long ere a ſigne was giuen, vpon which they within were apprehended, and the reſidue ſlaine. Forthwith certaine bands of Perſian Horſe-men ſcoured the field, killing as many Greekes as they met, and riding vp to the very Campe of the Grecians, who wondred much at the tumult, whereof they knew not the cauſe, till one, eſcaping ſorely wounded, informed them of all that had beene done. Hereupon the Greekes took Armes in haſte, thinking that the enemy would forthwith haue aſſailed their Campe. Anon they might perceiue the Embaſſadours of Tiſſaphernes, among whom were his owne brother, and Arieus, followed with three hundred Horſe, who called for the principall men in the Armie, ſaying, that they brought a meſſage from the King, which Arieus deliuered to this effect. That Clearchus hauing broken his faith, and the league made, was juſtly rewarded with death; that Menon and Procenus, two other of the fiue Coronels, for detecting his treacherie, were highly honoured; and finally, that the King required them to ſurrender their Armes, which were due to him, as hauing belonged vnto his ſeruant Cyrus. When ſome altercation had followed vpon this meſſage, Xenophon told the Embaſſadours, that if Clearchus had in ſuch ſort offended, it was well that he was in ſuch ſort puniſhed; but he willed them to ſend back

Menon

Menon and Proxenus, whom they had so greatly honoured, that by them, as by common friends to both Nations, the Greekes might be aduised how to answere the Persian. Hereunto the Embassadours knew not how to frame any reply, and therefore departed without speaking one word more. Clearchus, and the other foure were sent to Artaxerxes, by whose commandement their heads were striken off. I hold it not amisse to preuent the order of time, annexing to this perfidiousnesse of Tissaphernes, the reward which he afterward received. He saw his Prouince wasted by the Greekes, against whom receiuing from his Master conuenient aide of men and money, hee did so ill manage his affaires, that neither subtiltie, nor perjurie (to which he failed not to haue recourse) auailing him; finally, the King was jealous of his cunning head, and sent a new Lieutenant into those parts, who tooke it from his shoulders. Such was the recompence of his treacherie, which made him so mistrusted at home, that the seruice which he could not doe, he was thought vpon priuate ends to neglect; and so hated abroad, that he knew not which way to flye from the stroke, all the world being shut against him. But now let vs returne to the prosperitie, wherein hee triumphed without great cause, hauing betrayed brauer men than himselfe, and intending to bring the like mischiefe vpon the whole Armie.

§. VIII.

How XENOPHON heartened the Greekes, and in despight of TISSAPHERNES went off safely.

GReat was the heauinesse of the Souldiers, being now destitute of Leaders, and no lesse their feare of the euill hanging ouer their heads, which they knew not how to auoide. Among the rest, Xenophon, whose learning supplied his want of experience, finding the deepe sadnesse of the whole Armie to be such, as hindred them from taking any course of preuenting the danger at hand, began to aduise the vnder-Officers of Proxenus his companies, whose familiar friend he had beene, to bethinke themselues of some meane, whereby their safetie might be wrought, and the Souldiers encouraged: setting before their eyes whatsoeuer might serue to giue them hope, and aboue al perswading them in no wise to yeeld to the mercy of their barbarous enemies.

Hereupon they desired him to take vpon him the charge of that Regiment; and so together with him, the same night calling vp such as were remaining of any account, they made choice of the fittest men to succeede in the places of those who were slaine, or taken. This being done, and order set downe for disburdening the Armie of all superfluous impediments, they easily comforted themselues for the losse of Tissaphernes his assistance, hoping to take victuals by force better cheap than he had beene wont to sell them; To which purpose they intended to take vp their lodging two or three miles further, among some plentifull Villages, and so to proceede, marching towards the heads of those great Riuers, which lay in their way, and to passe them where they were foordable. Many attempts were made vpon them by Tissaphernes, whom they, seruing all on foot, were not able to requite for the harme which they received by the Persian Archers, who shot at a farther distance than the Greekes could reach. For this cause did Xenophon prouide slings, wherewith he ouer-reached the enemy; and finding some Horses fit for seruice, that were imployed among the carriages, he set men vpon them; training likewise his Archers to shoote compasse, who had beene accustomed to the point blanke. By these meanes did hee beare off the Persians who assailed him; and sometimes gaue them chace with that band of fiftie Horse, which being well backt, with a firme bodie of footmen, and seconded with troupes of the light-armed-shot and slingers, compelled the enemie to lie a-loofe. Tissaphernes not daring to come to handie-gripes with theſe reſolute men, did poſſeſſe the tops of Mountaines, and places of aduantage, by which they were to paſſe. But finally, when their valour made way through all ſuch difficulties, he betooke himſelfe to that courſe, which was indeede the ſureſt, of burning the Countrie. With great ſorrow did the Greekes behold the Villages on fire, and thereby all hope of victuals cut off. Some aduiſed to defend the Countrie, as granted by the enemie himſelfe to be theirs; others to make more fires, if ſo perhaps the Perſians might be aſhamed to doe that which were the deſire of ſuch as made paſſage in hoſtile manner; But theſe were faint comforts. The beſt counſaile was, that being neere vnto the Carduchi, a people enemie to the Perſian, they ſhould enter into their Countrie paſſing ouer ſome high Mountaines which lay betweene them. This courſe they followed, which could not haue auailed them, if Tiſſaphernes had begunne ſooner to cut off their victuals, rather then to ſeeke to force, or to circumuent them by his fine wit.

The difficulties which the Greeke Armie found in paſſing through the Land of the Carduchi.

ENtring vpon the Land of the Carduchi, they were encountred with many difficulties of waies, but much more afflicted by the fierce Inhabitants, who, accuſtomed by force to defend themſelues againſt the huge Armies of the Perſian, were no way inferiour to the Greekes in daring, but only in the Art of warre. They were verie light of foot, skilfull Archers; and vſed the Sling well; which weapons in that mountainous Countrie were of much vſe againſt theſe poore trauailers, afflicting them in ſeuen daies which they ſpent in that paſſage, farre more than all the power of the great King had done. Betweene the Territorie of theſe Carduchi, and the parts of Armenia confining them, ranne Centrites a great Riuer, vpon which the Greekes refreſhed themſelues one day, reioycing that they had ſo well eſcaped theſe dangers, and hoping that the remainder would proue eaſie. But the next morning they ſaw certaine troupes of Horſe, that lay to forbid their paſſage. Theſe were leauied by the Kings Deputies in thoſe parts; Tiſſaphernes and his Companies hauing taken their way towards Ionia. The Riuer was broade and deepe, ſo that it was not poſſible for ſuch as would enter it, to make reſiſtance againſt thoſe which kept the oppoſite bankes. To increaſe theſe dangers the Carduchi following vpon them, lay on the ſide of a Mountaine, within leſſe than a mile of the water. But it was their good hap to diſcouer a Foord, by which the greater number of them paſſing ouer, did eaſily chaſe away the Subiects of the Perſian, and then ſending backe the moſt expedite men, gaue ſuccour to the Reare-ward, againſt which the Carduchi being ſlightly armed, could not on plaine ground make reſiſtance hand to hand. Theſe Carduchi ſeeme to haue inhabited the Mountaines of Niphates, which are not farre from the Spring of Tygris; though Ptolomie place them far more to the Eaſt vpon the Riuer of Cyrus in Media, wherein he differs much from Xenophon, whoſe relation being grounded vpon his owne knowledge, doth beſt in this caſe deſerue credit. Of the Riuer Centrites (as of many other Riuers, Townes, and Places, mentioned by Xenophon) I will not labour to make a coniecture, which may endure the ſeueritie of a Critick. For Ptolomie, and the whole Nation of Geographers, adde ſmall light to this expedition: only of this laſt, I thinke it the ſame which falleth into Tigris, not much aboue Artaſigarta ſpringing out of Niphates, and running by the Towne of Sardeua in Gordene, a Prouince of Armenia the Great, wherein the Greekes hauing paſſed Centrites did arriue.

How TERIBAZVS Gouernour of Armenia, seeking to entrap the Greekes with termes of fained peace, was disappointed and shamefully beaten.

THe Armie finding in Armenia good prouision, marched without any disturbance about fiftie or threescore miles to the heads of the Riuer Tigris, and passing ouer them, trauailed as farre further without resistance, till they were encountred by Teribazus at the Riuer Teleboa, which Xenophon commends as a goodly water, though small; but Ptolomie and others omit it. Teribazus gouerned that Countrie for the Persian, and was in great fauour with Artaxerxes, whose Court may seeme to haue beene a Schoole where the Art of falshood was taught as wisdome. He desired peace of the Greeks, which was made vpon this condition, that they should take what they pleased, but not burne downe the Townes and Villages in their way. As soone as he had made this league, he leauied an Armie, & besetting the Straights of certaine Mountaines which they were to passe, hoped wel to make such benefit of their security, as might giue him the commendation of being no lesse craftily dishoneſt than Tissaphernes. Yet his cunning failed of successe. For a great snow fell, which caused the Greekes to make many fires, and scatter themselues abroad in the Villages. Teribazus also made many fires, and some of his men wandred about seeking relieſe. By the fires he was discouered, and by a Souldier of his that was taken prisoner, the whole plot was reuealed. Hereupon the Greekes, taking this captiue with them for a guide, sought him out; and comming vpon his Campe, did so affright him, that before the whole Armie could arriue there, the shout which was raised by the Vaunt-currors, chased him away. They tooke his Pauilion, wherein (besides many slaues, that were Artificers of voluptuousneſſe) verie rich furniture was left by the treacherous coward, who returned no more to challenge it. From hence the Armie went northward, and passing Euprates, not far below the springs thereof, trauailed with much difficulty through deepe snow, being followed aloofe by the enemy, who durst not approach them, but did cut off such as they found straggling behinde. The Inhabitants of the Countrie, through which they marched, had their wintring houses vnder ground, wherein was found great plentie of victuals, and of cattaile, which likewise did winter in the same Cellars with the owners. Hauing refreshed themselues in those parts, and taken sufficient ease after the miserable iourney, which had consumed many of them with extreme cold; they departed, leading with them many bond-slaues, and taking away (besides other Horses and Cattaile) some Colts that were bred vp for the great King.

§. XI.

The passage of the Armie to Trabizonde, through the Countries bordering vpon the Riuer of Phasis, and other obscure Nations.

SO without impediment they came to the Riuer Phasis, neere whereunto the people called Phasiani Taochi, and Chalybes were seated. These Nations ioyned together, and occupying the tops of a ledge of Mountaines, which the Greekes were to passe, made countenance of warre: but some companies being sent by night to seize vpon a place of equall height to that whereon the enemies lay, making good the piece of ground which they had taken, secured the ascent of the rest; which caused these people to flie, euery one retyring to the defence of his owne. The first vpon whose Countrie the the Greekes did enter were the Taochi, who conuaying all their prouiſion of victuals into ſtrong holds, brought the Armie into much want, vntill with hard labour one place was forced, wherein great ſtore of cattaile were taken; the people, to auoide captiuitie, threw themſelues head-long downe the rocks, the very women throwing downe firſt their owne children, and then caſting themſelues vpon them. Here was taken a great bootie of Cattaile, which ſerued to feed them, trauailing through the land of the Chalybes, of whom they got nothing but ſtrokes. The Chalybes were a very ſtout Nation, well armed at all points, and exceeding fierce. They encountred the Greekes hand to hand, killing as many as they tooke priſoners, and cutting off their heads, which they carried away, ſinging and dancing, to the great griefe of their companions liuing; who were glad, when after ſeuen daies iourney they eſcaped from thoſe continuall skirmiſhes, wherewith they had been vexed by theſe Barbarians. Hence trauailing through a good corne-Countrie, inhabited by an obſcure Nation called the Scythini, they came to a rich Towne, the Lord wherof, and of the Region adioyning, vſed them friendly, and promiſed to guide them to a Mountaine, whence they might diſcouer the Euxine-Sea. From Gymnias (which was the name of his Towne) he led them through the Territorie of his enemies, deſiring them to waſte it with ſword and fire. After fiue daies march, they came to a Mountaine called Teches, being (as I thinke) a part of the Mountaines called Moſchici, whence their guide ſhewed them the Sea; towards which they bent their courſe, and paſſing friendly through the Region of the Macrones, (with whom by meanes of an interpreter, found among themſelues, who borne in that place had beene ſold into Greece, they made a good peace) they arriued in the Land of Colchos, wherein ſtands the Citie of * Trabiſond, called then Trapezus, a Colonie of the Greekes. The Colchi entertaining them with hoſtilitie, were requited with the like; for the Armie hauing now good leiſure to repoſe themſelues among their friends the Trapezuntians, did ſpoile the Countrie thirtie daies together; forbearing onely the Borderers vpon Trabizonde, at the Citizens requeſt.

* Trabiſond a Colonie of the Greekes, ſituate in the bottome of the Euxine Sea.

§. XII.

How the Armie beganne at Trabizond to prouide a Fleet, wherewith to returne home by Sea: how it came into the Territorie of Sinope, and there proſequnted the ſame purpoſe.

MAuing now found an Hauen Towne, the Souldiers were deſirous to take ſhipping, and change their tedious Land-iournies into an eaſie Nauigation. To which purpoſe Cheriſophus a Lacedemonian, one of the principall Commanders, promiſed by meanes of Anaxibius the Lacedamonian Admirall, who was his friend, that he would prouide Veſſels to embarke them. Hauing thus concluded; they likewiſe tooke order for the ſtaying of ſuch ſhips as ſhould paſſe that way, meaning to vſe them for their nauigation. Leſt all this prouiſion ſhould be found inſufficient for the tranſportation of the whole Armie, Xenophon perſwaded the Cities adioyning to cleare the waies, and make an eaſie paſſage for them by Land; whereunto the Souldiers were vtterly vnwilling to giue eare, being deſirous to returne by Sea, but the Countrie fearing what inconuenience might grow by their long ſtay, did readily condeſcend to Xenophons requeſt. Two ſhips they borrowed of the Trapezuntians, which they manned and ſent to Sea: the one of them ſailed directly into Greece, forſaking their Companions, who had put them in truſt to bring ſhips into the Port of Trabiſonde: the other tooke Merchants and paſſengers, whoſe goods were ſafely kept for the owners, but the Veſſels were ſtaied to increaſe the fleet. After long abode, when victuals beganne to faile, by reaſon that all the Land of the Colchi, neere vnto the Campe was alreadie quite waſted, they were faine to embarke their ſickmen, with the women, children, and such of the baggage as might best be spared, in those few ships which they had already prouided. The rest of the Armie tooke their way by Land to Cerasus, a Greeke Towne, where the fleet likewise arriued. Here the Armie being mustered, was found to consist of eight thousand and six hundred men From hence they passed through the Countrie of the [a] Mosynaci, who were diuided into factions. The stronger partie, despising their friendship, caused them to ioyne with the weaker, whom they left Masters of all.

The next place of their abode was [b] Cotyora, a Greeke Towne likewise, and a Colonie of the Sinopians, as Trapezus and Cerasus were; but the entertainement which here they found was very churlish, hauing neither an open Market affoorded to them, nor the sick-men that were among them admitted into any house. Hereupon the Souldiers entred the Towne by force, and (committing no outrage) bestowed those which were sicke in conuenient lodgings, taking into their owne hands the custody of the Gates. Prouision for the Armie they made by strong hand, partly out of the Territorie of the Paphlagonians, partly out of the Lands belonging to the Towne. These newes were vnwelcome to [c] Sinope, whence Embassadours were sent to the Camp, who complaining of these dealings, and threatning to ioyne with the Paphlagonians, if redresse could not otherwise be had, were roundly answered by Xenophon, That meere necessitie had enforced the Armie to teach those of Cotyora good manners in so bad a methode: letting them know, that he feared not to deale with them and the Paphlagonian at once; though perhaps the Paphlagonian would be glad to take Sinope it selfe, to which, if cause were giuen, they would lend assistance. Vpon this answere the Embassadors grew better aduised, promising all friendship that the State of Sinope could shew, and commanding the Towne of Cotyora to relieue the Souldiers as well as they might. Further, they promised to assist them with shipping; letting them vnderstand how difficult the passage by Land would proue, in regard of the many and great Riuers, as Thermodon, Iris, Halys, and Parthenius, which crossed their way. This good counsaile, and the faire promises accompanying it, were kindly accepted by the Armie, which well perceiued, that the Citie of Sinope would spare for no cost, to be freed from such a neighbourhood. It was therefore decreed that they would passe the rest of the way by Sea; prouided that if there should want such number of Vessels as might serue to embarke euery one man of them, then would they not put from the shore.

[b] Cotyora a Port Towne in the same Region.

§. XIII.

Of dissension which arose in the Armie; and how it was embarked.

HItherto the danger of enemies, and miseries of weather & wants, had kept the companie in firme vnitie; which now beganne to dissolue and to thaw, by the neighbouring aire of Greece, warming their heads with priuate respects to their seuerall ends and purposes. Whilest they, who were sent as Agents from the Campe, remained at Sinope; Xenophon considering the strength and valour of his men, and the opportunitie of the coast wheron they lay, thought it would be an honorable worke to build a Citie in those parts, which were soone like to proue great and wealthie, in regard both of their owne puissance, and of the great repaire of the Greekes into that quarter. For this cause he made sacrifice, according to the superstition of his time and Countrie, diuining of his successe by the entrailes of beasts. The Sooth-sayer whom hee imployed had receiued a great reward of Cyrus, for coniecturing aright, that Artaxerxes would not giue battaile in ten daies: hee therefore, hauing preserued his money carefully, was desirous to be soone at home, that he might freely enioy his gettings. By him the purpose of Xenophon was diuulged, which was interpreted according to the diuersitie of mens opinions; some approuing the motion, but the greater greater part reiecting it. They of Sinope and Heraclea, being informed of this consultation, were sore afraide, left the pouertie of the Souldiers, who had not wherewith to maintaine themselues at home, should giue successe to the proiect. Which to preuent, they promised to supply the Armie with a sufficient fleet, and likewise offered money to some of the Captaines, who thereupon vndertooke to giue the Souldiers pay, if they would presently set saile for Greece. One of these Captaines being a banished man, desired them to follow him into Troas; another offered to leade them into Cherronesus. Xenophon who desired only the common good, was pleased greatly with these propositions and professed openly that hee would haue them to set forward, and hold together in any case, punishing him as a Traitor that should forsake the Armie, before such time as they were arriued at their iournies end. Silanus the Sooth-sayer, who had vttered Xenophons purpose, was heereby staied from outrunning his fellowes, and driuen to abide with his wealth among poore men, longer than stood with his good liking. Also the other Captaines were much troubled and afraid, when they perceiued, that ships were prepared sufficient for their Nauigation, but that the money promised to them, and by them to the Souldiers, came not. For the people of Sinope, and Heraclea, knowing that the Armie was now resolued for the voiage, & that Xenophon, whom they feared, had perswaded them to this resolution; thought it the wisest way to furnish them with a Nauy whilest they were in good readinesse to depart, but to keepe the money to themselues. The Captaines therefore who being disappointed by these Townes, found themselues in great danger of their men, whom they had deceiued with fair hopes, repented much of their hastie offers, & signifying as much to Xenophon, praied him to make proposition to the Armie, of taking the ships, and sayling to Phasis, where they might seize vpon Lands, & plant themselues in such wise as should stand best with their good liking. But finding him cold in the businesse, they began to worke the principall of their own followers, hoping by them to draw in all the rest. These newes becomming publike, bred a suspition of Xenophon, as if he had wonne the rest of the Captaine to his purpose, and meant now to carrie the Armie quite another way from their owne home. Wherefore assembling the Companies, he gaue them satisfaction, and withall complained of some disorders which he caused them to redresse. A generall inquisition was likewise made of offences committed since the death of Cyrus; which being punished, all things were in quiet. Shortly after came Embassadours from Corylas, Lord of the Paphlagonians, who sending presents desired peace of the Greekes: the Embassadours were friendly entertained, and peace concluded, which needed not to haue been sought, for that the Greekes hauing now their fleet in a readinesse, did soone weigh Anchors, and set saile for Harmene the Port of Sinope, whither Cherisophus came, bringing with him a few Gallies from the Admirall Anaxibius, who promised to giue the Armie pay as soone, as they came into the parts of Greece.

§. XIIII.

Another great dissension and distraction of the Armie. How the mutiners were beaten by the Barbarians, and rescued by XENOPHON.

THeneerer that they approched to Greece, the greater was their desire to make prouision for themselues, that they might not returne home emptie-handed. Wherefore trusting well that if the charge of the Armie were absolutely committed to one sufficient man, hee might the more conueniently procure the good of them all, they determined to make Xenophon sole Commander of all; in whose fauour as well the Captains as the common Souldiers were very earnest and violent. But he, either fearing to displease the Lacedæmonians, who were iealous of him already (being incensed by that fugitiue who forsooke the Armie at Trabizond, flying with one of their two ships) or moued by some tokens appearing to him in the entrails that threatned ill successe to his gouernment, procured with vehement contention, that this honour was laied vpon Cherisophus a Lacedæmonian. It seemes that Xenophon, considering the vexations incident to the conduct of a voluntarie Army, wanting pay, did wisely in yeelding to such tokens as forbad him to accept it: especially, knowing so well their desire, which was by right or by wrong to get wealth wheresoeuer it might bee found, without all regard of Friend or of Foe. Cherisophus had beene Generall but sixe or seuen daies, when he was deposed, for hauing been vnwilling to robbe the Towne of Heraclea which had sent presents to the Campe, and beene very beneficiall vnto them in lending ships for their transportation. Two daies they had sailed by the coast of Asia, when being past those great Riuers, which would haue giuen impediment to their iourney by Land, they touched at Heraclea, where consulting how to take their way onwards, whether by Land or Sea, one seditious man began to put them in minde of seeking to get somewhat for themselues; telling them that all their prouision would be spent in three daies, and that being now come out of the enemies Countrie, victuals and other necessaries could not bee had without money; for which cause he gaue aduice to send messengers into the Towne of Heraclea, giuing the Citizens to vnderstand what their wants were, and demanding of them three thousand pieces of money, called Cyzicens, which summe amounteth to two thousand and fiue hundred pound starling, or thereabout. This motion was greatly applauded, and the summe raised to tenne thousand Cyzicens at least: which to require, they thought Cherisophus, as being Generall, the fittest man; others had more desire to send Xenophon: but in vaine, for they both refused it, and renounced the action as dishonest. Least therefore either of these should faile in managing the businesse which agreed not with his disposition, others of more impudencie and lesse discretion were sent, who in such wise deliuered their insolent message; that the Citizens taking time to deliberate vpon their request, brought what they could out of the fields into the Towne, and shutting the Gates, did forthwith man the walls. When the Souldiers perceiued themselues to be disappointed of their rauenous purpose, they fel to mutiny, saying, That their Leaders had betraied them: and being for the more part of them Arcadians, and Achæans, they forsooke immediately Cherisophus and Xenophon, choosing new Leaders out of their owne number. Aboue foure thousand and fiue hundred they were, all heauily armed, who electing ten Captaines, sailed into the Port of Calphas, which is in the mid-way betweene Heraclea and Bizantium, with purpose to assaile the Bythinians on the suddaine. With Cherisophus there abode two thousand and one hundred, of whom one thousand and foure hundred were armed weightily: Xenophon had two thousand foot, three hundred whereof were lightly armed, and fortie horse, which smal band had done good seruice alreadie, and could not haue beene spared now. Cherisophus had agreed with Cleander Gouernour of Bizantium, to meet him at the mouth of the Riuer Calphas, whither Cleander promised to bring some Gallies to conuey him ouer into Greece; for which cause he tooke his way thither by Land, leauing to Xenophon such shipping as he had, who passing some part of the way by Sea, landed vpon the Confines of Heraclea, and Thracia Asiatica, intending to make a cut through the mid-land-Countrie to the Propont. The Mutiners, who had landed at Calpas by night, with purpose to take spoiles in Bythinia, diuided themselues into ten Companies, euery Captaine leading his owne Regiment into some Village, fiue or sixe miles from the Sea, in the greater Townes were two Regiments quartered; and so was that part of the countrie surprised on the suddaine, & sacked all at one time.

The

The place of Rendeuous was an high peece of ground, where ſome of them arriued, finding no diſturbance; others, not without much trouble and danger; two Companies were broken and defeated, only eight men eſcaping, the reſt were all put to the ſword. For the Thracians which had ſlipt at firſt out of the Souldiers hands, did raiſe the Countrie, and finding the Greekes loden with bootie, tooke the aduantage of their diſorder, cutting in pieces thoſe two Regiments: which done, they attempted the reſt, encompaſſing the hill whereon they encamped. One great aduantage the Thracians had, that being all light armed, they could at pleaſure make retrait from theſe Arcadians, & Achæans: who wanting the aſſiſtance of horſe, and hauing neither Archers nor Slingers among them, were driuen to ſtand meerely vpon their defence, bearing off with great danger, and many wounds receiued, the Darts and Arrowes of the Barbarians, till finally they were driuen from their watering place, and enforced to craue parly. Whatſoeuer the articles of compoſition were, the Thracians yeelded to all; but pledges for aſſurance they would giue none, without which the Greekes well knew, that all promiſes of ſuch people, eſpecially ſo incenſed, were nothing worth. In the meane time Xenophon holding his way quietly through the In-land Region, did enquire of ſome Trauailers, whether they knew ought of any Grecian Armie, paſſing along thoſe parts: and receiuing by them true information of the deſperate caſe into which theſe Gallants had fooliſhly throwne themſelues, he marched directly towards the place where they lay, taking with him for guides them who gaue him the intelligence. His horſe-men hee ſent before to diſcouer, and to ſcowre the waies; the light-armed foot-men tooke the hill-tops on either hand, all of them ſetting fire on whatſoeuer they found combuſtible, whereby the whole Countrie ſeemed to be on a light-flame, to the great terrour of the enemies, who thought that ſome huge Armie had approched. That night he encamped on a Hill, within fiue mile of the Arcadians, encreaſing ſtill the number of his fires, which hee cauſed haſtily to be quenched ſoone after Supper. The enemies perceiuing this, thought certainely that hee would haue fallen vpon them in the darke, which cauſed them in all haſte to diſlodge. Early the next morning Xenophon comming thither in very good order, to haue giuen battaile, found that his deuice, to affright the Thracians, had taken full effect; but hee marualled that the Greekes were alſo departed, concerning whom he learned by enquirie, that they remoued at breake of day, and perceiued by ſignes that they had taken the way to the Port of Calpas, in which journey hee ouertooke them. They embraced Him, and His, with great ioy: Confeſſing that they themſelues had thought the ſame which the enemies did, looking that hee ſhould haue come by night, wherein finding themſelues deceiued, they were afraid leſt he had forſaken them, and therefore haſtened away, to ouertake him, and ioyne with him. So they arriued at the Hauen of Calpas, where it was decreed, That whoſoeuer from thenceforth made any motion to diſioyne the Armie, ſhould ſuffer death.

§. XV.

Of diuers pieces of ſeruice done by XENOPHON; and how the Armie returned into Greece. The occaſions of the Warre betweene the Lacedæmonians and the Perſian.

THe Hauen of Calpas lay vnder a goodly head-land, that was very ſtrong, and abounding with all kinde of Graine and Fruits, except Oliues. There was alſo Timber for building and ſhipping, and a very conuenient ſeate for a great Citie. All which commodities, that might haue allured the Souldiers to ſtay there, and to plant, cauſed caused them to haste away, fearing lest Xenophon should finde some deuice to haue settled himselfe and them in that place. For the greater part of them had good meanes to liue at home, neither did they so much for hope of gaine follow Cyrus in that Warre, as in regard of his Honour, and the loue which they bare vnto him: the poorer sort were such as left the Parents, Wiues, and Children, to whom (though failing of the riches which they had hoped to purchase) they were now desirous to returne. But whether it were so that Xenophon found aduantage by their owne superstition, to make them stay, which they greatly suspected; or whether the signes appearing in the entrailes, did indeede forbid their departure: so long they were inforced to abide in the place till victualls failed, neither would the Captaines leade them forth to forrage the Countrie, vntill the Sacrifices should promise good successe. Cherisophus was dead of an Ague, and his ships were gone, being returned to the Heracleans, of whom they were borrowed. His followers were joyned to the rest of the Armie, which the greater it was, the more prouision it needed, and the sooner felt want. For which cause, he that was chosen Coronell into the place of Cherisophus, would needs aduenture to gratifie the Souldiers with the spoile of some Villages that stood neere at hand; in which enterprise he found ill successe, the whole Countrie lying in waite to entrap him, and an Armie of Horse being sent by Pharnabazus the Satrapa, or Vice-roy of Phrygia, to the assistance of these Bythinian Thracians, which troupes falling vpon the Greekes that were scattered abroade in seeking bootie, slew fiue hundred of them, and chased the rest to a certaine Mountaine thereby. The newes of this ouerthrow comming to Xenophon, he led forth a part of the Armie to the rescue of those that suruiued, and brought them safe to the Campe; vpon which the Bythinians made an offer that night, and breaking a Corps du garde, slew some, pursuing the rest to the very Tents. This new courage of the enemie, together with the present condition of the Armie, so disheartened and vnfurnished of necessaries, caused the Greekes to remoue their Campe to a place of more strength; which hauing intrenched, and committed to the defence of such as were least able to indure trauaile, Xenophon with the firmest and best able men went forth, both to burie those which were lately slaine, and to abate the pride of the Thracians, and their Assistants. In this journey his demeanour was very Honourable. For hauing giuen buriall to the dead, the Enemie was discouered, lying on the tops of the Hills adjoyning, to whom (notwithstanding that the way was very rough, and troublesome, so that some thought it a matter of too great danger, to leaue at their backes a wood scarce passeable) hee marched directly, telling his men plainely, that hee had rather follow the enemie with halfe the number, than turne his back to them with twice as many, and letting them further know, that if they did not charge the Barbarian, hee would not faile with the greater resolution to pursue them; from whom if they could safely retire to the campe, yet what should they doe there, wanting victualls to sustaine them in the place, and ships, to carrie them away? wherefore hee willed them rather to fight well that day, hauing eaten their dinners, than an other day fasting; and not to regard the vneasie returne, which might serue to stay Cowards from running away, but to wish vnto the Enemie a faire and easie way, by which hee might flie from them. These perswasions were followed with so valiant execution, that both Persians and Bythinians being chased out of the field, abandoned the Countrie forthwith, remouing their Families, and leauing all that could not sodainely bee conueighed away, to the discretion of the Greekes, who at good leisure gathered the haruest of these bad Neighbours fields. This was the last fight which they had on the side of Asia. For they were not only suffered quietly to enjoy the spoile of the Countrie, but when the opinion grew common in those parts, that it was the intent of Xenophon to plant a Colonie on the Port of Calpas, Embassadours were sent from the Neighbour people, to desire friendship, and make offer of their beſt aſſiſtance. But the Souldiers had no minde to ſtay. Wherfore entring further into Bythinia, they tooke a great bootie, which they carried away to Chryſopolis, a Citie neere vnto Chalcedon, where they ſold it. Pharnabazus, Lieutenant in Phrygia to Artaxerxes, did greatly feare, leſt their long ſtay in that Countrie might breede in them a deſire to viſite his Prouince, where they might haue found great wealth, and little power to guard it. Therefore he ſent to the Lacedæmonian Admirall, entreating him with much inſtance and large promiſes to waft them ouer into Europe; to whom Anaxibius the Admirall condeſcending, promiſed to giue the Souldiers pay, as ſoon as they arriued at Bizantium. So were they carried out of Aſia at the intreatie of the Perſian, who in the height of his pride had thought them ſo ſurely impriſoned with mighty Riuers, that he not only denied to permit their quiet departure, but willed them to ſurrender their Armes into his hands, and ſo to yeeld their liues to his diſcretion. How diſcourteouſly they were intreated by Anaxibius, and how to requite his injurious dealings, they ſeized vpon Bizantium, which by Xenophons perſwaſion they forbare to ſacke, I hold it ſuperfluous to relate. For the reſidue of their doings appertaine little to the generall courſe of things. But this expedition, as in all ages it was glorious, ſo did it both diſcouer the ſecrets of Aſia, and ſtirre vp the Greekes to thinke vpon greater enterpriſes, than euer their forefathers had vndertaken. Likewiſe it was the only remarkable action which the time affoorded. For the Roman warres did hitherto extend no further than to the next neighbouring Townes of Italie; and in Greece all things were quiet, the Lacedæmonians ruling inſolently, but without diſturbance. True it is, that the ſeedes of the Warre ſhortly following, which the Lacedæmonians made vpon Artaxerxes, were already ſowne, before theſe companies returned out of the high Countries of Aſia. For the Townes of Ionia, which had ſided with yong Cyrus againſt Tiſſaphernes, if not againſt the great King, prepared to rebell, which they thought ſafer, than to fall into the hands of Tiſſaphernes, who was now appointed Lieutenant, both of his old Prouince, and of all that had belonged to Cyrus. Wherefore the Ionians beſought the Lacedæmonians to ſend them aide, whereby to recouer their libertie; and obtained their requeſt.

For a power was ſent ouer, vnder conduct of Thimbro a Spartan, who beſtowed his men in ſuch Townes as had already reuolted, to ſecure the Cities and their Fields, but not to make any offenſiue Warre.

CHAP. XI.

Of the affaires of Greece, whilest they were managed by the Lacedæmonians.

How the Lacedæmonians tooke courage by example of XENOPHONS Armie, to make Warre vpon ARTAXERXES.

IT seemes that the Lacedæmonians did well perceiue in how ill part Artaxerxes tooke their fauour shewed vnto his brother, and yet were timorous in beginning an open warre against him, thinking it sufficient to take all care that no aduantage might slip, which could serue to strengthen their estate, by finding the Persian worke beyond the Sea. But when Xenophons Armie had reuealed the baseneſſe of those effeminate Asiatiques, and rehearsed the many victories which they themselues had gotten, vpon termes of extreme disaduantage; then was all Greece filled with desire of vndertaking vpon this huge vnweldie Empire, thinking it no hard matter for the joynt-forces of that whole Nation, to hew out the way to Susa, whereof one handfull had opened the passage to Babylon, and further, finding no power that was able to giue them resistance; in all that long journey of foure and thirty thousand two hundred and fifty fiue furlongs, spent in going and returning, which make of Englisſh miles about foure thousand two hundred foure score and one, a very painefull march of one yeere and three moneths. Neuertheleſſe the ciuill distraction wherewith Greece was miserably torne, and especially that hot fire of the Theban Warre, which, kindled with Persian gold, brake forth sodainly into a great flame, drew backe out of Asia the power of the Lacedæmonians, to the defence of their owne estate; leauing it queſtionable whether Ageſilaus, hauing both the same, and farre greater forces, could haue wrought proportionable effects. Sure it is, that in the whole space of two yeeres, which he spent in Asia, his deedes procured more commendation of magnanimitie and faire behauiour, than of stout courage, and great, or profitable atchieuements. For how highly so euer it pleased Xenophon, who was his friend, and follower in this, and in other warres, to extoll his vertue; his exploits being only a few incursions into the Countries lying neere the Sea, carry no proportion to Xenophons owne journey, which I know not whether any Age hath paralleled: the famous retrait of Conon the Briton with six thousand men from Aquileia, to his owne Countrie, through all the breadth of Italie, and length of France, in despite of the Emperor Theodosius, being rather like it than equall. But of Ageſilaus and his warres in Asia and Greece, we shall speake more in due place.

§. II.

§. II.

The proſperous beginnings of the warre in Aſia.

THIMBRO receiuing Xenophons men, beganne to take in Townes, and to entertaine all ſuch as were willing to reuolt from the Perſian, who were many, and ſome of them ſuch, as had beene highly beholding to the King; who ſeeme to haue had no other cauſe of diſcontent, than that they were to liue vnder the gouernement of Tiſſaphernes, whom all others did as vehemently hate as the King his Maſter did loue him. The managing of the warre begunne by Thimbro, was for his oppreſſions taken out of his hands, and committed to Dercyllidas a Spartan, who behaued himſelfe as a good man of Warre, and a wiſe Commander. For whereas the rule of the low-Countries of Aſia was diuided betweene Pharnabazus and Tiſſaphernes, who did ill agree; Pharnabazus being the worthier man, but the other by his Princes fauour the greater, and hauing the chiefe command in thoſe warres againſt the Greekes; Dercyllidas who did beare a priuate hatred to Pharnabazus (knowing well that Tiſſaphernes was of a miſchieuous nature, and would not be ſorry to ſee his Corriuall throughly beaten, though to the Kings loſſe) made an appointment with Tiſſaphernes, and forthwith entred Æolis, which was vnder the juriſdiction of Pharnabazus, which Prouince, in few daies, he brought into his owne power.

That Countrie of Æolis had about the ſame time ſuffered a violent alteration, which gaue eaſie ſucceſſe to the attempts of Dercyllidas. Zenis a Dardanian had beene Deputie to Pharnabazus in thoſe parts; after whoſe death his wife Mania procured his Office, wherein ſhee behaued herſelfe ſo well, that ſhee not only was beloued of the people vnder her gouernement: but enlarged her Territorie, by the conqueſt of certaine Townes adjoyning; and ſundry times gaue aſſiſtance to Pharnabazus in his warres againſt the Myſians and Perſians. For ſhee had in pay ſome Companies of Greekes, whoſe valour by her good vſage did her great ſeruice. But ſomewhat before the arriuall of Dercyllidas in thoſe parts, a Sonne-in-law of hers, called Midias, whom ſhee truſted and loued much, being blinded with ambition, found meanes to ſtifle her, and kill her ſonne of ſeuenteene yeeres old; which done, he ſeized vpon two of her principall Townes, wherein her treaſure lay, hoping to haue beene admitted into poſſeſſion of her whole eſtate. Being denied entrance by her Souldiers, that lay in Garriſon, he ſent Meſſengers with preſents to Pharnabazus, deſiring him to make him Gouernour in the place of Mania. His preſents were not only reiected by Pharnabazus, but reuenge of his foule treaſon threatned, whereby the wicked villaine was driuen into tearmes of almoſt vtter deſperation. In the meane time came Dercyllidas, to whom the Townes of Mania, that held againſt Midias, did quickly open their Gates. One only Towne ſtood out foure daies (againſt the will of the Citizens, who were couetous of libertie) the Gouernour ſtriuing in vaine to haue kept it to the vſe of Pharnabazus. Now remained only two Cities Gergethe and Scepſis, which the Traitour held, who fearing all men, as being loued of none, ſent Embaſſadours to Dercyllidas, deſiring leaue to ſpeake with him, and pledges for his ſecuritie: vpon the deliuerie of which hee iſſued out of Scepſis, and comming into the Campe, made offer to joyne with the Greekes vpon ſuch conditions as might ſeeme reaſonable. But he was plainely told by Dercyllidas, that other condition there was none, than to ſet the Citizens freely at libertie. And preſently vpon theſe words they marched toward Scepſis. When Midias perceiued that it was in vaine to ſtriue againſt the Armie, and the Townes-men, who were all of one minde; hee quietly went along with Dercyllidas; who remaining but a few houres in the Citie, did a ſacrifice to Minerua, and then leading away the Garriſon of Midias, he left the Citie free, and departed toward Gergethe. Midias did not forſake his Companie, but followed him, earneſtly intreating that hee might be ſuffered to re-

taine Gergethe: but comming to the Gates, he was bidden to command his Souldiers that they should be opened, for (quoth Dercyllidas) I must here likewise doe a sacrifice to Minerua. The Traitor, not daring to make deniall, caused his Mercinaries to open the Gates, whereby Dercyllidas, taking possession of the place, tendred pay to the Garrison, who did not refuse to serue vnder his Ensignes. This done, all the goods of Mania were seized vpon, as belonging to one that had beene subject to Pharnabazus, who was enemie to the Greekes: and so the murderous wretch was sent away naked, not knowing in what part of the World hee might finde any place to hide his detested head. Dercyllidas, hauing in eight daies taken nine Cities, purposed for the ease of his Confederates to winter in Bythinia, to which end hee tooke Truce with Pharnabazus, who had not any desire of Warre. That Winter, and the Sommer ensuing, the Truce being recontinued held; in which time, besides the wasting of Bythinia, the neck of Land joyning Cherronea to the Maine, was fortified, being foure or fiue miles in breadth, by which meanes eleuen Townes with much good Land belonging to them, were freed from the incursions of the wild Thracians; and made fit and able to victuall the Campe. Likewise the Citie of Atarne was taken, which was of great strength, and very well stored with prouision. After this, Dercyllidas had command from Sparta, to diuert the warre into Caria, where was the seate of Tissaphernes; for that hereby it was thought not vneasie to recouer all the Townes of Ionia: Pharax the Admirall of the fleet (which was a yeerely Office) being appointed to joyne with him. Though it was manifest that Thissaphernes had neglected Pharnabazus in time of necessity, yet was he not in his owne danger requited with the like. For Pharnabazus hauing respect to the Kings seruice, came to assist his priuate enemie Tissaphernes, & so passing into Caria, they thrust Garrisons into all places of strength; which done, they marched towards Ionia, hoping to finde the Townes ill manned for resistance. As these Persians were desirous to keepe the warre from their owne dores, so was Dercyllidas willing to free his Confederates the Ionians from the spoile and danger of the warre, by transferring it into Caria. For which cause he passed the Riuer of Maander, and not looking to haue bin so soone encountered, marched carelesly through the Countrie: when on the very sodaine the whole Armie of Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus was discouered, consisting of Persians, Carians, and some Mercinarie Greekes, who were all marshalled in very good order to present battaile. The oddes was too apparent, both in numbers of men, and in readinesse, as also in aduantage of ground: for the Persian had a great multitude of Horse, the Greeke very few and feeble, being to fight in an open plaine. Therefore all the Ionians, together with the Ilanders and others, of such places as bordered vpon the Kings Dominions, did either betake themselues to present flight; or abiding a while for shame, did plainely discouer by their lookes, that they meant not to be more bold than wise. Only Dercyllidas with his Peloponnesians regarding their honor, prepared to endure the fight: which must needs haue brought them to destruction, if the counsaile of Pharnabazus had beene followed, who perceiuing the opportunitie of so great a victorie, was not willing to let it slip. But Tissaphernes, who naturally was a coward, seeing that countenance of resistance was made, beganne to consider what strange defence the Souldiers of Xenophon had shewed, and thinking that all the Greekes were of the like resolution, held it the wisest way to craue parly; the conclusion of which was, That a truce should be made, to last vntill Tissaphernes might receiue answere from the King, and Dercyllidas from Sparta, concerning the demands propounded in the Treatie, which were on the one part, that all the Greekes in Asia might enjoy their owne libertie and lawes, but contrariwise on the other side, that the Lacedæmonians should depart Asia, and leaue the Townes to the Kings pleasure. This Treatie was of none effect; only it serued to free the Greekes from the present danger, and to gaine time vnto Tissaphernes, who desired to auoide the warre by procrastination, which he durst not aduenture to finish by triall of a battaile.

§. III.

How the Lacedæmonians tooke reuenge vpon the Eleans for old diſpleaſure. The diſcontents of the Corinthians and Thebans, conceiued againſt the State of Sparta.

IN the meane ſeaſon the Lacedæmonians, who found none able to withſtand them in Greece, beganne to call the Eleans to accompt for ſome diſgraces receiued by them during the late warres, when leiſure was wanting to the requitall of ſuch pettie iniuries. Theſe Eleans being Preſidents of the Olympiaque games, had ſet a fine vpon the Citie of Sparta, for Non-paiment of which, they forbade them to come to the ſolemnitie; and publiquely whipt one of them, that was a man of note, for preſuming to contend againſt their decree. Likewiſe they hindred Agis King of Sparta, from doing ſacrifice to Iupiter; and in all points vſed great contempt toward the Spartans, who now had no buſineſſe that could hinder them from taking reuenge: and therefore ſent a peremptorie meſſage to the Eleans, commanding them to ſet at libertie the Cities which they held in ſubiection. This was the vſuall pretence which they made the ground of all their warres: though little they cared for the libertie of ſuch Townes, which they cauſed afterwards to become followers, and little better than meere Vaſſals of the Lacedæmonians. In their late warres with Athens, the ſtrong oppoſition which they found, cauſed this goodly Title of libertie to worke verie ſlowly; but hauing now to doe with a State of great ſpirit and ſmall force, it gaue preſent ſucceſſe to their deſires. Two yeeres together they ſent an Armie into the Countrie of the Eleans: the firſt yeere an earthquake (held in thoſe times a prodigious ſigne, and which did alwaies forbid the proſecution of any enterpriſe in hand) cauſed them to retire: the ſecond yeere, all the Townes of the Eleans did haſtily reuolt, and the Citie it ſelfe was driuen to ſubmiſſion; conſenting both to ſuffer their old ſubiects freely to enioy their libertie, and to haue her owne walls throwne downe. Only the Preſidentſhip of the Olympian games was left vnto them, which, it was not to be doubted that they would in time comming vſe modeſtly, finding themſelues to ſtand at the mercy of Sparta. In this expedition all the Greekes were aſſiſtant to the Lacedæmonians, excepting the Corinthians and Bœotians, whoſe aide hauing been of as much importance in the late Peloponneſian Warre, as the force of Sparta it ſelfe, they could not ſmoother their diſlike of their vnequall diuiſion following the victorie; which gaue to Sparta the command of al Greece; to Thebes, and Corinth, only ſecuritie againſt Athens, but ſuch a ſecuritie as was worſe than the danger. For when the equall greatneſſe of two mightie Eſtates did counterpoiſe each the other, it was in the power of theſe Neutral Common-weales to adhere to either, as the condition of their affaires required; but when to reuenge iniuries, they had by mortall hatred proſecuted the warre to extremitie, leauing the one Citie naked of power and friends, the other mightily encreaſed in both, it was then (if not neceſſarie to obey the greatneſſe which themſelues had made yet) fooliſh and dangerous to prouoke it. Neuertheleſſe, it was not the purpoſe of the Spartans to take occaſion of any quarrell, which they could not finiſh at pleaſure, till ſuch time as they had by victorie or compoſition made ſome good end with the Perſian, toward whom they bent all their care and forces.

§. IIII.

The passage of AGESILAVS into Asia. His warre with TISSAPHERNES. How TISSAPHERNES was put to death, and the warre diuerted into another Prouince, through perswasion and gifts of TITHRAVSTES his successor. How carlesse the Persian Lieutenants were of the Kings good.

AGESILAVS newly made king of Sparta, was desirous to haue the honour of the victory, which not without cause, he expected vpon those of Asia; and therefore procuring a great Armie to ioyne with that of Dercyllidas, he tooke his way in great pompe to Aulis in Bœotia, a Hauen, lying opposite to the Iland of Eubœa, in which place Agamemnon (leading the power of all Greece to the warre against Troy, many Ages before) had embarked his men. In imitation of Agamemnon hee meant also to do sacrifice in Aulis, which the Thebans, Lords of that Countrie, would not permit, but saying that the performance of such ceremonies in that place, belonged vnto their Officers, they were so vnable to conceale their malice, that sending some Companies of horse, they threw downe his sacrifice from the Altar. It was not then conuenient time for Agesilaus to entangle himselfe and his Countrie in any new warre; therefore waiting better opportunitie of reuenge, he quietly swallowed the contumelie, and followed his maine intendment. Hauing landed his men at Ephesus, he was entertained by Tissaphernes with a Treatie of peace, wherein Agesilaus peremptorily requiring that the Persian should restore to liberty all the Greek Townes in Asia, was promised that the King, being first informed of his demand, should send answere to his good liking, if he would in the meane while make truce. Truce was therfore made, which Tissaphernes had sought, onely to winne time of making prouision for the warre, and getting supply of men and money from Artaxerxes; whilest Agesilaus was busie in setling the Estates of his confederate Cities on that side of the Sea. The end of this long vacation from warre was at the comming down of these forces which Artaxerxes had sent: at what time Agesilaus receiued a plain message from Tissaphernes, that either he must forth-with depart out of Asia, or make good his aboade by strong hand. Agesilaus returning word, that hee was glad to heare that his enemies had by periurie deserued vengeance from Heauen, prepared to inuade them; and sending word to all the Townes which lay betweene him, and Caria, that they should prouide victuals and other necessaries for his Armie, did easily make Tissaphernes beleeue, that his intent was to inuade that Prouince wherein Tissaphernes dwelt, and which was vnfit for Horse, in which part of his forces the Persian had most confidence. Therefore Tissaphernes bestowing all his Companies of foot in Caria, entred with his horse into the plaines of Maander, hoping thereby to stoppe the passage of a heauie foot-Armie, not suffering them to passe into that Countrie which was fittest for their seruice. But the Greekes left him waiting there in vaine, and marched directly into Phrygia, where they tooke great spoile without resistance, till such time as the Horse men of Pharnabazus met him, who in a small skirmish hauing the better of the Greekes, were the occasion that Agesilaus returned to Ephesus. Although in this last fight onely twelue men were lost, yet Agesilaus perceiuing by that triall how hard it would be to preuaile, and hold the masterie of the field, without a greater strength of Horse, tooke all possible care to encrease that part of his forces. By which meanes hauing enabled himselfe, whilest winter lasted hee entred vpon the Countrie of Tissaphernes, as soone as the season of the yeere would permit, and not onely tooke a great bootie, but finding the Horse-men of Tissaphernes in the plaine of Maander, without assistance of their infanterie, hee gaue them battaile, and had a great victorie, taking their Campe in which hee found great riches. The blame of this losse fell heauie vpon

Tissaphernes

Tissaphernes, who either vpon cowardise had absented himselfe from the battaile, or following some other businesse, was then at Sardes. For which cause his Master hauing him in distrust, and thinking that peace might be the sooner had, which he much desired, if the man, so odious to the whole Nation of the Greekes, were taken out of the way, he sent into those parts Tithraustes a Persian, to cut off the head of Tissaphernes, and succeede him in the gouernment. Such was the end of this base and cowardly Politician, who little caring to offend Heauen, when by periurie he could aduance his purposes on Earth, failed at the last through too much ouer-weening of his owne wisdome, euen in that part of cunning, wherein he thought himselfe most perfect; for supposing, that by his great skill in subtile negotiation hee should one way or other circumuent the Greekes, and make them weary of Asia; he did not seeke to finish the warre, and according to his Masters wish, bring all things speedily to quiet, but rather to temporize, till he might finde some opportunitie of making such end as best might stand with the Kings honour and his own. Wherein it seemes that he much mistooke his Princes disposition, who though he had highly rewarded him for the aide which he did bring in his time of danger, yet would hee much more gladly haue taken it, if he could haue found such meanes whereby the danger it sefe might haue beene auoided: as not louing to haue warre, whilest by any conditions (honourable or not) he might obtaine peace. And this appeared well by the course which Tithraustes tooke at his first possession of the low-Countries. For he sent Embassadours to Agesilaus, in very friendly sort, letting him know, that the man who had beene Author of the warre, was now taken out of the way; and that it was the Kings pleasure to let the Greekes enjoy their owne lawes and libertie, vpon condition, that they should pay him the tribute accustomed, and the Armie be forthwith dismissed. The answere to this proposition, was by Agesilaus referred to the Councell of Sparta; in the meane season he was content to transferre the warre into the Prouince of Pharnabazus, at the request of Tithraustes, who bought his departure with thirtie Talents.

This was a strange manner of Warre, both on the offensiue and on the defensiue part. For Agesilaus hauing entertained great hopes of vanquishing the great King, was contented to forbeare his seuerall Prouinces, at the entreatie of the Lieutenants: and those Lieutenants being employed by the King to maintaine his Estates against all enemies (wherein if they failed, they knew that their heads might easily bee taken from their shoulders) were little offended at any losse that fell on their next Neighbour-Prouinces, which were subiect likewise to the same Crowne of Persia, so long as their own gouernement could be preserued free from waste and danger. The cause of this disorder on the Persian side, I can ascribe to nothing so deseruedly, as to the corrupted estate of the Court, wherein Eunuches, Concubines, and Ministers of pleasure, were able by partiall construction to countenance, or disgrace, the actions of such as had the managing of things abroade; and to that foolish manner of the Kings (which was so vsuall that it might be called a rule) to reward or punish the Prouinciall Gouernour, according to the benefit or losse, which the Countrie giuen in charge vnto each of them receiued, during the time of his rule. Whereby it came to passe, that as euery one was desirous to make his owne Territorie yeeld a large increase to the Kings treasure; so no man was carefull to assist his borderers, if losse or danger might thereby grow to himselfe and his; but sate still as an idle beholder, when perhaps by joyning their forces, it had not beene vneasie to recompence the spoile of one Countrie, by conquering another, or defending a third from farre greater miseries.

§. V.

The Warre and Treatie betweene AGESILAVS and PHARNABAZVS.

AGESILAVS hauing thus compounded with Tithraustes, entred Phrygia, burning and wasting the Countrie without resistance. Hee tooke the Palace of Pharnabazus, and by his Lieutenant draue him out of his Campe. These actions, together with his honourable behauiour, which added much to their lustre, were more glorious then profitable. For he did not winne Cities and Places of strength, which might haue encreased his power, and giuen assurance to the rest of his proceedings: but purchased fame and high reputation, by which he drew vnto him some that were disontented and stood vpon bad termes with the great King, whom he lost againe as easily, by meanes of some slight iniurie done to them by his vnder-Captaines. Pharnabazus did not enclose himselfe in any Towne for feare of being besieged, but kept the field, lying as neere as he could safely to the enemies, with whom it was not his purpose to fight, but to make some good end by composition, which he found not vneasie to doe. For the pleasures, by him formerly done to the State of Sparta, in the times of their most necessitie, had beene so great, that when hee (obtaining parlie) did set before their eies his bountie towards them, and his loue (which had beene such, that besides many other hazards of his person, he had for the rescue of their fleet when it was driuen to runne a-shore at Abydus, aduentured to ride into the Sea as farre as he could finde any ground, and fight on horse-backe against the Athenians) together with his faith which had neuer beene violated in word or deede: they knew not how to excuse their ingratitude, otherwise then by telling him, That hauing warre with his Master, they were inforced, against their will, to offend him. Agesilaus did make a faire offer to him, that if he would reuolt from the King to them; they would maintaine him against the Persian, and establish him free Prince of the Countrie wherein hee was at that time onely Deputie to Artaxerxes. But Pharnabazus told him plainely, That if the King his Master did put him in trust to make warre against them, he would not faile to doe the best that he could as their enemie; if the charge were taken out of his hand, and he commanded to obey an other, he would then shift side, and betake himselfe to their alliance. The issue of this parlie was, That the Armie should no longer abide in Phrygia, nor againe returne into it, whilest employment could be found elsewhere. The excuse made by Agesilaus, and the withdrawing of his forces out of those parts, were not sufficient to appease Pharnabazus, whom he had not inuaded for want of more necessarie businesse elsewhere; but becausse his Countrie would yeeld great bootie; and for the hire of thirtie Talents. By this meanes the Lacedæmonians changed an honourable Friend into a hot Enemie, who afterwards requited their vnthankefulnesse with full reuenge.

§. VI.

The great commotions raised in Greece by the Thebans and others, that were hyred with gold from the Persian.

IN the meane while Tithraustes, perceiuing that Agesilaus meant nothing lesse then to returne into Greece, and let Artaxerxes rest quietly in Asia, tooke a wise course whereby the Citie of Sparta was not only driuen to looke to her owne, and giue ouer her great hopes of subuerting the Empire, but was beaten out of all that had beene gotten by many late victories, and saw her Dominion restrained vnto the narrow bounds of her her owne Territorie. Hee ſent into Greece fiftie talents of ſiluer, to be imployed in raiſing warre againſt the Lacedæmonians; which treaſure was, by the ſubtile practice of him that was put in truſt with it, in ſuch wiſe diſperſed, among the principall men of the Thebans, Argiues, & Corinthians, that all thoſe Eſtates hauing formerly borne ſecret hate to that of Sparta, were now deſirous of nothing ſo much as of open war. And leſt this great heate of the incenſed multitude ſhould, for want of preſent exerciſe, begin to faint, and vaniſh away in idle wordes, occaſion was found out to thruſt the Lacedæmonians into Armes, that they themſelues might ſeeme Authours of the quarrell. Some land there was in the tenure of the Locrians, to which the Thebans had in former time laid claime; but the Phocians either hauing the better title, or finding the greater fauour, had it adjudged vnto them, and receiued yeerly money for it. This money the Locrians were either hired or perſwaded to pay now to the Thebans, who readily accepted it. The Phocians not meaning ſo to loſe their Rent, made a diſtreſſe by ſtrong hand, recouering a great deale more than their owne; which the Thebans (as in protection of their new Tenants) requited with an inuaſion made vpon Phocis, waſting that Countrie in the manner of open warre. Such were the beginnings of profeſſed hoſtilitie betweene Thebes and Sparta, and the firſt breaking out of their cloſe enmitie, that had long time, though hardly, been concealed. For when the Phocian Embaſſadours came to Sparta, complaining of the violence done by the Thebans, and requeſting ſuccour, they had very fauourable audience, and readie conſent to their ſuite; it being the manner of the Lacedæmonians, to deferre the acknowledgement of injuries receiued, vntil occaſion of reuenge were offered, and then to diſcouer their indignation in cold bloud. At this time they had very good opportunitie to worke their owne wills, hauing no other war to diſturbe them in Greece, and hearing out of Aſia no newes, that could offend or trouble them. Wherefore they ſent Lyſander to raiſe all the Countries about Phocis, and with ſuch forces as he could leauie, to attend the comming of Pauſanias King of Sparta (for Sparta, as hath beene ſhewed before, had two Kings) who ſhould follow him with the ſtrength of Peloponneſus. Lyſander did as he was appointed, and being of great reputation in thoſe parts, he drew the Orchomenians to reuolt from Thebes. Pauſanias likewiſe raiſed all Peloponneſus, except the Corinthians, (who refuſed to aſſiſt him in that enterpriſe) meaning to joine with Lyſander, and make a ſpeedie end of the war. The conſideration of ſo great a danger, approching ſo ſwiftly, cauſed the Thebans to ſeeke what helpe they could abroade, foraſmuch as their owne ſtrength was farre too little to make reſiſtance againſt ſuch mightie preparations. It was not vnknown to them, that many followers of the Lacedæmonians were otherwiſe affected in heart than they durſt vtter in countenance; but the good wiſhes of ſuch people were little auaileable, conſidering that the moſt which could be expected from them, was, that they ſhould doe as little hurt as they could: by which manner of tergiuerſation, the Corinthians did at that preſent caſt themſelues into the diſpleaſure of the Spartans, to the no great benefit of Thebes. Wherefore it was thought the ſafeſt courſe, to procure the aſſiſtance of ſome Eſtate that might preſently declare it ſelfe on their ſide, which would cauſe many others to follow the example, & make their partie ſtrong. To this end they ſent Embaſſadours to Athens, excuſing old offences, as either not committed by publike allowance, or done in time of the generall warre, and recompenced with friendſhip lately ſhewne in their refuſall of aſſiſting Pauſanias, when he came in behalfe of the thirtie Tyrants, againſt the good Citizens of Athens. In regard of which, and for their owne Honour ſake, they requeſted them of aide in the preſent warre, offering to doe the beſt that they could for the reſtoring of Athens to her former Eſtate and Dignitie. Thraſybulus and his Friends, who perſecuted by the thirtie, had been well entertained at Thebes, procured now the Citie to make a large requitall of the courteſie which they had receiued. For it was decreed, that the State of Athens ſhould not only refuſe to aide the Lacedæmonians in this Warre; but that it ſhould aſſiſt the Thebans, and engage it ſelfe in their cauſe. Whileſt Pauſanias lay ſtill, waiting the arriuall of his Confederates; Lyſander being deſirous to doe ſomewhat that might aduance the buſineſſe in hand, came to Haliartus, where, though Pauſanias did not meet him, as had beene appointed, yet he attempted the Towne, and was ſlaine in fight by the Thebans, who came haſtily to the reſcue. As this victorie did encourage the Thebans, ſo the comming of Pauſanias with his great Army did againe amaze them, with preſentation of extreme danger; but their ſpirits were ſoone reuiued by the ſtrong ſuccour which was brought from Athens, in conſideration of which, and of the late battaile, Pauſanias durſt not hazard a new fight with them, but receiuing the bodies of thoſe that were ſlaine, by compoſition, departed out of their Territorie, for which, either cowardiſe or indiſcretion, he was at his returne to Sparta condemned as a Traitour, and driuen to flie into Tegea, where hee ended his daies in baniſhment.

How AGESILAVS was called out of Aſia to helpe his Countrie. A victorie of the Spartans. CONON the Athenian, aſſiſted by PHARNABAZVS, ouercomes the Lacedæmonian fleet; recouers the maſterie of the Seas; and rebuilds the walls of Athens.

THis good ſucceſſe, and the confederacie made with Athens, gaue ſuch reputation to the Thebans, that the Argiues, Corinthians, Eubœans, Locrians, and Acarnanes, did forthwith ſide with them, & raiſing a ſtrong Armie, determined to giue battaile to the Lacedæmonians as neere as they might, to their owne dores; Conſidering that the force of Sparta it ſelfe was not great, but grew more and more by the adiunction of their Confederates. The Magiſtrates of Sparta perceiuing the danger, ſent for Ageſilaus, who readily obeied them, and promiſing his friends in Aſia to returne ſpeedily to their aſſiſtance, paſſed the Straights of Helleſpont into Europe. In the meane time the Cities of the new league had giuen battaile to the Lacedæmonians, and the remainder of their Aſſociates, but with il ſucceſſe. For when the right-wing of each part had gotten the better hand, the Argiues and Thebans returning from the chaſe in ſome diſorder, were broken and defeated by the Lacedæmonians, who meeting them in good order, wonne from them the Honour which they had gotten, by forcing the left wing of the Lacedæmonians, and made the victorie of that day entirely their owne. The report of this battaile meeting Ageſilaus at Amphibolis, were by him ſent ouer into Aſia, where it is not likely that they brought much comfort vnto his friend, who had ſince his departure ſeene the Spartan fleet beaten, and Lyſander the Admirall ſlaine. The ſame man, whoſe endeuour had brought the Athenians into order, by aduancing the Sea-forces of the Lacedæmonians with money, and all manner of ſupplies, was now the occaſion that the power of Athens grew ſtrong at Sea, when the Citie was deſpoiled of her old reputation, and ſcarſly able to mainetaine an Armie by Land for her owne defence. Pharnabazus conſidering how much it imported the King his Maſter, to haue the Greeks diuided into ſuch factions, as might vtterly diſable them from vndertaking abroad, thought it the ſafeſt way for himſelfe, during theſe broiles, to take ſuch order, that he ſhould not need any more, to ſeeke peace by entreatie and commoration of old benefits, at their hands, who vn-prouoked had ſold his loue for thirtie Talents. To which purpoſe he furniſhed Conon the Athenian with eight ſhips, who had eſcaped, when the fleet of Athens was ſurpriſed by Lyſander at Ægos-Potamos; giuing him the command of a great Nauie, wherewith he requited the loſſe receiued at Ægos-Potamos, by repaying the Lacedæmonians with the like deſtruction of their fleet at Cnidus. After this victorie Conon ſailed to Athens, bringing with him, partly as the liberalitie of Pharnabazus, partly as the fruit of his victorie, ſo ſtrong a Nauie, and ſo much gold, as encouraged the Athenians to rebuild their walls, and thinke more hopefully vpon recouering the Signiorie which they had loſt.

Athenians

§. VIII.

Of ſundrie ſmall victories gotten on each part. The Lacedæmonians loſe all in Aſia; The Athenians recouer ſome part of their old Dominion.

NEuertheleſſe the Lacedæmonians, by many victories at Land, maintained for ſome yeeres the honour of their eſtate, endangered very greatly by this loſſe at Sea. For Ageſilaus obtained the better with his horſe-men from the Theſſalians, who were accounted the beſt riders in Greece: He waſted Bœotia, and fought a great battaile at Coronea againſt the Thebans, and their Allies, whome he ouerthrew; and by his Marſhall Gylis forraged the Countrie of Locris: which done, he returned home.

The gaine of theſe victories was not great, & the reputation of them was, by many loſſes, much defaced. For the Thebans did in the battailes of Coronea vanquiſh the Orchomenians, who ſtood oppoſite vnto them, and retired vnbroken to Mount Helicon, opening way perforce when Ageſilaus charged them in the returne from the purſuit. Likewiſe Gylis was ſlaine with a great part of his Armie by the Locrians; and ſome other exploits by the Lacedæmonians performed againſt the Corinthians, were repayed with equall damage receiued in the parts adioyning; many Townes being eaſily taken, and as eaſily recouered. The varietie of which enter-feates was ſuch, that the Thebans themſelues were drawne, by the loſſe of the hauen of Corinth, to ſue for peace, but could not get audience, till ſuch time as the newes came of a great victorie obtained by Iphicrates, Generall of the Athenian-forces at Lecheum; whereupon the Theban Embaſſadours being ſent for, and willed to doe their meſſage, required only in ſcorne, to haue a ſafe conduct giuen them, that they might enter into Corinth. From this time forward the Warre was made for a while only by incurſions, wherin the Achæans, confederates of Sparta, felt moſt loſſe, their whole ſtate being endangered by the Acarnanians, who held with the contrarie ſide, vntill Ageſilaus repaied theſe inuaders with equall, or greater calamities, brought vpon their owne Lands, which did ſo afflict the Acarnanes, that they were driuen to ſue for peace. But the affaires at Sea were of moſt conſequence, vpon which the ſucceſſe of all depended. For when the Townes of Aſia perceiued, that the Lacedæmonians were not only intangled in an hard war at home, but almoſt diſabled to paſſe the Seas, hauing loſt their fleet at Cnidus; they ſoone gaue eare to Pharnabazus, who promiſed to allow that they ſhould vſed their own lawes, if they would expell the Spartan Gouernours. Onely the Citie of Abidus did ſtand firme, wherein Dercyllidas lay, who did his beſt to containe all the Townes about Helleſpont, in the alliance of the Lacedæmonians; which he could not doe, becauſe the Athenian fleet vnder Thraſybulus tooke in Byzantium, Chalcedon, and other places thereabout, reducing the Ile of Lesbos to their ancient acknowledgement of Athens.

The baſe conditions offered vnto the Perſian by the Lacedæmonians. Of ſundrie fights and other paſſages in the warre. The peace of ANTALCIDAS.

ABout this time the Spartans beganne to perceiue how vneaſie a thing it would bee, to maintaine the warre againſt men as good as themſelues, aſſiſted with the treaſures of Perſia: wherefore they craued peace of Artaxerxes, moſt baſely offering, not only to renounce the Greekes inhabiting habiting Asia, & to leaue them to the Kings disposition, but withall to set the Ilanders, and euerie Towne in Greece, as well the little as the great, at full and absolute libertie whereby they said that all the principal Estates of their Countrie would so be weakened, that nō one, nor all of them should be able to stirre against the great King. And sure it was, that the power of the Countrie being so broken, and rent into many small pieces, could neither haue disquieted the Persian, by an offensiue warre, nor haue made any good defence against him, but would haue left it easie for him in continuance of time, to haue taken the Cities one after another, till he had made himselfe Master of all. The Spartans were not ignorant of this, but were so carried with enuie, that perceiuing how the dominion of the Seas was like to returne to Athens, they chose rather to giue all from themselues and others, and make all a-like weake; than to permit that any of their owne Nation should grow stronger than themselues, who so lately had commanded all. Yet this great offer was not at the first accepted, both in regard that the other Estates of Greece, who had in the Kings behalfe ioyned together against the Lacedæmonians, did by their seuerall Embassadours oppose themselues vnto it, and for that it was thought safest for Artaxerxes, rather to weaken the Lacedæmonians yet more, than by interposing himself to bring friends and foes on the suddaine to an equalitie. Especially Struthas, whom Artaxerxes did send as his Lieutenant into the low-Countries, did seeke to repay the harme done by Agesilaus in those parts: which his intent appearing plaine, and all hope of the peace being thereby cut off; Thimbro was sent into Asia to make war vpon Struthas; and others were appointed to other places, whereby the warre, being scattered about, all the Iles and Townes on the firme Land grew almost to the manner of piracie and robberie, affording many skirmishes, but few great actions worthie of remembrance. Thimbro was slaine by Struthas, and in his place Diphridas was sent who demeaned himselfe more warily. Dercyllidas was remoued from his charge at Abydus, because he had not impeached Thrasybulus in his enterprises about Hellespont; Anaxibius, who succeeded him, was surprised and slaine in a skirmish by Iphicrates the Athenian. Thrasybulus, departing from Lesbos toward Rhodes, was slaine by the way at Aspendus. The Citie of Rhodes had long before ioined with the Lacedæmonians, who erected there (as was their manner) an Aristocratie, or the Gouernment of a few the principall Citizens, where as contrariwise the Athenians were accustomed to put the Soueraignetie into the hands of the people, each of them seeking to assure themselues, by erecting in the Townes of their Confederates a Gouernment like vnto their owne: which doing (where more especiall cause did not hinder) caused the Nobilitie to fauour Sparta, and the Commons to encline to Athens. The people of Ægina roued vpon the coast of Attica, which caused the Athenians to land an Armie in Ægina, and besiege their towne: but this siege being raised by the assistance of the Lacedæmonian fleet, the Ilanders beganne a-new to molest Attica, which caused the Athenians to man their ships againe, that returned beaten, hauing lost foure of thirteene. The losse of these ships was soone recompensed by a victory which Chabrias the Athenian General had in Ægina, whereupon the Ilanders were faine to keepe home, and leaue to the Athenians the Seas free. It may well seeme strange that the Citie of Athens, hauing but newly raised her walls; hauing not by any fortunate and important battaile secured her estate from dangers by land; but onely depending vpon the assistance of such Confederates, as carried vnto different ends, had often discouered themselues irresolute in the common cause; would send a fleet and an Armie to Cyprus, in defence of Euagoras, when the mastry of the Seas, was so ill assured, that an Iland lying in the eie of Pyræus, had abilitie to vexe the coast of Attica. But as the ouer-weaning of that Citie did cause it vsually to embrace more then it could compasse; so the insolencie and shameless iniustice of the people, had now bred in the chiefe Commanders, a desire to keepe themselues farre out of sight, and to seeke emploiments at such distance as might secure them from the eies of the enuious, and from publike iudgements, out of which few few or none eſcaped. For which cauſe Timotheus did paſſe away much part of his time in the Iſle of Lesbos; Iphicrates in Thrace; and Chabrias now did carrie away into Cyprus a greater force than his Countrie well could haue ſpared, with which he returned not when the buſineſſe in Cyprus came to an end, but ſought new aduentures in Ægypt, whereby aroſe neither thankes to himſelfe, nor profit to his Citie, though honour both to him and it. The Athenians being thus careleſſe of things at hand, had a notable blow giuen vnto them, ſhortly after that Chabrias was gone to Cyprus, euen within their owne Hauen. For Teleutias, a Lacedæmonian, being made Gouernour of Ægina, conceiued a ſtrong hope of ſurpriſing the Nauie of Athens, as it lay in Piræus; thinking a-right that it was an harder matter to encounter with ten ſhips prepared for the fight, than with twentie lying in harbour, whoſe Mariners were aſleepe in their Cabbins, or drinking in Tauernes. Wherefore he ſailed by night vnto the mouth of the Port, which entring at the breake of day, hee found (according to his expectation) moſt of the men on ſhore, & few or none left aboord to make reſiſtance: by which meanes hee tooke many ſhips laden with marchandizes, many fiſher-men, paſſengers, and other Veſſels, alſo three or foure Gallies, hauing ſunke or broken, and made vnſeruiceable, as many of the reſt as the time would ſuffer. About this time Pharnabazus, the Lieutenant of Phrygia, had one of the Kings Daughters giuen to him in marriage, with whom hee liued about the Court; and many Officers that fauoured the Lacedæmonians were placed in the lower Aſia; by whoſe aſſiſtance, the fleet of Sparta grew victorious about Helleſpont; in ſuch wiſe, that perhaps they ſhould not haue needed the peace, which they themſelues procured by Antalcidas, from the great King, the conditions whereof were ſuch as are mentioned before, giuing freedome to all the Cities of Greece, and diuiding the Countrie into as many ſeuerall States as there were pettie Boroughs in it. Thus Artaxerxes hauing bought his owne peace with money, did likewiſe by his money become arbitrator & decider of Controuerſies betweene the Greekes, diſpoſing of their buſineſſe in ſuch wiſe as ſtood beſt with his owne good. The tenor of Artaxerxes his decree was, That all Aſia and Cyprus ſhould be his owne; the Iles of Lemnos, Imbrus, and Scirus be ſubject to Athens; all other Greeke Townes, as well the little as the great, be ſet at libertie; and that whoſoeuer ſhould refuſe this peace, vpon them the approuers of it ſhould make warre, the King aſſiſting them by Land and Sea, with men, and ſhips, and treaſure. The Athenians were ſo diſcouraged by their loſſes at Sea; the Lacedæmonians by reuolt of their Confederates, and the neceſſitie of maintaining many Garriſons, for which they wanted money; and other States by the miſeries of the warre, whereof they ſaw no end; that all (excepting the Thebans) did conſent vnto theſe Articles. This was called the peace of Antalcidas: whereof the Lacedæmonians taking vpon themſelues the execution, did not only compell the Argiues to depart out of Corinth (which vnder pretence of defending they held by Garriſons, lately thruſt into it, not as Patrons, but as Lords) and the Thebans to leaue Bœotia free, of which Prouince Thebes had alwaies held the gouernment: the Thebans themſelues being alſo comprehended vnder the name of the Bœotians; but cauſed the Mantineans to throw downe their owne Citie, and to dwell in Villages: alleaging that they had formerly beene accuſtomed ſo to doe, though purpoſing indeede to chaſtiſe them, as hauing beene ill affected to Sparta in the late Warre. By theſe courſes the Lacedæmonians did hope that all the ſmall Townes in Greece would, when occaſion ſhould require it, willingly follow them in their warres, as Authors of their libertie; and that the great Cities hauing loſt all their dependants, would be vnable to make oppoſition.

The ware which the Lacedæmonians made vpon Olynthus. They take Thebes by treason; and Olynthus by famine.

WHileſt theſe warres, which ended without either victorie or profit, conſumed the riches and power of Greece, the Citie of Olynthus in Thrace was growne ſo mighty, that ſhee did not only command her Neighbour-Townes, but was become terrible to places farre remoued, and to Sparta it ſelfe. Great part of Macedonia, together with Pella, the principall Citie of that Kingdome, was taken by the Olynthians, who following the vſuall pretence of the Lacedæmonians, to ſet at libertie the places ouer which King Amyntas did tyrannize, had almoſt now driuen him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themſelues. The Citizens of Acanthus and of Apollonia, being neereſt vnto the danger of theſe incroching neighbours, acquainted the Lacedæmonians with their feare, affirming that this Dominion of the Olynthians would bee too ſtrong for al Greece, if ſome continuance of time ſhould giue it reputation, which only it wanted, wherefore they requeſted aſſiſtance, but in ſuch termes as did ſound of compulſion; proteſting that either they muſt warre vpon Olynthus, or become ſubject vnto her, and fight in her defence. Heereupon was made a haſtie leauie of men, two thouſand being preſently ſent away with promiſe to bee ſeconded by a greater Armie. Whileſt theſe two thouſand gaue ſuch beginning to the warre, as agreed with their ſmall number, the body of the Armie following them, ſurpriſed the Cittadell of Thebes, which was betraied into the hands of Phœbidas the Lacedæmonian, by ſome of the Magiſtrates, who ſought to ſtrengthen their faction by the ſlauerie of their Countrie. The Thebans were ill affected to Sparta, but had not in any one point violated the peace lately made betweene them; which cauſed the Lacedæmonians to doubt whether this act of Phœbidas were more worthy of reward or of puniſhment; In concluſion, profit ſo farre ouer-weighed honeſtie, that the deede was approued, many principall Citizens of Thebes condemned to death, many driuen into baniſhment; and the Traitors rewarded with the gouernement of the Citie: by whoſe authoritie, and the force of the Garriſon, the Thebans were compelled to ſerue the Lacedæmonians, in all, and more than all that they could require. This acceſſe of power hauing ſtrengthned the Lacedæmonians, cauſed them to entertaine the greater forces about Olynthus, which (notwithſtanding the loſſe of one great battaile, and ſome other diſaſters) they compelled at length by famine to render it ſelfe to their obedience.

§. XI.

How the Thebans recouered their libertie, driuing out the Lacedæmonian Garriſon.

AFter this Olynthian Warre, which endured almoſt three yeeres, it ſeemed that no Eſtate in Greece was able to make head againſt that of Sparta: but it was not long ere the Thebans found meanes to ſhake off their yoke, and gaue both example and meanes to others to doe the like. One of the baniſhed men found by conference with a Scribe of the Theban Magiſtrates, comming to Athens, that the tyrannie wherewith his Countrie was oppreſſed, pleaſed him no better than it did thoſe who for feare of it were fled from home. Whereupon a plot was layd betweene theſe two, that ſoone found very good ſucceſſe, being managed thus. Seuen of the baniſhed men forſooke Athens priuily, and entred by night into the fields of Thebes; where ſpending the next day ſecretly, they came late in the euening to the Gates like husband-men returned turned from worke, and ſo paſſed vndiſcouered vnto the houſe of Charon, whom Phyllidas the Scribe had drawne into the conſpiracie. The day following, a ſolemne feaſt being then held in the Citie, Phyllidas promiſed the Gouernours, who were inſolent and luſtfull men, that hee would conueigh vnto them that night the moſt beautifull Dames of the Towne, with whom they ſhould take their pleaſure. Hauing cheared them with ſuch hope, and plentie of good wine, hee told them when the time of performance (which they vrged) came, that hee could not make good his promiſe, vnleſſe they would diſmiſſe their followers, becauſe the Gentlewomen, who attended without a Chamber, would not endure, that any of the ſeruants ſhould ſee their faces. Vpon this occaſion the attendants were diſmiſſed, and the Conſpirators, attired like Ladies and their Maides, brought into the place; who taking aduantage of the Gouernours looſe behauiour, ſlew them al vpon the ſodaine with Daggers, which they brought hidden vnder their garments. Then preſently caſting off their diſguiſe, they went to other places, where faining themſelues to come to the Gouernours vpon buſineſſe, they got admittance, and ſlew thoſe which were of the Lacedæmonian faction. By the like deuice they brake into the priſon, ſlew the Gaoler; and ſet at libertie ſuch as they thought meete, and being followed by theſe deſperate men, proclaimed libertie, making the death of the Tyrants knowen. The Captaine of the Caſtle hearing the Proclamation, thought the Rebels to bee ſtronger than indeed they were: the Citizens contrariwiſe miſtruſted, that it was a practice to diſcouer ſuch, as would be forward vpon occaſion of reuolting. But as ſoone as day-light reuealed the plaine truth, all the people tooke armes & beſieged the Caſtle, ſending haſtily to Athens for ſuccour. The Garriſon alſo ſent for aide vnto the Townes adioyning, whence a few broken troupes comming to the reſcue, were defeated on the way by the horſe-men of Thebes. On the other ſide the baniſhed Thebans did not only make ſpeede to aſſiſt their Countrimen, but procured ſome Athenians to joyne with them, and thereby came ſo ſtrong into the Citie, that the Caſtle was yeelded, more through feare than any neceſſitie, vpon cõdition that the Souldiers might quietly depart with their Armes; for which compoſition the Captaine at his returne to Sparta was put to death. When the newes of the doings at Thebes, and the ſucceſſe arriued at Sparta, an Armie was raiſed forth-with, and all things prepared as earneſtly for the recouering of that Citie, as if ſome part of their ancient inheritance had beene taken from the Lacedæmonians, and not a Towne perfidiouſly vſurped by them, reſtored to her owne libertie, Cleombrotus, one of the Kings, was ſent on this expedition, who hauing wearied his followers, with a toileſome Winters journey, returned home without any good or harme done; leauing Sphodrias, with part of his Armie, at Theſpies, to infeſt the Thebans; who doing them ſome diſpleaſures, made large amends by a fooliſh attempt vpon the Hauen of Athens, which failing to take, hee waſted the Countrie adioyning, and draue away Cattaile, cauſing by this outrage the Athenians to enter with all their power into the Warre, out of which they were before very carefully ſeeking how to with-draw themſelues.

CHAP. XII.

Of the flouriſhing eſtate of Thebes, from the battaile of Leuctra to the battaile of Mantinæa.

§. I.

How Thebes and Athens ioyned together againſt Sparta. How the Athenians made peace for themſelues, and others, out of which the Thebans were excluded. The battaile of Leuctra, and beginning of the Theban greatneſſe.

THE Lacedæmonians were men of great reſolution, and of much grauitie in all their proceedings, but one diſhonorable rule they held, That all reſpects withſtanding the commoditie of Sparta were to be neglected; the practice of which doctrine, euen by the beſt and wiſeſt of them, did greatly blemiſh that Eſtate, but when it was put in execution by inſufficient ouerweening men, it ſeldome failed to bring vpon them in ſtead of profit vnjuſtly expected, both ſhame & loſſe. And ſo it befel them in theſe enterpriſes of Phœbidas, vpon the Caſtle of Thebes, and Sphodrias vpon the Pireus. For howſoeuer Ageſilaus did ſpoile the Countrie about Thebes, in which hee ſpent two Summers, yet the diligence of the Thebans repaired all, who by the good ſucceſſe of ſome attempts, grew ſtronger than they were at the firſt.

The Athenians likewiſe beganne to looke abroade, ſailing to the Ile of Coreyra, where they ordered things at their pleaſure, and hauing in ſome fights at Sea preuailed, began as in the Peloponneſian warre, to ſurround Peloponneſus with a Nauie; afflicting ſo the Lacedæmonians, that had not the Thebans by their inſolencie wearied their friends, and cauſed them to ſeeke for peace, it had beene very likely that the end of this warre, ſhould haue ſoone come to a good end, which neuertheleſſe, being proſequuted by the Thebans (who oppoſed at once both theſe two great Eſtates) left the City of Sparta as much dejected as the beginning found it proud and tyrannous. But the Athenians perceiuing how Thebes encroched euery day vpon her weake Neighbours, not ſparing ſuch as had beene dependants vpon Athens, and finding themſelues, whileſt engaged in ſuch a warre, vnable to relieue their complaining friends, reſolued to ſettle the affaires of Greece, by renewing that forme of peace which Antalcidas had brought from the Perſian. Wherefore they ſent Meſſengers to Thebes, peremptorily ſignifying, That it was their intent to finiſh the Warre; to which purpoſe they willed the Thebans to ſend Embaſſadours along with them to Sparta; who readily condeſcended, fearing otherwiſe that they ſhould be left out of the Treatie of peace, which came to paſſe, being ſo wrought by the couragious wiſdome of Epaminondas, who vnderſtood farre better than his Countrimen, what was to be feared or hoped. In this Treatie the Lacedæmonians and Athenians did ſoone agree; but when the Thebans offered to ſweare to the Articles in the name of the Bœotians; Ageſilaus required them to ſweare in their owne name, and to leaue the Bœotians free, whom they had lately reduced vnder their obedience. Whereunto Epaminondas made anſwere, That the Citie of Sparta ſhould giue example to Thebes by ſetting the Laconians free; for that the Signorie of Bœotia did by as good right appertaine to the Thebans, as that of Laconia to the Spartans. This was well and truly ſpoken; but was heard with no patience: For Ageſilaus bearing a vehement hatred vnto thoſe of Thebes, by whom he was drawne back out of Aſia into Greece, & diſappointed of all the glory which he had hoped to atchieue by the Perſian Warre, did now very paſſionately vrge that point of ſetting the Bœotians at libertie, and finding it as obſtinately refuſed, he daſht the name of the Thebans out of the league. At the ſame time Cleombrotus the other King of Sparta lay in Phocis, who receiued command from the Gouernours of Sparta forthwith to enter vpon the Land of the Thebans with all his power, which he did, and was there ſlaine at Leuctra, and with him the flowre of his Armie. This battaile of Leuctra being one of the moſt famous that euer were fought betweene the Greekes, was not ſo notable for any circumſtance foregoing it, or for the managing of the fight it ſelfe, as for the death of the King, and many Citizens of Sparta, but eſpecially, for that after this battaile (betweene which and the concluſion of the generall peace there paſſed but twentie daies) the Lacedæmonians were neuer able to recouer the ſtrength and reputation which had formerly made them redoubted farre and neere; whereas contrariwiſe the Thebans, whoſe greateſt ambition had in former times confined it ſelfe vnto the little Region of Bœotia, did now begin to vndertake the leading and command of many People and Eſtates, in ſuch wiſe, that ſoone after they brought an Armie of threeſcore and ten thouſand ſtrong vnto the Gates of Sparta. So much doe the afflictions of an hard warre, valiantly indured, aduance the affaires of the diſtreſſed, and guide them into the way of Conqueſt, by ſtiffening that reſolution with a manly temper, which wealth and eaſe had through luxurie, rechleſſeneſſe, and many other vices or vanities, made ruſtie and effeminate.

§. II.

How the Athenians tooke vpon them to maintaine the peace of Greece. New troubles hence ariſing. EPAMINONDAS inuadeth and waſteth the Territorie of Lacedæmon.

THE Athenians, refuſing to take aduantage of this ouerthrow fallen vpon their old Enemies, and new Confederates the Lacedæmonians; did neuertheleſſe finely giue them to vnderſtand, that their Dominion was expired, and therefore their pride might well be laid away. For taking vpon themſelues the maintenance of the peace lately concluded, which Ageſilaus (perhaps of purpoſe to make benefit of quarels that might ariſe) had left vnperfect, they aſſembled the Deputies of al the Eſtates confederated at Athens; where the generall libertie of all Townes, as well ſmall as great, was ratified, vnder the ſtile Of the Athenians, and their Aſſociates. Hereupon began freſh garboiles. The Mantineans, claiming power by this decree to order their affaires at their owne pleaſure, did (as it were) in deſpight of the Spartans, who had enforced them to raze their towne, reedifie it, & allie themſelues with ſuch of the Arcadians as ſtood worſt affected to Sparta. The Arcadians, a ſtrong Nation, conſiſting of many Cities, were diſtracted with factions; ſome deſiring to hold good correſpondencie with the Lacedæmonians; ſome to weaken & keep them low; yet all pretending other ends. The Lacedæmonians durſt not giue impeachment to the Mantineans; nor take vpon them to correct their ill-willers among the Arcadians, till ſuch time as the factions brake out into violence, and each part called in forraine helpe. Then was an Armie ſent from Sparta, as it were in defence of the people of Tegea, againſt the Mantineans, but indeed againſt them both. Ageſilaus had the leading of it, but effected nothing. The Thebans had by this time ſubdued the Phocians, & were become head of the Locrians, Acarnanians, Eubœans, & many others; with the power of which Countries they entred Peloponneſus in fauor of the Arcadians, who had, vpon expectatiõ of their coming abſtained from giuing battaile to Ageſilaus. The Armie of the Spartans being diſmiſſed, and Epaminondas joyned with the Arcadians; the Region of Laconia vvas inuaded and ſpoiled: a thing ſo ſtrange, that no Oracle could haue found beliefe if any had foretold it. Almoſt ſixe hundred yeeres were ſpent, ſince the Dorians, vnder the poſteritie of Hercules, had ſeized vpon Laconia, in all which time the ſound of an enemies trumpet was not heard in that Countrie: Ten yeeres were not fully past, since all Greece was at the deuotion of the Spartans: but now the Region which neither Xerxes with his huge Armie could once looke vpon, nor the mightie forces of Athens, and other Enemie-States had dared to set foot on, saving by stealth, was all on a light fire, the very smoke whereof the women of Sparta were ashamed to behold. All which indignitie notwithstanding, the Lacedæmonians did not issue out of Sparta to fight, but sought how to preserue the Towne, setting at libertie as many of their Heilotes or Slaues as were willing to beare Armes in defence of the State, and somwhat pittifully entreated the Athenians to giue them succour. From Corinth and some Townes of Peloponnesus they receiued speedie assistance; the Athenians came forward more slowly, so that Epaminondas returned without battaile, hauing rebuilded the Citie of Messene, and peopled it a-new by calling home the ancient Inhabitants, whom the Lacedæmonians many Ages before had chased away into other Countries, possessing their Territories themselues.

§. III.

The composition betweene Athens and Sparta for command in warre against the Thebans; who againe inuade and spoile Peloponnesus. The vnfortunate presumption of the Arcadians.

THis journie therefore vtterly defaced the reputation of the Spartans, in such wise, that they did no longer demand the conduct of the Army, which was to be raised, nor any maner of precedence: but sending Embassadors from Sparta, and from all the Cities which held league with it, vnto Athens, they offered to yeeld the Admiraltie to the Athenians, requesting that they themselues might be Generalls by Land. This had beene a composition well agreeing with the situation and qualitie of those two Cities; but it was rejected, because the Mariners and others that were to be imploied at Sea, were men of no marke or estimation, in regard of those companies of horse and foot whereof the Land-Armie was compounded, who being all Gentlemen or Citizens of Athens, were to haue serued vnder the Lacedæmonians. Wherefore it was agreed that the authority should be diuided by time, the Athenians ruling fiue daies, the Lacedæmonians other fiue, & so successiuely that each of them should haue command of all, both by Land and by Sea. It is manifest, that in this conclusion vaine ambition was more regarded than the common profit, which must of necessitie be very slowly aduanced, where consultation, resolution, and performance are so often to change hands. This appeared by a second inuasion of Peloponnesus, wherein the Thebans found their enemies so vnable to impeach them, that hauing fortified Isthmus from Sea to Sea, as in former times they had done against Xerxes, they were driuen out of their strength by Epaminondas, who forraged the Countrie without resistance. But as the Articles of this league betweene Athens and Sparta did, by diuiding the conduct in such manner, disable the societie, and make it insufficient to those ends for which it was concluded; so the example of it wrought their good, by filling the enemies heads with the like vanitie. For the Arcadians considering their owne numbers which they brought into the field, and hauing found by many trials that their people were not inferiour to others in strength of body, in courage, or in good Souldiership, thought it good reason that they should in like maner share the gouernement, with their friends the Thebans; and not alwaies continue followers of others, by encreasing whose greatnes they should strengthen their own yoke. Herevpon they began to demeane themselues very insolently, whereby they grew hatefull to their Neighbours, and suspected of the Thebans in an ill time. For a motion of generall peace hauing been made (which tooke not effect, because the City of Messene was not abandoned to the Lacedæmonians) the next enterprise of the Spartans and their friends was vpon these Arcadians, who relying too much vpon their owne worth, were ouerthrowne in a great battaile, their calamitie being as pleasing to their Confederates, as to their Enemies.

§. IIII.

§. IIII.

The great growth of the Theban Estate. Embassages of the Greekes to the Persian; with the reasons why he most fauoured the Thebans. Troubles in the Persian Empire. The fruitlesse issue of the Embassages.

THe Thebans especially reioyced at the Arcadians misfortune, considering, that, without their aide, the successe of all enterprises proued so ill, whereas they themselues had by their owne power accomplished very well whatsoeuer they tooke in hand, and were become not only victorious ouer the Lacedæmonians, but patrons ouer the Thessalians, and Moderators of the great quarrels that had risen in Macedonia, where compounding the differences about that Kingdome, as pleased them best, they carried Philip the Sonne of Amyntas, and Father of Alexander the Great, as an Hostage vnto Thebes. Hauing therefore obtained such reputation, that little seemed wanting to make them absolute Commanders of al Greece, they sought meanes of alliance with the Persian King, to whom they sent Embassadour the great and famous Captaine Pelopidas, whose reputation drew Artaxerxes to grant vnto the Thebans all that they desired; whereof two especiall points were, That Messene should remaine free from the Lacedæmonians, and that the Athenians should forbeare to send their ships of Warre to Sea; only the later of these two was somwhat qualified with reference to further aduice. The other States of Greece did also send their Embassadours at the same time, of whom few or none receiued much contentment. For the King hauing found by long experience, how farre it concerned him to maintaine a sure partie in Greece, did vpon many waightie considerations resolue, to binde the Thebans firmely vnto him; iustly expecting, that their greatnesse should bee on that side his owne securitie. The Athenians had beene ancient enemies to his Crowne, and, hauing turned the profit of their victories vpon the Persian to the purchase of a great Estate in Greece, maintained their Signorie in such puissant manner, that (sundrie grieuous misfortunes notwithstanding) they had endured a terrible warre, wherein the Lacedæmonians being followed by most of the Grecks, and supplied with treasure, and all sorts of aide by Darius Nothus, were not able to vanquish them, till their owne indiscretion brought them on their knees. The Lacedæmonians being victorious ouer Athens, had no sooner established their Dominion at home, than they vndertooke the conquest of Asia, from which though, by the commotion raised in Greece with Persian gold, they were called backe, yet hauing renewed their power, and settled things in Greece, it was not vnlikely, that they should vpon the next aduantage haue pursued the same enterprise, had not they been empeached by this Theban Warre. But the Thebans contrariwise had alwaies discouered a good affection to the Crowne of Persia. They had sided with Xerxes in his inuasion of Greece; with Darius and the Lacedæmonians against Athens: And finally, hauing offered much contumely to Agesilaus when he put to Sea, they drew him home by making warre on the Confederates of Sparta. Besides all these their good deseruings, they were no Sea-men, and therefore vnlikely to looke abroade; whereunto if perchance they should haue any desire, yet were they disabled by the want of good hauen townes, which they could not seize vpon without open breach of that peace, whereof they intended to become the Executors, giuing libertie to all Cities that had at any time been free. Wherefore Artaxerxes did wholly condescend vnto the requests of Pelopidas, as farre forth as he might without giuing open defiance to the rest of Greece; and by that meane he purchased his owne quiet, being neuer afterward molested by that Nation in the lower Asia. The ill meanes which the Greeks had to disturbe Artaxerxes, was very beneficiall to the Estate of Persia shortly after these times, in that great rebellion of all the Maritime Prouinces. For had then the affaires of Greece beene so composed, that any one Citie might without empeachment of the rest haue transported an Armie, to assist the reuolting Satrapæ, or Viceroies of Caria, Phrygia, Lydia, Mysia, Lycia, Pisidia, Pamphilia, Cilicia, Syria, and Phœnicia, humane reason can hardly find the meanes, by which the Empire could haue been preserued from that ruine, which the diuine Coũcel had deferred vnto the daies of Alexander. But this great conspiracie of so many large and wealthy Prouinces, wanting a firme bodie of good and hardy Souldiers, was in short space discussed and vanished like a mist, without effect: these effeminate Asiatiques wearied quickly with the trauailes and dangers incident to warre, forsaking the common cause, and each man striuing to bee the first, that by treason to his company should both redeeme the former treason to his Prince, & purchase withal his own promotion with encrease of riches. Of this commotion, which in course of time followed some actions not as yet related, I haue rather chosen to make short mention in this place, than hereafter to interrupt the Narration of things more important; both for that it was like a suddaine storme, rashly commenced, idlely followed, and foolishly laied downe, hauing made a great noise without effect, and hauing small reference to any other action regardable; as also because in the whole raigne of Artaxerxes, from the warre of Cyrus, to the inuasion of Ægypt, I finde nothing (this insurrection, and a fruitlesse journey against the Caduſians excepted) worthy of any mẽtion; much lesse of digression from the course of the businesse in Greece. All, or the most of his time, passed away so quietly, that he enjoied the pleasures which an Empire so great and wealthy could affoord vnto so absolute a Lord, with little disturbance. The troubles which he found were only or chiefly Domesticall; growing out of the hatred which Parysatis the Queen-Mother bare vnto his wife Statira, and to such as had bin the greatest enemies to her sonne Cyrus, or gloried in his death: vpon whom, when by poison and mischieuous practices shee had satisfied her feminine appetite of reuenge, thenceforth she wholly applied her selfe to the Kings disposition, cherishing in him the lewd desire of marrying his own Daughter, & filling him with the perswasion, which Princes, not endued with an especiall grace, doe readily entertaine, That his owne will was the supreme law of his subject, and the rule by which all things were to be measured, and adjudged to be good or euill. In this imaginarie happinesse Pelopidas, and the other Embassadours of Greece, both found and left him, but left him by so much more assured than they found him, by how much the cõclusion of his Treatie with them, being altogether to his owne aduantage, did seeme to promise, if not the perpetuitie, a long endurance of the same felicity to him and his, or (at the least) a ful security of danger from Greece, whence only could any danger be feared. But such foundations of eternitie laied by mortall men in this transitory world, like the Tower of Babel, are either shaken from heauen, or made vaine and vnprofitable, ere the frame can be raised to full height, by confusion of tongues among the builders. Hereof was found a good example in the Thebans, and other Estates of Greece that had sent Embassadours to the Persian. For whereas it had been concluded, that all Townes, as well the little as the great, should be set at libertie, and the Thebans made Protectors of this common peace, who thereby should become the Iudges of all controuersies that might arise, and Leaders in warre of all that would enter into this Confederacy; the Kings letters being solemnely published at Thebes, in the presence of Embassadours, drawne thither from all parts of Greece; when an oath was required for obseruation of the forme of peace therein set downe, a dilatorie answere was made by the Embassadors, who said, that they were sent to heare the articles; not to sweare vnto them. Hereby the Thebans were driuen to send vnto each of the Cities to require the Oath; But in vaine. For when the Corinthians had boldly refused it, saying, That they did not neede it; others tooke courage by their example to doe the like, disappointing the Thebans of their glorious hopes, to whom this negotiation with Artaxerxes gaue neither addition nor confirmation of greatnesse, but left them as it found them to relie vpon their owne swords.

§. V.

How all Greece was diuided, betweene the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, on the one ſide, and Thebans on the other. Of the great tumults riſing in Arcadia.

THe condition of things in Greece at that time did ſtand thus. Athens and Sparta, which in former times had commanded all that Nation, and each vpon enuie of the others greatneſſe drawne all her followers into a cruell inteſtine warre, by which the whole Countrie, and eſpecially the Eſtate of theſe two Cities, was brought very low, did now conjoyne their forces againſt the Thebans, who ſought to make themſelues Lords of all. The Eleans, Corinthians, and Achaians, followed the partie of theſe ancient gouerning Cities; either for the old reputation of them, and benefits receiued, or in diſlike of thoſe, who by ſtrong hand were readie to become Rulers, to which authoritie they could not ſuddenly aſpire without ſome injurie and much enuie. The Citie of Thebes abounding with men, whom neceſſitie had made warlike, and many victories in few yeeres had filled with great ſpirits, & being ſo mightie in dependants, that ſhee had reduced all the continent of Greece without Peleponneſus (the Region of Attica, and very little part beſide excepted) vnder ſuch acknowledgement, as wanted not much of meere Vaſſallage, did hope to bring all Peloponneſus to the like obedience, wherein alreadie ſhee had ſet good footing by her conjunction with the States of Argos, and of Arcadia. The Argiues had beene alwaies bad Neighbours to the Spartans, to whom they thought themſelues in ancient Nobilitie Superiours, but were farre vnder them in valour, hauing beene often beaten out of the field by them, and put in danger of looſing all: which cauſed them to ſuſpect and enuie nothing more than the greatneſſe and honor of Sparta, taking truce with her when ſhee was at reſt, and had leiſure to bend her whole force againſt them, but firmely ioyning with her enemies whenſoeuer they found her entangled in a difficult Warre. As the Argiues were, in hatred of Sparta, ſure friends of Thebes, ſo the Arcadians, tranſported with a great opinion of their owne worthines, had formerly renounced and prouoked againſt them their old Confederates and Leaders, the Lacedæmonians, and were now become very doubtfull adherents to the Thebans. In which regard it was thought conuenient by Epaminondas, and the State of Thebes, to ſend an Armie into Peloponneſus, before ſuch time as theſe wauering friends ſhould fall further off, and become either Neutrall, or, which was to be feared, open enemies. And ſurely great cauſe there was to ſuſpect the worſt of them, conſidering that without conſent of the Thebans, they had made peace with Athens; which was very ſtrange, and ſeemed no leſſe to the Athenians themſelues, who holding a firme league with Sparta at the ſame time when the Arcadians treated with them, did neuertheleſſe accept this new Confederacie, not relinquiſhing the old, becauſe they found that, howſoeuer theſe Arcadians were enemies to the Lacedæmonians, they ſhould hereby be drawne ſomewhat further from their alliance with Thebes, which without them was vnlikely to inuade Peloponneſus with a ſtrong Armie. But this did rather haſten, than by any meanes ſtay, the comming of Epaminondas; who finding the way ſomewhat more cleare for him (becauſe the Citie of Corinth, which lay vpon the Iſthmus, and had beene aduerſe to Thebes, was now, by miſeries of this grieuous warre, driuen to become Neutrall) tooke occaſion hereby, and by ſome diſorders among the Arcadians, to viſit Peloponneſus with an Armie, conſiſting of all the power of Thebes. A great tumult had riſen in Arcadia about conſecrated money, which many principall men among them had laied hands on, vnder pretence of imploying it to publique vſes. In compounding the differences growne vpon this occaſion, ſuch, as had leaſt will to render account of the money which had come into their handes, procured the Captaine of ſome Theban Souldiers, lying in Tegea, to take priſoners many of their Countrimen, as people deſirous of innouation. This was done: but the vp-roare thereby thereby caused was so great, that the prisoners were forth-with enlarged, and the Arcadians, who had in great numbers taken Armes, with much a-doe scarse pacified. When complaint of the Captaines proceedings came to Thebes, Epaminondas turned all the blame vpon them, who had made the peace with Athens, letting them know, that he would be shortly among them, to iudge of their fidelitie, by the assistance which they should giue him, in that warre, which he intended to make in Peloponnesus. These Lordly wordes did greatly amaze the Arcadians; who needing not the aide of so mightie a power as he drew a-long with him, did vehemently suspect that great preparation to bee made against themselues. Hereupon such of them as had before sought meanes to settle the affaires of their Countrie, by drawing things to some good conclusion of peace, did now forth-with send to Athens for helpe, and withall dispatched some of the principall among them as Embassadours to Sparta, by whom they offered themselues to the common defence of Peloponnesus, now readie to be inuaded. This Embassage brought much comfort to the Lacedæmonians, who feared nothing more than the comming of Epaminondas, against whom they well knew, that all their forces, and best prouisions, would bee no more than very hardly sufficient. Forbearing therefore to dispute about prerogatiues, they (who had been accustomed vnto such a supremacie, as they would in no wise communicate with the powerfull Citie of Athens, till other hope of securing their owne Estate could not be thought vpon) did now verie gently yeeld to the Arcadians, that the command of the Armie in chiefe, should be giuen, for the time, to that Citie, in whose Territorie it lay.

A terrible inuasion of Peloponnesus by EPAMINONDAS.

CErtaine it is, that the condition of things did at that time require a verie firme consent, and vniforme care of the common safetie. For beside the great forces raised out of the other parts of Greece, the Argiues, and Messenians, prepared with all their strength to ioyne with Epaminondas; who hauing lien a while at Nemea, to intercept the Athenians, receiued there intelligence, that the Armie comming from Athens would passe by Sea, whereupon he dislodged, and came to Tegea, which Citie, and the most of all Arcadia besides, forthwith declared themselues his. The common opinion was, that the first attẽpt of the Thebans, would be vpon such of the Arcadians as had reuolted; which caused the Lacedæmonian Captaines to fortifie Mantinæa with all diligence, and to send for Agesilaus to Sparta, that he bringing with him all that small force of able men, which remained in the Towne, they might be strong enough to abide Epaminondas there. But Epaminondas held so good espiall vpon his Enemies, that had not an vnknowne fellow brought hastie aduertisement of his purpose to Agesilaus, who was then well onward in the way to Mantinæa, the Citie of Sparta had suddenly been taken. For thither with all speede and secrecie did the Thebans march, who had surely carried the Citie, notwithstanding any defence that could haue beene made by that handfull of men remaining within it; but that Agesilaus in all flying haste got into it with his Companies, whom the Army of his Confederates followed thither to the rescue as fast as it was able. The arriuall of the Lacedæmonians and their friends, as it cut off all hope from Epaminondas of taking Sparta, so it presented him with a faire aduantage vpon Mantinæa. It was the time of Harueſt, which made it very likely, that the Mantinæans, finding the warre to be carried from their walls into another quarter, would vse the commoditie of that vacation, by fetching in their corne, and turning out their cattell into their fields, whilest no enemie was neere that might empeach them. Wherefore hee turned away from Sparta to Mantinæa, sending his horse-men before him, to seize vpon all that might be found without the Citie. The Mantineans (according to the expectation of Epaminondas) were ſcattered abroad in the Countrie; farre more intent vpon their harueſt-buſineſſe, than vpon the warre, whereof they were ſecure, as thinking themſelues out of diſtance. By which preſumption it fell out, that great numbers of them, and all their Cattell, being vnable to recouer the Towne, were in a deſperate caſe; and the Towne it ſelfe in no great likelihood of holding out, when the enemy ſhould haue taken all their prouiſion of victuals with ſo many of the people, as had not ouer-dearely beene redeemed, by that Cities returning to ſocietie with Thebes. But at the ſame time, the Athenians comming to the ſuccour of their Confederates, whom they thought to haue found at Mantinea, were very earneſtly entreated by the Citizens to reſcue their goods, and people, from the danger whereinto they were fallen, if it were poſſible by any couragious aduenture to deliuer thoſe who otherwiſe were giuen as loſt. The Thebans were knowne at that time to bee the beſt Souldiers of all the Greekes, and the commendation of good horſemanſhip had alwaies beene giuen to the Theſſalians, as excelling in that qualitie all other Nations; yet the regard of honour ſo wrought vpon the Athenians, that for the reputation of their Citie, which had entred into this warre, vpon no neceſſitie of her owne, but onely in deſire of relieuing her diſtreſſed friends, they iſſued forth of Mantinea, not abiding ſo long as to refreſh themſelues, or their horſes with meat, and giuing a luſtie charge vpon the enemie, who as brauely receiued them, after a long and hote fight, they remained maſters of the field, giuing by this victorie a ſafe and eaſie retrait to all that were without the walls. The whole power of the Bœotians arriued in the place ſoone after this battaile, whom the Lacedæmonians and their Aſſiſtants were not farre behinde.

EPAMINONDAS, conſidering that his Commiſſion was almoſt now expired, and that his attempts of ſurpriſing Sparta and Mantinea, hauing failed, the impreſſion of terrour which his name had wrought in the Peloponneſians, would ſoone vaniſh, vnleſſe by ſome notable act he ſhould abate their courage in their firſt grouth, and leaue ſome memorable character of his expedition; reſolued to giue them battaile, whereby he reaſonably hoped both to ſettle the doubtfull affections of his own Aſſociates, and to leaue the Spartans as weake in ſpirit and abilitie, as he found them, if not wholly to bring them into ſubjection. Hauing therefore warned his men to prepare for that battaile, wherein victorie ſhould be rewarded with Lordſhip of all Greece; and finding the alacritie of his Souldiers to be ſuch, as promiſed the accompliſhment of his owne deſire; he made ſhew of declining the enemie, and intrenching himſelfe in a place of more aduantage, that ſo by taking from them all expectation of fighting that day, hee might allay the heate of their valour, and afterward ſtrike their ſenſes with amazement, when hee ſhould come vpon them vnexpected. This opinion deceiued him not. For with very much tumult, as in ſo great and ſodaine a danger, the enemie ranne to Armes, neceſſitie enforcing their reſolution, and the conſequence of that daies ſeruice vrging them to doe as well as they might. The Theban Armie conſiſted of thirtie thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe; the Lacedæmonians and their friends were ſhort of this number, both in horſe and in foot, by a third part. The Mantineans (becauſe the warre was in their Countrie) ſtood in the right wing, and with them the Lacedæmonians: the Athenians had the left wing, the Achæans, Eleans, and others of leſſe account, filled the bodie of the Armie. The Thebans ſtood in the left wing of their owne battaile, oppoſite to the Lacedæmonians, cedæmonians, hauing by them the Arcadians; the Eubeans, Locrians, Sicyonians, Messenians, and Thessalians with others, compounding the maine battaile; the Argiues held the right wing; the horse-men on each part were placed in the flancks, only a troupe of the Eleans were in reare. Before the footmen could joyne, the encounter of the horse on both sides was very rough, wherein finally the Thebans preuailed, notwithstanding the valiant resistance of the Athenians: who not yeelding to the enemie either in courage or skil, were ouer-laied with numbers, and so beaten vpon by Thessalian slings, that they were driuen to forsake the place, and leaue their infanterie naked. But this retrait was the lesse disgracefull, because they kept themselues together, and did not fall backe vpon their owne foot-men; but finding the Theban horse to haue giuen them ouer, and withall discouering some Companies of foot, which had beene sent about by Epaminondas, to charge their battaile in the reare, they brake vpon them, routed them, and hewed them all in peeces. In the meane season the battaile of the Athenians had not onely to doe with the Argiues, but was hardly pressed by the Theban Horse-men, in such wise that it beganne to open, and was readie to turne backe, when the Elean squadron of Horse came vp to the reliefe of it, and restored all on that part. With farre greater violence did the Lacedæmonians and Thebans meete, these contending for Dominion, the other for the maintenance of their ancient honour, so that equall courage and equal losse on both sides made the hope and appearance of victorie to either equally doubtfull: vnlesse perhaps the Lacedæmonians being very firme abiders, might seeme the more likely to preuaile, as hauing borne the first brunt, and furie of the on-set, which was not hitherto remitted, and being framed by Discipline, as it were by Nature, to excell in patience, whereof the Thebans, by practice of a few yeeres, cannot be thought to haue gotten a habite so sure and generall. But Epaminondas perceiuing the obstinate stiffenesse of the Enemies to bee such, as neither the badde successe of their owne horse, nor all the force of the Bœotian Armie, could abate so farre, as to make them giue one foote of ground; taking a choise Companie of the most able men, whom hee cast into the forme of a Wedge, or Diamond, by the aduantage of that figure against a squadron, and by his owne exceeding vertue, accompanied with the great strength and resolution of them which followed him, did open their rancks, and cleaue the whole battaile in despight of all resistance. Thus was the honour of that day wonne by the Thebans, who may justly bee said to haue carried the victorie, seeing that they remained Masters of the ground whereon the battaile was fought, hauing driuen the Enemie to lodge farther off. For that which was alleaged by the Athenians, as a token that the victorie was partly theirs, the slaughter of those Mercenaries vpon whom they lighted by chance in their owne flight, finding them behinde their Armie, and the retaining of their dead bodies; it was a Ceremonie regardable onely among the Greekes, and serued meerely for ostentation, shewing that by the fight they had obtained somewhat, which the Enemie could not get from them otherwise than by request. But the Thebans arriued at the generall immediate end of battaile; none daring to abide them in the field: whereof a manifest confession is expressed from them, who forsake the place which they had chosen or accepted, as indifferent for triall of their abilitie and prowesse. This was the last worke of the incomparable vertue of Epaminondas, who being in the head of that Warlike troupe of men, which broke the Lacedæmonian esquadron, and forced it to giue back in disaray, was furiously charged on the sodaine, by a desperate Company of the Spartans, who all at once threw their Darts at him alone; whereby receiuing many wounds, hee nethertheless with a singular courage maintained the fight, vsing against the Enemies many of their Darts, which hee drew out of his owne bodie; till at length by a Spartan, called Anticrates, hee receiued so violent a stroke with a Dart, that the wood of it brake, leaning the yron and a peece of the tronchion in his brest. Hereupon hee sunke downe, and was soone conueighed out of the fight by his friends; hauing by his fall somewhat animated the Spartans (who faine would haue got his bodie) but much more inflamed with reuengefull indignation, the Thebans, who raging at this heauie mischance did with great slaughter compell their disordered enemies to leaue the field; though long they followed not the chase, being wearied more with the sadnesse of this disaster, than with all the trauaile of the day. Epaminondas being brought into his Tent, was told by the Phisicians, That when the head of the Dart should be drawne out of his bodie, hee must needes die. Hearing this, hee called for his shield, which to haue lost, was held a great dishonour: It was brought vnto him. He bade them tell him which part had the victorie; answere was made, that the Bœotians had wonne the field. Then said he, it is faire time for mee to die, and withall sent for Iolidas, and Diophantes, two principall men of Warre, that were both slaine; which being told him, He aduised the Thebans to make Peace, whilest with aduantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to discharge the office of a Generall. Herewithall he willed, that the head of the weapon should be drawne out of his bodie; comforting his friends that lamented his death, and want of issue, by telling them, that the victories of Leuctra and Mantinæa were two faire Daughters, in whom his memorie should liue.

So died Epaminondas, the worthiest man that euer was bred in that Nation of Greece, and hardly to bee matched in any Age or Countrie: for hee equalled all others in the seuerall vertues, which in each of them were singular. His Iustice, and Sinceritie, his Temperance, Wisedome, and high Magnanimitie, were no way inferiour to his Militarie vertue; in euery part whereof hee so excelled, That hee could not properly bee called a Warie, a Valiant, a Politique, a Bountifull, or an Industrious, and a Prouident Captaine; all these Titles, and many other, being due vnto him, which with his notable Discipline, and good Conduct, made a perfect composition of an Heroique Generall. Neither was his priuate Conuersation vnanswerable to those high parts, which gaue him praise abroade. For he was Graue, and yet very Affable and Curteous; resolute in publique businesse, but in his owne particular easie, and of much mildnesse: a louer of his People, bearing with mens infirmities, wittie and pleasant in speech, farre from insolence, Master of his owne affections, and furnished with all qualities that might winne and keepe loue. To these Graces were added great abilitie of bodie, much Eloquence, and very deepe knowledge in all parts of Philosophie and Learning, wherewith his minde being enlightened, rested not in the sweetnesse of Contemplation, but brake forth into such effects as gaue vnto Thebes, which had euer-more beene an vnderling, a dreadfull reputation among all people adjoyning, and the highest command in Greece.

§. VIII.

Of the peace concluded in Greece after the battaile of Mantinæa. The voiage of AGESILAVS into Ægypt. His death, and qualities; with an examination of the comparison made betweene him and POMPEY the Roman.

THis battaile of Mantinæa was the greatest that had euer beene fought in that Countrie betweene the Naturals; and the last. For at Marathon, and Platæa, the populous Armies of the barbarous Nations gaue rather a great fame, than a hard triall to the Grecian valour; neither were the practice of Armes and Art Militarie so perfect in the beginnings of the Peloponnesian Warre, as long continuance and daily exercise had now made them. The times following produced no actions of worth or moment, those excepted excepted which were vndertaken against forraine enemies, proouing for the most part vnfortunate. But in this last fight all Greece was interessed, which neuer had more able Souldiers, and braue Commanders, nor euer contended for victory with greater care of the successe, or more obstinate resolution. All which notwithstanding, the issue being such as hath beene related, it was found best for euery particular Estate, that a generall peace should be established, euery one retaining what hee presently had, and none being forced to depend vpon another. The Messenians were by name comprised in this new league; which caused the Lacedæmonians not to enter into it. Their standing out hindred not the rest from proceeding to conclusion; considering that Sparta was now too weake to offend her Neighbours, and therefore might well bee allowed to shew that anger in ceremonies, which had no power to declare it selfe in execution. This peace, as it gaue some breath and refreshing to all the Country, so to the Cities of Athens and Sparta it affoorded leisure to seeke after wealth by forraine emploiment in Ægypt, whither Agesilaus was sent with some smal forces to assist, or indeed, as a Mercenarie, to serue vnder Tachos King of Ægypt in his warre vpon Syria. Chabrias the Athenian, who had before commanded vnder Acoris King of Ægypt, went now as a voluntary, with such forces as he could raise, by entreatie, and offer of good pay, to the same seruice. These Ægyptian Kings descended from Amyrtæus of Sais, who rebelled against Darius Nothus, hauing retained the Country, notwithstanding all intestine dissensions, and forraine inuasions, during three Generations of their owne race, were so well acquainted with the valour of the Greekes, that by their helpe (easily procured with gold) they conceiued great hope, not onely to assure themselues, but to become Lords of the Prouinces adioyning, which were held by the Persian. What the issue of this great enterprise might haue been, had it not fallen by Domesticall rebellion, it is vncertaine. But very likely it is, that the rebellion it selfe had soone come to nothing, if Agesilaus had not proued a false Traitor, ioyning with Nectanebus, who rose against his Prince, and helping the Rebell with that Armie which the money of Tachos had waged. This falshood Agesilaus excused, as tending to the good of his owne Countrie; though it seeme rather, that hee grudged because the King tooke vpon himselfe the Conduct of the Armie, vsing his seruice onely as Lieutenant, who had made full accompt of being appointed the Generall. Howsoeuer it came to passe, Tachos being shamefully betraied by them, in whom he had reposed his chiefe confidence, fled vnto the Persian, who vpon his submission gaue him gentle entertainement; and Nectanebus (who seemes to haue beene the Nephew of Tachos) raigned in his stead. At the same time the Citizens of Mendes had set vp another King, to whom all, or most of the Ægyptians yeelded their obedience. But Agesilaus fighting with him in places of aduantage, preuailed so farre, that hee left Nectanebus in quiet possession of the Kingdome; who in recompence of his treason to the former King Tachos, and good seruice done to himselfe, rewarded him with two hundred and thirtie Talents of siluer, with which bootie sailing homewards, he died by the way. He was a Prince very temperate, and valiant, and a good Leader in warre, free from couetousnesse, and not reproched with any blemish of lust; which praises are the lesse admirable in him, for that the discipline of Sparta was such as did endue euerie one of the Citizens (not caried away by the violent streame of an ill nature) with all, or the chiefe, of these good qualities. Hee was nenertheless very arrogant, peruerse, vniust and vaine-glorious, measuring all things by his owne will, and obstinately prosecuting those courses, whose ends were beyond hope. The expedition of Xenophon had filled him with an opinion, that by his hand the Empire of Persia should be ouerthrowne; with which conceipt being transported, and finding his proceedings interrupted by the Thebans, and their Allies, hee did euer after beare such hatred vnto Thebes, as compelled that Estate by meere necessitie to grow warlike, and able, to the vtter dishonour of Sparta, and the irreparable losse of all her former greatnesse. The commendations giuen to him by

Xenophon

Xenophon his good friend, haue cauſed Plutarch to lay his name in the ballance againſt Pompey the Great; whoſe actions (the ſolemne grauitie of carriage excepted) are very diſproportionable. Yet we may truely ſay, That as Pompey made great warres vnder ſundrie Climates, and in all the Prouinces of the Roman Empire, exceeding in the multitude of imploiments all that were before him; ſo Ageſilaus had at one time or other, ſome quarrell with euery Towne in Greece, had made a Warre in Aſia, and meddled in the buſineſſe of the Ægyptians, in which variety he went beyond all his Predeceſſours: yet not winning any Countries, as Pompey did many, but obtaining large wages, which Pompey neuer tooke. Herein alſo they are very like; Each of them was the laſt great Captaine which his Nation brought forth in time of libertie, and each of them ruined the libertie of his Countrie by his owne Lordly wilfulneſſe. We may therefore well ſay, Similia magis omnia quàm paria; The reſemblance was neerer than the equalitie. Indeede the freedome of Rome was loſt with Pompey, falling into the hands of Cæſar, whom he had enforced to take Armes; yet the Roman Empire ſtood, the forme of Gouernement only being changed: But the libertie of Greece, or of Sparta it ſelfe, was not forfaited vnto the Thebans, whom Ageſilaus had compelled to enter into a victorious warre; yet the Signiorie, and ancient renowne of Sparta was preſently loſt: and the freedome of all Greece being wounded in this Theban warre, and after much bloud loſt, ill healed by the peace enſuing, did very ſoone, vpon the death of Ageſilaus, giue vp the Ghoſt, and the Lordſhip of the whole Countrie was ſeized by Philip King of Macedon, whoſe actions are now on foote, and more to be regarded than the Contemporarie paſſages of things, in any other Nation.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE WORLD:

INTREATING OF THE TIMES FROM the raigne of PHILIP of MACEDON, to the eſtabliſhing of that Kingdome, in the race of ANTIGONVS.

THE FOVRTH BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of PHILIP, the Father of ALEXANDER the Great, King of Macedon.

§. I.

What Kings raigned in Macedon before PHILIP.

THE Greekes, of whom wee haue alreadie made large diſcourſe, not as as yet wearied with inteſtine warre, nor made wiſe by their vaine contention for ſuperioritie, doe ſtill, as in former times, continue the inuaſion and vaſtation of each other.

Againſt Xerxes, the greateſt Monarch of that part of the World, they defended their libertie, with as happie ſucceſſe, as euer Nation had, and with no leſſe honour, than hath euer beene acquired by deeds of Armes. And hauing had a triall and experience, more than fortunate, againſt thoſe Nations, they ſo little regarded what might come from them, who had ſo often forfeited the reputation of their forces, as whatſoeuer could be ſpared from their owne diſtraction at home, they tranſported ouer the Helleſpont, as ſufficient, to entertaine and buſie them withall.

But, as it commonly falleth out with euery man of marke in the world, that they vnder-fall, and periſh, by the hands and harmes which they leaſt feare; ſo fared it at this time with the Greeks. For of Philip of Macedon (of whom we are now to speake) they had so little regard, as they grew euen then more violent in deuouring each other, when the fast-growing greatnesse of such a neighbour King, should, in regard of their owne safeties, haue serued them for a strong argument of vnion and accord. But the glorie of their Persian victories, wherewith they were pampred and made proud, taught them to neglect all Nations but themselues, and the rather to value at little the power and purposes of the Macedonians, because those Kings and States, which sate neerer them than they did, had in the time of Amyntas, the Father of Philip, so much weakned them, and wonne vpon them, that they were not (as the Graecians perswaded themselues) in any one age, likely to recouer their owne, much lesse to worke any wonders against their borderers. And, indeed, it was not in their Philosophie to consider, That all great alterations are storme-like, suddaine, and violent; and that it is then ouer-late to repaire the decaied and broken banks, when great Riuers are once swollen, fast-running, and inraged. No, the Greeks did rather imploy themselues, in breaking downe those defences, which stood betweene them and this inundation: than seeke to rampare and re-enforce their owne fields, which by the Leuell of reason they might haue found to haue lien vnder it. It was therefore well concluded by OROSIVS: Graeciae Ciuitates dum imperare singulae cupiunt, imperium omnes perdiderunt; The Cities of Greece lost their command, by striuing each of them to command all.

Oroſius l. 3. c. 12.

The Kingdome of Macedon, so called of Macedon, the Sonne of Osiris, or, as other Authors affirme, of Iupiter and Aethra, is the next Region towards the North which bordereth Greece; It hath to the East, the Aegean Sea; it is bounded on the North and North-west, by the Thracians and Illyrians; and on the South and South-west, by Thessalie and Epirus.

Their Kings were of the family of Temenus, of the race of Hercules, and by nation Argiues; who are listed as followeth. About some sixe yeeres after the translation of the Assyrian Empire, Arbaces then gouerning Media; Caranus of Argos, commanded by an Oracle, to lead a Colonie into Macedon, departed thence with many people, and as hee was marching through that Countrie, the weather being raynie and tempestuous, hee espied a great heard of Goats, which fled the storme as fast as they could, hasting them to their knowne place of couert. Whereupon Caranus, calling to minde, that he had also by another Oracle beene directed, to follow the first troupe of those beasts, that should either lead him, or flye before him; He pursued these Goats to the Gates of Edessa, and being vndiscouered by the Inhabitants, by reason of the darknesse of the aire, he entred their Citie without resistance, and possest it. Soone after this, by the ouerthrow of Cisseus, Caranus became Lord of the rest of Macedon, and held it eight and twentie yeeres. Caenus succeeded Caranus, and raigned twelue yeeres. Tyrimas followed Caenus, and ruled eight and twentie yeeres.

Euſeb. in Chron.

Perdiccas the first, the sonne of Tyrimas, gouerned one and fiftie yeeres: a Prince, for his great valour, and many other vertues, much renowned. Solinus, Plinie, Iustine, Eusebius, Theophilus, Antiochenus, and others affirme, that he appointed a place of buriall for himselfe, and for all the Kings of Macedon his Successours, at Aegae: assuring them, that the Kingdome should so long continue in his line and race, as they continued to lay vp their bodies in that Sepulchre; wherein it is said, that because Alexander the Great failed, therefore the posteritie of the Temenidae failed in him: a thing rather deuised after the effect, as I conceiue, than foretold by Perdiccas.

Sol. c. 14. Plin. l. 4. c. 10.

Euſeb. in Chron.

Argaeus succeeded vnto Perdiccas, and ruled eight and twentie yeeres.

Philip the first, his successour, raigned eight and twentie yeeres.

Europus followed Philip, and gouerned sixe and twentie yeeres: in whose infancie the Illyrians inuaded Macedon, and hauing obtained a great victorie, they pursued the same to the great danger of that State. Whereupon the Macedonians, gathering new forces, and resoluing either to recouer their former losse, or to loose at once both their their Kingdome and their King, they carried him with them in his Cradle into the field, and returned victorious; for they were either confident that their Nation could not bee beaten (their King present;) or rather they perswaded themselues that there was no man so void of honour and compassion, as to abandon their naturall Lord, being and Infant, and no way (but by the hands of his seruants) able to defend himselfe from destruction. The like is reported by Aimoinus, of Clotarius the sonne of Fredegunda. Euseb. Iustin. Ammian. The. Ant. &c. Aimon. l.3 c.82.

Alcetas succeeded Æropus, and ruled nine and twentie yeeres.

Amyntas the first succeeded Alcetas, and raigned fiftie yeeres; Hee liued at such time as Darius Hystaspes, after his vnprosperous returne out of Scythia, sent Megabazus with an Armie into Europe, who in Xerxes name required Amyntas to acknowledge him for his Supreme Lord, by yeelding vnto him Earth and Water. But his Embassadours, as you haue heard before, were, for their insolent behauiour towards the Macedonian Ladies, slaine by the direction of Alexander, who was the sonne of Amyntas, and his Successour. Her. Eus. Iustin. &c.

Alexander, surnamed the rich, the sonne of Amyntas, gouerned Macedon three and fortie yeeres. He did not only appease the wrath of Megabazus, for the slaughter of the Persian Embassadours, by giuing Gygæa his Sister, to Bubares of the bloud of Persia, but by that match he grew so great in Xerxes grace, as he obtained all that Region betweene the Mountaines of Olympus and Hemus, to be vnited to the Kingdome of Macedon. Yet could not these benefits buy his affection from the Greekes. For Xerxes being returned into Asia, and Mardonius made Generall of the Persian Armie, Alexander acquainted the Greekes with all his intents and purposes against them. He had three sonnes, Perdiccas, Alcetas, and Philip. Her. l. 8. Plut. Euseb. Iust. &c.

Perdiccas the second, the sonne of Alexander, liued in the time of the Peloponnesian Warre, and raigned in all eight and twentie yeeres. The Warres which hee made were not much remarkeable: the Storie of them is found here and there by peices, in Thucydides, his first sixe bookes. Hee left behind him two sonnes; Perdiccas, who was very yong, and Archelaus who was base borne.

Perdiccas the third, being deliuered to the custodie and care of Archelaus, was at seuen yeeres of age cast into a Well and drowned by his false Guardian: who excusing this fact to Cleopatra the Mother of the young King, said, That the child in following a Goose hastily, fell thereinto by misaduenture. But Archelaus staied not here: for hauing thus dispatched his brother, hee slew both his Vncle Alcetas the sonne of Alexander the Rich, and Alexander the sonne of this Alcetas, his Cosen Germaine, and enioyed the Kingdome of Macedon himselfe foure and twentie yeeres. Plat. in Gorg. Arist. Pol. 5.

This Archelaus, of whom both Plato and Aristotle make mention, though hee made himselfe King by wicked murder, yet hee performed many things greatly to the profit of his Nation. It is said, That he sought by all meanes to draw Socrates vnto him, and that he greatly loued and honoured Eurypides the Tragœdian. He had two sonnes, Archelaus and Orestes.

Archelaus the second succeeded his Father, and hauing raigned seuen yeeres, hee was slaine in hunting, either by chance or of purpose, by Crataus.

Orestes his yonger sonne was committed to the education of Æropus, of the roial bloud of Macedon, and had the same measure which Archelaus had measured to his Pupill; for Æropus murdered him and vsurped the Kingdome, which he held some sixe yeeres: the same who denied passage to Agesilaus King of Sparta, who desired after his returne from the Asian expedition, to passe by the way of Macedon into Greece.

This Vsurper left three sonnes, Pausanias, Argæus, and Alexander. Pausanias succeeded his father Æropus, and hauing raigned one yeere, hee was driuen out by Amyntas the sonne of Philip, the sonne of the first Perdiccas, the sonne of Alexander the Rich; which Philip was then preserued, when Archelaus the Bastard slew his brother Perdicas, his Vncle Alcetas, and his sonne Alexander. This Amyntas Diod. Polyæn. Plut. in Demet.

raigned (though very vnquietly) foure and twentie yeeres; for he was not only infested by Pausanias, assisted by the Thracians, and by his brother Argæus; incouraged by the Illyrians; and by the said Argæus, for two yeeres dispossest of Macedon: but on the other side, the Olynthians, his Neighbours neere the Ægæan Sea, made themselues for a while Masters of Pella, the chiefe Citie of Macedon.

Amyntas the second had by his Wife Eurydice, the Illyrian, three Sonnes; Alexander the second, Perdiccas the third, and Philip the second, Father of Alexander the Great; and one Daughter called Euryone or Exione: He had also by his second Wife Gygea, three Sonnes; Archelaus, Argæus, and Menelaus, afterward slaine by their brother Philip: He had more by a Concubine, Ptolomie, surnamed Alorites, of the Citie Alorus, wherein he was borne.

Alexander the second raigned not much aboue one yeere, in which time hee was inuaded by Pausanias, the sonne of Æropus, but defended by Iphicrates the Athenian, while he was at that time about Amphipolis. Hee was also constrained (for the payment of a great summe of money) to leaue his yongest brother Philip in Hostage with the Illyrians, who had subiected his Father Amyntas to the payment of tribute. After this, Alexander, being inuited by the Aleuadæ against Alexander the Tyrant of Pheres in Thessalie, hauing redeemed his brother Philip; to draw the Thebans to his assistance, entred into confederacie with Pelopidas, being at that time in the same Countrie, with whom he also left Philip with diuers other principall persons for the gage of his promises to Pelopidas. But Eurydice his Mother falling in loue with her Sonne-in-law, who had married her Daughter Euryone or Exione, practized the death of Alexander her sonne, with a purpose to conferre the Kingdome on her Paramour, which Ptolomie Alorites did put in execution: by meanes whereof hee held Macedon for three yeeres, but was soone after slaine by Perdiccas the brother of Alexander. Diodor hath it otherwise of Philips being made pledge; and sayth, That Amyntas his Father deliuered him for hostage to the Illyrians, by whom he was conueied to Thebes, there to be kept: others report that Philip (while his Father was yet liuing) was first ingaged to the Thebans, and deliuered for hostage a second time by Alexander his brother.

Diod. l. 15. & 16.

Perdiccas the third, after he had slaine Alorites his base-brother, gouerned Macedon fiue yeeres, and was then slaine in a battaile against the Illyrians, according to Diodorus; but Iustine affirmeth, that he perished by the practice of Eurydice his Mother, as Alexander did.

§. II.

The beginning of PHILIPS raigne; and how he deliuered Macedon from the troubles wherein he found it entangled.

PHILIP the second, the yongest sonne of Amyntas by Eurydice, hauing beene instructed in all knowledge requisite vnto the gouernment of a Kingdome, in that excellent education which hee had vnder Epaminondas, making an escape from Thebes, returned into Macedon, in the first yeere of the hundred and fifth Olympiad, which was after the building of Rome three hundred fourscore and thirteene yeeres: and finding the many enemies and dangers wherewith the Kingdome was inuironed, hee tooke on him, not as King (for Perdiccas left a sonne, though but an infant) but as the Protector of his Nephew, and Commander of the men of Warre. Yet his fruitfull ambition soone ouergrew his modestie, and hee was easily perswaded by the people to accept both the Title of King, and withall the absolute Rule of the Kingdome. And to say the truth, The necessitie of the State of Macedon at that time required a King both prudent and actiue. For, besides the incursions of the Illyrians and Pannonians, the King of Thrace did set vp in opposition Pausanias; the Athenians, Argæus;

Diod. l. 16.

ſonnes of the late Vſurper Æropus: each of theſe labouring to place in Macedon a King of their owne Election. Theſe heauie burdens when Philip could not well beare, he bought off the weightieſt by money, and by faire promiſes vnloded himſelfe of ſo many of the reſt, as he ranne vnder the remainder happily enough. For, notwithſtanding that his brother Perdiccas had his death accompanied with foure thouſand Macedonians, beſide theſe that were wounded and taken priſoners; and that the Pannonians were deſtroying all before them in Macedon; and that the Athenians with a fleet by Sea, and three thouſand Souldiers by Land vnder Mantias, did beat vpon him on all ſides and quarters of his Countrie: Yet after he had practiſed the men of warre of Pannonia; and corrupted them with gifts; and had alſo bought the King of Thrace from Pauſanias, he forthwith made head againſt the Athenians his ſtiffeſt enemies; and, for the firſt, he preuented their recouerie of Amphipolis, a Citie on the frontier of Macedon: and did then purſue Argæus the ſonne of Æropus, ſet againſt him by the Athenians, and followed him ſo hard at the heeles, in his retrait from Æges, that he forced him to abide the battaile: which Argæus loſt, hauing the greateſt part of his Armie ſlaine in the place. Thoſe of the Athenians, and others which remained vnbroken, tooke the aduantage of a ſtrong peece of ground at hand, which though they could not long defend, yet auoiding thereby the preſent furie of the Souldiers, they obtained of the vanquiſhers life and libertie to returne into Attica. Whereupon a peace was concluded betweene him and the Athenians for that preſent, and for this clemencie he was greatly renowned and honoured by all the Greekes.

§. III.

The good ſucceſſe which PHILIP had in many enterpriſes.

NOw had Philip leiſure to looke Northward, and to attend the Illyrians and Pæonians, his irreconciliable enemies and borderers: both which he inuaded with ſo proſperous ſucceſſe, as hee ſlew Bardillis, King of the Illyrians, with ſeuen thouſand of his Nation, and thereby recouered all thoſe places which the Illyrians held in Macedon: and withall, vpon the death of the King of Pannonia, he pierſt that Countrie, and after a maine victorie obtained, hee enforſt them to pay him tribute. This was no ſooner done, than (without ſtaying to take longer breath) he haſted ſpeedily towards Lariſſa, vpon the Riuer Peneus in Theſſalie, of which Towne hee ſoone made himſelfe maſter; and thereby he got good footing in that Countrie, whereof he made vſe in time following. Now although hee reſolued either to ſubdue the Theſſalians, or to make them his owne againſt all others, becauſe the horſe-men of that Countrie were the beſt, and moſt feared in that part of Europe; yet he thought it moſt for his ſafetie to cloſe vp the entrances out of Thrace, leaſt while hee inuaded Theſſalie and Greece towards the South, thoſe ample Nations, lying towards the North, ſhould either withdraw him, or ouer-runne Macedon as in former times. He therefore attempted Amphipolis, ſeated on the famous Riuer of Strimon, which parteth Thrace from Macedon, and wonne it. He alſo recouered Pydna; and (to the North of Amphipolis) the Citie of Crenides (ſometime Datus) and called it after his owne name Philippi: to the people whereof S^t. Paul afterward directed one of his Epiſtles. This place, wherein Philippi ſtood, is very rich in Mines of gold, out of which, greatly to the aduancement of Philips affaires, he drew yeerely a thouſand talents, which make ſixe hundred thouſand French Crownes.

And that hee might with the more eaſe diſburden the Thracian-ſhores of the Athenian Garriſons, to which he had giuen a great blow by the taking in of Amphipolis, he entred into league with his Fathers malicious enemies the Olynthians; whom the better to faſten vnto him, he gaue them the Citie of Pydna with the Territorie, meaning ning nothing lesse than that they should enjoy it, or their owne Estate, many yeeres.

Now that he might by degrees winne ground vpon the Greeks, he tooke the faire occasion to deliuer the Citie of Pheres in Thessalie, from the tyrannie Lycophron and Tisiphonus. Who, after they had conspired with Thebe the wife of Alexander, who vsurped vpon the libertie of that State, they themselues (Alexander being murdered) held it also by the same strong hand and oppression that Alexander did, till by the assistance of Philip they were beaten out, and Pheres restored to her former libertie. Which act of Philip did for-euer after fasten the Thessalians vnto him, and, to his exceeding great aduantage, bind them to his seruice.

§. IIII.

Of the Phocian Warre which first drew PHILIP into Greece.

ABout this time, to wit, in the second yeere of the hundred and sixth Olympiad, eight yeeres after the battaile of Mantinea, and about the eighth yeere of Artaxerxes Ochus, beganne that Warre, called Sacred. Now, as all occasions concurre towards the execution of eternall prouidence, and of euery great alteration in the World there is some preceeding preparation, though not at the first easily discerned; so did this reuengefull hatred by the Thebans, Thessalians, and Locrians, conceiued against the Phocians, not only teach Philip how he might with halfe a hand wrest the sword out of their fingers; but the Greekes themselues beating downe their owne defences, to giue him an easie passage, and beating themselues, to giue him victorie without perill, left nothing vnperformed towards their owne slauerie, sauing the title and imposition. Of this Warre the Thebans (made ouer-proude by their victorie at Leuctres) were the inflamers. For at the Councell of the Amphyctiones, or of the general Estates of Greece, in which, at that time, they swaied most, they caused both the Lacedæmonians and Phocians to be condemned in greater summes of money than they could well beare; the one for surprising the Castle of Cadmea in the time of peace, the other for ploughing vp a peece of ground belonging to the Temple of Delphos. The Phocians being resolued not to obey this Edict, were secretly set on and incouraged by the Lacedæmonians: and for refusall were exposed as Sacrilegers, and accursed to all their Neighbour-Nations, for whom it was then lawfull to inuade, and destroy them at their pleasures.

The Phocians perswaded thereunto by Philomelus, a Captaine of their owne, cast the same dice of hazard that Cæsar after many Ages following did; but had not the same chance. Yet they dealt well enough with all the enemies of their owne Nation. And the better to beare out an vngracious quarrell, of which there was left no hope of composition, they resolued to sacke the Temple it selfe. For seeing that for the ploughing of a peece of Apollo's ground, they had so much offended their neighbour-God, and their Neighbour-Nations, as worse could not befall them than alreadie was intended; they resolued to take the gold with the ground, and either to perish for all, or to preuaile against all that had commission to call them to account. The treasure which they tooke out of the Temple in the beginning of the Warre, was tenne thousand talents, which in those daies serued them to wage a great many men, and such was their successe in the beginning of the warre, as they wonne three great battailes against the Thebans, Thessalians, and Locrians, but being beaten in the fourth, their Leader Philomelus cast himselfe head-long ouer the Rockes.

In the meane while the Cities of Chersonesus, both to defend themselues against their bad-Neighbour Philip, who encroched vpon them, and to draw others into their quarrell, rendred themselues to the Athenians. Philip prepareth to get them into his hands, and at the siege of Methone lost one of his eyes. It is said, That hee that shot him, did purposely direct his arrow towards him, and that it was written on the shaft thereof; After PHILIPPO; Aster to PHILIP; for so hee was called that gaue him the wound. This Citie he cured with the soile. Plut. Vlpian. Strab. l 8.

The Tyrant Lycophron before mentioned, while Philip was busied on the border of Thrace, and the Thessalians ingaged in the holy warre, entred Thessalie with new forces, being assisted by Onomarchus, Commander of the Phocian Armie, in place of Philomelus. For hereby the Phocians hoped so to entertaine the Thessalians at home, as they should not find leisure to inuade them. Hereupon was Philip the second time called into Thessalie, but both the Thessalians, and Macedonians, (Philip being present) were vtterly ouerthrowne by Onomarchus; and great numbers of both Nations lost. From Thessalie, Onomarchus drew speedily towards Baetia, and with the same victorious Armie brake the forces of the Bœotians, and tooke from them their Citie of Coronea. But Philip impatient of his late misaduenture, after he had re-enforced his Armie, returned with all speed into Thessalie, there to find againe the honour which he lately lost: and was the second time incountred by Onomarchus, who brought into the field twentie thousand foot, and fiue hundred horse. All this great preparation sufficed not; for Onomarchus was by Philip surmounted, both in numbers and in good fortune, his Armie ouerturned, six thousand slaine, and three thousand taken: of which number himselfe being one, was among others hanged by Philip. Those that fled, were in part receiued by the Athenian Gallies, which sailed alongst the coast, commanded by Chares, but the greatest number of those that tooke the Sea, were therein deuoured ere they recouered them. Lycophron was now againe driuen out of Thessalie, and Pheres made free as before.

§. V.

Of the Olynthian Warre. The ambitious practices of PHILIP.

FRom hence Philip resolued to inuade Phocis it selfe, but the Athenians did not fauour his entrance into those parts, and therefore with the helpe of the Lacedæmonians they retrencht his passage at the Straits of Thermopylis. Whereupon hee returned into Macedon, and after the taking of Micyberne, Torone, and other Townes, hee quarrelled with the Olynthians, whom not long before he had wooed to his alliance, and bought his peace of them. For the Olynthians were very strong, and had euermore both braued and beaten the Macedonians. It is said, that Philip hauing put to death Archelaus his halfe brother (for Amyntas had three sonnes by Eurydice the Mother of Philip, and three other sonnes by Gygæa: but Philips elder brothers by the same Mother being dead, he determined to rid himselfe also of the rest) the two yonger held themselues within Olynthus; and that the receiuing of them by the Olynthians was the cause of the warre, Iustine affirmeth. But iust quarrels are ballanced by iust Princes, for to this King all things were lawfull that might any way serue his turne; all his affections, and passions, how diuers soeuer in other men, were in his ambition swallowed vp, and thereinto conuerted. For hee neither forbare the murder of his owne brothers, the breach of faith, the buying of other mens fidelitie; he esteemed no place strong where his Asse loaden with gold might enter, Nor any Citie or State vnconquerable, where a few of the greatest, to be made greater, could loose the sense of other mens sorrow and subjection. And because hee thought it vaine to practise the winning of Olynthus, till he had inclosed all the power they had within their owne walls, he entred their Territorie, and by the aduantage of a well compounded and trained Armie, he gaue them two ouerthrowes ere hee sate downe before the Citie it selfe: which done, he bought Euthicrates and Lasthenes from their people, and from the seruice of their Countrie and Common-weale, by whose treason he entred the Towne, slew his brothers therein, sackt it, and sold the Inhabitants for slaues by Iust. l. 8.

the drum. By the spoile of this place he greatly inriched himselfe, and had treasure sufficient to buy in other Cities withall, which he daily did. For so was hee aduised by the Oracle in the beginning of his vndertaking, That hee should make his assaults with siluer speares: Whereupon Horace well and truly said.

Hor. Carm. Od. 16.

——— Diffidit Vrbium
Portas vir Macedo, & subruit aemulos,
Reges muneribus.———

By gifts the Macedon claue Gates a-sunder,
And Kings enuying his estate brought vnder.

And it is true that he wonne more by corruption and fraude, than he did by force. For as he had in all the principall Cities of Greece his secret workers (which way of Conquest was well followed by Philip the second of Spaine:) So when in the contention betweene the Competitors for the Kingdome of Thrace, he was chosen the Arbitrator, he came not to the Councell accompanied with Pietie and Iustice, but with a powerfull Armie and hauing beaten and slaine both Kings, gaue sentence for himselfe, and made the Kingdome his owne.

§. VI.

How PHILIP ended the Phocian Warre.

THE warre still continuing betweene the Phocians, and the Associates of the holy warre, the Bœotians, finding themselues vnable to subsist without some present aide, sent vnto Philip for succour, who willingly yeelded to their necessities, and sent them such a proportion of men, as were neither sufficient to master their enemies, nor to assure themselues; but yet to inable them to continue the warre, and to waste the strength of Greece. They also sent to Artaxerxes Ochus for supply of treasure, who lent them thirtie talents, which makes a hundred & fourescore thousand Crownes: but when with these supplies they had still the worst in all their attempts against the Phocians, who held from them three of their strongest Cities within Bœotia it selfe, They then besought Philip of Macedon that he would assist them in person, to whom they would giue an entrance into their Territorie, and in all things obey his Commandements in that Warre.

Now had Philip what he longed for; for he knew himselfe in state to giue the law to both, and so quitting all his other purposes towards the North, he marched with a speedie pace towards Bœotia, where being arriued, Phalleeus who commanded the Phocian Armie, fearing to shock with this victorious King, made his owne peace, and withdrew himselfe with a Regiment of eight thousand Souldiers into Peloponnesus, leauing the Phocians to the mercie of the Conquerour, and for conclusion he had the glorie of that warre called Sacred, which the Gracians with so many mutuall slaughters had continued for ten yeeres, and, besides the glorie, hee possest himselfe of Orchomene, Coronea and Corsia, in the Countrie of the Bœotians, who inuited him to bee victorious ouer themselues. Hee brought the Phocians into seruitude, and wasted their Cities, and gaue them but their Villages to inhabite, reseruing to himselfe the yeerely tribute of threescore talents, which make sixe and thirtie thousand French Crownes. He also hereby (besides the fame of pietie for seruice of the Gods) obtained the same double voice in the Councell of the Amphyctiones, which the Phocians had, with the superintendencie of the Pythian games, forfeited by the Corinthians, by being partakers in the Phocian sacriledge.

How PHILIP with ill successe attempted vpon Perinthus, Byzantium, and the Scythians.

PHILIP, after his triumphant returne into Macedon, by the Lieutenant of his Armie Parmenio, slaughtered many thousands of the Illyrians, and Dardanians, and brought the Thracians to pay him the tenth part of all their reuennues. But his next enterprise against the Perinthians staied his furie. Perinthus was a Citie of Thrace, seated vpon Propontis, in the mid-way betweene Sestos and Byzantium, a place of great strength, and a people resolued to defend their libertie against Philip, where the Athenians incouraged and assisted them. Philip sate downe before it with a puissant Armie, made many faire breaches, gaue many furious assaults, built many ouer-topping and commanding Towers about it. But hee was repel'd with equall violence. For whereas Philip thought by his continuall assaults to wearie them, and waste both their men and munition, they were supplied, not only from the Persian with men and money, and succoured from Byzantium which stood vpon the same Sea-coast, but they were relieued from Athens, Chio, and Rhodes, by the conduction of Phocion, with whatsoeuer was wanting to their necessitie. But because those of Byzantium, by reason of their neighbour-hood, and the easie passage by water, gaue them often and readie helpe; Philip remoued with the one halfe of his Armie and besieg'd it, leauing fifteene thousand foot before Perinthus, to force it if they could; but to be short, he failed in both attempts, (as all Princes commonly doe that vnder-take diuers enterprises at one time) and returned into Macedon with no lesse dishonour than losse: whereupon he made an Ouerture of peace with the Athenians, and greatly desired it, to which though Phocion perswaded them in all he could, and that by the occasion offered they might greatly aduantage their conditions; Yet Demosthenes with his eloquence preuailed in the refusall. In the meane while, Philip hauing digested his late affront, and supplied his expence, by the taking of an hundred and threescore and ten Marchants ships, he gathered new forces, and being accompanied with his sonne Alexander, led them into Scythya; but hee was also vnprosperous in this enterprise: For the Triballi, a people of Mœsia set on him in his returne, wounded him, and tooke from him the greatest part of the spoiles, which he had gathered.

§. VIII.

How PHILIP ouerthrowing the Greekes in the battaile of Chæronæa, was chosen Captaine-Generall of Greece. The death of PHILIP.

AMong these Northren Nations (part of which hee suppress, and part quieted) hee spent some eight yeeres; and in the ninth yeere, after the end of the holy warre, he was to his great aduantage inuited againe by the Græcians to their assistance. For the Citizens of Amphissa hauing disobeyed the decree of the Amphyctiones, in which Philip had a double voice, and who by reason that the Thebans and Locrians gaue countenance and aide to the Amphissensians, the rest were not of themselues able to constraine them, they besought Philip to come in person to their assistance. Now you must thinke that Philip was not long in resoluing vpon this enterprise; hee needed no drawing on, whom nothing could keepe backe; nor other disswasion than a mastring power could hold thence. He therefore commanded his Armie forthwith to march; the same being compounded of thirtie thousand foot, and two thousand horse; and with as much expedition as could be made, he entred Phocis, wanne Platæa, and brought into subjection all that Region.

The rest, and especially the Athenians, although they had good cause to feare that a great part of this storme would fall on themselues, yet were they disswaded by Demosthenes from accepting such reasonable conditions of peace as Philip offered, and rather made choise (hauing drawne the Thebans to joyne with them) to leaue the injoying of their estates and their freedome to the chance of one battaile, than to hold it either by composition, or by the grace of Philip. But this their Oratours eloquence cost them deare. It is true that he could farre more easily minde them of the vertue of their Ancestors, then make them to be such as they were. Hee might repeate vnto them (with wordes mouing passion) the wonders they wrought at Marathon, but hee could not transforme the Macedonians into Persians, nor draw from the dead, a Miltiades, an Aristides, a Themistocles, or a Cimon, or any of those famous Commanders, whose great vertues they had payed with the greatest ingratitude that euer Nation did. A Phocion they had, but by the strength of a contrarie faction hee was at this time in disgrace, and not imployed: in so much as when the Armies of Philip and the Confederates incountred, although some thousand of the Athenians abid the killing, and the like number well-neere of the Thebans died with them; yet the want of worthie men on that side to hold vp the rest, and to draw them on, and the many choise Captains of the Macedonians, incouraged by a King of a growing fortune, as it gaue to Philip so shining a victorie that Alexander by the light thereof found his way (in despight of all the Nations interjacent) into Persia, India, and Ægypt; so it cut to the ground, and gaue end and date to all the Græcian glorie: Yea their libertie (saith Curtius) with their large Dominion wonne with so many difficulties, continued for so many Ages, and so often defended against the greatest Kings, was now lost in a moment, and for euer lost.

Now this aduised King (neuer passionate to his disaduantage) to the end hee might obtaine the Soueraignetie ouer all Greece, and be acknowledged for their Captaine-Generall against the Persians, without any further hazard or trouble, was content to let goe those Athenians that were taken at this battaile of Cheronæa, as he also forbare to attempt any thing against their Citie: but in Thebes (which lately by the vertue of Epaminondas triumphed ouer the rest) hee lodged a Garrison of Macedonians. And being soone after (according vnto the long desire which he had nourished of this Soueraignetie) by the generall States at Corinth, stiled the first Commander of all the Græcians, and contribution of men and money granted him, he compounded an Armie of great strength, and vnder the commandement of Attalus and Parmenio, transported the same ouer the Hellespont into Asia, to begin the Warre. Of his enterprise against Persia hee sought the successe from the Oracle at Delphos, from whence he receiued such another conuertible riddle, as Cræsus did when he attempted Cyrus, and was in like sort mistaken in the exposition.

But as it is hard to discerne and withstand the flatteries of our owne appetites, so did Philips ambitious desire to inuade Persia abuse his judgement, so farre, that the death, wherewith himselfe was threatned, he vnderstood to be deliuered of his enemie, whom he intended presently to inuade. Before his purposed departure into Asia, hee prepared for the marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra with Alexander King of Epirus, to which feast and pastimes thereat appointed, hee inuited all his Friends, and Allies, with the principall persons of the Græcian Cities, from whom he receiued much honour and many rich presents; but this was indeed the feast of his Funerall. For hauing refused to doe justice to one Pausanias a Gentleman of his Guard, whom Attalus (greatly fauoured by Philip) had first made drunke, and then left to be carnally abused by diuers base persons, This Pausanias grew into so great detestation of the Kings partialitie in so foule a fact, as when Philip was passing towards the Theater, he drew a sword from vnder his long garment and wounded him to death, when hee had liued sixe and fortie yeeres, and raigned fiue and twentie.

Iustine

Iustine reports it, that Olympias incouraged Pausanias to murder the King her husband, which after his death shee boldly auowed, by the honour shee did vnto Pausanias in crowning his dead bodie, in consecrating his sword vnto Apollo, by building for him a Monument, and other like Graces. Iust. l. 9.

What good foundations of ALEXANDERS greatnesse were laied by PHILIP. Of his laudable qualities, and issue.

NOw although he were then taken from the World, when he had mastred all opposition on that side the Sea, and had seene the fruits of his hopes and labours, changing colour towards ripenesse and perfection, yet he was herein happy that hee liued to see his sonne Alexander at mans estate, and had himselfe been an eie-witnesse of his resolution, and singular valour in this last battaile.

The foundation of whose future greatnesse he had laied so soundly for him, with so plaine a patterne of the buildings which himselfe meant to erect, as the performance and finishing was farre more easie to Alexander, though more glorious than the beginnings were vnto Philip, though lesse famous. For besides the recouerie of Macedon it selfe, in competition betweene him and the sonnes of Æropus, the one assisted by the Thracians, the other by the Athenians, and besides the regayning of many places possest by the Illyrians, the crushing of all those Northren Kings his Neighbours, the ouerthrow of Olynthus, a State that despised the power of his Father, the many Maritimate Cities taken, of great strength and ancient freedome, and the subjection of that famous Nation of Greece, which for so many Ages had defended it selfe against the greatest Kings of the World, and wonne vpon them; Hee left vnto his sonne, and had bred vp for him, so many choise Commanders, as the most of them, both for their valour and iudgement in the warre, were no lesse worthie of Crownes, than himselfe was that ware a Crowne: For it was said of Parmenio (whom Alexander, vngratefull to so great vertue, impiously murdered) That Parmenio had performed many things challenging eternall fame, without the King, but the King, without Parmenio neuer did any thing worthie of renowne; as for the rest of his Captaines, though content to obay the Sonne of such a Father, yet did they not after Alexanders death endure to acknowledge any man Superiour to themselues.

Of this Prince it is hard to judge, whether his ambition had taught him the exercise of more vices, than Nature, and his excellent Education had inriched him with vertues. For besides that he was Valiant, Wise, Learned, and Master of his Affections, he had this sauour of Pietie, that he rather laboured to satisfie those that were grieued, than to suppresse them, Whereof (among many other) wee finde a good example in his dealing with Arcadion, and Nicanor; whom, when for their euill speech of Philip, his familiars perswaded him to put to death; Hee answered them, That first it ought to bee considered, whether the fault were in them that gaue him ill language, or in himselfe: Secondly, that it was in euery mans owne power to bee well spoken off; and this was shortly proued, for after Philip had relieued their necessities, there were none within his Kingdome that did him more honour than they did. Whereupon hee told those that had perswaded him to vse violence, that he was a better Phisition for euill speech than they were.

His Epistles to Alexander his sonne are remembred by Cicero, and Gellius; and by Dion: and Chrysostome exceedingly commended. His Stratagems are gathered by Polyænus and Frontinus, his wise sayings by Plutarch, And albeit hee held Macedon as in his owne right, all the time of his raigne, yet was he not the true and next Heire thereof: for Amyntas the sonne of his Brother Perdiccas (of whom he had the protection Cic. Of. 2. Gell. l. 9. c. 3. Dion. 2. de Regn.

protection during his infancie) had the right. This Amyntas hee married to his Daughter Cyna, who had by him a Daughter called Eurydice, who was married to Philips base sonne Aridæus, her Vncle by the mothers-side: both which Olympias, Philips first Wife, and Mother to Alexander the Great, put to death; Aridæus by extreme torments: Eurydice shee strangled.

Philip had by this Olympias, the Daughter of Neoptolemus, King of the Molossians, (of the race of Achilles) Alexander the Great, and Cleopatra. Cleopatra was married to her Vncle Alexander, King of Epirus, and was after her Brother Alexanders death slaine at Sardis, by the commandement of Antigonus.

By Audata, an Illyrian, his second wife, hee had Cyna, married as is shewed before.

By Nicesipolis, the Sister of Iason, Tyrant of Pheres, hee had Thessalonica, whom Cassander, after he had taken Pidna, married, but shee was afterward by her Father-in-law Antipater put to death.

By Cleopatra, the Neece of Attalus, he had Caranus, whom others call Perdiccas. Him, Olympias, the Mother of Alexander the Great, caused to be rosted to death in a copper Pan. Others lay this murder on Alexander himselfe. By the same Cleopatra hee had likewise a Daughter, called Europa, whom Olympias also murdered at the Mothers breast.

By Phila and Meda he had no issue.

Hee had also two Concubines, Arsinoe, whom, after hee had gotten with child, hee married to an obscure man, called Lagus, who bare Ptolomie, King of Ægypt, called the sonne of Lagus, but esteemed the sonne of Philip: by Philinna, his second Concubine, a publike Dancer, he had Aridæus, of whom wee shall haue much occasion to speake hereafter.

Chap. II.

Of Alexander the Great.

§. I.

A briefe rehearsall of Alexanders doings, before hee inuaded Asia.

Alexander, afterward called the Great, succeeded vnto Philip his Father; being a Prince no lesse valiant by Nature, than by Education, well instructed, and inriched in all sorts of Learning and good Arts. Hee began his raigne ouer the Macedonians foure hundred and seuenteene yeeres after Rome built, and after his owne birth twentie yeeres. The strange dreames of Philip his Father, and that one of the gods, in the shape of a Snake, begat him on Olympias his Mother, I omit as fooliſh tales; but that the Temple of Diana (a worke the most magnificent of the World) was burnt vpon the day of his birth, and that so strange an accident was accompanied with the newes of three seuerall victories, obtayned by the Macedonians, it was very remarkeable, remarkeable, and might with the reaſon of thoſe times be interpreted for ominous, and foreſhewing the great things by Alexander afterward performed. Vpon the change of the King, the Neighbour-Nations, whom Philip had oppreſt, beganne to conſult about the recouerie of their former libertie, and to aduenture it by force of Armes. Alexanders yong-yeeres gaue them hope of preuailing, and his ſuſpected ſeuerity increaſed courage in thoſe, who could better reſolue to die, than to liue ſlauiſhly. But Alexander gaue no time to thoſe ſwelling humours, which might ſpeedily haue endangered the health of his eſtate. For after reuenge taken vpon the Conſpirators againſt his Father, whom he ſlew vpon his Tombe; and the celebration of his Funeralls, hee firſt faſtened vnto him his owne Nation, by freeing them from all exactions, and bodily ſlauerie, other than their ſeruice in his warres; and vſed ſuch Kingly auſteritie towards thoſe that contemned his yong yeeres, and ſuch clemencie to the reſt that perſwaded themſelues of the crueltie of his diſpoſition, as all affections being pacified at home, He made a preſent journey into Peloponneſus, and ſo well exerciſed his ſpirits among them, as by the Counſell of the States of Greece, he was according to the great deſire of his heart, elected Captaine-Generall againſt the Perſians, vpon which war Philip his Father had not only reſolued, (who had obtained the ſame title of Generall Commander) but had tranſported vnder the leading of Parmenio, and Attalus, a part of his Armie, to recouer ſome places on Aſia-ſide, for the ſafe deſcent of the reſt.

This enterpriſe againſt the Perſian occupied all Alexanders affections; thoſe faire markes of riches, Honour, and large Dominion, hee now ſhot at both ſleeping and waking: all other thoughts and imaginations were either grieuous or hatefull. But a contrary winde ariſeth; for hee receiueth aduertiſement that the Athenians, Thebans, and Lacedæmonians, had vnited themſelues againſt him, and, by aſſiſtance from the Perſian, hoped for the recouerie of their former freedome. Hereto they were perſwaded by Demoſthenes, himſelfe being thereto perſwaded by the gold of Perſia; the deuice he vſed was more ſubtile than profitable, for hee cauſed it to be bruted that Alexander was ſlaine in a battaile againſt the Triballes, & brought into the aſſembly a Companion whom hee had corrupted to affirme, That himſelfe was preſent and wounded in the battaile. There is indeede a certaine Doctrine of Policie (as Policie is now a-daies defined by falſhood and knauerie) that deuiſed rumours and lies, if they ſerue the turne, but for a day or two, are greatly auaileable. It is true that common people are ſometime mockt by them, as Souldiers are by falſe alarums in the Warres; but in all that I haue obſerued, I haue found the ſucceſſe as ridiculous as the inuention. For as thoſe that finde themſelues at one time abuſed by ſuch like brutes, doe at other times neglect their duties, when they are vpon true reports, and in occaſions perilous, ſummoned to aſſemble; ſo doe all men in generall condemne the Venters of ſuch trumperie, and for them feare vpon neceſſarie occaſions to entertaine the truth it ſelfe. This labour vnlooked for, and loſſe of time, was not only very grieuous to Alexander, but by turning his ſword from the ignoble and effeminate Perſians, againſt which he had directed it, towards the manly and famous Grecians, of whoſe aſſiſtance he thought himſelfe aſſured, his preſent vndertaking was greatly diſordered. But he that cannot indure to ſtriue againſt the winde, ſhall hardly attaine the Port which hee purpoſeth to recouer: and it no leſſe becommeth the worthieſt men to oppoſe misfortunes, than it doth the weakeſt children to bewaile them.

Hee therefore made ſuch expedition towards theſe Reuolters, as that himſelfe, with the Armie that followed him, brought them the firſt news of his preparation. Hereupon all ſtagger, and the Athenians, as they were the firſt that moued, ſo were they the firſt that fainted, ſeeking by their Embaſſadours to pacifie the King, and to be receiued againe into his grace. Alexander was not long in reſoluing; for the Perſians perſwaded him to pardon the Grecians. Wiſe men are not eaſily drawne from great purpoſes by ſuch occaſions as may eaſily be taken off, neither hath any King euer brought to effect any great affaire, who hath intangled himselfe in many enterprises at once, not tending to one and the same certaine end.

And hauing now quieted his borderers towards the South, he resolued to assure those Nations which lay on the North-side of Macedon, to wit, the Tracians, Triballes, Peones, Getes, Agrians, and other saluage people, which had greatly vexed with incursions, not only other of his Predecessours, but euen Philip his Father: with all which, after diuers ouerthrowes giuen them, hee made peace, or else brought them into subiection. Notwithstanding this good successe, he could not yet find the way out of Europe. There is nothing more naturall to man than libertie; the Greekes had enjoyed it ouer-long, and lost it too late to forget it; they therefore shake off the yoke once againe. The Thebans, who had in their Citadell a Garrison of a thousand Macedons, attempt to force it; Alexander hasteth to their succour, and presents himselfe with thirty thousand foot, all old Souldiers, and three thousand horse, before the Citie, and gaue the Inhabitants some daies to resolue, being euen heart-sicke with the desire of passing into Asia. So vnwilling, indeede, he was to draw bloud of the Grecians, by whom hee hoped to serue himselfe elsewhere, that hee offered the Thebans remission, if they would only deliuer into his hands Phœnix and Prothytes, the stirrers vp of the Rebellion. But they, opposing the mounting fortune of Alexander, (which bare all resistance before it, like the breaking-in of the Ocean-Sea) in stead of such an answer, as men besieged and abandoned should haue made, demanded Philotas and Antipater to bee deliuered vnto them; as if Thebes alone, then layed in the ballance of Fortune with the Kingdome of Macedon, and many other Prouinces, could either haue euened the scale or swaied it. Therefore in the end they perished in their obstinacie. For while the Thebans oppose the Armie assailant, they are charged at the back by the Macedonian Garrison, their Citie taken and razed to the ground, sixe thousand slaine, and thirty thousand sold for slaues, at the price of foure hundred and fortie talents. This the King did to the terrour of the other Grecian Cities.

Many Arguments were vsed by Cleadas, one of the prisoners, to perswade Alexander to forbeare the destruction of Thebes. He prayed the King to beleiue that they were rather misse-led by giuing hasty credit to false reports, than any way malicious; for being perswaded of Alexanders death, they rebelled but against his Successour. He also besought the King to remember, that his father Philip had his education in that Citie, yea that his Ancestor Hercules was borne therein: but all perswasions were fruitlesse; the times wherein offences are committed, doe greatly aggrauate them. Yet for the honour he bare to learning, he pardoned all of the race of Pindarus the Poet, and spared, and set at libertie Timoclea, the sister of Theagenes, who died in defence of the libertie of Greece against his Father Philip. This Noble-woman being taken by a Thracian, and by him rauished, hee threatned to take her life vnlesse she would confesse her treasure: she led the Thracian to a Well, and told him that she had therein cast it: and when the Thracian stooped to looke into the Well, she suddainly thrust him into the mouth thereof, and stoned him to death.

Now because the Athenians had receiued into their Citie so many of the Thebans, as had escaped and fled vnto them for succour, Alexander would not grant them peace, but vpon condition to deliuer into his hands both their Orators which perswaded this second reuolt, and their Captaines; yet in the end it being a torment vnto him to retard the enterprise of Persia, he was content that the Orators should remaine, and accepted of the banishment of the Captaines, wherein he was exceeding ill aduised, had not his fortune, or rather the prouidence of God, made all the resistance against him vnprofitable: for these good Leaders of the Grecians betooke themselues to the seruice of the Persian, whom after a few daies he inuadeth.

§. II.

§. II.

How ALEXANDER paſsing into Aſia, fought with the Perſians vpon the Riuer of Granicus.

WHen all was now quieted at home, Alexander, committing to the truſt of Antipater both Greece and Macedon, in the firſt of the Spring did paſſe the Helleſpont, and being readie to diſ-imbarke, he threw a Dart towards the Aſian ſhore, as a token of defiance, commanding his Souldiers not to make any waſte in their owne Territorie, or to burne, or deface thoſe buildings which themſelues were preſently, and in the future to poſſeſſe. He landed his Armie, conſiſting of two and thirtie thouſand foot, and fiue thouſand horſe, all old Souldiers, neere vnto Troy, where he offered a ſolemne ſacrifice vpon Achilles Tombe, his maternall Anceſtor.

But before he left his own coaſt, he put to death, without any offence giuen him, all his Mother-in-lawes Kinſmen, whom Philip his Father had greatly aduanced, not ſparing ſuch of his owne as he ſuſpected. Hee alſo tooke with him many of his tributarie Princes, of whoſe fidelitie he doubted; thinking by vniuſt crueltie to aſſure all things, both in the preſent and future. Yet the end of all fell out contrary to the policy which his Ambition had commended vnto him, though agreeing very well with the iuſtice of God; for all that he had planted, who ſoone after withered, and rooted vp; thoſe, whom he moſt truſted, were the moſt traiterous; his mother, friends, and children, fell by ſuch another mercileſſe ſword as his own, and all manner of confuſion followed his dead bodie to the graue, and left him there.

When the knowledge of Alexanders landing on Aſia ſide was brought to Darius, hee ſo much ſcorned the Armie of Macedon, and had ſo contemptible an opinion of Alexander himſelfe, as hauing ſtiled him his ſeruant on a letter which hee wrote vnto him, reprehending his diſloyaltie and audacitie (for Darius intitled himſelfe King of Kings, and the Kinſman of the gods) hee gaue order withall to his Lieutenants of the leſſer Aſia, that they ſhould take Alexander aliue, whip him with rods, and then conuay him to his preſence: that they ſhould ſinke his ſhips, and ſend the Macedons taken priſoners beyond the Red-Sea, belike into Æthiopia, or ſome other vnhealthfull part of Affrica.

In this ſort did this glorious King, confident in the glittering, but heartleſſe, multitude which he commanded, diſpoſe of the alreadie-vanquiſhed Macedonians; But the il deſtinies of men beare them to the ground, by what ſtrong confidence ſoeuer armed. The great numbers which he gathered together, and brought in one heape into the field, gaue rather an exceeding aduantage to his enemies, then any diſcouragement at all. For beſides that they were men vtterly vnacquainted with dangers, men who by the name and countenance of their King were wont to preuaile againſt thoſe of leſſe courage than themſelues, men that tooke more care how to embroder with gold and ſiluer their vpper garments, as if they attended the inuaſion but of the Sunne-beames, than they did to arme themſelues with yron and ſteele againſt the ſharpe pikes, ſwords and darts of the hardie Macedonians; I ſay, beſides all theſe, euen the opinion they had of their owne numbers, of which euery one in particular hoped that it would not fall to his turne to fight, filled euery of them with the care of their owne ſafetie, without any intent at all to hazard any thing but their owne breath, and that of their horſes, in running away. The Macedonians as they came to fight, and therby to enrich themſelues with the gold and iewels of Perſia, both which they needed, ſo the Perſians, who expected nothing in that Warre but blowes and wounds, which they needed not, obeyed the King, who had power to conſtraine them in aſſembling themſelues for his ſeruice; but their owne feares and cowardice, which in time of danger had moſt power ouer them, they only then obeied, when their rebellion againſt ſo ſeruile a paſſion did iuſtly and violently require it. For saith VEGETIVS: Quemadmodum bene exercitatus miles prælium cupit, ita formidat indoctus; nam sciendum est in pugnâ vsum amplius prodesse quàm vires; As the well-practised Souldier desires to come to battaile, so the raw one feares it: for we must vnderstand, that in fight it more auailes to haue beene accustomed vnto the like, than only to haue rude strength. What maner of men the Persians were, Alexander discouered in the first encounter, before which time it is said, by those that writ his Storie, That it was hard to iudge, whether his daring to vndertake the Conquest of an Empire so wel peopled, with a handfull of men, or the successe he had, were more to be wondred at. For at the Riuer of Granick, which seuereth the Territorie of Troy from Propontis, the Persians sought to stop his passage, taking the higher ground and banke of the riuer to defend, which Alexander was forced (as it were) to clime vp vnto, and scale from the Leuel of the water; Great resistance (saith Curtius) was made by the Persians, yet in the end Alexander preuailed. But it seemes to mee, that the victorie then gotten was exceeding easie, and that the twentie thousand Persian foot-men, said to be slaine, were rather kil'd in the back, in running away, than hurt in the bosomes by resisting. For had those twentie thousand foot, and two hundred and fiftie horse-men, or after Plutarch, two thousand and fiue hundred horse-men, died with their faces towards the Macedonians, Alexander could not haue bought their liues at so small a rate, as with the losse of foure and thirtie of all sorts of his owne. And if it were also true, that Plutarch doth report, how Alexander encountred two of the Persian Commanders, Spithridates and Rhœsaces, and that the Persian horse-men fought with great furie, though in the end scattered; and lastly, how those Græcians in Darius his pay, holding themselues in one bodie vpon a piece of ground of aduantage, did (after mercy was refused them) fight it out to the last; how doth it then resemble truth, that such resistance hauing beene made, yet of Alexanders Armie there fell but twelue Foote-men, and two and twentie Horse-men?

§. III.

A digression concerning the defence of hard passages. Of things following the battaile of Granick.

THE winning of this passage did greatly encourage the Macedonians, and brought such terror vpon all those of the lesser Asia, as hee obtained all the Kingdomes thereof without a blow, some one or two Townes excepted. For in all inuasions, where the Nations inuaded haue once beene beaten vpon a great aduantage of the place, as in defence of Riuers, Streights, and Mountaines, they will soone haue perswaded themselues, that such an enemie vpon equall termes and euen ground, can hardly be resisted. It was therefore Machiauels counsell, that he which resolueth to defend a passage, should with his ablest force oppose the Assailant. And to say truth, few Regions of any great circuit are so well fenced, that Armies of such force as may be thought sufficient to conquer them, can be debarred all entrance, by the natural difficultie of the waies. One passage or other is commonly left vnguarded: if all be defended, then must the forces of the Countrie be distracted, and yet lightly, some one place will be found that is defended very weakely. How often haue the Alpes giuen way to Armies, breaking into Italie? Yea, where shall we finde that euer they kept out an inuadour? Yet are they such, as (to speake briefly) afflict with all difficulties those that trauaile ouer them; but they giue no securitie to those that lie behinde them: for they are of too large extent. The Townes of Lumbardie perswaded themselues that they might enioy their quiet, when the Warlike Nation of the Switzers had vndertaken to hinder Francis the French King from descending into the Duchie of Milan: but whilest these Patrons of Milan, whom their owne dwelling in those Mountaines

Mountaines had made fitteſt of all other for ſuch a ſeruice, were buſied in cuſtodie of the Alpes; Francis appeared in Lumbardie, to ſo much the greater terrour of the Inhabitants, by how much the leſſe they had expected his arriuall. What ſhall we ſay of thoſe Mountaines, which locke vp whole Regions in ſuch ſort, as they leaue but one gate open? The Straights, or (as they were called) the gates of Taurus in Cilicia, and thoſe of Thermopylæ, haue ſeldome beene attempted, perhaps becauſe they were thought impregnable: but how ſeldome (if euer) haue they been attempted in vaine? Xerxes and long after him, the Romans, forced the entrance of Thermopylæ; Cyrus the yonger, and after him Alexander, found the Gates of Cilicia wide open; how ſtrongly ſoeuer they had beene locked & barred, yet were thoſe countries open enough to a fleet that ſhould enter on the backe-ſide. The defence of Riuers how hard a thing it is, we finde examples in all hiſtories that beare good witneſſe. The deepeſt haue many Foords; the ſwifteſt and broadeſt may bee paſſed by Boates, in caſe it be found a matter of difficultie to make a bridge. He that hath men enow to defend all the length of his owne banke, hath alſo enow to beat his enemie; and may therefore doe better to let him come ouer, to his loſſe, than by ſtriuing in vaine to hinder the paſſage, as a matter tending to his owne diſaduantage, fill the heads of his Souldiers with an opinion, that they are in ill caſe, hauing their meanes of ſafeguard taken from them, by the skill or valour of ſuch as are too good for them. Certainely, if a Riuer were ſufficient defence againſt an Armie, the Iſle of Mona, now called Angleſey, which is diuided from North-Wales by an arme of the Sea; had beene ſafe enough againſt the Romans, inuading it vnder conduct of Iulius Agricola. But he wanting, and not meaning to ſpend the time in making veſſels to tranſport his forces, did aſſay the foords. Whereby hee ſo amazed the enemies attending for ſhips and ſuch like prouiſion by Sea, that ſurely beleeuing nothing could bee hard or inuincible to men, which came ſo minded to Warre, they humbly intreated for peace, and yeelded the Iland. Yet the Britaines were men ſtout enough; the Perſians very daſtards.

It was therefore wiſely done of Alexander, to paſſe the Riuer of Granick in face of the enemie; not marching higher to ſeeke an eaſier way, nor labouring to conuey his men ouer it by ſome ſafer meanes. For hauing beaten them vpon their own ground, he did thereby cut off no leſſe of their reputation, than of their ſtrength, leauing no hope of ſuccour to the partakers and followers of ſuch vnable Protectors.

Soone after this victorie he recouered Sardis, Epheſus, the Cities of the Trallians and Magneſia, which were rendred vnto him. The Inhabitants of which, with the people of the Countrie, he receyued with great grace, ſuffring them to be gouerned by their owne lawes. For he obſerued it well; Nouum Imperium inchoantibus vtilis clementiæ fama; It is commodious vnto ſuch as lay the foundations of a new Soueraignety, to haue the fame of being mercifull. He then by Parmenio wanne Miletus, and by force maſtred Halicarnaſſus, which becauſe it reſiſted obſtinatly, he razed to the ground. From whence he entred into Caria, where Ada the Queene, who had beene caſt out of all that ſhee held (except the Citie of Alinda) by Darius his Lieutenants, preſented her ſelfe vnto him, and adopted him her ſonne and ſucceſſor; which Alexander accepted in ſo gracious part, as he left the whole Kingdome to her diſpoſing. Hee then entred into Lycia, and Pamphilia, and obtained al the Sea-coaſts, and ſubiecting vnto him Piſidia, he directed himſelfe towards Darius (who was ſaid to be aduanced towards him with a maruellous Armie) by the way of Phrygia: For all the Prouince of Aſia the leſſe, bordering vpon the Sea, his firſt victorie layed vnder his feet.

While he gaue order for the gouernment and ſetling of Lycia, and Pamphilia, the ſent Cleander to raiſe ſome new Companies in Peloponneſus, and marching towards the North, he entred Celenas ſeated on the Riuer Maander, which was abandoned vnto him, the Caſtle onely holding out, which alſo after fortie daies was giuen vp: for ſo long time he gaue them to attend ſuccour from Darius. From Celenas he paſt on through Phrygia towards the Euxine Sea, till hee came to a City called Gordium, the Regall-seate, in former times, of King Midas. In this City it was that he found the Gordian-knot, which when he knew not how to vndoe, hee cut it a-sunder with his sword. For there was an ancient prophecie did promise to him that could vntie it, the Lordship of all Asia; whereupon Alexander, not respecting the maner how, so it were done, assumed to himselfe the fulfilling of the propheſie, by hewing it in pieces.

But before he turned from this part of Asia the lesse towards the East, hee tooke care to cleare the Sea-coast on his backe, and to thrust the Persians out of the Ilands of Lesbos, Scio, and Coos, the charge whereof hee committed vnto two of his Captaines, giuing them such order as he thought to be most cõuenient for that seruice; and deliuering vnto them fiftie Talents to defray the charge; and withall out of his first spoile gotten, hee sent threescore talents more to Antipater his Lieutenant in Greece and Macedon. From Celenas he remoued to Ancira, now called Anguori, standing on the same Riuer of Sangarius, which runneth through Gordium: there hee mustred his Armie, and then entred Paphlagonia, whose people submitted themselues vnto him, and obtained freedome of tribute: where he left Catus Gouernour with one Regiment of Macedonians lately arriued.

Heere he vnderstood of the death of Memnon, Darius Lieutenant, which hartned him greatly to passe on towards him, for of this only Captaine hee had more respect than of all the multitude by Darius assembled, and of all the Commanders he had besides. For so much hath the spirit of some one man excelled, as it hath vndertaken and effected the alteration of the greatest States and Common-weales, the erection of Monarchies, the conquest of Kingdomes and Empires, guided handfuls of men against multitudes of equal bodily strength, contrined victories beyond all hope and discourse of reason, conuerted the fearefull passions of his owne followers into magnanimitie, and the valour of his enemies into cowardize; such spirits haue beene stirred vp in sundry Ages of the world, and in diuers parts thereof, to erect and cast downe againe, to establish and to destroy, and to bring all things, Persons and States, to the same certaine ends, which the infinit Spirit of the Vniuersall, piercing, mouing, and gouerning all things, hath ordained. Certainly the things that this King did were maruellous, and would hardly haue beene vndertaken by any man else: and though his Father had determined to haue inuaded the lesser Asia, it is like enough that he would haue contented himselfe with some part thereof, and not haue discouered the Riuer of Indus, as this man did. The swift course of victory, wherwith he ranne ouer so large a portion of the World, in so short a space, may iustly be imputed vnto this, that he was neuer encountred by an equall spirit, concurring with equall power against him. Hereby it came to passe that his actions being limited by no greater opposition, then Desart places, and the meere length of tedious iournies could make, were like the Colossus of Rhodes, not so much to bee admired for the workemanship, though therein also praise-worthy, as for the huge bulke. For certainely the things performed by Xenophon, discouer as braue a spirit as Alexanders, and working no lesse exquisitely, though the effects were lesse materiall, as were also the forces and power of command, by which it wrought. But hee that would finde the exact patterne of a noble Commander, must looke vpon such as Epaminondas, that encountring worthy Captains, and those better followed than themselues, haue by their singular vertue ouer-topped their valiant enemies, and still preuailed ouer those, that would not haue yeelded one foot to any other. Such as these are, doe seldome liue to obtaine great Empires. For it is a worke of more labour and longer time, to master the equall forces of one hardie and well-ordered State, than to tread downe and vtterly subdue a multitude of seruile Nations, compounding the body of a grosse vnweildie Empire. Wherefore these Paruo Potentes, men that with little haue done much vpõ enemies of like ability, are to be regarded as choise examples of worth; but great Conquerours, to be rather admired for the ſubſtance of their actions, than the exquiſite managing: exactneſſe and greatneſſe concurring ſo ſeldome, that I can finde no inſtance of both in one, ſaue onely that braue Roman Ceſar.

Hauing thus farre digreſſed, it is now time that wee returne vnto our Eaſterne Conqueror; who is trauailing haſtily towards Cilicia, with a deſire to recouer the Streights thereof before Darius ſhould arriue there. But firſt making a diſpatch into Greece, he ſent to thoſe Cities, in which he repoſed moſt truſt, ſome of the Perſian Targets which he had recouered in his firſt battaile; vpon which, by certaine inſcriptions, he made them partakers of his victorie. Herein he well aduiſed himſelfe; for he that doth not as well impart of the honour which he gaineth in the Warres, as hee doth of the ſpoiles, ſhall neuer be long followed by thoſe of the better ſort. For men which are either well borne or well bred, and haue more of wealth than of reputation, doe as often ſatisfie themſelues with the purchaſe of glorie; as the weake in fortune, and ſtrong in courage, doe with the gaine of gold and ſiluer.

The Gouernour of Cilicia hearing of Alexander comming on, left ſome Companies to keepe the Streights, which were indeede very defencible; and withall, as Curtius noteth, hee beganne ouer-late to priſe and put in execution the Counſell of Memnon: who in the beginning of the Warres aduiſed him to waſte all the prouiſions for Men and Horſe, that could not be lodged in ſtrong places, and alwaies to giue ground to the Inuader, till hee found ſome ſuch notable aduantage as might aſſuredly promiſe him the obtaining of victory. For the fury of an inuading Army is beſt broken, by delaies, change of diet, and want, eating ſometimes too little, and ſometimes too much, ſometimes repoſing themſelues in beds, and more oftner on the cold ground. Theſe and the like ſuddaine alterations bring many diſeaſes vpon all Nations out of their owne Countries. Therefore if Darius had kept the Macedonians but a while from meat and ſleepe, and refuſing to giue or take battaile, had wearied them with his light horſe, as the Parthians afterward did the Romans, hee might perchance haue ſaued his owne life, and his eſtate. For it was one of the greateſt incouragements giuen by Alexander to the Macedonians, in the third and laſt fatall battaile, that they were to fight withall the ſtrength of Perſia at once.

Xerxes, when hee inuaded Greece and fought abroad, in being beaten, loſt onely his men; but Darius being inuaded by the Greekes, and fighting at home, by beeing beaten, loſt his Kingdome; Pericles, though the Lacedæmonians burnt all in Attica to the Gates of Athens, yet could not be drawne to hazard a battaile: for the inuaded ought euermore to fight vpon the aduantage of time and place. Becauſe wee reade Hiſtories to informe our vnderſtanding by the examples therein found, wee will giue ſome inſtances of thoſe that haue periſhed by aduenturing in their own countries, to charge an inuading Armie. The Romans, by fighting with Hannibal, were brought to the brinke of their deſtruction.

Pompey was well aduiſed for a while, when hee gaue Ceſar ground, but when by the importunitie of his Captaines he aduentured to fight at Pharſalia, hee loſt the battaile, loſt the freedome of Rome, and his owne life.

Ferdinand, in the Conqueſt of Naples, would needs fight a battaile with the French to his confuſion, though it was told him by a man of ſound judgement, that thoſe Counſels which promiſe ſuretie in all things, are honourable enough.

The Conſtable of France made fruſtrate the mighty preparation of Charles the Fift, when he inuaded Prouence, by waſting the Countrie, and forbearing to fight; ſo did the Duke of Alua wearie the French in Naples, and diſſolue the boiſterous Armie of the Prince of Orenge in the low-Countries.

The Leigers, contrarie to the aduice of their Generall, would needs fight a battaile with the Bourgonians, inuading their Countrie, and could not be perſwaded to linger the time, and ſtay their aduantage; but they loſt eight and twenty thouſand vpon the place. Philip of Valois ſet vpon King Edward at Creſſie, and King Iohn (when the Engliſh were well-neere tired out, and would in ſhort time by an orderly purſuit haue haue beene walled to nothing) constrained the black Prince with great fury, neere Poitiers, to joyne battaile with him: But all men know what lamentable successe these two French Kings found. Charles the Fift of France made another kinde of Fabian-Warfare; and though the English burnt and walled many places, yet this King held his resolution to forbeare blowes, and followed his aduice which told him, That the English could neuer get his inheritance by smoke; and it is reported by Bellay and Herrault, that King Edward was wont to say of this Charles, that hee wanne from him the Duchie of Guien without euer putting on his Armour.

But where God hath a purpose to destroy, wise men grow short-liued, and the charge of things is committed vnto such as either cannot see what is for their good, or know not how to put in execution any sound aduice: The course which Memnon had propounded, must in all appearance of reason haue brought the Macedonian to a great perplexitie, and made him stand still a while at the Streights of Cilicia, doubting whether it were more shamefull to returne; or dangerous to proceede. For had Cappadocia and Paphlagonia beene wasted whilest Alexander was farre off; and the Streights of Cilicia beene defended by Arsenes, Gouernor of that Prouince, with the best of his forces: hunger would not haue suffered the enemie, to stay the triall of all meanes that might be thought vpon, of forcing that passage; or if the place could not haue beene maintained, yet might Cilicia, at better leisure haue beene so throughly spoiled, that the heart of his Armie should haue beene broken, by seeking out miseries with painefull trauaile.

But Arsenes leauing a small number to defend the Streights, took the best of his Armie with him, to waste, & spoile the Countrie; or rather, as may seeme, to finde himselfe some worke, by pretence of which he might honestly runne further away from Alexander. Hee should rather haue aduentured his person in custodie of the Streights, whereby hee might perhaps haue saued the Prouince; and in the meane time, all that was in the fields, would haue beene conueighed into strong Townes. So should his Armie, if it were driuen from the place of aduantage, haue found good entertainement within walled Cities, and himselfe with his horse-men haue had the lesse worke in destroying that little which was left abroad. Handling the matter as he did, hee gaue the Cilicians cause to wish for Alexanders comming, and as great cause to the Keepers of the passage not to hinder it. For cowards are wise in apprehending all formes of danger. These Guardians of the Streights, hearing that Arsenes made all haste to joyne himselfe with Darius, burning down all as he went, like one despairing of the defence, beganne to grow circumspect, and to thinke that surely their Generall, who gaue as lost the Countrie behinde their backs, had exposed themselues vnto certaine death, as men that were good for nothing else, but to dull the Macedonian swords. Wherefore, not affecting to die for their Prince and Countrie (which honour they saw that Arsenes himselfe could well forbeare) they speedily followed the foote-steps of their Generall, gleaning after his Haruest. Thus Alexander without labour got both the entrance of Cilicia, abandoned by the cowardise of his Enemies, and the whole Prouince that had beene alienated from the Persian side by their indiscretion.

§. IIII.

Of the vnwarlike Armie leuied by DARIVS againſt ALEXANDER. The vnaduiſed courſes which DARIVS tooke in this expedition. He is vanquiſhed at Iſſus; where his Mother, Wife, and Children are made priſoners. Of ſome things following the battaile of Iſſus.

IN the meane ſeaſon Darius approched; who (as Curtius reports) had compounded an Armie of more than two hundred & ninetie thouſand Souldiers, out of diuers Nations; Iuſtine muſters them at three hundred thouſand Foot, and a hundred thouſand Horſe; Plutarch at ſixe hundred thouſand.

The manner of his comming on, as Curtius deſcribes it, was rather like a masker than a man of Warre, and like one that tooke more care to ſet out his glorie and riches, than to prouide for his owne ſafety, perſwading himſelfe, as it ſeemed, to beat Alexander with pompe and ſumptuous Pageants. For, before the Armie there was carried the holy fire which the Perſians worſhipped, attended by their Prieſts, and after them three hundred and threeſcore and fiue yong-men, anſwering the number of the daies of the yeere, couered with Scarlet; then the Chariot of Iupiter drawne with white Horſes, with their Riders cloathed in the ſame colour, with rods of gold in their hands; And after it, the Horſe of the Sunne: Next after theſe followed ten ſumptuous Chariots, inlaied and garniſht with ſiluer and gold, and then the Vantguard of their horſe, compounded of twelue ſeuerall Nations, which the better to auoide confuſion, did hardly vnderſtand each others language, and theſe marſhalled in the head of the reſt, being beaten, might ſerue very fitly to diſorder all that followed them; in the taile of theſe Horſes the Regiment of foote marched, with the Perſians called immortall, becauſe if any died, the number was preſently ſupplied: and theſe were armed with chaines of gold, and their coates with the ſame metall imbrodered, whereof the ſleeues were garniſhed with pearle, baites, either to catch the hungrie Macedonians withall, or to perſwade them that it were great inciuilitie to cut and to deface ſuch glorious garments. But it was well ſaid: Sumptuosè inductus miles, ſe virtute ſuperiorem alijs non exiſtimet, cum in præliis oporteat fortitudine animi, & non veſtimentis muniri, quoniam hoſtes veſtibus non debellantur; Let no man thinke that hee exceedeth thoſe in valour, whom hee exceedeth in gay garments, for it is by men armed with fortitude of mind, and not by the apparell they put on, that enemies are beaten. And it was perchance from the Roman Papyrius that this aduice was borrowed, who when he fought againſt the Samnites in that fatall battaile, wherein they all ſware either to preuaile or die, thirtie thouſand of them hauing apparelled themſelues in white garments, with high creſts and great plumes of feathers, bade the Roman Souldiers to lay aſide all feare: Non enim criſtas vulnera facere, & per picta atque aurata ſcuta tranſire Romanum pilum; For theſe plumed creſts would wound no bodie, and the Roman pile would bore holes in painted and gilded ſhields.

To ſecond this Court-like company, fifteene thouſand were appointed more rich and glittering than the former, but apparelled like Women (belike to breede the more terrour) and theſe were honoured with the Title of the Kings Kinſmen. Then came Darius himſelfe, the Gentle-men of his Guard-robe, riding before his Chariot, which was ſupported with the gods of his Nation, caſt and cut in pure gold; theſe the Macedonians did not ſerue, but they ſerued their turnes of theſe, by changing their maſſie-bodies into thinne portable and currant coine. The head of this Chariot was ſet with precious ſtones, with two little golden Idols, couered with an open-winged-Eagle of the ſame metall: The hinder part being raiſed high whereon Darius ſate, had a couering of ineſtimable value. This Chariot of the King was followed with ten thouſand Horſe-men, their Lances plated with ſiluer, and their heads heads guilt; which they meant not to imbrew in the Macedonian bloud, for feare of marring their beautie. He had for the proper Guard of his person two hundred of the bloud Royall, bloud too Royall & precious to be spilt by any valorous aduenture, (I am of opinion that two hundred sturdie fellowes, like the Switzers, would haue done him more seruice) and these were backt with thirtie thousand foot-men, after whom againe were led foure hundred spare horses for the King, which if hee had meant to haue vsed, he would haue marshalled somewhat neerer him.

Now followed the Reareward, the same being led by Sisygambis the Kings Mother, and by his Wife, drawne in glorious Chariots, followed by a great traine of Ladies their attendants on horse-back, with fifteen Wagons of the Kings children, and the wiues of the Nobilitie, waited on by two hundred and fiftie Concubines, and a world of Nurses, and Eunuchs, most sumptuously apparelled. By which it should seeme that Darius thought that the Macedonians had beene Comedians or Tumblers; for this troupe was far fitter to behold those sports than to be present at battailes. Betweene these and a company of slight-armed slaues, with a world of Vallets, was the Kings treasure, charged on sixe hundred Mules, and three hundred Camels, brought, as it proued, to pay the Macedonians. In this sort came this May-game-King into the field, incombred with a most vnnecessarie traine of Strumpets, attended with troupes of diuers Nations, speaking diuers languages, and for their numbers impossible to be marshalled, and for the most part so effeminate, & so rich in gold and in garments, as the same could not but haue incouraged the nakedest Nation of the world against them. We finde it in daily experience, that all discourse of magnanimitie, of Nationall Vertue, of Religion, of Libertie, and whatsoeuer else hath been wont to moue and incourage vertuous men, hath no force at all with the common Souldier, in comparison of spoile and riches. The rich ships are boorded vpon all disaduantages, the rich Townes are furiously assaulted, and the plentifull Countries willingly inuaded. Our English Nations haue attempted many places in the Indies, and runne vpon the Spaniards head-long, in hope of their Royals of plate, and Pistolets, which had they been put to it vpon the like disaduantages in Ireland, or in any poore Countrie, they would haue turned their Peeces and Pikes against their Commanders, contesting that they had beene brought without reason to the Butcherie and slaughter. It is true that the warre is made willingly, and for the most part with good successe, that is ordained against the richest Nations; for as the needie are alwaies aduenturous, so plentie is wont to shunne perill, and men that haue well to liue, doe rather studie how to liue well, I meane wealthily, than care to die (as they call it) honourably. Car on il ny' a rien a gaigner, que des coups volontiers il ny' va pas; No man makes haste to the market, where there is nothing to be bought but blowes.

Now if Alexander had beheld this preparation before his consultation with his South-saiers, hee would haue satisfied himselfe by the out-sides of the Persians, and neuer haue looked into the intrailes of Beasts for successe. For leauing the description of this second battaile (which is indeede no-where well described, neither for the confusion and hastie running away of the Asians could it be) we haue enough by the slaughter that was made of them, and by the few that fell of the Macedonians, to informe vs what manner of resistance was made. For if it be true that threescore thousand Persian footmen were slaine in this battaile, with ten thousand of their horsemen: Or (as Curtius saith) an hundred thousand footmen, with the same number of horse-men, and besides this slaughter, fortie thousand taken prisoners, while of Alexanders Armie there miscarried but two hundred and fourescore of all sorts, of which numbers Arianus and other Historians cut off almost the one halfe: I doe verily beleeue, that this smal number rather died with the ouer-trauaile and paines-taking in killing their enemies, than by any strokes receiued from them. And surely if the Persian Nation (at this time degenerate and the basest of the World) had had any sauour remaining of the ancient valour of their forefathers; they would neuer haue sold so good cheape, and at so vile a price, the Mother, the Wife, the Daughters, ters, and other the Kings children; had their owne honor beene valued by them at nothing, and the Kings safetie and his estate at lesse. Darius by this time found it true, that Charidemus a banished Grecian of Athens had told him, when hee made a view of his Armie about Babylon, to wit, That the multitude which hee had assembled of diuers Nations, richly attired, but poorely armed, would bee found more terrible to the Inhabitants of the country, whom in passing by they would deuour, than to the Macedonians, whom they meant to assaile; who being all old and obedient Souldiers, imbattailed in grosse squadrons, which they call their Phallanx, well couered with Armour for defence, and furnished with weapons for offence of great aduantage, would make so little accompt of his delicate Persians, louing their ease and their palat, being withall ill armed and worse disciplined, as except it would please him to entertaine (hauing so great aboundance of treasure to doe it withall) a sufficient number of the same Grecians, and so to encounter the Macedonians with men of equall courage, hee would repent him ouer-late, as taught by the miserable successe like to follow.

But this discourse was so vnpleasing to Darius (who had beene accustomed to nothing so much as to his owne praises, and to nothing so little as to heare truth;) as he commanded that this poore Grecian should be presently slaine: who while hee was a sundring in the Tormentors hand, vsed this speech to the King, That Alexander, against whom hee had giuen this good counsell, should assuredly reuenge his death, and lay deserued punishment vpon Darius for despising his aduice.

It was the saying of a Wise man: Desperata eius Principis salus est, cuius aures ita formatæ sunt, vt asperæ quæ vtilia, nec quicquam nisi iucundum accipiat; That Princes safetie is in a desperate case, whose eares iudge all that is profitable to bee too sharpe, and will entertaine nothing that is vnpleasant.

For libertie in counsell is the life and essence of counsell; Libertas consilij est eius vita, & essentia, qua erepta consilium euanescit.

Darius did likewise value at nothing the Aduice giuen him by the Grecian Souldiers that serued him, who intreated him not to fight in the Streights: but had they beene Counsellers and directors in that Warre, as they were vnderlings and commanded by others, they had with the helpe of a good troupe of horse-men beene able to haue opposed the furie of Alexander, without any assistance of the Persian foot-men. For when Darius was ouerthrowne with all his cowardly and confused rabble, those Grecians, vnder their Captaine Amyntas, held firme, and marched away in order in despight of the vanquishers. Old Souldiers are not easily dismayed: we reade in Histories ancient and moderne, what braue retraits haue beene made by them, though the rest of the Armie in which they haue serued, hath beene broken.

At the battaile of Rauenne, where the Imperialls were beaten by the French, a squadron of Spaniards, old Souldiers, came off vnbroken and vndismayed; whom when Gaston de Foix, Duke of Nemures, and Nephew to Lewis the twelfth, charged, as holding the victorie not intire by their escape, hee was ouer-turned and slaine in the place. For it is truely said of those men, who, by being acquainted with dangers feare them not, That, Neglecto periculo imminenti is mali opus ipsum quantumuis difficile aggrediuntur; They goe about the businesse it selfe, how hard soeuer it be, not standing to consider of the danger, which the mischiefe hanging ouer their heads may bring: and as truely of those that know the warres but by heare-say. Quod valentes sunt & prævalentes ante pericula, in ipsis tamen periculis discedunt; They haue abilitie enough, and to spare, till dangers appeare; but when perill indeede comes, they get them gone.

These Grecians also that made the retract, aduised Darius to retire his Armie into the plaine of Mesopotamia, to the end that Alexander being entred into those large fields and great Champions, he might haue inuironed the Macedonians on all sides with his multitude; and withall they counselled him to diuide that his huge Armie into parts, not committing the whole to one stroke of Fortune, whereby he might might haue fought many battailes, and haue brought no greater numbers at once then might haue beene well marshalled and conducted. But this counsell was so contrarie to the cowardly affections of the Persians, as they perswaded Darius to inuirone the Græcians which gaue the aduice, and to cut them in pieces as Traitors. The infinite wisedome of God doth not worke alwaies by one and the same way, but very often in the alteration of Kingdomes and Estates, by taking vnderstanding from the Gouernours, so as they can neither giue nor discerne of Counsels. For Darius that would needs fight with Alexander vpon a straightned piece of ground, neere vnto the Citie of Issus, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Alexander could, (who by the aduice of Parmenio staied there, as in a place of best aduantage) was vtterly ouerthrowne, his Treasure lost, his Wife, Mother, and Children (whom the Græcians his followers had perswaded him to leaue in Babylon, or elsewhere) taken prisoners, and all their traine of Ladies spoiled of their rich Garments, Iewels, and Honour: It is true, that both the Queene, with her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexanders presence, were entertained with all respect due vnto their birth, their Honours preserued, and their Iewels and rich Garments restored vnto them; and though Darius Wife was a most beautifull Ladie, and his Daughters of excellent forme, yet Alexander mastred his affections towards them all: onely it is reported out of Aristobulus the Historian, that he imbraced the Wife of the valiant Memnon, her Husband lately dead, who was taken flying from Damascus by Parmenio, at which time the Daughters of Ochus, who raigned before Darius, and the Wiues and Children of all the Nobilitie of Persia in effect, fell into captiuitie; at which time also Darius Treasure (not lost at Issus) was seized, amounting to sixe thousand and two hundred talents of coine, and of Bullion fiue hundred talents, with a world of riches besides.

Darius himselfe leauing his brother dead, with diuers other of his chiefe Captaines (casting the Crowne from his head) hardly escaped.

After this ouerthrow giuen vnto Darius, all Phœnicia (the Citie of Tyre excepted) was yeelded to Alexander, of which Parmenio was made Gouernour.

Aradus, Zidon, and Biblos, Maritimate Cities of great importance, of which one Strato was King (but hated of the people) acknowledged Alexander. Good fortune followed him so fast that it troade on his heeles; for Antigonus, Alexanders Lieutenant in Asia the lesse, ouerthrew the Cappadocians, Paphlagonians, and others lately reuolted; Aristodemus, Darius Admirall, had his Fleet partly taken, and in part drowned by the Macedonians newly leauied; the Lacedæmonians that warred against Antipater were beaten; foure thousand of those Greeks which made the retrait at the last battaile, forsaking both the partie of Darius and of Alexander, and led by Amyntas into Ægypt, to hold it for themselues, were buried there; for the time was not yet come to diuide Kingdomes.

Alexander, to honour Ephestion, whom he loued most, gaue him power to dispose of the Kingdome of Zidon. A man of a most poore estate, that laboured to sustaine his life, being of the Royall bloud, was commended by the people vnto him, who changed his Spade into a Scepter, so as he was beheld both a Begger and a King in one and the same houre.

It was a good desire of this new King, when speaking to Alexander, he wisht that he could beare his prosperitie with the same moderation, and quietnesse of heart, that he had done his aduersitie; but ill done of Alexander, in that he would not performe in himselfe that which he commended in another mans desire: for it was a signe that he did but accompanie, and could not gouerne his felicitie.

While he made some stay in those parts, he receiued a letter from Darius, importing the ransome of his Wife, his Mother, and his Children, with some other conditions of peace, but such as rather became a Conqueror, than one that had now been twice shamefully beaten, not vouchsafing, in his direction, to stile Alexander King. It is true, that the Romans, after that they had receiued an ouerthrow by Pyrrhus, returned returned him a more scornefull answere vpon the offer of peace, than they did before the triall of his force. But as their fortunes were then in the Spring, so that of Darius had already cast leafe, the one a resolued well armed and disciplined Nation, the other cowardly and effeminate. Alexander disdained the offers of Darius, and sent him word that he not only directed his letter to a King, but to the King of Darius himselfe.

How ALEXANDER besieged and wanne the Citie of Tyre.

ALEXANDER comming neere to the Citie of Tyre, receiued from them the present of a golden Crowne, with great store of victuals, and other presents, which he tooke very thankefully, returning them answere, That he desired to offer a sacrifice to Hercules, the Protector of their Citie, from whom he was descended. But the Tyrians like not his companie within their Walls, but tel him that the Temple of Hercules was seated in the old City adioyning, now abandoned and desolate. To be short, Alexander resolued to enter it by force, and though it were a place in all mens opinion impregnable, because the Iland whereon it was built, was eight hundred furlongs from the Maine, yet with the labour of many hands, hauing great store of stone from the old Tyre, and timber sufficient from Lybanus, he filled the passage of the Sea betweene the Iland and the Maine, which being more then once carried away by the strength of the Sea vpon a storme of winde, sometime by the Tyrians fired, and sometime torne asunder, yet with the helpe of his Nauie which arriued (during the siege) from Cyprus, he ouercame al difficulties and preuailed, after he had spent seuen months in that attempt. The Tyrians in the beginning of the siege had barbarously drowned the messengers sent by Alexander, perswading them to render the Citie, in respect whereof, and of the great losse of time and men, hee put eight thousand to the sword, and caused two thousand of those, that escaped the first furie, to be hanged on Crosses on the Sea-shore, and reserued for slaues (saith Diodore) thirteene thousand; Arrianus reckons them at thirtie thousand. Many more had died, had not the Zidonians, that serued Alexander, conueied great numbers away by shipping vnto their owne Citie.

it was only half a mile.

Happy it was for Apollo that the Towne was taken, for one of the Tyrians hauing dreamt, that this god meant to forsake the Citie, they bound him fast with a golden chaine to the Idoll of Hercules; but Alexander like a gracious Prince loosened him againe.

It is true, that it was a notable enterprise and a difficult, but great things are made greater. For Nabuchodonosor had taken it before, and filled vp the channell, that lay betweene the Iland and the Maine.

The gouernement of this Territorie he gaue to Philotas, the Sonne of Parmenio; Cilicia, he committed to Socrates, and Andromachus Lieutenant vnder Parmenio; Ephestion had the charge of the Fleet, and was directed to finde Alexander at Gaza towards Ægypt.

§. VI.

How DARIVS offered conditions of peace to ALEXANDER. ALEXANDER winnes Gaza; and deales graciously with the Iewes.

IN the meane while Darius sends againe to Alexander, sets before him all the difficulties of passing on towards the East, and laieth the losse of the last battaile to the straightnesse of the place: he hoped to terrifie him, by theatning to encompasse him in the plaine Countries, he bids him consider, how impossible it was to passe the Riuers of Euphrates, Tigris, might haue fought many battailes, and haue brought no greater numbers at once then might haue beene well marshalled and conducted. But this counsell was so contrarie to the cowardly affections of the Persians, as they perswaded Darius to inuirone the Grecians which gaue the aduice, and to cut them in pieces as Traitors. The infinite wisedome of God doth not worke alwaies by one and the same way, but very often in the alteration of Kingdomes and Estates, by taking vnderstanding from the Gouernours, so as they can neither giue nor discerne of Counsels. For Darius that would needs fight with Alexander vpon a straightned piece of ground, neere vnto the Citie of Issus, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Alexander could, (who by the aduice of Parmenio staied there, as in a place of best aduantage) was vtterly ouerthrowne, his Treasure lost, his Wife, Mother, and Children (whom the Grecians his followers had perswaded him to leaue in Babylon, or elsewhere) taken prisoners, and all their traine of Ladies spoiled of their rich Garments, Iewels, and Honour: It is true, that both the Queene, with her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexanders presence, were entertained with all respect due vnto their birth, their Honours preserued, and their Iewels and rich Garments restored vnto them; and though Darius Wife was a most beautifull Ladie, and his Daughters of excellent forme, yet Alexander mastred his affections towards them all: onely it is reported out of Aristobulus the Historian, that he imbraced the Wife of the valiant Memnon, her Husband lately dead, who was taken flying from Damascus by Parmenio, at which time the Daughters of Ochus, who raigned before Darius, and the Wiues and Children of all the Nobilitie of Persia in effect, fell into captiuitie; at which time also Darius Treasure (not lost at Issus) was seized, amounting to sixe thousand and two hundred talents of coine, and of Bullion fiue hundred talents, with a world of riches besides.

Darius himselfe leauing his brother dead, with diuers other of his chiefe Captaines (casting the Crowne from his head) hardly escaped.

After this ouerthrow giuen vnto Darius, all Phœnicia (the Citie of Tyre excepted) was yeelded to Alexander, of which Parmenio was made Gouernour.

Aradus, Zidon, and Biblos, Maritimate Cities of great importance, of which one Strato was King (but hated of the people) acknowledged Alexander. Good fortune followed him so fast that it troade on his heeles; for Antigonus, Alexanders Lieutenant in Asia the lesse, ouerthrew the Cappadocians, Paphlagonians, and others lately reuolted; Aristodemus, Darius Admirall, had his Fleet partly taken, and in part drowned by the Macedonians newly leauied; the Lacedæmonians that warred against Antipater were beaten; foure thousand of those Greeks which made the retrait at the last battaile, forsaking both the partie of Darius and of Alexander, and led by Amyntas into Ægypt, to hold it for themselues, were buried there; for the time was not yet come to diuide Kingdomes.

How DARIVS offered conditions of peace to ALEXANDER. ALEXANDER winnes Gaza; and deales graciously with the Iewes.

IN the meane while Darius sends againe to Alexander, sets before him all the difficulties of passing on towards the East, and laieth the losse of the last battaile to the straightnesse of the place: he hoped to terrifie him, by theatning to encompasse him in the plaine Countries, he bids him consider, how impossible it was to passe the Riuers of Euphrates, Tigris, Tigris, Araxes, and the rest, with all such other fearefull things: for he that was now filled with nothing but feare, had arguments enough of that nature to present vnto another. All the Kingdomes betweene the Riuer of Alys, and the Hellespont, hee offered him in Dower with his beloued daughter. But Alexander answered, That he offred him nothing but his own, and that which victorie and his own vertue had possest him of; That he was to giue conditions, and not to receiue any, and that he hauing passed the Sea it selfe, disdained to thinke of resistance in transporting himselfe ouer Riuers. It is said, that Parmenio, who was now old and full of honour and riches, told the King, that were he Alexander, he would accept of Darius his offers; to which Alexander answered, That so would he, if he were Parmenio.

But he goes on towards Ægypt, and comming before Gaza, Betis a faithfull seruant to Darius, shuts the Gate against him, and defends the Towne with an obstinate resolution, at the siege whereof Alexander receiued a wound in the shoulder, which was dangerous, and a blow on his legge with a stone; Hee found better men in this place than he did at the former battailes, for he left so many of his Macedonians buried in the sands of Gaza, that hee was forst to send for a new supply into Greece. Here it was that Alexander first began to change condition, and to exercise crueltie. For after that he had entred Gaza by assault, and taken Betis, (whom Iosephus calleth Babemesis) that was weakened with many wounds, and who neuer gaue ground to the Assailants; he bored holes through his feete, and caused him to bee drawne about the streets, whilest he was as yet aliue; who being as valiant a man as himselfe, disdained to aske him either life or remission of his torments. And what had he to countenance this his tyrannie, but the imitation of his Ancestor Achilles, who did the like to Hector? It is true, that crueltie hath alwaies somewhat to couer her deformitie.

Lib.1.c.vlt.

From Gaza (saith Iosephus) he led his Army towards Ierusalem, a Citie, for the antiquitie and great fame thereof, well known vnto him while he lay before Tyre; He had sent for some supply thither, which Iaddus the high Priest, being subiect and sworne to Darius, had refused him. The Iewes therefore fearing his reuenge, and vnable to resist, committed the care of their estates and safetie to Iaddus, who, being taught by God, issued out of the Citie couered with his Pontificall Robes, to wit, an vpper garment of purple, embrodered with gold, with his Miter, and the plate of gold wherein the name of God was written, the Priests and Leuits in their rich ornaments, and the people in white garments, in a maner so vnusual, stately and graue, as Alexander greatly admired it. Iosephus reports it, that he fell to the ground before the high Priest, as reuerencing the name of God, and that Parmenio reprehended him for it; Howsoeuer it was, I am of opinion, That he became so confident in his enterprise, and so assured of the successe after the propheſie of Daniel had been read vnto him, wherein he saw himselfe, and the conquest of Persia so directly pointed at, as nothing thence-forth could discourage him or feare him. He confessed to Parmenio (saith Iosephus) That in Dio a Citie of Macedon, when his minde laboured the conquest of Asia, he saw in his sleepe such a person as Iaddus, and so apparelled, professing one and the same God, by whom he was incouraged to pursue the purpose he had in hand with assurance of victorie. This apparition, formerly apprehended only by the light of his fantasie, he now beheld with his bodily eies; wherewith he was so exceedingly pleased and imboldened, as contrarie to the practice of the Phœnicians, (who hoped to haue sackt and destroyed Ierusalem) he gaue the Iewes all, and more than they desired, both of libertie and immunitie, with permission to liue vnder their owne lawes, and to exercise and enioy their owne Religion.

ALEXANDER winnes Ægypt: and makes a iournie to the Temple of HAMMON.

FRom Ierusalem Alexander turned againe towards Ægypt, and entred it, where Darius his Lieutenant, Astaces, receiued him and deliuered into his hand the Citie of Memphis, with eight hundred talents of treasure, and all other the Kings riches. By this wee see that the Kings of Persia, who had more of affection than of iudgement, gaue to the valiantest man hee had but the command of one Citie, and to the veriest coward the gouernement of all Ægypt. When he had set things in order in Ægypt, he beganne to trauaile after God-head, towards Iupiter Hammon, so fooliſh had prosperitie made him. He was to passe ouer the dangerous and drie sands, where, when the water which he brought on his Camels backe was spent, he could not but haue perished, had not a maruailous showre of raine fallen vpon him, when his Armie was in extreme despaire. All men that know Ægypt, and haue written thereof, affirme, That it neuer raines there; but the purposes of the Almightie God are secret, and he bringeth to passe what it pleaseth him; for it is also said, That when hee had lost his way in those vast desarts, that a flight of Crowes flew before the Armie; who making faster wing when they were followed, and fluttering slowly when the Army was cast backe, guided them ouer those pathlesse sands to Iupiters Temple.

Arrianus from the report of Ptolomie, the sonne of Lagus, saies, That he was led by two Dragons, both which reports may be a-like true; But many of these wonders and things prodigious, are fained by those that haue written the Storie of Alexander, as that an Eagle lay houering directly ouer his head at the battaile of Issus; That a Swallow flew about his head when he slept, and could not be feared from him, till it had wakened him at Halicarnassus, fore-shewing the treason of Æropus, practised by Darius to haue slaine him; That from the yron barres of which the Tyrians made their defensiue engines, when Alexander besieged them, there fel drops of bloud; and that the like drops were found in a loafe of bread, broken by a Macedonian Souldier, at the same time; That a Turfe of earth fell on his shoulder, when he lay before Gaza, out of which there flew a Bird into the aire. The Spaniards in the conquest of the West-Indies haue many such pretie tales; telling how they haue been assisted in battaile, by the presence of our Ladie, and by Angels riding on white horses, with the like Romish miracles, which I thinke themselues do hardly beleeue. The strangest things that I haue read of in this kind being certainly true, was, That the night before the battaile at Nouarra, all the Dogges which followed the French Armie, ranne from them to the Switzers, leaping and fawning vpon them, as if they had beene bred and fed by them all their liues, and in the morning following, Triuulzi and Tremouille, Generals for Lewis the twelfth, were by these Imperial Switzers vtterly broken and put to ruine. Arrian. l. 3.

The place of this Idol of Iupiter Hammon is ill described by Curtius, for he bounds it by the Arabian Troglodites on the South, betweene whom and the Territorie of Hammon, the Region Thebais, or the superiour Ægypt, with the Mountaine of Lybia, and the Riuer of Nilus, are interiacent, and on the North he ioynes it to a Nation, called Nassamones, who bordering the Sea-shore, liue (saith hee) vpon the spoiles of shipwracke, whereas the Temple or groue of this Idoll hath no Sea neere it by two hundred miles and more, being found on the South part of Lybia; these Nassamones being due West from it, in the South part of Marmarica. Ptol. Af. Tab. 3.

When Alexander came neere the place, hee sent some of his Parasites before him to practise the Priests attending the Oracle, That their answer might bee giuen in all things, agreeable to his madde ambition, who affected the title of Iupiters sonne. And so he was saluted, Sonne of Iupiter, by the Deuils prophet, whether prepared before to flatter him, or rather (as some thinke) defectiue in the Greeke tongue; For whereas he meant to say Opaidion, he said Opaidios, that is; O sonne of Iupiter, in stead of, O deare ſonne: for which Grammaticall error he was richly rewarded,& a rumor preſently ſpred, that the great Iupiter had acknowledged Alexander for his owne.

He had heard that Perſeus and Hercules had formerly conſulted with this Oracle, The one,when he was imploied againſt Gorgon, The other, againſt Anteus & Buſiris; and ſeeing theſe men had deriued themſelues from the gods, why might not hee? By this it ſeemes,that he hoped to make his followers and the world fooles,though indeede he made himſelfe one, by thinking to couer from the Worlds knowledge his vanities and vices; and the better to confirme his followers in the beliefe of his Deitie, hee had practized the Prieſts to giue anſwere to ſuch as conſulted with the Oracle, that it ſhould be pleaſing to Iupiter to honour Alexander as his Sonne. Curt.li.4.

Who this Ammon was,and how repreſented,either by a boſſe carried in a Boate, or by a Ramme, or a Rammes-head ; I ſee that many wiſe-men haue troubled themſelues to finde out ; but, as Arrianus ſpeakes of Dionyſius, or Liber Pater (who liued ſaith St. Auguſtine in Moſes time) Ea quæ de dijs veteres fabulis ſuis conſcripſere,non ſunt nimium curioſè perueſtiganda ; We muſt not ouer-curiouſly ſearch into the fables,which the Ancients haue written of their gods.

But this is certaine and notable, that after the Goſpel beganne to be preached in the world, the Deuill in this and in all other Idols became ſpeechleſſe. For that this Hammon was neglected in the time of Tiberius Cæſar, and in the time of Traian altogether forgotten, Strabo and Plutarch witneſſe.

There is found neere his Temple a Fountaine called Fons ſolis (though Ptolomie in his third African Table ſets it farther off) that at mid-night is as hot as boyling water, and at Noone as cold as any yce,to which I cannot but giue credit, becauſe I haue heard of ſome other Wells of like nature,and becauſe it is reported by Saint Auguſtine, by Didore, Herodotus, Plinie, Mela, Solinus, Arrianus, Curtius, and others, and indeed our Bathes in England are much warmer in the night, than in the day.

§. VIII.

How ALEXANDER marching againſt DARIVS, was oppoſed very vnskilfully by the Enemie.

FRom the Temple of Hammon he returned to Memphis, where among many other learned men, he heard the Philoſopher Pſammones, who, belike vnderſtanding that he affected the title of Iupiters Sonne, told him that God was the Father-King of all men in generall; and refining the pride of this haughtie King, brought him to ſay, That God was the Father of all mortall men, but that he acknowledged none for his children ſaue good men.

He gaue the charge of the ſeuerall Prouinces of Ægypt to ſeuerall Gouernours, following the rule of his Maſter Ariſtotle, That a great Dominion ſhould not bee continued in the hands of any one: whom therein the Roman Emperours alſo followed,not daring to commit the gouernment of Ægypt to any of their Senators, but to men of meaner ranck and degree. He then gaue order for the founding of Alexandria vpon the Weſter-moſt branch of Nilus. And hauing now ſetled (as hee could) the eſtate of Ægypt, with the Kingdomes of the leſſer Aſia, Phœnicia, and Syria, (which being but the pawnes of Darius his ill fortune, one happie victorie would readily haue redeemed,) he led his Army towards Euphrates, which paſſage though the ſame was committed to Mazeus to defend, yet was it abandoned, and Alexander without reſiſtance paſt it. From thence he marched towards Tigris, a Riuer for the ſwiftneſſe thereof called by the Perſians, The Arrow. Here, as Curtius, and Reaſon it ſelfe tels vs, might Darius eaſily haue repelled the inuading Macedonian: for the violent courſe of the ſtreame was ſuch, as it draue before it many waightie ſtones, and thoſe that moued not but lay in the bottome, were ſo round and well poliſhed by continuall rolling, Ariſt.Pol.l.5. Curt.l.4.

rolling, that no man was able to fight on ſo ſlipperie a footing; nor the Macedonian foot-men to wade the Riuer, otherwiſe than by ioyning their hands and enterlacing their Armes together, making one waightie and entire body to reſiſt the ſwift paſſage and furious race of the ſtreame. Beſides this notable helpe, the Channell was ſo deepe towards the Eaſterne ſhore, where Darius ſhould haue made head, as the footmen were inforſt to lift their Bowes, and Arrowes, and Darts ouer their heads to keepe them from being moiſtned, and made vnſeruiceable by the Waters. But it was truely and vnderſtandingly ſaid of Homer.

Talis eſt hominum terreſtrium mens,
Qualem quotidie ducit pater virorumq́; Deorumq́;.

The mindes of men are euer ſo affected,
As by Gods will they daily are directed.

And it cannot be denied, that as all Eſtates of the World, by the ſurfeit of miſgouernement haue beene ſubiect to many grieuous, and ſometimes mortall diſeaſes: So had the Empire of Perſia at this time brought it ſelfe into a burning and conſuming Feauer, and therby become frantick and without vnderſtanding, foreſhewing manifeſtly the diſſolution and death thereof.

But Alexander hath now recouered the Eaſterne ſhores of Tygris, without any other difficultie, thã that of the nature of the place; where Mazeus (who had charge to defend the paſſage both of Euphrates and it) preſented himſelfe to the Macedonians, followed with certaine companies of Horſe-men, as if with vneuen forces hee durſt haue charged them on euen ground, when as with a multitude farre exceeding them, he forſooke the aduantage which no valour of his enemies could eaſily haue ouercome. But it is commonly ſeene, that fearefull and cowardly men doe euer follow thoſe waies and counſels, whereof the opportunitie is already loſt.

It is true that he ſet all prouiſions a fire wherewith the Macedonians might ſerue themſelues ouer Tygris, thinking thereby greatly to haue diſtreſſed them; but the execution of good counſell is fruitleſſe when vnſeaſonable. For now was Alexander ſo well furniſhed with carriages, as nothing was wanting to the competencie of the Armie which he conducted. Thoſe things alſo which he ſought to waſte, Alexander being now in ſight, were by his Horſe-men ſaued and recouered. This, Mazeus might haue done ſome daies before at good leiſure; or at this time with ſo great a ſtrength of horſe-men, as the Macedonians durſt not haue purſued them, leauing the ſtrength of their foote out of ſight, and farre behinde.

The new prouiſions of DARIVS. Accidents foregoing the battaile of Arbela.

DARIVS, vpon Alexanders firſt returne out of Ægypt, had aſſembled all the forces, which thoſe Regions next him could furniſh, and now alſo were the Arians, Scythians, Indians, and other Nations arriued; Nations (ſaith Curtius) that rather ſerued to make vp the names of men, than to make reſiſtance. Arrianus hath numbred them with their Leaders; and finds of foot-men of all ſorts ten hundred thouſand, and of horſe foure hundred thouſand, beſides armed Chariots, and ſome few Elephants. Curtius who muſters the Armie of Darius at two hundred thouſand foote, and neere fiftie thouſand horſe, comes (I thinke) neerer to the true number; and yet ſeeing he had more confidence in the multitude than in the valour of his Vaſſals, it is like enough that hee had gathered together of all ſorts ſome three or foure hundred thouſand, with which hee hoped in those faire plaines of Assyria to haue ouer-borne the few numbers of the inuading Armie. But it is a Rule in the Philosophie of the Warre.

Veget. In omni prælio non tam multitudo, & virtus indocta, quam ars & exercitium solent præstare victoriam; In euerie battaile skill and practice doe more towards the victory, than multitude and rude audacitie.

While Alexander gaue rest to his Armie after their passage ouer Tygris, there happened an Eclipse of the Moone, of which the Macedonians, not knowing the cause and reason, were greatly affrighted. All that were ignorant (as the multitude alwaies are) tooke it for a certaine presage of their ouerthrow and destruction, in so much as they began not only to murmur, but to speake it boldly, That for the ambition of one man, a man that disdained Philip for his Father, and would needs bee called the Sonne of Iupiter, they should all perish; For he not only inforst them to make warre against Worlds of enemies, but against Riuers, Mountaines, and the Heauens themselues.

Hereupon Alexander being readie to march forward made a halt, and to quiet the mindes of the multitude, he called before him the Ægyptian Astrologers, which followed him thence, that by them the Souldiers might be assured that this defection of the Moone was a certaine presage of good successe; for that it was natural they neuer imparted to the common people, but reserued the knowledge to themselues, so as a sorrie Almanack-maker had beene no small foole in those dayes.

Of this kind of superstitious obseruation Cæsar made good vse, when hee fought against Ariouistus and the Germans: for they being perswaded by the casting of lots, that if they fought before the change of the Moone, they should certainely lose the battaile, Cæsar forst them to abide it, though they durst not giue it, wherein hauing their mindes already beaten by their owne superstition, and being resolutely charged by the Romans, the whole armie in effect perished.

These Ægyptians gaue no other reason than this, That the Grecians were vnder the aspect of the Sunne, the Persians, of the Moone; and therefore the Moone failing and being darkened, the state of Persia was now in danger of falling, and their glorie of being obscured. This iudgement of the Ægyptian Priests being noised through all the Armie, all were satisfied, and their courage redoubled. It is a principle in the Warre, which, though deuised since, was well obserued then. Exercitum terrore plenum Dux ad pugnam non ducat; Let not a Captaine leade his Armie to the fight, when it is possessed with matter of terrour.

It is truely obserued by Curtius, that the people are led by nothing so much as by superstition; yea, we finde it in all Stories, and often in our owne, that by such inuentions, deuised tales, dreames, and propheſies, the people of this Land haue been carried head-long into many dangerous tumults and insurrections, and still to their owne losse and ruine.

As Alexander drew neere the Persian Armie, certaine letters were surprized written by Darius to the Græcians, perswading them for great summes of money, either to kill or betray Alexander. But these by the aduice of Parmenio he suppressed.

At this time also Darius his faire Wife, oppresst with sorrow, and wearied with trauell, died. Which accident Alexander seemed no lesse to bewaile than Darius, who vpon the first bruit suspected that some dishonourable violence had beene offered her, but being satisfied by an Eunuch of his owne that attended her, of Alexanders Kingly respect towards her, from the day of her being taken, he desired the immortal Gods, That if they had decreed to make a new Master of the Persian Empire, then it would please them to conferre on so iust and continent an enemie as Alexander, to whom he once againe before the last triall by battaile offered these conditions of peace.

That with his Daughter in marriage he would deliuer vp and resigne all Asia the lesse, and with Ægypt, all those Kingdomes between the Phœnician Sea, and the Riuer of Euphrates; That he would pay him for the ransome of his Mother, and his other Daughter thirtie thouſand talents, and that for the performance thereof, hee would leaue his Sonne Ochus in hoſtage: To this they ſought to perſwade Alexander by ſuch arguments as they had. Alexander cauſing the Embaſſadours to be remoued, aduiſed with his Counſell, but heard no man ſpeake but Parmenio, the very right hand of his good fortune; who perſwaded him to accept of theſe faire conditions. Hee told him, that the Empire betweene Euphrates and Helleſpont was a faire addition to Macedon; that the retaining of the Perſian priſoners was a great cumber, and the treaſure offered for them of farre better vſe than their perſons, with diuers other arguments; all which Alexander rejected. And yet it is probable that if he had followed his aduice, and bounded his ambition within thoſe limits, he might haue liued as famous for vertue as for fortune, and left himſelf a Succeſſor of able age to haue enjoyed his eſtate, which afterward, indeed, hee much inlarged, rather to the greatning of others than himſelfe: who to aſſure themſelues of what they had vſurped vpon his iſſues, left not one of them to draw breath in the world within a few yeeres after. The truth is, That Alexander in going ſo far into the Eaſt, left behinde him the reputation which he brought out of Macedon; the reputation of a juſt and prudent Prince, a Prince temperate, aduiſed and gratefull: and beeing taught new leſſons by aboundance of proſperitie, became a louer of wine, of his owne flatterie, and of extreme crueltie. Yea, as Seneca hath obſerued, the taint of one vniuſt ſlaughter, amongſt many, defaced and withered the flouriſhing beautie of all his great acts and glorious victories obtained. But the Perſian Embaſſadours ſtay his anſwere, which was to this effect, That whatſoeuer hee had beſtowed on the Wife and children of Darius, proceeded from his owne naturall clemencie and magnanimitie, without all reſpect to their Maſter, that thanks to an enemie was improper; that he made no warres againſt aduerſitie, but againſt thoſe that reſiſted him; not againſt Women and Children, but againſt armed enemies: and although by the reiterated practice of Darius, to corrupt his Souldiers, and by great ſummes of money to perſwade his friends to attempt vpon his perſon, hee had reaſon to doubt that the peace offered was rather pretended than meant, yet hee could not (were it otherwiſe and faithfull) reſolue in haſte to accept the ſame, ſeeing Darius had made the Warre againſt him, not as a King with Royall and ouert-force, but as a Traitor by ſecret and baſe practice; That for the Territorie offered him, it was alreadie his owne, and if Darius could beate him back againe ouer Euphrates, which he had alreadie paſt, he would then beleeue that hee offered him ſomewhat in his owne power: Otherwiſe he propounded to himſelfe for the reward of the Warre, which hee had made, all thoſe Kingdomes as yet in Darius poſſeſſion, wherein, whether he were abuſed by his owne hopes or no, the battaile which hee meant to fight in the day following ſhould determine. For concluſion, he told them, that he came into Aſia to giue, and not to receiue; That the Heauens could not hold two Sunnes: and therefore if Darius could be content to acknowledge Alexander for his Superiour, he might perchance bee perſwaded to giue him conditions fit for a ſecond Perſon, and his Inferiour.

The battaile of Arbela: and that it could not be ſo ſtrongly fought as report hath made it.

WIth this anſwer the Embaſſadors returne; Darius prepares to fight, and ſends Mazeus to defend a paſſage, which he neuer yet dared ſo much as to hazard. Alexander conſults with his Captaines, Parmenio perſwades him to force Darius his Camp by night; ſo that the multitude of enemies might not moue terrour in the Macedonians, being but few. Alexander diſdaines to ſteale the victorie, and reſolues to bring with him the day-day-light, to witnesse his valour. But it was the successe that made good Alexanders resolution, though the counsell giuen by Parmenio was more sound: For it is a ground in Warre, Si pauci necessario cum multitudine pugnare cogantur, consilium est nocti tempore belli fortunam tentare. Notwithstanding vpon the view of the multitude at hand, hee staggers and intrenches himselfe vpon a ground of aduantage, which the Persian had abandoned: And wheras Darius for feare of surprise had stood with his Armie in armour all the day, and forborne sleepe all the night; Alexander gaue his men rest and store of foode, for reason had taught him this Rule in the Warre, In pugna Milites validius resistunt, si cibo potuq; refecti fuerint, nam fames intrinsecus magis pugnat, quàm ferrum exterius; Souldiers doe the better stand to it in fight; if they haue their bellies full of meate and drinke; for hunger within, fights more eagerly than steele without.

The numbers which Alexander had, saith Arrianus, were fortie thousand foot, and seuen thousand horse; these belike were of the European Armie; for hee had besides both Syrians, Indians, Ægyptians, and Arabians, that followed him out of those Regions. He vsed but a short speech to his Souldiers to incourage them; and I thinke that he needed little Rhetorick; for by the two former battailes vpon the Riuer of Granick and in Cilicia, the Macedonians were best taught with what men they were to encounter. And it is a true saying, Victoria Victoriam parat, animumq; victoribus auget, & aduersarijs aufert; One victorie begets another, and puts courage into those that haue alreadie had the better, taking spirit away from such as haue beene beaten.

Arrianus and Curtius make large descriptions of this battaile, fought at Gaugamela; They tell vs of many charges and re-charges; That the victory inclined sometime to the Persians, sometime to the Macedonians; That Parmenio was in danger of being ouerthrowne, who led the left wing; That Alexanders Reare-guard was broken and his carriages lost; That for the fierce and valorous encounters on both sides, Fortune her selfe was long vnresolued on whom to bestow the Garland: And lastly, That Alexander in person wrought wonders, being charged in his retrait. But, in conclusion, Curtius deliuers vs in accompt but three hundred dead Macedonians, in all this terrible daies-worke, saying, That Ephestion, Perdiccas and others of name were wounded. Arrianus findes not a third part of this number slaine; of the Persians there fell fortie thousand (saith Curtius,) thirtie thousand according to Arrianus: Ninetie thousand, if we beleeue Diodor. But what can wee judge of this great encounter, other than that, as in the two former battailes, the Persians vpon the first charge ranne away, and that the Macedonians pursued? For if of these foure or fiue hundred thousand Asians brought into the field by Darius, euery man had but cast a Dart, or a Stone, the Macedonians could not haue bought the Empire of the East at so easie a rate, as sixe or seuen hundred men in three notorious battailes. Certainly, if Darius had fought with Alexander vpon the bankes of Euphrates, and had armed but fiftie or threescore thousand of this great multitude, onely with Spades (for the most of all he had were fit for no other weapon) it had been impossible for Alexander to haue past that Riuer so easily, much lesse the Riuer of Tygris. But as a man whose Empire God in his prouidence had determined, He abandoned all places of aduantage, and suffered Alexander to enter so farre into the bowels of his Kingdome, as al hope and possibilitie of escape by retrait being taken from the Macedonians, they had presented vnto them the choise, either of death or victorie; to which election Darius could no way constraine his owne, seeing they had many large Regions to runne into from those that inuaded them.

§. XI.

Of things following the battaile of Arbela. The yeelding of Babylon and Suſa.

DARIVS after the rout of his Armie recouered Arbela the ſame night, better followed in his flight, than in the fight. He propounded vnto them that ranne after him his purpoſe of making a retrait into Media, perſwading them that the Macedonians, greedie of ſpoile and riches, would rather attempt Babylon, Suſa, and other Cities, filled with treaſure, than purſue the vanquiſhed. This miſerable reſolution his Nobilitie rather obeied than approued.

Alexander ſoone after Darius his departure arriues at Arbela, which with a great maſſe of treaſure, and Princely ornaments, was rendred vnto him: for the feare which conducted Darius, tooke nothing with it but ſhame and diſhonour. Hee that had beene twice beaten, ſhould rather haue ſent his treaſure into Media, than brought it to Arbela, ſo neere the place where he abid the comming of his enemies; if he had beene victorious, he might haue brought it after him at leiſure, but beeing ouer-come, hee knew it vnpoſſible to driue Mules and Camels laden with gold from the purſuing Enemie, ſeeing himſelfe, at the ouerthrow hee had in Cilicia, caſt the Crowne from his head, to runne away with the more ſpeed. But errors are then beſt diſcerned when moſt incurable. Et præterita magis reprehendi poſſunt quam corrigi; It is eaſier to reprehend than amend what is paſt.

From Arbela Alexander took his way towards Babylon, where Mazeus in whom Darius had moſt confidence rendred himſelfe, his children and the Citie. Alſo the Captaine of the Caſtle, who was keeper of the treaſure, ſtrewed the ſtreets with flowres, burnt frankinſence vpon Altars of ſiluer as Alexander paſſed by, and deliuered vnto him whatſoeuer was committed to his truſt. The Magi (the Chaldean Aſtrologers) followed this Captaine in great ſolemnitie to entertaine their new King: after theſe came the Babylonian horſemen, infinite rich in attire, but exceeding poore in warlike furniture. Betweene theſe (though not greatly to be feared) and himſelfe, Alexander cauſed his Macedonian foote-men to march. When he entred the Caſtle, he admired the glorie thereof, and the aboundance of treaſure therein found amounting to fiftie thouſand talents of ſiluer vncoyned. The Citie it ſelfe I haue elſewhere deſcribed with the Walles, the Towers, the Gates and the Circuite, with the wonderful place of pleaſure about two miles in Circuite, ſurrounded with a Wall of foureſcore foote high, and on the top thereof (being vnder-borne with Pillars) a Groue of beautifull and fruitfull trees, which it is ſaid that one of the Kings of Babylon cauſed to be built, that the Queene and other Princeſſes might walke priuately therein. In this Citie, rich in all things, but moſt of all in Voluptuous pleaſures, the King reſted himſelfe and the whole Armie foure and thirty daies, An. b. Alex. conſuming that time in banquetting and in all ſorts of effeminate exerciſe, which ſo much ſoftned the mindes of the Macedonians, not acquainted till now with the like delicacies, as the ſeuere diſcipline of warre which taught them the ſufferances of hunger and thirſt, of painefull trauaile, and hard lodging, began rather to be forgotten, than neglected.

Heere it was that thoſe bands of a thouſand Soldiers were erected, and Commanders appointed ouer them, who thereupon were ſtiled Chiliarchi. This new order Alexander brought in, was to honor thoſe Captaines which were found by certaine ſelected Iudges to haue deſerued beſt in the late warre. For before this time the Macedonian companies conſiſted but of fiue hundred. Certainely the drawing downe of the foote-bands in this latter age hath been the cauſe (ſaith the Marſhal Monluc) that the title and charge of a Captaine hath beene beſtowed on euery Picque Bœuf or Spurn-Cow, for when the Captaines of foote had a thouſand Souldiers vnder one Ensigne,and after that fiue hundred, as in the time of Francis the first, the title was honorable, and the Kings were lesse charged, and farre better serued. K. Henry the eighth of England neuer gaue the commandement of any of his good ships,but to men of knowne valour, and of great estate, nay sometime he made two Gentlemen of qualitie commanders in one ship: but all orders and degrees are fallen from the reputation they had.

While Alexander was yet in Babylon, there came to him a great supply out of Europe, for Antipater sent him sixe thousand foote and fiue hundred horse,out of Macedon,of Thracians three thousand foot,and the like number of horse,and out of Greece foure thousand foote and foure hundred horse, by which his Armie was greatly strengthned: for those that were infected with the pleasures of Babylon,could hardly be brought againe, De quitter la plume pur dormir sur la dure; To change from soft beds to hard boords.

Hee left the Castle and Citie of Babylon with the Territories about it in charge with three of his owne Captaines, to wit, Agathon, Minetus,and Appoliderus; to supply all wants a thousand talents: but to grace Mazeus, who rendred the citie vnto him,he gaue him the title of his Lieutenant ouer all, and tooke with him Bagistines that gaue vp the Castle,and hauing distributed to euery Souldier a part of the Treasure,he left Babylon and entred into the Prouince Satrapene: from thence hee went on towards Susa in Persia,the same with Ptolomie, Herodotus, and Elianus call Memnonia,situate on the riuer Euleus, a Citie sometime gouerned by Daniel the Prophet. Abulites also,gouernour of this famous Citie gaue it vp to the Conqueror,with fifty thousand talents of siluer in bullion,and twelue Elephants for the warre, with all other the treasures of Darius. In this sort did those Vassals of fortune, louers of the Kings prosperitie, not of his person (for so all ambitious men are) purchase their owne peace and safetie with the Kings treasures. And herein was Alexander well aduised, that whatsoeuer titles he gaue to the Persians, yet hee left all places of importance in trust with his owne Captaines, to wit, Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis,with other Cities and Prouinces by him conquered; for if Darius (as yet liuing) had beaten the Macedonians but in one battell, all the Nobilitie of Persia would haue returned to their naturall Lord. Those that are Traitors to their owne Kings, are neuer to bee vsed alone in great enterprises by those Princes that entertaine them, nor euer to bee trusted with the defences of any frontier-Towne, or Fortresse of waight, by the rendring whereof they may redeeme their libertie and estates lost. Hereof the French had experience,when Don Pedro de Nauarra, being banished out of Spaine,was trusted with Fonterabe, in the yeere 1523.

Diodor speaketh of more than fortie thousand talents in bullion,and of nine Millions of gold, sub dorica forma excusi.

While Alexander spoiled Arbela, Mazeus might haue furnisht the King from Babylon,and while he staied foure and thirtie daies at Babylon, Abulites might haue holpen him from Susa: and while he feasted there, Tiridates from Persepolis might haue relieued him, for the great masse of treasure was laied vp in that Citie. But who hath sought out and friended fearefull aduersitie? It is certaine, that benefits binde not the ambitious,but the honest: for those that are but greedy of themselues, doe in all changes of fortune onely consult the conseruation of their owne greatnesse.

The gouernement of Susa, with the Castle and Treasure, hee committed to his owne Macedonians, making Abulites who rendred it vnto him his Lieutenant, as he had done Mazeus and others,in giuing them Titles,but neither trust nor power; for he left three thousand old Souldiers in Garrison to assure the place; and Darius Mother and her children to repose themselues.

It is said, that Charles the fifth hauing promised Charles of Bourbon the gouernement of Marseilles, if he could haue forst it,and whereof he made sure accompt,told some of his neerest Counsellers, that he meant nothing lesse than the performance of that promise,because hee should thereby haue left the Duke (reuolted from his Master) very well wherewithall to haue recouered his fauour.

How ALEXANDER came to Perſepolis, and burnt it.

FRom Suſa Alexander leadeth his Armie toward Perſepolis, and when hee ſought to paſſe thoſe Mountaines which ſunder Suſiana and Perſia, hee was ſoundly beaten by Ariobarzanes, who defended againſt him thoſe Straights, called Pylæ Perſidis, or Suſcidæ; and after the loſſe of many Companies of his Macedonians, he was forſt to ſaue himſelfe by retrait, cauſing his foote to march cloſe together, and to couer themſelues with their Targets from the ſtones tumbled on them from the Mountaine-top. Yet in the end he found out another path, which a Lycian, liuing in that Countrie, diſcouered vnto him, and came thereby ſuddenly in view of Ariobarzanes, who being inforſt to fight vpon euen ground, was by Alexander broken, whereupon he fled to Perſepolis, but (after that they of Perſepolis had refuſed to receiue him) hee returned and gaue a ſecond charge vpon the Macedonians, wherein he was ſlaine. In like manner did King Francis the firſt, in the yeere 1515. finde a way ouer the Alpes; the Switzers vndertaking to defend all the paſſages, who, if their footmanſhip had not ſaued them vpon the Kings deſcent on the other ſide, they had beene ill paied for their hard lodging on thoſe Hils.

Foure thouſand Greekes, ſaith Curtius, (Iuſtine numbers them but at eight hundred) hauing been taken priſoners by the Perſians, preſented themſelues to Alexander now in ſight of Perſepolis. Theſe had the barbarous Perſians ſo maimed and defaced, by cutting off their Hands, Noſes, Eares, and other Members, as they could no way haue beene knowne to their Country-men, but by their voices; to each of theſe Alexander gaue three hundred Crownes, with new garments, and ſuch Lands as they liked to liue vpon.

Tiridates, one of Darius his falſe-hearted Grandes, hearing of Alexanders approch, made him know that Perſepolis was ready to receiue him, and praied him to double his pace, becauſe there was a determination in the people to ſpoile the Kings treaſure. This Citie was abandoned by many of her Inhabitants vpon Alexanders arriuall, and they that ſtaied followed the worſt counſell, for all was left to the libertie of the Souldiers, to ſpoile and kill at their pleaſure. There was no place in the world at that time, which, if it had beene laied in ballance with Perſepolis, would haue waighed it downe. Babylon, indeede, and Suſa, were very rich; but in Perſepolis lay the bulke and maine ſtore of the Perſians. For after the ſpoile that had beene made of money, curious plate, bullion, Images of gold and ſiluer, and other jewels; there remained to Alexander himſelfe one hundred and twentie thouſand talents. He left the ſame number of three thouſand Macedonians in Perſepolis, which he had done in Suſa, and gaue the ſame formall honor to the Traitor Tiridates, that he had done to Abulites; but he that had the truſt of the place was Nicarides, a creature of his owne. The bodie of his Armie he left here for thirtie daies, of which the Commanders were Parmenio and Craterus, and with a thouſand horſe and certaine troupes of choſen foote, hee would needs view in the Winter-time thoſe parts of Perſia, which the Snow had couered, a fruitleſſe and fooliſh enterpriſe, but as Seneca ſaies: Non ille ire vult, ſed non poteſt ſtare; He hath not a will to goe, but he is vnable to ſtand ſtill. It is ſaid and ſpoken in his praiſe: That when his Souldiers cried out againſt him, becauſe they could not indure the extreme froſt, and make way, but with extreme difficultie, through the ſnow, that Alexander forſooke his horſe, and led them the way. But what can bee more ridiculous than to bring other men into extremitie, thereby to ſhew how well himſelfe can indure it? His walking on foote did no otherwiſe take off their wearineſſe that followed him, than his ſometime forbearing to drinke did quench their thirſt, that could leſſe indure it. For mine owne little judgement I ſhall rather commend that Captaine, that makes carefull prouiſion for thoſe that follow follow him, & that seekes wisely to preuent extreme necessitie, than those witlesse arrogant fooles, that make the vaunt of hauing indured equally with the common Souldier, as if that were a matter of great glorie and importance.

We finde in all the Warres that Cæsar made, or the best of the Roman Commanders, that the prouision of victuals was their first care. For it was a true saying of Coligni, Admirall of France; That whoso will shape that beast (meaning Warre) must begin with his belly.

But Alexander is now returned to Persepolis, where those Historians, that were most amorous of his vertues, complaine, that the opinion of his valour, of his liberalitie, of his clemencie, towards the vanquished, and all other his Kingly conditions, were drowned in drinke; That he smothered in carrowsing cups all the reputation of his actions past, and that by descending, as it were, from the reuerend Throne of the greatest King, into the companie and familiaritie of base Harlots, he beganne to be despised both of his owne and all other Nations. For being perswaded, when he was inflamed with wine, by the infamous Strumpet Thais, hee caused the most sumptuous and goodly Castle and Citie of Persepolis, to bee consumed with fire, notwithstanding all the arguments of Parmenio to the contrarie, who told him that it was a dishonour to destroy those things by the perswasions of others, which by his proper vertue and force he had obtained; and that it would be a most strong perswasion to the Asians, to thinke hardly of him, and thereby alene their hearts: For they might well beleeue that he which demolished the goodliest Ornaments they had, meant nothing lesse than (after such vastation) to hold their possession. Fere vinolentiam crudelitas sequitur; Crueltie doth commonly follow drunkennesse: For so it fell out soone after, and often, in Alexander.

Curt. l. 5.

Sen. Epist. 84.

§. XIII.

ABout this time he receiued a new supply of Souldiers out of Cilicia, and goes on to finde Darius in Media. Darius had there compounded his fourth and last Armie, which hee meant to haue increased in Bactria, had he not heard of Alexanders comming on, with whom (trusting to such companies as hee had, which was numbred at thirtie or fortie thousand) hee determined once againe to trie his fortune. He therefore cals together his Captaines & Commanders, and propounds vnto them his resolution, who being desperate of good successe vsed silence for a while. Artabazus, one of his eldest men of Warre, who had sometime liued with Philip of Macedon, brake the yce, and protesting that hee could neuer be beaten by any aduersitie of the Kings, from the faith which he had euer ought him, with firme confidence, that all the rest were of the same disposition (whereof they likewise assured Darius by the like protestation) hee approued the Kings resolution. Two only, and those the greatest, to wit, Naburzanes, and Bessus, whereof the latter was Gouernour of Bactria, had conspired against their Master, and therefore aduised the King to lay a new foundation for the Warre, and to pursue it by some such person for the present, against whom neither the gods nor Fortune had in all things declared themselues to bee an enemie: this preamble Naburzanes vsed, & in conclusion aduised the election of his fellow Traitor Bessus, with promise, that the warres ended, the Empire should again be restored to Darius. The King swollen with disdaine prest towards Naburzanes to haue slaine him, but Bessus & the Bactrians whom he commanded, being more in number than the rest, with-held him. In the meane while Naburzanes with-drew himselfe, and Bessus followed him, making their quarter a-part from the rest of the Armie. Artabazus, the Kings faithfull seruant, perswaded him to be aduised, and serue the time, seeing seeing Alexander was at hand, and that hee would at least make shew of forgetting the offence made, which the King being of a gentle disposition, willingly yeelded, vnto. Bessus makes his submission and attends the King, who remooues his Armie. Patron, who commanded a Regiment of foure thousand Greekes, which had in all the former Battailes serued Darius with great fidelitie, and alwayes made the retrait in spight of the Macedonians, offered himselfe to guard his person, protesting against the Treason of Bessus, but it was not in his destinie to follow their aduice who from the beginning of the Warre gaue him faithfull counsell: but hee inclined still to Bessus, who told him, that the Greekes with Patron their Captaine were corrupted by Alexander, and practised the diuision of his faithfull seruants. Bessus had drawne vnto him thirtie thousand of the Armie, promising them all those things, by which the louers of the World and themselues are wont to bee allured, to wit, riches, safetie, and honour.

Now the day following Darius plainely discouered the purposes of Bessus, and being ouercome with passion, as thinking himselfe vnable to make head against these vngratefull and vnnaturall Traytors, he prayed Artabazus his faithfull seruant to depart from him, and to prouide for himselfe. In like sort he discharged the rest of his attendants, all saue a few of his Eunuchs; for his Guards had voluntarily abandoned him: His Persians being most base Cowardes, durst not vndertake his defence against the Bactrians, notwithstanding that they had foure thousand Greekes to ioyne with him, who had beene able to haue beaten both Nations. But it is true, that him, which forsakes himselfe, no man followes. It had beene farre more Man-like and King-like to haue dyed in the head of those foure thousand Greekes, which offered him the disposition of their liues, (to which Artabazus perswaded him) than to haue lien bewailing himselfe on the ground, and suffering himselfe to bee bound like a Slaue by those ambitious Monsters that layd hand on him, whom neyther the consideration of his former great estate, nor the honours he had giuen them, nor the trust reposed in them, nor the world of benefits bestowed on them, could moue to pittie: no, nor his present aduersitie, which aboue all things should haue mooued them, could pierce their viperous and vngrateful hearts. Vaine it was indeed to hope it, for infidelitie hath no compassion.

Now Darius, thus forsaken, was bound and layd in a Cart, couered with Hides of Beasts, to the end that by any other ornament he might not bee discouered; and to adde despight and derision to his aduersitie, they fastned him with Chaines of Gold, and so drew him on among their ordinary Carriages and Carts. For Bessus and Nabarzanes perswaded themselues to redeeme their liues and the Prouinces they held, eyther by deliuering him a Prisoner to Alexander, or if that hope failed, to make themselues Kings by his slaughter, and then to defend themselues by force of Armes. But they failed in both. For it was against the nature of God, who is most iust, to pardon so strange villanie, yea though against a Prince purely Heathenish and an Idolater.

Alexander hauing knowledge that Darius was retyred towards Bactria, and durst not abide his comming, hasted after him with a violent speed, and because hee would not force his Foot-men beyond their powers, hee mounted on horse-backe certaine selected Companies of them, and best armed, and with sixe thousand other Horse, rather ranne than marched after Darius. Such as hated the Treason of Bessus, and secretly forsooke him, gaue knowledge to Alexander of all that had happened, informing him of the way that Bessus tooke, and how neere hee was at hand: for many men of worth daily ranne from him. Hereupon Alexander againe doubled his pace, and his Vant-gard being discouered by Bessus his Reare, Bessus brought a Horse to the Cart, where Darius lay bound, perswading him to mount thereon, and to saue himselfe. But the vnfortunate King refusing to follow those that had betrayed him, they cast Darts at him, wounded him to death, and wounded the Beasts that drew him, and slew two poore Seruants that attended his person. This done, they all all fled that could, leauing the reſt to the mercie of the Macedonian Swords.

Polyſtratus a Macedonian, being by purſute of the vanquiſhed preſt with thirſt, as he was refreſhing himſelfe with ſome water that he had diſcouered, eſpying a Cart with a Teame of wounded beaſts breathing for life, and not able to moue, ſearched the ſame, and therein found Darius bathing in his owne bloud. And by a Perſian captiue which followed this Polyſtratus, he vnderſtood that it was Darius, and was informed of this barbarous Tragedie. Darius alſo ſeemed greatly comforted (if dying men ignorant of the liuing God can bee comforted) that hee caſt not out his laſt ſorrowes vnheard, but that by this Macedonian, Alexander might know and take vengeance on thoſe Traitors, which had dealt no leſſe vnworthily than cruelly with him, recommending their reuenge to Alexander by this Meſſenger, which hee beſought him to purſue, not becauſe Darius had deſired it, but for his owne honor, and for the ſafetie of all that did, or ſhould after weare Crownes. Hee alſo, hauing nothing elſe to preſent, rendred thankes to Alexander for the Kingly grace vſed towards his Wife, Mother, and Children, deſiring the immortall Gods to ſubmit vnto him the Empire of the whole world. As hee was thus ſpeaking, impatient death preſſing out his few remaining ſpirits, he deſired water, which Polyſtratus preſented him, after which he liued but to tell him, that of all the beſt things that the world had, which were lately in his power, he had nothing remaining but his laſt breath, where-with to deſire the Gods to reward his compaſſion.

§. XIIII.

IT was now hoped by the Macedonians, that their trauells were neere an end, euery man preparing for his returne. Hereof when Alexander had knowledge, hee was greatly grieued; for the bounded earth ſufficed not his boundleſſe ambition. Many arguments hee therefore vſed to draw on his Armie farther into the Eaſt, but that which had moſt ſtrength was, that Beſſus, a moſt cruell Traitor to his Maſter Darius, hauing at his deuotion the Hyrcanians, and Bactrians, would in ſhort time (if the Macedonians ſhould returne) make himſelfe Lord of the Perſian Empire, and enioy the fruits of all their former trauailes. In concluſion, hee wanne their conſents to goe on: which done, leauing Craterus with certaine Regiments of foot, and Amyntas with ſixe thouſand Horſe in Parthenia, hee enters not without ſome oppoſition into Hyrcania; for the Mardons, and other barbarous Nations, defended certaine paſſages for a while. Hee paſſeth the Riuer of Zioberis, which taking beginning in Parthia, diſſolues it ſelfe in the Caſpian Sea: it runneth vnder the ledge of Mountaines, which bound Parthia and Hyrcania, where hiding it ſelfe vnder ground for three hundred furlongs, it then riſeth againe and followeth its former courſe. In Zadracarta or Zendracarta, the ſame Citie which Ptolomie writes Hyrcania, the Metropolis of that Region, hee reſted fifteene dayes, banquetting, and feaſting therein.

Phataphernes, one of Darius his greateſt Commanders, with other of his beſt followers, ſubmit themſelues to Alexander, and were reſtored to their places and gouernements. But of all other he graced Artabazus moſt highly for his approued & conſtant faith to his Maſter Darius. Artabazus brought with him ten thouſand and fiue hundred Greekes, the remainder of all thoſe that had ſerued Darius; He treats with Alexander for their pardon, before they were yet arriued, but in the end they render themſelues ſimply without promiſe or compoſition: he pardons all but the Lacedæmonians, whom he impriſoned, their Leader hauing ſlaine himſelfe. Hee was alſo wrought,

(though to his great diſhonour) to receiue Nabarzanes that had joyned with Beſſus to murder Darius.

§ XV.

Of THALESTRIS Queene of the Amazons; where, by way of digreſſion it is ſhewed, that ſuch Amazons haue beene, and are.

HEre it is ſaid, that Thaleſtris or Minothea, a Queene of the Amazones, came to viſite him, and her ſute was, (which ſhee eaſily obtayned) That ſhee might accompanie him till ſhee were made with childe by him: which done (refuſing to follow him into India) ſhe returned into her owne Countrie.

Plutarch citeth many Hiſtorians, reporting this meeting of Thaleſtris with Alexander, and ſome contradicting it. But, indeede, the letters of Alexander himſelfe to Antipater, recounting all that befell him in thoſe parts, and yet omitting to make mention of this Amazonian buſineſſe, may juſtly breede ſuſpition of the whole matter as forged. Much more iuſtly may we ſuſpect it as a vaine tale, becauſe an Hiſtorian of the ſame time reading one of his bookes to Lyſimachus (then King of Thrace) who had followed Alexander in all his voyage; was laught at by the King for inſerting ſuch newes of the Amazons, as Lyſimachus himſelfe had neuer heard of. One that accompanied Alexander tooke vpon him to write his acts; which to amplifie, He tolde how the King had fought ſingle with an Elephant, and ſlaine it. The King hearing ſuch ſtuffe, caught the booke, and threw it into the Riuer of Indus; ſaying, that it were well done to throw the writer after it, who by inſerting ſuch fables, diſparaged the truth of his great exploits. Yet as wee beleeue and know that there are Elephants, though it were falſe that Alexander fought with one; ſo may we giue credit vnto writers, making mention of ſuch Amazons, whether it were true or falſe that they met with Alexander; as Plutarch leaues the matter vndetermined. Therefore I will heere take leaue to make digreſſion, as well to ſhew the opinions of the ancient Hiſtorians, Coſmographers, and others, as alſo of ſome moderne diſcouerers touching theſe warlike Women, becauſe not onely Strabo, but many others of theſe our times make doubt, whether, or no, there were any ſuch kinde of people. Iulius Solinus ſeates them in the North parts of Aſia the leſſe. Pom. Mela finds two Regions filled with them; the one, on the Riuer Thermodoon; the other, neere the Caſpian Sea; Quas (ſaith hee) Sauromatidas appellant; Which the people call Sauromatidas. The former of theſe two had the Cimerians for their Neighbours; Certum eſt (ſaith Vadianus, who hath Commented vpon MELA) illos proximos Amazonibus fuiſſe; It is certaine that the Cimerians were the next Nations to the Amazones. PTOLOMIE ſets them farther into the Land North-wards, neere the Mountaines Hippaci, not farre from the Pillars of Alexander. And that they had Dominion in Aſia it ſelfe toward India, Solinus and Pliny tells vs; Where they gouerned a people called the Pandeans, or Padeans, ſo called after Pandea the Daughter of Hercules, from whom all the reſt deriue themſelues. Claudian affirmes, That they commanded many Nations: For he ſpeakes (largely perhaps as a Poet) thus:

L. 2. Diodorus Siculus hath heard of them in Lybia, who were more ancient (saith hee) than those which kept the bankes of Thermodoon, a Riuer falling into the Euxine Sea neere Heraclium.

Herodotus doth also make report of these Amazons, whom hee tells vs that the Scythians call Æorpatas, which is as much as Viricidas, or Men-killers. And that they made incursion into Asia the lesse, sackt Ephesus, and burnt the Temple of Diana, Manethon and Auentinus report, which they performed fortie yeeres after Troy was taken. At the siege of Troy it selfe wee reade of Penthesilea, That shee came to the succour of Priamus.

Æneiad. 1. l. 3.

L. 22. c. 7. Am. Marcellinus giues the cause of their inhabiting vpon the riuer of Thermodoon, speaking confidently of the Warres they made with diuers Nations, and of their ouerthrow.

Plutarch in the life of Theseus, out of Philochorus, Hellanicus, and other ancient Historians, reports the taking of Antiopa Queene of the Amazons by Hercules, and by him giuen to Theseus, though some affirme, That Theseus himselfe got her by stealth when shee came to visit him aboord his ship. But in substance there is little difference; all confessing, That such Amazons there were. The same Author in the life of Pompey speakes of certaine companies of the Amazons, that came to aide the Albanians against the Romans, by whom, after the battaile, many Targets and Buskins of theirs were taken vp: and hee saith farther, That these women entertaine the Gelæ and Lelages once a yeere, Nations inhabiting betweene them and the Albanians.

But to omit the many Authors, making mention of Amazons that were in the old times; Fran. Lopez who hath written the nauigation of Orellana, which he made down the Riuer of Amazons from Peru, in the yeere 1542. (vpon which Riuer, for the diuers turnings, he is said to haue sailed sixe thousand miles) reports from the relation of the said Orellana, to the Councell of the Indies, That hee both saw those women and fought with them, where they sought to impeach his passage towards the East-Sea.

Hister. Ind. part. 2. c. 28.

It is also reported by Vlricus Schmidel, that in the yeere 1542. where he sailed vp the Riuers of Paragna and Parabol, that he came to a King of that Countrie, called Scherues, inhabiting vnder the Tropick of Capricorne, who gaue his Captaine Ernando Rieffere, a Crowne of siluer, which hee had gotten in fight from a Queene of the Amazons in those parts.

Ed. Lopes, in his description of the Kingdome of Congo, makes relation of such Amazons, telling vs, That (agreeable to the reports of elder times) they burne off their right brest, and liue a-part from men, saue at one time of the yeere, when they feast and accompanie them for one moneth. These (saith he) possesse a part of the Kingdome of Monomotapa in Africa, nineteene degrees to the Southward of the line: and that these women are the strongest guards of this Emperour, all the East Indian Portugals know.

I haue produced these authorities, in part, to iustifie mine owne relation of these Amazons, because that which was deliuered mee for truth by an ancient Cacique of Guiana, how vpon the Riuer of Papamena (since the Spanish discoueries called Amazons) that these women still liue and gouerne, was held for a vaine and vnprobable report.

§. XVI.

How ALEXANDER fell into the Perſians Luxurie: and how hee further purſued BESSVS.

NOw as Alexander had begunne to change his condition after the taking of Perſepolis: ſo at this time his proſperitie had ſo much ouerwrought his vertue, as hee accompted clemencie to bee but baſeneſſe, and the temperance which hee had vſed all his life-time, but a poore and deiected humour, rather becomming the inſtructers of his youth, than the condition and ſtate of ſo mighty a King, as the world could not equall. For hee perſwaded himſelfe that he now repreſented the greatneſſe of the gods; he was pleaſed that thoſe that came before him, ſhould fall to the ground, and adore him; he ware the Robes and garments of the Perſians, and commanded that his Nobilitie ſhould doe the like; hee entertained in his Court, and Campe, the ſame ſhameleſſe rabble of Curtiſans, and Sodomiticall Eunuches, that Darius had done, and imitated in all things the proud, voluptuous, and deteſted manners of the Perſians, whom hee had vanquiſhed. So licentious is felicitie, as notwithſtanding that hee was fully perſwaded, that the Gods whom he ſerued (deteſting the vices of the inuaded) aſſiſted him in all attempts againſt them, he himſelfe, contrarie to the Religion he profeſt (which how Idolatrous ſoeuer it were, could not be but fearefull vnto him by neglecting it) became by imitation, and not by ignorance or education, a more foule and fearefull Monſter than Darius, from whoſe tyrannie hee vaunted to haue deliuered ſo many Nations. Yea, thoſe that were deareſt and neereſt vnto him, began to be aſhamed of him, entertaining each other with this, and the like ſcornefull diſcourſe; That Alexander of Macedon was become one of Darius his licentious Courtiers; That by his example, the Macedonians were in the end of ſo many trauailes, more impoueriſhed in their vertues, than inriched by their victories; and that it was hard to iudge whether the Conquerors, or the Conquered were the baſer ſlaues. Neither were theſe opinions ſo reſerued, but that the noiſe of them came to his eares. He therefore with great gifts ſought to pacifie the better ſort, and thoſe of whoſe iudgements he was moſt iealous; and making it knowne to the Armie, that Beſſus had aſſumed the title of a King, and called himſelfe Artaxerxes, and that hee had compounded a great Armie of the Bactrians, and other Nations, hee had arguments enow to perſwade them to goe on, to the end that all alreadie gotten, might not with themſelues (ſo farre ingaged) be caſt away. And becauſe they were peſtered with the ſpoiles of ſo many Cities, as the whole Armie ſeemed but the guard of their carriages, (not much vnlike the warfare of the French) hauing commanded euery mans ſardells to be brought into the market-place, he together with his owne, cauſed all to bee conſumed with fire. Certainely, this could not but haue prooued moſt dangerous vnto him, ſeeing the common-Souldiers had more intereſt in theſe things which they had bought with their painefull trauailes, and with their bloud, than in the Kings ambition; had not (as Seneca often obſerued) his happie temeritie ouer-come all things. As hee was in his way, newes came to him, that Satribarzanes, whom he had eſtabliſhed in his former gouernement ouer the Arrians, was reuolted; whereupon leauing the way of Bactria, he ſought him out, but the Rebell, hearing of his comming, fled to Beſſus, with two thouſand Horſe. Hee then went on towards Beſſus, and by ſetting a great pile of wood on fire, with the aduantage of a ſtrong winde, wonne a paſſage ouer an high and vnacceſſable Rocke, which was defended againſt him, with thirteene thouſand foote. For the extremitie of the Flame and ſmoke, forced them from the place, otherwiſe inuincible. I ſaw in the third ciuill warre of France, certaine Caues in Languedoc, which had but one entrance, and that very narrow, cut out in the mid-way of high Rockes, which wee knew not how to enter by any ladder or engine, till at laſt, by certaine bundels of ſtraw, let downe by an yron chaine, and a waighty ſtone in the middeſt, thoſe that defended it, were ſo ſmothered, as they rendred themſelues with their plate, monie, and other goods therein hidden. There were alſo ſome three yeeres before my arriuall in Guiana, three hundred Spaniards well mounted, ſmothered to death, together with their Horſes, by the Countrie-people, who did ſet the long dry graſſe on fire to the Eaſtward of them, (the winde in thoſe parts being alwayes Eaſt) ſo as notwithſtanding their flying from the ſmoke, there was not any one that eſcaped. Sr. Iohn Borrowes alſo, with a hundred Engliſh, was in great danger of being loſt at Margarita, in the Weſt-Indies, by hauing the graſſe fired behinde him, but the ſmoke being timefully diſcouered, hee recouered the Sea-ſhore with the loſſe of ſixetene of his men. I remember theſe things, but to giue caution to thoſe that ſhall in times to come inuade any part of thoſe Countries, that they alwayes, before they paſſe into the Land, burne downe the graſſe and ſedge to the Eaſt of them; they may otherwiſe, without any other enemie, than a handfull of ſtraw ſet on fire, die the death of hony-Bees, burnt out of the Hiue.

§. XVII.

A Conſpiracie againſt ALEXANDER. The death of PHILOTAS and PARMENIO.

ALEXANDER was, after he parted hence, no where reſiſted, till he came into Aria, to the Eaſt of Bactria, where the chiefe City of that Prouince, called Artacoana, was a while defended againſt him, by the reuolt of Sartibarzanes, but in the end hee receiued the Inhabitants to mercie. At this place his Armie was re-enforced with a new ſupply of fiue thouſand and fiue hundred foote, and neere fiue hundred Horſe, out of Greece, Theſſalie, & other places. His iournie out of Perſia into theſe parts, is very confuſedly deſcribed. For hauing (as all his Hiſtorians tell vs) a determination to find Beſſus in Bactria, he leaues it at the very entrance, and takes the way of Hyreania; from thence hee wanders Northward towards the obſcure Mardi, vpon the Caſpian-Sea, and thence ouer the Mountaines Coronus into Aria, and Drangiana.

At this time it was that the treaſon of Dimnus brake out, of which Philotas the ſonne of Parmenio was accuſed, as acceſſarie, if not principall. This Dimnus, hauing (I know not vpon what ground) conſpired with ſome others againſt the life of Alexander, went about to draw Nicomachus, a yong man whom hee loued, into the ſame treaſon. The Youth, although hee was firſt bound by oath to ſecrecie, when he heard ſo foule a matter vttered, beganne to proteſt againſt it ſo vehemently, that his friend was like to haue ſlaine him for ſecuritie of his owne life. So, conſtrained by feare, hee made ſhew as if hee had beene wonne by perſwaſion, and by ſeeming at length to like well of the buſineſſe, hee was told more at large what they were, that had vndertaken it. There were nine or ten of them, all men of ranke; whoſe names Dimnus (to countenance the enterpriſe) reckoned vp to Nicomachus. Nicomachus had no ſooner freed himſelfe from the company of this Traitor Dimnus, than he acquainted his owne brother Ceballinus with the whole Hiſtorie: whereupon it was agreed betweene them, that Ceballinus (who might with leaſt ſuſpition) ſhould goe to the Court, and vtter all. Ceballinus, meeting with Philotas, told him the whole buſineſſe; deſiring him to acquaint the King therewith: which hee promiſed to doe, but did not. Two dayes paſſed, and Philotas neuer brake with the King about the matter, but ſtill excuſed himſelfe to Ceballinus by the Kings want of leiſure. This his coldneſſe bred ſuſpition, and cauſed Ceballinus to addreſſe himſelfe to another, one Metron, Keeper of the Kings Armorie, who forth-with brought him to Alexanders preſence. Alexander, finding by examination what had paſſed betweene Ceballinus and Philotas, did fully perſwade himſelfe that this concealement of the treaſon, ſon, argued his hand to haue beene in the buſineſſe. Therefore when Dimnus was brought before him, he asked the Traitor no other queſtion then this: Wherein haue I ſo offended thee, that thou ſhouldeſt thinke PHILOTAS more worthie to be King than I? Dimnus perceiuing, when he was apprehended, how the matter went, had ſo wounded himſelfe, that he liued no longer, than to giue his laſt groane in the Kings preſence. Then was Philotas called, and charged with the ſuſpition, which his ſilence might juſtly breede. His anſwere was, That when the practice was reuealed vnto him by Nicomachus, he judging it to be but friuolous, did forbeare to acquaint Alexander therewithall, vntill he might haue better information. This errour of his, (if it were onely an errour) although Alexander, for the notorious ſeruices of his Father Parmenio, of his brother Nicanor lately dead, and of Philotas himſelfe, had freely pardoned and giuen him his hand for aſſurance; yet by the inſtigation of Craterus, hee againe ſwallowed his Princely promiſe, and made his enemies his Iudges: Curtius giues a note of Craterus in this buſineſſe; How hee perſwaded himſelfe, that hee could neuer finde a better occaſion to oppreſſe his priuate enemie, than by pretending pietie, and dutie towardes the King. Heereof a Poet of our owne hath giuen a note as much better, as it is more generall in his Philotas.

See how theſe great men cloathe their priuate hate,
In theſe faire colours of the publike good,
And to effect their ends, pretend the State,
As if the State by their affection ſtood,
And arm'd with power and Princes jealouſies,
Will put the leaſt conceit of diſcontent
Into the greateſt ranke of treacheries,
That no one action ſhall ſeeme innocent;
Yea valour, honour, bountie, ſhall be made
As acceſſaries vnto ends vnjuſt:
And euen the ſeruice of the State muſt lade
The needfull'ſt vndertaking with diſtruſt,
So that baſe vilenſſe; idle Luxurie,
Seeme ſafer farre, than to doe worthily, &c.

Now although it were ſo, that the King, following the aduice of Craterus, had reſolued the next day to put Philotas to torment, yet in the very euening of the ſame night in which he was apprehended, he called him to a banquet, and diſcourſed as familiarly with him as at any other time. But when in the dead of the night Philotas was taken in his lodging, and that they which hated him beganne to binde him; he cryed out vpon the King in theſe wordes: O ALEXANDER, the malice of mine Enemies hath ſurmounted thy mercie, and their hatred is farre more conſtant than the word of a King. Many circumſtances were vrged againſt him by Alexander himſelfe; (for the Kings of Macedon did in perſon examine the accuſations of treaſon) and this was not the leaſt (not the leaſt offence, indeede, againſt the Kings humour, who deſired to be glorified as a God) That when Alexander wrote vnto him concerning the title giuen him by Iupiter Hammon; Hee anſwered, That hee could not but reioyce that he was admitted into that ſacred Fellowſhip of the gods, and yet hee could not but withall grieue for thoſe that ſhould liue vnder ſuch a one as would exceede the nature of man. This was (ſaith Alexander) a firme perſwaſion vnto me, that his heart was changed, and that hee held my glory in deſpight. See what a ſtrange Monſter Flatterie is, that can perſwade Kings to kill thoſe that doe not praiſe and allow thoſe things in them, which are of all other moſt to bee abhorred. Philotas was brought before the multitude, to heare the Kings Oration againſt him: he was brought forth in vilde garments, and bound like a Theefe; where hee heard himſelfe, and his abſent Father the greateſt Captaine of the World, accuſed, his two other Brothers,

Hector,

Hector and Nicanor hauing beene loſt in the preſent Warre. Hee was ſo greatly oppreſt with griefe, as for a while he could vtter nothing but teares, and ſorrow had ſo waſted his ſpirits, as hee ſunke vnder thoſe that led him. In the end the King asked him, in what language he would make his defence; he anſwered, In the ſame wherein it had pleaſed the King to accuſe him, which hee did, to the end that the Perſians, as well as the Macedonians, might vnderſtand him. But hereof the King made his aduantage, perſwading the aſſembly, that hee diſdained the language of his owne Countrie, and ſo with-drawing himſelfe, left him to his mercileſſe enemies.

This proceeding of the Kings, Philotas greatly lamented, ſeeing the King, who had ſo ſharpely inueyed againſt him, would not vouchſafe to heare his excuſe. For, not his enemies onely were imboldened thereby againſt him, but all the reſt, hauing diſcouered the Kings diſpoſition and reſolution, contended among themſelues, which of them ſhould exceede in hatred towardes him; Among many other arguments, which he vſed in his owne defence, this was not the weakeſt; That when Nicomachus deſired to know of Dimnus, what men of marke and power were his partners in the conſpiracie (as ſeeming vnwilling to aduenture himſelfe with meane and baſe Companions) Dimnus named vnto him Demetrius of the Kings Chamber, Nicanor, Amyntas, and ſome others, but ſpake not a word of Philotas, who by being Commander of the Horſe, would greatly haue valued the partie, and haue incouraged Nicomachus. Indeede, as Philotas ſaid well for himſelfe, it is likely that Dimnus, thereby the better to haue heartned Nicomachus, would haue named him, though hee had neuer dealt with him in any ſuch practice. And for more certaine proofe, that he knew nothing of their intents, that practiſed againſt the King, there was not any one of the Conſpirators, being many, inforc'd by torments, or otherwiſe, that could accuſe him, and it is true, that aduerſity being ſeldome able to beare her owne burden, is for the moſt part found ſo malicious, as ſhee rather deſires to draw others (not alwayes deſeruing it) into the ſame danger, than to ſpare any that it can accuſe. Yet at the laſt, howſoeuer it were, to auoide the extremity of reſiſtleſſe and vnnaturall torments, deuiſed by his profeſt enemies Craterus, Cenus, Epheſtion, and others, Philotas accuſed his owne ſelfe; being perſwaded that they would haue ſlaine him forthwith. But he failed euen in that miſerable hope, and ſuffering all that could be layd on fleſh and bloud, hee was forc'd to deliuer, not what he knew, but whatſoeuer beſt pleaſed their cares, that were farre more mercileſſe than death it ſelfe.

Of this kinde of judiciall proceeding S. Auguſtine greatly complaineth as a matter to bee bewayled, ſaith he, with Fountaines of teares. Aug. de Ciuit. Dei, l.19.c.6. Quid cum in ſua cauſa quiſq; torquetur: & cum quæritur vtrum ſit nocens cruciatur: & innocens luit pro incerto ſcelere certiſſimas pœnas: non quia illud commiſiſſe detegitur, ſed quia non commiſiſſe neſcitur? What ſhall we ſay to it, when one is put to torture in his owne caſe; and tormented whileſt yet it is in queſtion whether he be guiltie; and being innocent, ſuffers aſſured puniſhment for a fault, of which there is no certaintie, not becauſe he is knowne to haue committed the offence, but becauſe other doe not know that he hath not committed it?

It had beene enough for Alexanders ſafety, if Philotas had beene put to death without torment, the reſt would not much haue grieued thereat, becauſe hee was greatly ſuſpected. But Hemolaus, who afterward conſpired againſt him, made the Kings cruelty and delight in bloud, the greateſt motiue of his owne ill intent. Therefore, Seneca, ſpeaking of Alexander, ſaith thus: Sen. de Clem. l.1. Crudelitas minime humanum malum eſt, indignum tam miti animo; ferina iſta rabies eſt ſanguine gaudere & vulneribus, & abiecto homine, in ſilueſtre animal tranſire; Crueltie is not a humane vice; it is vnworthy of ſo milde a ſpirit. It is euen a beaſtly rage to delight in bloud and wounds, and caſting away the nature of man, to become a ſauage Monſter.

For the concluſion of this Tragedie, Curtius makes a doubt, whether the confeſſion that Philotas made, were to giue end to the torments which hee could not any longer indure, or that the ſame was true indeede; For (ſaith hee) in this caſe, they that ſpeake truely, or they that deny falſly, come to one and the ſame end. Now, while the Kings hands were yet wet in bloud, he commanded that Lynceſtes, ſonne-in-Law to Antipater, who had beene three yeeres in priſon, ſhould be ſlaine: The ſame diſpatch had all thoſe that Nicomachus had accuſed: others there were that were ſuſpected, becauſe they had followed Philotas, but when they had anſwered for themſelues that they knew no way ſo direct to winne the Kings fauour, as by loſing thoſe whom the King fauoured; they were diſmiſt. But Parmenio was yet liuing; Parmenio, who had ſerued with great fidelitie as well Philip of Macedon the Kings Father, as himſelfe; Parmenio that firſt opened the way into Aſia; That had depreſt Attalus the Kings enemie; that had alwaies, and in all hazards, the leading of the Kings Vant-guard, that was no leſſe prudent in counſell, than fortunate in all attempts; A man beloued of the men of Warre, and, to ſay the truth, hee that had made the purchaſe for the King of the Empire of the Eaſt, and of all the glorie and fame hee had: That he might not therefore reuenge the death of his Sonne, though not vpon the King, (for it was vnlikely that hee would haue diſhonoured his fidelitie in his eldeſt age, hauing now liued threeſcore and ten yeeres) yet vpon thoſe that by the witchcraft of flatterie had poſſeſt themſelues of his affection; it was reſolued that he ſhould be diſpatcht. Polydamas was imployed in this buſineſſe, a man whom of all other Parmenio truſted moſt, and loued beſt, who (to bee ſhort) finding him in Media, and hauing Cleander and other Murderers with him, ſlew him walking in his Garden, while hee was reading the Kings letters. Hic exitus PARMENIONIS fuit, militiæ domiq; clari viri; Multa ſine Rege proſperè, Rex ſine illo nihil magnæ rei geſſerat; This was the ende of PARMENIO (ſaith CVRTIVS) who had performed many notable things without the King, but the King, without him, did neuer effect any thing worthy of praiſe. Lib.7.

§. XVIII.

How ALEXANDER ſubdued the Bactrians, Sogdians, and other people. How BESSVS was deliuered into his hands. How hee fought with the Scythians.

WHen theſe things had end, Alexander went on with his Armie, and brought vnder his obedience the Araſpians or Euergitans; hee made Amenides (ſometime Darius his Secretarie) their Gouernour; then he ſubdued the Arachoſians, and left Menon to commaund ouer them. Heere the Armie, ſometimes led by Parmenio, findes him, conſiſting of twelue thouſand Macedons and Greekes, with whom he paſt through ſome cold Regions with difficultie enough. At length hee came to the foote of the Mountaine Taurus towards the Eaſt, where he built a Citie which hee honoured with his owne name, and peopled it with ſeuen thouſand of his olde Macedons, worne with age and with trauailes of the warre, The Arians, who ſince hee left them were reuolted, hee ſubdued againe by the induſtrie and valour of Caranus and Erigius; And now he reſolues to finde out the new King Beſſus in Bactria. Beſſus, hearing of his comming, prepares to paſſe ouer the great Riuer of Oxus which diuides Bactria from Sogdiana; Artabazus is made Gouernour of Bactria abandoned by Beſſus; The Macedonian Armie ſuffereth for want of Water, inſomuch as when they came to the Riuer of Oxus, there died more of them by drinking inordinately, then Alexander had loſt in any one battaile againſt the Perſians. And it may well be; For (as Clytus did after obiect vnto him) hee fought againſt women, not againſt men, and not againſt their perſons but their ſhadowes. Hee found on the bankes of this great Riuer no manner of Timber or other materialls, to make either boates, bridges, or raffe, but was forſt to ſow together the Hides that couered his carriages, and ſtuffe them with ſtraw, and on them in ſixe daies to paſſe ouer his Armie; which Beſſus might eaſily haue diſtreſt, if he had dared but to beholde the Macedonian Armie afarre farre off. Hee had formerly complained against Darius for neglecting to defend the bankes of Tigris, and other passages, and yet now, when this traiterous slaue had styled himselfe a King, hee durst not performe any thing worthy of a slaue. And therefore those that were neereſt vnto him, and whom he most trusted, to wit, Spitamines, Dataphernes, Catanes, and others the Commanders of his Armie, moued both by the care of their owne safetie, and by the memorie of Bessus his Treason and crueltie against Darius, bound him in the like manner that hee had done his Master, but with this difference, that he had the chaine closed about his neck like a mastiffe Dog, and so was dragged along to be presented to his enemie.

In the meane while Alexander was arriued at a certaine Towne inhabited with Greekes of Miletum, brought thither by Xerxes, when long before he returned out of Greece, whose issues had well-neere forgotten their Countrey-language. These most cruelly (after they had receiued him with great ioy) hee put to the sword, and destroyed their Citie. At this place he receiued Bessus, and hauing rewarded Spitamenes with the rest that deliuered him, he gaue the Traitor into the hands of Oxatres, Darius his brother, to be tormented.

But while he now thought himselfe secure, some twenty thousand Mountainers assaulted his Camp; in repelling whom he receiued a shot in the leg, the arrow head sticking in the flesh, so as hee was carried in a Horse-Lytter, sometime by the horsemen, sometime by the foote. L.7.

Soone after hee came vnto Maracanda, which Petrus Perondinus takes to be Samarchand, the regall Citie of the great Tamerlaine. It had in compasse threescore and ten furlongs (Curtius saith.) Heere he receiued the Embassadors of the Scythians (called Auians) who offered to serue him.

The Bactrians are shortly againe with the Sogdians stirred to Rebellion, by the same Spitamenes and Catanes, who had lately deliuered into his hands the Traitor Bessus. Many Cities were resoluedly defended against him, all which, after victorie, hee defaced and rased, killing all therein. At one of these hee receiued a blow on the necke which strucke him to the ground, and much disabled him for many daies after. In the meane while Spitamenes had recouered Maracanda, against whom hee imployed Menedemus with three thousand foote and eight hundred horse.

In the heate of these tumults Alexander marched on (if we may beleeue Curtius and others) till he came to the Riuer of Tanais; vpon whose banke he built another Alexandria threescore furlongs in compasse, which hee beautified with houses within seuenteene daies after the walls built. The building of this Citie is said to haue beene occasion of a warre betweene him and the Scythians; the Scythian King perswading himselfe, that this new Towne was fortified of purpose to keepe him vnder. I doe not well vnderstand, why the Scythians, offering warre in such terrible manner that Alexander was iudged by his owne Souldiers to counterfeit sickneſse for very feare, should neuertheleſse make suite for peace: neither finde I the reason why Alexander (not intending the conquest of those Northerne desarts, but onely the defence of his owne banke) should refuse to let them alone, with whom he could not meddle further then they should agree to suffer him. Yet hereof is made a great matter; and a victorie described; in pursuit of which the Macedons ranne beyond the bounds and monuments of Bacchus his expedition.

The truth is, That Curtius and Trogus haue greatly mistaken this Riuer which they call Tanais. For it was the Riuer of Iaxartes, that runnes betweene Sogdiana and Scythia, which Alexander past ouer, while Menedemus was imployed in the recouerie of Samarchand: But Tanais which diuides Asia from Europe, is neere two thousand miles distant from any part of Bactria and Sogdiana, and the way desart & vnknowne. So that Alexander had (besides Iaxartes) the great Riuer of Volga and many others to swimme ouer, ere he could recouer Tanais: which (from the place where he was) he could hardly haue discouered with the Armie that followed him, if he had imployed all the time that he liued in Asia in that trauaile.

Where-

Wherefore it is enough to beleeue, that the Aſiatique Scythians, making ſome offer to diſturbe the erection of this new Citie, which was like to giue ſome hindrance to their excurſions, were driuen away by the Macedonians; and being naked of defenſiue Armes, eaſily chaſed ſome tenne or twelue miles; which is the ſubſtance of Curtius his report. As for the limits of Bacchus his iournie; like enough it is that Bacchus (if in his life time he were as ſober a man, as after his death he was held a drunken God) went not verie farre into that waſte Countrie, where hee could finde nothing but trees and ſtones, nor other buſineſſe than to ſet vp a monument.

Threeſcore of the Macedons are ſaid to haue beene ſlaine, and one thouſand one hundred hurt in this fight, which might eaſily be in paſſing a great Riuer, defended againſt them by good Archers. Of Scythian horſes one thouſand eight hundred were brought into the Campe, and many priſoners. It is forbidden by ſome Hiſtorians, and indeede it is hardly poſſible, to ſet downe the numbers of ſuch as periſh in battell: yet Cæſar commonly did it. And where the diligence of the victors hath beene ſo inquiſitiue into the greatneſſe of their owne ſucceſſe, that writers haue beene able to deliuer ſuch particulars by credible report, I hold it not vnlawfull to ſet downe what wee finde; eſpecially when it ſerues to giue light to the buſineſſe in hand. The ſmall number which the Macedonians loſt; the omiſſion of the number which they ſlew (a thing not vſuall in Curtius, who forbeares nothing that may ſet out the greatneſſe of Alexander) and the little bootie that was gotten; doe make it probable, that this warre was no better than the repulſion of a few roning Tartars (the like being yeerely performed by the Moſcouite, without any boaſt) and therefore better omitted by ſome Hiſtorians, than ſo highly extolled as a great exploit by others.

While Alexander was aſſuring himſelfe of thoſe Scythians bordering vpon Iaxartes, he receiued the ill newes that Menedemus was ſlaine by Spitamenes, the Armie (by him led) broken, and the greateſt numbers ſlaine, to wit, two thouſand foote, and three hundred horſe. He therefore, to appeaſe the rebellion, and to take reuenge of Spitamenes, makes all the haſte he can; but Spitamenes flies into Bactria. Alexander kills, burnes, and laies waſte all before him; not ſparing the innocent children, and ſo departs, leauing a new Gouernour in that Prouince.

To repaire this loſſe he receiued a great ſupply of nineteene thouſand Souldiers out of Greece, Lycia, and Syria; with all which, and the old Armie, hee returnes towards the South, and paſſeth the Riuer of Oxus; on the South-ſide whereof hee built ſixe Townes neere each other for mutuall ſuccour. But hee finds a new ſtart-vp-Rebell, called Arimazes, (a Sogdian) followed with thirtie thouſand Souldiers that defended againſt him a ſtrong piece of ground on the top of a high Hill; whom when Alexander had ſought in vaine to winne by faire words, hee made choiſe of three hundred yong-men, and promiſed ten talents to the firſt, nine to the ſecond, and ſo in proportion to the reſt, that could finde a way to creepe vp to the top thereof. This they performed with the loſſe of ſome two and thirtie of their men, and then made a ſigne to Alexander, that they had performed his commandement. Hereupon he ſent one Cophes to perſwade Arimazes to yeeld the place; who, being ſhewed by Cophes that the Armie of Macedon was alreadie mounted vp, yeelded ſimply to Alexanders mercie, and was (with all his kinred) ſcourged and crucified to death; which puniſhment they well deſerued for neglecting to keepe good watch in ſo dangerous a time. For the place, as ſeemes by the deſcription, might eaſily haue beene defended againſt all the Armies of the World. But, what ſtrength cannot doe; Mans wit, being the moſt forcible engine, hath often effected; Of which I will giue you an example in a place of our owne.

The Iland of Sarke, ioyning to Garnſey and of that gouernement, was in Queene Maries time ſurpriſed by the French, and could neuer haue beene recouered againe by ſtrong hand, hauing cattell and corne enough vpon the place to feede ſo many men as will ſerue to defend it, and being euery way ſo inacceſſible, that it might bee held held againſt the Great Turke. Yet by the induſtrie of a Gentleman of the Netherlands, it was in this ſort regained. Hee anchored in the roade with one Ship of ſmall burden, and, pretending the death of his Marchant, beſought the French, being ſome thirtie in number, that they might burie their Marchant in hallowed Ground, and in the Chappell of that Iſle; offering a preſent to the French of ſuch Commodities as they had aboord; whereto (with condition that they ſhould not come a-ſhore with any weapon, no not ſo much as with a Knife) the French-men yeelded. Then did the Flemings put a Coffin into their Boat, not filled with a dead carkaſſe, but with Swords, Targets, and Harquebuſſes; The French receiued them at their landing; and ſearching euery of them ſo narrowly as they could not hide a Pen-knife, gaue them leaue to draw their Coffin vp the Rockes with great difficultie; ſome part of the French tooke the Flemiſh Boat and rowed aboord their Ship, to fetch the commodities promiſed, and what elſe they pleaſed, but being entred, they were taken and bound. The Flemings on the Land, when they had carried their Coffin into the Chappell, ſhut the doore to them, and taking their weapons out of the Coffin, ſet vpon the French; they runne to the Cliffe and cry to their Companie aboord the Fleming to come to their ſuccour, but finding the Boat charged with Flemings, yeelded themſelues and the place. Thus a Fox-taile doth ſometimes helpe well to piece out the Lions-skinne, that elſe would be too ſhort.

§. XIX.

How ALEXANDER ſlew his owne friends.

AFter theſe Sogdian and Scythian Warres, we reade of Alexanders killing of a Lion, and other friuolous matter, and that hee committed the Gouernment of Maracanda, & the Country about it, to Clytus, and how he ſlew him ſoone after, for valuing the vertue of Philip the father before that of Alexander the ſonne, or rather becauſe he obiected to the King the death of Parmenio, and derided the Oracle of Hammon: for therein hee toucht him to the quicke, the ſame being deliuered in publike and at a drunken Banquet. Clytus, indeed, had deſerued as much at the Kings hands, as any man liuing had done, and had in particular ſaued his life, which the King well remembred when he came to himſelfe, and when it was too late. Yet to ſay the truth, Clytus his inſolencie was intolerable. As he in his Cups forgat whom he offended, ſo the King in his (for neyther of them were themſelues) forgat whom he went about to ſlay, for the griefe whereof he tare his owne face and ſorrowed ſo inordinately, as, but for the perſwaſions of Calliſthenes, it is thought he would haue ſlaine himſelfe.

Wine begat Furie, Furie matter of Repentance: but preceding miſchiefes are not amended by ſucceeding bewailings: Omne vitium ebrietas & incendit, & detegit; obſtantem malis conatibus verecundiam remouet; vbi poſſedit animum nimia vis vini, quicquid mali latebat, emergit: non facit ebrietas vitia, ſed protrahit; Drunkenneſſe both kindles and layes open euery vice; it remooues out of the way that ſhame which giues impediment vnto bad attempts; where wine gets the maſtrie, all the ill that before lay hidden breakes out: drunkenneſſe indeed rather diſcouers vices, than makes them.

Soone after this, Spitamenes, who ſlew Beſſus, and had lately reuolted from Alexander, was murdered by his Wife, and his head preſented to Alexander. Spitamenes being taken away, the Dahans alſo ſeized vpon his fellow-conſpirator Dataphernes, and deliuered him vp. So Alexander being now freed from all theſe pettie-Rebels, diſpoſed of the Prouinces which he paſt ouer, and went on with his Armie into Gabaza, where it ſuffered ſo much Hunger, Cold, Lightning, Thunder, and Storme, as he loſt in one Tempeſt a thouſand of his Traine. From hence he inuaded the Sacans, and deſtroyed their Countrie. Then came he into the Territorie of Cohortanes, who ſubmitted himſelfe vnto him, feaſted him greatly, and preſented him with thirtie beautifull Virgins, among whom Roxane, afterward his Wife, was one: which although all the Macedonians disdained, yet none of them durst vse any freedome of speech after Clytus his death. From hence he directed his course towards India, hauing so increased his numbers, as they amounted to an hundred and twentie thousand armed men.

In the meane while he would needes bee honoured as a God: whereto that hee might allure the Macedonians, hee imploied two pernitious Parasites, Hegis and Gleo; whom Callisthenes opposed: For, among many other honest arguments vsed to the assembly, he told Cleo, That he thought, that Alexander would disdaine the gift of God-head from his Vassalls; That the opinion of Sanctity, though it did sometime follow the death of those, who in their life-time had done the greatest things, yet it neuer accompanied any one as yet liuing in the world. He further told him, That neither Hercules nor Bacchus were Deified at a banquet, and vpon drinke, (for this matter was propounded by Cleo at a carowsing feast) but that, for the more than manly acts by them performed while they lined, they were in future and succeeding Ages numbred among the gods. Alexander stood behinde a partition and heard all that was spoken, waiting but an opportunitie, to be reuenged on Callisthenes, who being a man of free speech, honest, learned, and a louer of the Kings honour, was yet soone after tormented to death, not for that he had betraied the King to others: but because hee neuer would condescend to betray the King to himselfe, as all his detestable flatterers did. For in a conspiracie against the King made by one Hermolaus and others (which they confest) he caused Callisthenes without confession, accusation, or triall, to be torne a-sunder vpon the racke: This deed, vnworthy of a King, Seneca thus censureth. Hoc est ALEXANDRI crimen æternum, quod nulla virtus, nulla bellorum fœlicitas redimet. Nam quotiens quis dixerit, Occidit Persarum multa millia: opponitur, & CALLISTHENEM: Quotiens dictum erit, Occidit DARIVM: opponitur, & CALLISTHENEM. Quotiens dictum erit, Omnia Oceano tenus vicit, ipsum quoque tentauit nouis classibus, & Imperium ex angulo Thraciæ vsque ad Orientis terminos protulit: dicetur, sed CALLISTHENEM occidit. Omnia licet antiqua Ducum Regumque exempla transierit, ex his quæ fecit nihil tam magnum erit quam scelus CALLISTHENES; This is the eternall crime of ALEXANDER, which no vertue nor felicity of his in Warre shall euer be able to redeeme. For as often as any man shall say, He slew many thousand Persians; it shall be replied, He did so, and he slew CALLISTHENES: When it shall be said, He slew DARIVS, it shall be replied, and CALLISTHENES; When it shall bee said, He wanne all as farre as to the very Ocean, thereon also he aduentured with vnusuall Navies, and extended his Empire from a corner of Thrace, to the vtmost bounds of the Orient, It shall be said withall; But he killed CALLLISTHENES. Let him haue out-gone all the ancient examples of Captaines and Kings; none of all his acts makes so much to his glory, as CALLISTHENES to his reproch.

§. XX.

Of ALEXANDERS iourney into India. The battaile betweene him and PORVS.

WIth the Armie before remembred, of one hundred and twenty thousand foot and horse, Alexander did enter the borders of India, where such of the Princes, as submitted themselues vnto him, hee entertained louingly, the rest hee constrained; killing Man, Woman, and Child, where they resisted. Hee then came before Nisa built by Bacchus, which after a few daies was rendred vnto him. From thence he remoued to a Hill at hand, which on the top had goodly Gardens filled with delicate fruits and Vines, dedicated to Bacchus, to whom he made feasts for ten daies together. Now when hee had drunke his fill, hee went on towards Dedala, and thence to Acadera,

Countries ſpoiled and abandoned by the Inhabitants, by reaſon whereof, victuals failing, he diuides his Armie: Ptolomie led one part, Cenon another, and himſelfe the reſt. They take many Townes, whereof that of greateſt fame was Mazage, which had in it three hundred thouſand men; but after ſome reſiſtance, it was yeelded vnto him by Cleophe the Queene, to whom againe he reſtored it; at the ſiege of this Citie he receiued a wound in the legge. After this, Nora was taken by Polyſperchon, and a Rocke of great ſtrength by himſelfe: he wanne alſo a paſſage vpon one Eryx, who was ſlaine by his companie, and his head preſented to Alexander. This is the ſumme of Alexanders doings in thoſe parts, before ſuch time as he arriued at the Riuer of Indus. Comming to Indus, he found there Epheſtion, who (being ſent before) had prepared boates for the tranſportation of his Army, and ere Alexanders arriuall, had perſwaded Omphis King of that part of the Country to ſubmit himſelfe to this great Conquerour. Therefore, ſoone vpon Alexanders comming, Omphis preſented himſelfe with all the ſtrength of his Country, and ſixe and fiftie Elephants, vnto him; offering him his ſeruice and aſſiſtance. Hee made Alexander know, that hee was an Enemie to the next two great Kings of that part of India, named Abiaſares and Porus; wherewith Alexander was not a little pleaſed, hoping by this diſvnion to make his owne victorie by farre the more eaſie. Hee preſented Alexander with a Crown of gold, ſo did he the reſt of his Commanders, and withal foureſcore talents of ſiluer coine, which Alexander not onely refuſed, but to ſhew that hee was couetous of glory, not of gold, he gaue Omphis a thouſand talents of his own treaſure, beſides other Perſian rarities. Abiaſares, hauing heard that Alexander had receiued his enemie Omphis into his protection, reſolued to make his owne peace alſo: For, knowing that his owne ſtrength did but equall that of Omphis, and that there was no other difference betweene them, than that which the chance of Warre gaue, he thought it an ill match when Alexander, who had alreadie beaten vnder foote all the greateſt Princes of Aſia, ſhould make himſelfe a Party and Head of the quarrell. So had Alexander none now to ſtand in his way but Porus, to whom he ſent a commandement, that he ſhould attend him at the border of his Kingdome, there to doe him homage. But from Porus hee receiued this manly anſwere; That hee would ſatisfie him in his firſt demand, which was to attend him on his borders, and that well accompanied; but for any other acknowledgement hee was reſolued to take counſell of his Sword. To be ſhort, Alexander reſolues to paſſe ouer the Riuer Hydaſpes, and to find Porus at his owne home. Porus attends him on the farther banke with thirtie thouſand foot, foureſcore and ten Elephants, and three hundred armed Chariots, and a great troupe of Horſe. If Darius had done the like on Tigris, Alexander had ſurely ſtaied ſomewhat longer ere he had ſeene India. The Riuer was foure furlongs broad, which makes halfe a mile, and withall deepe and ſwift. It had in it many Ilands, among which there was one well ſhadowed with wood, and of good capacitie. Alexander ſent Ptolomie vp the Riuer with a great part of the Armie, ſhrowding the reſt from the view of Porus: who by this deuice being drawne from his firſt incamping, ſets himſelfe downe oppoſite to Ptolomie, ſuppoſing that the whole Armie of Macedon meant to force their paſſage there. In the meane while Alexander recouers the farther ſhore without reſiſtance. He orders his troups and aduanceth towards Porus, who at firſt rather beleeues, that Abiaſares his Confederate (but now the Confederate of fortune) had been come ouer Hydaſpes to his aide, than that Alexander had paſt it. But he finds it otherwiſe, and ſends his Brother Hagis with foure thouſand horſe, and a hundred armed waggons to entertaine him. Each waggon had in it foure to fight, and two to guide it; but they were at this time of little vſe: for there had fallen ſo much raine, and thereby the fields were ſo moiſtned, as the horſes could hardly trot. The Scythians & Dahans had the Vantguard, who ſo galled theſe Indians, as they brake their reines, & other furniture, ouerturning the waggons, and thoſe in them. Perdiccas alſo gaue vp the Indian horſ-men, and the one & the other were forſt to recoile. Porus moues forward with groſſe of his Armie, that thoſe of his Vantguard ſcattered might recouer his Reare: Alexander being followed with Epheſtion, Ptolomie, and Perdiccas, tooke on him to charge the Indian horſe-men on the left wing, commanding Cenus or Cenon to inuade the right; Antigonus and Leonatus, hee directed to breake vpon Porus his battaile of foote, ſtrengthened with Elephants, Porus himſelfe being carried vpon one of them of the greateſt ſtature. By theſe beaſts the Macedonian foot were moſt offended; but the Archers and Darters being well guarded with the long and ſtrong Pikes of the Macedons, ſo galled them, as being inraged, they turned head, and ranne ouer the foote that followed them: In the end, and after a long and doubtfull fight, by the aduantage of weapon, and by the courage and skilfulneſſe of the Macedonian Captaines, the victorie fell to Alexander, who alſo farre exceeded Porus in number: for beſides the Macedonians and other Eaſterne and Northern Nations, Porus was aſſailed by his owne Confederate and Countrie people. Yet for his owne perſon he neuer gaue ground otherwiſe then with his ſword towards his enemies, till being weakened with many wounds, and abandoned by his army, he became a priſoner to the Conqueror, from whom againe he receiued his eſtate with a great enlargement.

§. XXI.

How ALEXANDER finiſhed his expedition, and returned out of India.

I Forbeare to trouble my ſelfe and others with a friuolous diſcourſe of Serpents, Apes and Peacocks, which the Macedonians found in theſe their trauailes: or of thoſe pettie Wars which Alexander made betweene the ouerthrow of Porus, and his ſailing downe the Riuer of Indus. The deſcriptions of places about the head and branches thereof are better knowne vnto vs in this Age, by meanes of our late Nauigations into thoſe parts, than they were in any former times. The magnificence and riches of thoſe Kings we could in no ſort be perſwaded to beleeue, till our owne experience had taught vs, that there were many ſtranger things in the World, than are to bee ſeene betweene London and Staines.

Our great traueller Mandeuile, who died in the yeere 1372. and had ſeene ſo much of the World, and of the Eaſt India, wee accompted the greateſt fabler of the World; yet had he another reputation among other Nations, as well able to iudge as we. Witneſſe the Monument made of him in the Couent of the Friers Guillimins in Liege, where the religious of that place keepe ſome things of his, Comme pour honorable memoire de ſon Excellence; For an honourable memorie of his Excellencie, ſaith Guichardine. Guic. in Diſc. of the Low Countries.

The Countries towards the Springs of Indus, and where thoſe many Riuers of Hydaſpes, Zaradris, Aceſines, and the reſt, fall into the maine ſtreame, are now poſſeſt by the great Mogor, the ninth from Tamberlane, who commands all that tract betweene Perſia and Indus towards the Weſt, as alſo a great extent of Countrie towards Ganges. In the mouth of Indus, the Aſcenſion, a ſhip of London, ſuffered ſhipwracke, in the yeere 1609. and ſome of the company trauailed ouer Land till they came to Agra, the ſame great Citie (as I take it) which our later Coſmographers call Nagra, being named of old Dionyſopolis.

Phyloſtratus in the life of Apollonius Tyaneus, ſpeaking of the expedition of Bacchus and Hercules into the Eaſt India, tells vs, that thoſe two great Captaines (whom Alexander ſought by all meanes to out-fame) when they indeuored to ſubiect vnto them the Oxydracæ, a people inhabiting betweene the Riuers of Hyphaſis and Ganges, they were beaten from the aſſault of their cities with thunder and lightnings. This may well be vnderſtood by the great Ordinance that thoſe people had then in vſe. For it is now certainely known, that the great Kings of the vttermoſt Eaſt, haue had the vse of the Canon, many hundreds of yeeres since, and euen since their first ciuilitie and greatnesse, which was long before Alexanders time. But Alexander pierst not so farre into the East. It sufficed, that hauing alreadie ouer-wearied his Armie, hee discouered the rest of India by fame. The Indian Kings whom he had subdued, informed him, that a Prince called Aggramenes, who commanded many Nations beyond the Riuer of Ganges, was the powerfullest King of all those Regions: and that he was able to bring into the field two hundred thousand Foot, three thousand Elephants, twentie thousand Horse, and two thousand armed Chariots. With this report, though Alexander were more inflamed, than euer to proceede in this discouerie and conquest, yet all the art he had, could not perswade the Souldiers to wander ouer those great deserts beyond Indus and Ganges, more terrible vnto them than the greatest Armie that the East could gather. Yet at the last contented they were, after many perswasiue Orations, to follow him towards the South, to discouer such part of the Ocean Sea, as was neerer at hand, whereunto the Riuer of Indus was their infallible guide. Alexander seeing that it would be no otherwise, deuised a prettie tricke, wherewith he hoped to beguile posteritie, and make himselfe seeme greater than he was. He enlarged his Campe, made greater trenches, greater cabbines for the Souldiers, greater Horse-stalles, and higher mangers than his Horses could feede in. He caused all furniture of Men and Horses to bee made larger than would serue for vse; and scattered these Armours and Bridles about his Campe, to be kept as reliques, and wondred at by the Sauages. Proportionable to these he raised vp twelue great Altars to be the monument of his iournies end. This was a readie way to encrease the fame of his bignesse; to his greatnesse it could adde nothing saue a suspition, that it was lesse than is thought, seeing he stroue so earnestly to make it thought more than it was.

This done, he returned againe to the banke of Acesines, and there determined to set vp his fleet where Acesines and Hydaspis incounter, where to testifie by a surer monument, how farre he had past towards the East, he built by those riuers two Cities: the one he called Nicea, and the other Bucephalon, after the name of his beloued Horse Bucephalus. Here againe he receiued a fourth supply of sixe thousand Thracian Horse-men, seuen thousand Foot, and from his Lieutenant at Babylon fiue and twentie thousand Armours, garnished with siluer and gold, which hee distributed among his Souldiers. About these Riuers he wanne many Townes, and committed great slaughter on those that resisted; It is then written of him, that assaulting a Citie of the Oxidracans, he lept from the top of the wall into it, and fought, I know not how long, against all the Inhabitants; tales like those of Beuis of Southampton, friuolous and incredible. Finally, hee past downe the Riuer with his fleete, at which time also the newes came vnto him of a rebellion in Bactria, and then of the arriuall of an hundred Embassadours from a King of India, who submitted himself vnto him. He feasted these Embassadours vpon a hundred beds of gold, with all the sumptuosity that could bee deuised, who soone after their dispatch returned againe with a present of three hundred Horse, one hundred and thirtie Waggons, and to each foure Horses, a thousand Targets, with many other things rare and rich.

Their entertainments ended, he sailes towards the South, passeth through many obscure Nations, which did all yeeld vnto him either quietly, or compelled by force: among these he builded another Alexandria. Of many places which he took in this passage, Samus was one, the Inhabitants whereof fought against him with poisoned Swords, with one of which Ptolomie (afterward King of Ægypt) was wounded, and cured by an hearbe which Alexander dreamt that he had seene in the mouth of a Serpent.

When he came neere the out-let of Indus (being ignorant of the tides of the Sea) his Gallies as they were on a sudden shuffled one vpon another by the Floud, so on the Ebbe they were left on the drie ground, and on the sandie bankes of the Riuer, uer, wherewith the Macedonians were much amazed, but after he had a few daies obſerued wel the courſe of the Sea, he paſt out of the riuers mouth ſome few miles, and after Sacrifices offered to Neptune returned: and the better to informe himſelfe, he ſent Nearchus and Oneſicritus, to diſcouer the coaſt towards the mouth of Euphrates. Arrianus in the beginning of his ſixt Booke hath written this paſſage downe the Riuer of Indus at length, with the manner of the Veſſels, in which hee tranſported his Army, the Commanders that were vſed therein, and other the maruellous prouiſions made.

Neere the out-lets of this Riuer, he ſpent ſome part of the Winter, and in eighteene daies march from thence recouered Gedroſia, in which paſſage his Armie ſuffered ſuch miſerie for want of foode, that of a hundred and twentie thouſand foot, and twelue thouſand horſe, which he carried into India, not the fourth part returned aliue.

§. XXII.

Of ALEXANDERS Riot, Crueltie, and death.

FRom Gedroſia, Alexander led his Armie into Carmania, and ſo drawing neere to Perſia, hee gaue himſelfe wholly to feaſting and drinking, imitating the triumphs of Bacchus. And though this Swiniſh vice bee hatefull enough in it ſelfe, yet it alwaies inflamed this King to Crueltie. For (ſaith Curtius) the Hang-man followed the feaſt, for ASPASTES one of his Prouinciall Gouernors he commanded to be ſlaine, ſo as neither did the exceſſe of voluptuouſneſſe qualifie his crueltie, nor his crueltie hinder in ought his voluptuouſneſſe.

While he refreſhed his Army in theſe parts, a new ſupply of fiue thouſand foote and a thouſand horſe, was brought him by Cleander, and his fellowes, that had been imploied in the killing of Parmenio. Againſt theſe Murderers great complaint was made by the Deputies of the Prouinces, in which they had commanded; and their offences were ſo outragious, as Alexander was perſwaded, that, had they not altogether deſpaired of his returne out of India, they durſt not haue committed them. All men were glad of the occaſion, remembring the vertue of him, whom they had ſlaughtered. The end was, That Cleander, and the other chiefe, with ſixe hundred Souldiers by them imploied, were deliuered ouer to the Hang-man: euery one reioycing that the Ire of the King was at laſt executed on the miniſters of his Ire.

Nearchus and Oneſicritus were now returned from the coaſt, and made report of an Iland rich in gold, and of other ſtrange things; whereupon they were commanded to make ſome farther diſcouerie: which done, that they ſhould enter the mouth of Euphrates, and finde the King at Babylon.

As he drew neere to Babylon, he viſited the Sepulchre of Cyrus in Paſargada, now called Chelquera: where he was preſented with many rich gifts by Orſines, one of the Princes of Perſia, of the race of Cyrus. But becauſe Bagoas, an Eunuch in eſpeciall fauour with the King, was neglected, he not only practiſed certaine looſe fellowes to witneſſe againſt Orſines, that he had robbed Cyrus tomb, for which he was condemned to die; but he aſſiſted the Hang-man with his owne handes in tormenting him. At which time alſo Alexander cauſed Phradates to be ſlaine, ſuſpecting his greatnes. Cæperat (ſaith CVRTIVS) eſſe præceps ad repræſentanda ſupplicia, item ad deteriora credenda; He began head-longly to ſhed bloud, and to beleeue falſe reports. It is true, that he tooke a way to make all men wearie of his gouernement, ſeeing crueltie is more fearefull, than all the aduentures that can be made againſt it.

Arrianus hath a farre different deſcription of Cyrus Tombe.

At this time it is ſaid, that Calanus the Philoſopher burnt himſelfe, when hee had liued threeſcore and thirteene yeeres. Whether herein he followed the cuſtome of his Countrie, being an Indian, Or ſought to preuent the griefe and incommoditie of elder age,it is vncertaine: but in this the Historians agree,that fore-seeing and foreshewing Alexanders death,he promised to meete him shortly after at Babylon.

From Pasargada he came to Susa, where hee married Statira, Darius his eldest Daughter, giuing her younger sister to his beloued Ephestion, and fourescore other Persian Ladies to his Captaines. There were sixe thousand guests inuited to the feast,to each of which he gaue a cup of gold.Here there came vnto him three thousand yong souldiers out of his conquered Prouinces,wherat the Macedonians greatly murmured.Harpalus,his Treasurer in Babylon,hauing lauishly consumed the monies in his keeping,got him going with fiue thousand talents,and sixe thousand hired Souldiers,but he was reiected in Greece,and there slaine. Alexander greatly reioyced at the fidelitie of the Greeks,whom Harpalus with these forces and treasures could not stirre: yet he sent commandement,that they should againe receiue their banished men, whereunto (fearefull of his indignation) all submitted themselues, (except the Athenians) though they resolued,that it was a manifest preparation towards their bondage. After this there followed a maruellous discontentmēt in his Army,because he had resolued to send into Macedon all those old Souldiers which could no longer indure the trauell of Warre,and to keepe the rest in Asia. He vsed many orations to satisfie them,but it was in vaine during the tempest of their fury. But afterward,as Whales are drawne to the Land with a twine threed, when they haue tumbled a while, so are the vnconsiderate multitude easily conducted when their first passions are evaporate. With such as were licenced to depart,he sent Craterus, to whom he gaue the Lieutenantship of Macedon,Thessaly, and Thrace,which Antipater had held from his first departure out of Europe, who had beaten the rebellious Greeks in his absence,discharged the trust committed vnto him with great fidelity,and sent him so many strong supplies into Asia from time to time. Certainely,if Alexander had not taken counsel of his cups,he would haue cast some better colour on this alteration,and giuen Antipater a stronger reason for his remoue, than to haue imploied him in the conduction of a new supply to be brought him to Babylon,the warre being now at an ende. For Antipater saw nothing in this remoue,but the Kings disposition to send him after Parmenio,and the rest. With this Antipater,the King, notwithstanding his great courage, had no great appetite to grapple: Princes,though iealous,doe not stand in doubt of euery man ill-affected though valiant: but there is a kind of Kingly courage, compounded of hardinesse and vnderstanding,which is many times so fearefull vnto them,as they take leaue both of Law and Religion,to free themselues thereof.

After he had sent for Antipater, he made a iourney into Media to settle things there; where Ephestion,whom he fauoured most of all men,dies. The King according to the greatnesse of his loue, laments his losse; hangs his Phisicion; and bestowes vpon his Monument twelue thousand talents: After which he returnes to Babylon. Thither Antipater came not, but sent; and not to excuse himselfe, but to free himselfe.For if we beleeue Curtius (whom Plutarch and others gaine-say) Antipater by his Sonnes,Cassander,Philip, and Iolla,who waited on Alexanders cup, gaue him poison,Thessalus (who was of the conspiracie) hauing inuited him to a drinking feast of purpose. For after he had taken a carouse in Hercules his cup, a draught of drinke stronger than Hercules himselfe,he quitted the World within a few daies.

Certainely the Princes of the World haue seldome found good,by making their ministers ouer-great,and therby suspicious to themselues.For he that doth not acknowledge fidelitie to be a debt, but is perswaded,that Kings ought to purchase it from their Vassals,will neuer please himselfe with the price giuen. The only restoratiue,indeed, that strengthens it,is the goodnes and vertue of the Prince,and his liberality makes it more diligent; so as proportion and distance be obserued.It may be that Antipater hauing commanded two or three Kingdoms twelue yeeres,knew not now how to play any other part;no more than Cæsar did,after he had so long a time gouerned the Gaules,where he vtterly forgat the art of obedience.A most cruel and vngratefull traitor Antipater was, if Curtius doe not belie him: For though he feared ſome ill meaſure vpon his remoue (the Tragedies of Parmenio, Clytus, and Calliſthenes, hauing been ſo lately acted) yet hee knew nothing to the contrarie, but that the King had reſolued to haue giuen him ſome other great gouernement in Aſia: The old Souldiers thence returned, hauing perchance deſired to be gouerned by Craterus, whom they had followed in all the former Warre.

§. XXIII.

Of ALEXANDERS Perſon and qualities.

MOwſoeuer it were, Alexanders former cruelties cannot bee excuſed, no more than his vanitie to be eſteemed the ſonne of Iupiter, with his exceſsiue delight in drinke and drunkenneſſe, which others make the cauſe of his feuer and death. In that hee lamented his want of enterpriſing, and grieued to conſider what hee ſhould doe when hee had conquered the World, Auguſtus Cæſar found juſt cauſe to deride him, as if the well gouerning of ſo many Nations & Kingdomes, as he had alreadie conquered, could not haue offered him matter more than aboundant, to buſie his braines withall. That he was both learned and a louer of learning, it cannot bee doubted. S^r Francis Bacon, in his firſt booke of the aduancement of learning, hath proued it ſufficiently. His liberalitie I know not how to praiſe, becauſe it exceeded proportion. It is ſaid, That when he gaue a whole Citie to one of his Seruants, He, to whom it was giuen, did out of modeſtie refuſe it, as diſproportionable to his fortune: to whom Alexander replyed, That hee did not enquire what became him to accept, but the King to giue: of which SENECA; Animoſa vox videtur & regia, cum ſit ſtultiſſima. Nihil enim per ſe quenquam decet. Refert, quid, cui, quando, quare, vbi, &c ſine quibus facti ratio non conſtabit; habeatur perſonarũ & dignitatum proportio, & cum ſit vbiq; virtutis modus, æque peccat quod excedit, quã quod deficit; It ſeemes a braue & royall ſpeech, whereas indeede it is very fooliſh. For nothing ſimply conſidered by it ſelfe beſeemes a man. Wee muſt regard what, to whom, when, why, where, and the like; without which conſiderations no act can be approued. Let honours be proportioned vnto the perſons: for whereas vertue is euer limited by meaſure, the exceſſe is as faultie as the defect. L.2.de Ben.c.1.

For his Perſon, it is very apparant, That he was as valiant as any man, a diſpoſition taken by it ſelfe, not much to be admired; For I am reſolued that hee had ten thouſand in his Armie as daring as himſelfe. Surely, if aduenturous natures were to be commended ſimply, wee ſhould confound that vertue with the hardineſſe of Theeues, Ruffians, and maſtife Dogges. For certainely it is no way praiſe-worthie but in daring good things, and in the performance of thoſe lawfull enterpriſes, in which we are imployed for the ſeruice of our Kings and Common-weales.

If we compare this great Conquerour with other Troublers of the World, who haue bought their glorie with ſo great deſtruction, and effuſion of bloud, I thinke him farre inferiour to Cæſar, and many other that liued after him, ſeeing hee neuer vndertooke any warlike Nation, the naked Scythians excepted, nor was euer encountred with any Armie of which he had not a moſt maſtring aduantage, both of weapons and of Commanders, euery one of his Fathers old Captaines by farre exceeding the beſt of his Enemies. But it ſeemeth, Fortune and Deſtinies (if we may vſe thoſe termes) had found out and prepared for him, without any care of his owne, both heaps of Men, that willingly offered their necks to the yoke, and Kingdomes, that inuited and called in their owne Conquerours. For concluſion, we will agree with Seneca, who ſpeaking of Philip the Father, and Alexander the Sonne, giues this judgement of them. Quod non minores fuere peſtes mortalium quàm inundatio, qua planum omne perfuſum eſt, quàm conflagratio qua magna pars animantium exarſit; That Natur. quæſt. l.3.q.1.

CHAP. III.

The raigne of ARIDÆVS.

§. I.

Of the question about succession to ALEXANDER.

THE death of Alexander left his Armie (as Demades the Athenian then compared it) in such case, as was that monstrous Giant Polyphemus, hauing lost his only eye. For, that which is reported in fables of that great Cyclops, might well be verified of the Macedonians: their force was intolerable, but for want of good guidance vneffectuall, and harmefull chiefly to themselues. The causes whereof (vnder the diuine ordinance) were, partly the vncertainetie of Title to succession in the Kingdome of Macedon, partly the stubborne pride of Alexander himself, who thinking none worthy to bee his Heire, did refuse to establish the right in any one, leauing euery one to his owne fortune: but especially the great ambition of his followers, who all had learned of their Master to suffer no equals; a lesson soone taught vnto spirits reflecting vpon their owne worth, when the reuerence of a greater obiect faileth.

It hath formerly beene shewed, That Philip (the Father of Alexander) gouerning in Macedon as Protector, assumed vnto himselfe the Kingdome, not rendring it vnto Amyntas, (the Sonne of his elder brother Perdiccas) when he grew to mans estate; but only bestowing vpon him in marriage a Daughter of his owne: by which bond, and much more by his proper strength, he assured the Crowne vnto himselfe: Amyntas neuer attempting ought against Philip; though (with price of his life) hee did against Alexander in the beginning of his raigne. Wherefore Eurydice the sole issue of his marriage, ought in reason to haue beene acknowledged Queene after Alexander; as hauing better Title thereto, than either He or Philip had, when they liued, vnlesse (peraduenture) some Law of that Nation forbade the raigne of women. But the excellent vertue of those two Princes had vtterly defaced the right of all Pretenders, not claiming from their owne bodies: and so great were their conquests, that Macedon it selfe was (in regard of them) a very small Appendix, and no way deseruing to be laied in ballance against the demand of their posteritie, had they left any able to make challenge of the Royall seate.

Alexander hauing taken many wiues, had issue by none of the principall of them. Barsine the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian had borne vnto him a yong Sonne: and Roxane the Daughter of Oxyartes (whom he had more solemnely married) was left by him great with child. But the baseneſse of the Mothers, and contempt of the conquered Nations, was generally alleaged in Barre of the Plea made for them, by some that would (perhaps) haue wrought out their owne ends, vnder the name of Alexanders children.

Cleopatra

Cleopatra the ſiſter of Alexander, widdow to the King of Epirus, and Aridæus his baſe brother (ſonne to Philip by a Concubine of no account) who had married the Ladie Eurydice before mentioned, were next in courſe. Of Cleopatra there was no ſpeech, which may giue ſuſpicion, that either Law or Cuſtome had made that ſexe vncapable of the Soueraignetie. Aridæus (beſides his baſtardie) was neither for perſon nor qualitie fit to rule as King; yet vpon him the election fell, but ſlowly, and (as happeneth often) for lack of a better: when the Counſailors hauing ouer-labored their diſagreeing wits in deuiſing what was beſt, were content for very wearineſſe to take what came next to hand.

Ptolomie (ſoone after King of Ægypt) concurring with them who reiected all mention of the halfe-Perſian broode, King Alexanders children, was of opinion, that the rule of all ſhould be giuen to the Captaines, that going for law which by the greater part of them ſhould be decreed: ſo farre was hee from acknowledging any one as true Heire to the Crowne.

This Ptolomie was called the ſonne of Lagus, but reputed of Philip: who hauing vſed the company of Arſinoë Ptolomeis mother, deliuered her in marriage to Lagus being great with child. Therefore, whether it were ſo, that he hoped well to worke his owne fortune out of thoſe diſſenſions, which are incident vnto the conſultations of many ambitious men, equall in place, forcing them at length to redeeme their quiet with ſubiection to one, deſeruing regard by his bloud, and truſt for his euen carriage; or whether hee deſired onely to get a ſhare to himſelfe, which could not haue come to paſſe, had all beene giuen to one: plaine enough it is, that he thought not on preferring Aridæus before himſelfe; and therefore gaue ſuch counſaile as fitted his owne and other mens purpoſes. Yea, this deuice of his tooke place in deede, though not in forme as he had propounded it: For, it was in effect all one, to haue aſſembled at Alexanders emptie chaire, as Ptolomie had conceiued the forme of their conſultations, or to ſet in the chaire ſuch a King as Aridæus, no wiſer then the chaire it ſelfe. Alſo the controuerſies ariſing were determined by the greater part of the Captaines; by the greater part, if not in number, yet in puiſſance.

But as theſe counterfait ſhewes of diſſembling aſpirers, doe often take check by the plaine dealing of them, who dare to goe more directly to worke: ſo was it like to haue fared with Ptolomie and the reſt, when Ariſtonus, another of the Captaines, interpreted the words of Alexander; ſaying, That he left his Kingdome to the worthieſt, as deſigning Perdiccas, to whom (lying at the point of death) hee deliuered his ring. It ſeemed good in reaſon, that Alexander ſhould bee diſpoſer of his owne purchaſes; and thoſe tokens of Alexanders purpoſe appeared plaine enough, ſo long as no man would interpoſe another conſtruction: euery one being vncertaine how the ſecret affections of the reſt might be inclined. Many therefore, either out of their loue, or becauſe they would not be of the lateſt, vrged Perdiccas to take vpon him the eſtate Royall. He was no ſtranger to the Royall bloud; yet his birth gaue him not ſuch reputation, as the great fauour of his dead King, with whom hee had beene very inward, and that eſpecially ſince the death of Epheſtian (a powerfull Minion) into whoſe place he was choſen. For his owne worth hee might well bee commended, as a good man of Warre, and one that had giuen much proofe of his priuate valour. But very ſurly hee was: which qualitie (joyned with good fortune) carried a ſhew of Majeſtie: being checkt with miſaduenture, it was called by a true name Pride; and rewarded with death.

In the preſent buſineſſe a fooliſh ouer-weening did him as great harme, as it had beene great happineſſe to haue ſucceeded Alexander. For not content to haue the acclamation of the Souldiers, approuing the ſentence of Ariſtonus, he would needs counterfait modeſtie; thinking that euery one of the Princes would haue intreated him to take the waightie burden of an Empire, which would bee the leſſe enuious, the more ſolemnity he vſed in the acceptance. It is truely ſaid, He that faineth himſelfe a ſheepe, may chance to be eaten by a Wolfe. Meleager, (a man by nature enuious, uious, and bearing a particular hatred to Perdiccas) tooke aduantage of his irresolute behauiour, and very bitterly inueighed against him. In conclusion, he pronounced, that whosoeuer was Heire to the Crowne, the Souldiers ought to be Heires to the treasure; and therefore he inuited them, who were nothing slow, to share it. This disturbed all the Consultation. The Captaines were left alone, farre enough from agreeing, and not able to haue brought any conclusion to good effect without consent of the Souldiers, who greedie of spoile thronged about Meleager.

§. II.

The election of ARIDÆVS, with the troubles there-about arising; the first diuision of the Empire.

DVring this vp-rore, mention was made of Aridæus by some one, and entertained with good liking of many, vntill at last it grew to the voice of the Armie. Meleager hauing with-drawne himselfe tumultuously from the company of the Lords, was glad of so faire an occasion to make himselfe great: therefore he produced Aridæus, commended him to the Souldiers, who called him by his Fathers name Philip, and brought him into the Palace, inuesting him in Alexanders Robes, and proclaiming him King. Many of the Nobles withstood this election, but in vaine: for they could not resolue what course to follow, reiecting this. Only Python, a hot-headed man, tooke vpon him to proclaime the Sonne of Alexander by Roxane, according to the counsaile which Perdiccas at first had giuen, appointing Perdiccas and Leonatus his Protectors. But this child was not yet borne, which made that attempt of Python vaine. Finally, Perdiccas with fiue hundred men, and Ptolomie with the Kings Pages tooke vpon them to defend the place where Alexanders bodie lay: but the Armie conducted by Meleager, who carried the new King about whither he listed, easily brake in vpon them, & inforced them to accept Aridæus for their Soueraigne Lord. Then by the interceſſion of the ancient Captaines, a reconciliation was propounded and admitted, but on neither side faithfully meant.

Leonatus, who was of the Roiall bloud, a goodly Gentleman and valiant, issued out of Babylon, being followed by all the horse, which consisted (for the most part) of the Nobilitie. Perdiccas abode in the Citie (but standing vpon his guard) that he might be readie to take the opportunitie of any commotion, that should happen among the infantrie, The King (who was gouerned by Meleager) commanded or gaue leaue to haue Perdiccas made away; which attempt succeeded ill, being neither secretly carried, nor committed to sure executioners. Their comming was not vnexpected: and they were by Perdiccas rebuked with such grauitie, that they departed honester than they came; being sorrie of their bad enterprise. Vpon the newes of this attempt the campe was in an vp-rore, which the King seeking to pacifie, wanted authoritie, as hauing newly got the Crowne by them, and holding it by their courtesie. The matter it selfe affoorded no good excuses, and his indiscretion made them worse. He said, that no harme was done, for Perdiccas was aliue: but their exclamations were against the tyrannous enterprise, which hee imputed to Meleager; abandoning the surest of his friends to the rage of the multitude, who were not appeased, vntill the King by offering to resigne his estate vnto them, renued out of their pittie that fauourable affection, which had moued them to set him vp at the first.

Perdiccas hauing now ioyned himselfe with Leonatus, kept the fields, intending to cut off all prouision of victuals from the Citie. But after sundrie Embassies passing betweene the King and the Nobles, (they requiring to haue the Authors of sedition giuen vp into their handes; the King, that Meleager might bee ioyned with Leonatus and Perdiccas, as a Third in gouernement of the Armie) things were compounded according to the Kings deſire. Meleager ſhould haue done well to conſider, that ſuch men as had one day demanded his head, were not like the day following to giue him a principall place among them without any new occaſion offered, had not ſome purpoſe of treacherie lurked vnder their great facilitie. Generall peace was renewed, and much loue proteſted where little was intended. The face of the Court was the ſame which it had beene in Alexanders time: but no longer now did the ſame heart giue it life; and windie ſpirits they were which moued in the arteries. Falſe reports were giuen out by appointment of Perdiccas, tending to his owne diſgrace; but in ſuch termes as might ſeeme to haue proceeded from Meleager: who finding part of the drift, but not all, tooke it as an injurie done to himſelfe; and (as deſirous of a true friendſhip) deſired of Perdiccas, that ſuch authors of diſcord might bee puniſhed. Perdiccas (as a louer of peace) did well approue the motion; and therefore agreed that a generall Muſter ſhould bee made, at which time the diſturbers of the common quiet ſhould receiue their puniſhment (as was the manner for Souldiers offending) in preſence of the Armie. The plot was miſchieuouſly laied: Had Meleager giuen way to ſeditious rumours, he muſt needs haue incurred the generall hatred of all, as a ſower of diſſenſion; and thereby with publike approbation might haue beene cut off, as hauing often offended in that kinde: his Prince being too weake a Patron. Now ſeeking redreſſe of theſe diſorders, he haſtened his owne ruine, by a leſſe formall, but more ſpeedie way. This kinde of Muſter was very ſolemne, and practiſed with many ceremonies, as for cleanſing of the Armie. The Horſe-men, the Elephants, the Macedonian foot, the Mercinaries, were each according to their qualitie ſet in array, a part from others, as if they had beene of ſundrie ſorts, met at aduenture: which done, the manner was to skirmiſh (as by way of exerciſe) according to direction of their ſeuerall Captaines. But at that time the great battaile of Macedonian Pikes, which they called the Phalanx, led by Meleager, was of purpoſe beſtowed in a ground of diſaduantage; and the countenance of the horſe and Elephants beginning to giue charge vpon them, was ſuch, as diſcouered no jeſting paſtime nor good intent. Kings were alwaies wont to fight among the horſemen: of which cuſtome Perdiccas made great vſe that day, to the vtter confuſion of his enemies. For Aridæus was alwaies gouerned by him, which for the preſent had him in poſſeſsion. Two or three daies before he had ſought the death of Perdiccas at the inſtigation of Meleager: now he rides with Perdiccas vp and downe about the foot-men, commanding them to deliuer vnto the death all ſuch as Perdiccas required. Three hundred they were who were caſt vnto the Elephants, and by them ſlaine, in the preſence of the King, who ſhould haue defended them, and of their affrighted companions. But theſe three hundred were not the men whoſe puniſhment Meleager had expected: they were ſuch as had followed him, when he diſturbed the firſt conſultation that was held about the election of a new King, and ſome of them his eſpeciall friends. Hauing therefore kept himſelfe quiet a while, as vnwilling to giue offence to them which had the aduantage; when hee ſaw their proceedings tend very manifeſtly to his deſtruction, he fled away into a Temple, which he found no Sanctuarie: for thither they ſent and ſlew him.

Leonatus

The Armie being thus corrected was led into the Citie, where a new Councell of the Princes was held, who finding what manner of man their King was, diuided all the Prouinces of the Empire among themſelues; leauing to Aridæus the office of a Viſitor, and yet making Perdiccas his Protector, and Commander of the forces remaining with him. Then were the funerals of Alexander thought vpon; whoſe bodie hauing beene ſeuen daies neglected, was opened, and embalmed by the Ægyptians: no ſigne of poiſon appearing, how great ſoeuer the ſuſpition might bee. The charge of his buriall was committed to Aridæus: one of the Captaines, who was two yeeres preparing of great and coſtly ſhew, making a ſtately Chariot in which the corps was laid; many coarſes of his friends being laied in the ground, before that of Alexander was bestowed in Alexandria, a Citie of his owne building in Ægypt.

§. III.

The beginning of the Lamian Warre.

WHilest these things were in doing, or presently after, Antipater and Craterus, two principall Noble-men, and inferiour to none of Alexanders followers, if not greater than any of the rest, were busied in Greece with a Warre, which the Athenians more bravely than wisely had begunne in Alexanders life, but now did prosecute more boldly than before, vpon the courage which they had taken by his death. Alexander, not long before he died, had commanded that all the banished Greekes (few excepted) should be restored vnto their former places. Hee knew the factious qualitie of the Græcian Estates, and therefore thought so to prouide, that in euery Citie hee would haue a sure partie. But it fell out otherwise: For he lost the hearts of many more than hee wanne by this proud injunction. His pleasure indeede was fulfilled; yet not without great murmuring of the whole Nation, as being against all order of Law, and a beginning of open tyrannie. The Athenians greatly decayed in estate, but retaining more, than was needfull, of their ancient spirits, forbade the execution of this decree in their Dominions; so did also the Ætolians, who were valiant men, and inhabited a Region well fortified by nature: yet neither of them tooke Armes, but seemed to beare themselues, as men that had done no more then they might well justifie by reason: neuertheless to preuent the worst, the Athenians gaue secret instructions to Leosthenes a Captaine of theirs, willing him to leauie an Armie, but in his owne name, and to keepe it in a readinesse for their vse. This was no hard thing for Leosthenes to doe: great numbers of Greeke Souldiers being lately returned from the Asian Warre in poore estate, as defrauded of their pay by the Captaines. Of these he had gathered vp eight thousand, when the certaine newes were brought of Alexanders death: at which time the Citie of Athens declared it selfe, and more honorably than wisely, proclaimed open Warre against the Macedonians, for the libertie of Greece. Hereupon Leosthenes drew in the Ætolians, and some other Estates, gaue battaile to the Bœotians, who sided with Antipater, and ouerthrew them; growing so fast in reputation, and so strong in Adherents; That Antipater (arming in all haste, yet suspecting his owne strength) was faine to send into Asia to Craterus for succour.

Nothing is more vaine than the feares and hopes of men, shunning or pursuing their destinies a-farre off, which deceiue all mortall wisdome, euen when they seeme neere at hand. One moneth was scarcely past, since nothing so heauily burthened the thoughts of Antipater as the returne of Craterus into Macedon; which hee then feared as death, but now desired as the most likely assurance of his life. Craterus, whom Alexander held as of all men the most assured vnto him, was sent into Macedon to conueigh home the old Souldiers (that was the pretence) and to succeed Antipater in the gouernement of Macedon and Greece. The suspicions were strong that he had a priuie charge to put Antipater to death: neither did that which was commonly published sound much better; which was, That Antipater should bee sent vnto the King, as Captaine of the yong Souldiers, newly to bee leauied in Europe. For Alexander was much incensed against him by his Mother Olympias: and would sometimes giue out speeches testifying his owne jealousie and hatred of him; but yet he stroue to smother it, which in a cruell Prince betokeneth little good. Few of Alexanders Lieutenants had escaped with life: most of them indeede were meane persons in regard of those who followed him in his Indian expedition, and were therefore (perhaps) remoued to make place for their betters. But if the Kings rigour gour was such, as could finde rebellious purposes (for so hee interpreted euen lewd gouernement) in base persons; little might Antipater hope for, who hauing sitten Viceroy ten yeeres in the strongest part of the Empire, was called away to the presence of so fell a Master, and the enuie of a Court, wherein they had beene his inferiors, which would now repine to see him their equall. Therefore whether his feare drew him to preuention, working first the Kings death by poison, giuen by his Son Iolaus, Alexanders cup-bearer; or whether it brake not forth vntill opportunitie had changed it into the passion of reuenge, which was cruelly performed by his Sonne Cassander: great cause of much feare he had, which I note in this place, as the ground of effects to be produced in very few yeeres.

At the present Craterus was sent for, and all the Captaines of companies lying neere, sollicited to make haste. Not without cause. For in Macedon there could not at that time be raised more than thirteene thousand foot, and sixe hundred horse; which Muster was of raw Souldiers, all the force of the Countrie being emptied into Asia. The Thessalians indeede who had long stood firme for Philip and Alexander, who also were the best horse-men of Greece, furnished him with very braue troupes, that might haue done great seruice, had their faith held out, which they changed for the libertie of Greece. With these forces did Antipater in Thessalie trie the fortune of a battaile with Leosthenes; rather (as may seeme) fearing the increase of his enemies power and rebellion of the Greekes, (were they not checkt at the first) than presuming on his owne strength. For Leosthenes had of Athenians, Ætolians, and Mercinaries, two & twentie thousand foot, besides the assistance of many petty Signories, and of some Illyrians, and Thracians: of horse hee brought into the field about two thousand and fiue hundred; but ouer-strong he was that way also, when once the Thessalians had reuolted vnto him. So Antipater lost the day: and his losse was such, that he neither was able to keepe the field, nor to make a safe retraite into his owne Countrie: therefore he fled into the Towne of Lamia, which was well fortified, and well prouided of all things necessarie to beate out a siege. Thither did Leosthenes follow him, present him battaile againe, and vpon the refusall close vp the Towne with earth-workes, and a wall. There will wee leaue him for a while, trauailing in the last honourable enterprise that euer was vnder-taken by that great Citie of Athens.

How PERDICCAS employed his Armie.

KIng Aridæus liuing vnder the rule of Perdiccas, when all the Princes were gone each to his owne Prouince, kept a naked Court: all his greatnesse consisting in a bare title, supported by the strength of his Protector, who cared not for him otherwise than to make vse of him. Perdiccas had no Prouince of his owne peculiar, neither was he like to be welcome to any whom he should visit in his Gouernement. A stronger Armie then any of the rest he had, which he might easily hope in that vnsettled condition of things to make better worth to him, than many Prouinces could haue been. The better to accomplish his desires, he closely sought the marriage of Cleopatra, the sister of Alexander; yet about the same time hee either married Nicæa the Daughter of Antipater, or made such loue to her as blinded their eies, who did not somewhat narrowly search into his doings.

Ariarathes the Cappadocian, the second of that name, and tenth King of that Countrie, had continued faith full to the Persian Empire as long as it stood: following the example of his forefathers, euen from Pharnaces the first that raigned in Cappadocia, who married Atossa sister to the great Cyrus. Some of his Ancestors had (indeede) beene oppressed by the Persians: but what Fortune tooke from them at one time, Vertue restored at another, and their faithfull Princes had much increased all. But now in the fatall Period of so great an Empire, with much wisedome, and (Darius being slaine) with sufficient honour, he might haue acknowledged the Macedonian in the Persians roome. This hee did not; neither did Alexander call him to account, being occupied with greater cares. But Perdiccas, who had no greater businesse wherein to entertaine his Armie, found it expedient both for the honour of the Empire, to take in that in-land Kingdome, surrounded with Prouinces of the Macedonian conquest, and for his owne particular to haue one opportune place of sure retrait, vnder the gouernement of a stedfast friend. Therefore he entred Cappadocia, fought with Ariarathes, who drew into the field thirtie thousand foot, and fifteene thousand horse (a strong Army, had it not incountred a stronger, and better trained) wanne the victorie, and thereby the whole Kingdome. But with much crueltie did he vse the victorie: for hauing taken Ariarathes prisoner with many others, hee crucified him, and as many of his Kindred as he could light vpon: and so deliuered that Prouince to Eumenes, whom of all men liuing he trusted most.

Another part of his forces he had committed to Python; rather as to the most honourable of such as remained about him, than as to the most assured. Python was to subdue the Greekes, rebelling in the high Countries of Asia. Aboue twenty thousand foot, and three thousand horse they were, (all old Souldiers) who planted in Colonies by Alexander, to bridle the barbarous Nations, were soone wearie of their vnpleasant habitations, and the rude people, among whom they liued: and therefore tooke aduantage of the present troubles to seeke vnto themselues a better fortune. Against these Python went, more desirous to make them his owne, than to destroy them: which intent of his Perdiccas discouering, did both giue him in charge to put all those Rebels to the sword, giuing the spoiles of them to his Souldiers, and further enioyned it vnto Pythons Captains (his own creatures) that they should see this command executed. These directions for vse of the victory might haue proued needlesse; so vncertaine was the victorie it selfe. A Captaine of the Rebels commanding ouer three thousand, corrupted by Python, did in the heat of the fight (which was very doubtfull) retire without necessitie to a Hill not farre off. This dismaied the rest, and gaue the day to Python: who being farre enough from Perdiccas, offered composition to the vanquished, granting vnto them their liues and libertie, vnder condition of laying down their armes; and hereupon he gaue them his faith. Being master of these companies, he might well haue a good opinion of his owne power: all power being then valued by strength in followers, when as none could vaunt himselfe as free Lord of any Territorie. He had thirteene thousand foot, and eight thousand eight hundred horse, besides these new Companions, whom needlesse feare without great losse had caused to leaue the field: but in true estimation all the greatnesse whereof Python might thinke himselfe assured, was (and soone appeared to be) inherent in Perdiccas. For by his command were ten thousand foote, and eight thousand horse, of those which followed Python, leauied; the Rulers of the Prouinces carefully obeying the letters of Perdiccas, by which they were enioyned to giue assistance to that businesse: and by vertue of the precept giuen vnto them by Perdiccas, did the Macedonians cut in pieces all those poore men who had yeelded themselues; leauing Python as naked as he came forth to returne vnto his great Master.

Now was Perdiccas mightie aboue the mightie, and had faire leisure to pursue his hopes of marriage with Cleopatra, and thereby to make himselfe Lord of all: but this must be secretly carried for feare of opposition. How it succeeded will appeare, when the Lamian warre taketh ending.

§. V.

The processe of the Lamian warre.

WE left Antipater hardly besieged, wanting meanes to free himself without succours from his friends in Asia. Those helps not appearing so soone as he expected, he came to parle with Leosthenes, & would haue yeelded vnto any termes of reason, wherewith men possessed with hope of victorie, do seldome limit their desires. Leosthenes willed him without further circumstance to submit himselfe to discretion. This was too much for him, that had once commanded ouer them, who now required of him such a dishonourable composition. Wherefore knowing that the extremities, from which as yet he was far enough, could bring no worse with it, Antipater prepared for the defence; and the other for winning the Towne, which felt great want of victuals.

In this lingring war, the Ætolians (whether wearie of sitting still at a siege, or hauing busines which they pretended at home) took their leaue, & returned into their owne Countrie. Their departure left the trenches so thinly manned, that Antipater found means to sally out vpon his enemies to their great losse: for many were slaine, and Leosthenes himselfe among them, ere he could be repulsed into the Towne. Yet hereby the Macedonians were nothing relieued; their victuals wasted, and they were not strong enough to deale with the Greeks in open fight. Craterus was long in coming. Lysimachus who was neerest at hand in Thrace, had work too much of his own, leading no more than 4000. foote, and 2000. horse, against Seuthes the Thracian King, who brought into the field aboue foure times that number; and though Lysimachus, not without losse, had gotten one victorie, yet the enemie abounding in multitude, felt not the blow so much as might abate his courage. Therfore Leonatus was earnestly sollicited by Antipaters friends, to make all haste to the rescue. He had the gouernement of Phrygia the lesse, and was able to raise an Army of more than 20000. foote, and 2500. horse, whether leauied out of his Prouince, or appointed vnto him out of the maine Armie, it is vncertaine. Certaine it is, that he was more willing to take in hand the iourny into Greece, than Antipater was to haue him come. For Cleopatra had written vnto him, desiring his presence at Pella, the chiefe Citie of Macedon, and very kindly offering her selfe to be his wife; which letters he kept not so close as had beene requisite, and therefore brought himselfe into great suspition, that soone ended with his life. Antiphilus, chosen Generall by the Athenians in place of Leosthenes, hearing of his approch, forsooke the siege of Lamia, and took the ready way to these great Conquerors of Asia, with purpose to giue them an euill welcome home, before Antipater and they should ioyne in one. He had (notwithstanding the departure of the Ætolians) the aduantage of Leonatus in horse, by the ods of 2000. Thessalians; in other things he was equall to him; in cause he thought himselfe Superior; in the fortune of that day he proued so: for he wan a great victorie (chiefly by vertue of the Thessalians) which appeared the greater by the end of Leonatus himselfe; who fighting valiantly, was driuen into a marish piece of ground, where hee found his death, which desperately he had sought among the Indians, but it waited for him at home, not far frō the place of his nativitie. He was the first of Alexanders Captaines which died in battaile, but al, or most of the rest, shal follow him the same way. After this day, the Athenians did neuer any thing sutable to their ancient glory.

The vanquished Macedonians were too weake to renew the fight, & too proud to flie. They betooke themselues to high grounds, vnfit for seruice on horse-back, and so abode in sight of the enemie that day; the day following Antipater with his men came into their camp, and tooke the charge of all. The Athenians perceiuing their strength to be at the greatest, and fearing lest that of the enemie should increase, did earnestly seeke to determine the matter quickly by another battaile. But still Antipater kept himselfe on ground of aduantage: which gaue more than reasonable confidence to the Greekes, many of whom departed to their homes, accounting the enemie to be vanquished. This rechlesnesse (incorrigible in an Armie of voluntaries) was very inexcusable; seeing that the victories by Land were much defaced by losses at Sea, where the Athenians labouring to haue made themselues once againe Masters, were put to the worst.

But now the fatall captiuitie of Greece came on, of which she neuer could bee deliuered vnto this day. Craterus with a strong Armie hauing made great marches from Cilicia, passed ouer into Europe, and comming into Thessalie, ioyned himselfe with Antipater. The forces of Leonatus, Antipater, and Craterus, being ioyned in one, contained fortie thousand waightily armed, three thousand light-armed men, and fiue thousand horse; of which numbers the Greekes wanted a thousand and fiue hundred in horse, in foot eighteene thousand. Carefully therefore did Antiphilus labour to auoide the necessitie of a battaile, vntill such time as the Townes confederate, should returne vnto the campe those bands which had straggled from it. But those companies were so slow in comming, and Antipater so vrgent vpon the Greeks, that compelled they were to put the matter in hazard without further attendance. Like enough it is, that with a little more helpe they had carried away the victorie: for the Thessalians had the vpper hand, and held it, vntil such time as they perceiued their battailes (ouer-laied with multitude) retire vnto the higher grounds, which caused them also to fall back. So the Macedonians became Lords of the field, hauing little else to boast of, considering that with the losse of a hundred and thirtie men, they had purchased only the death of some fiue hundred enemies. Yet hereof was great vse made. For the Greekes, as not subiect vnto the full command of one Generall, and being euerie one desirous to preserue his owne estate, and Citie; concluded to make a treatie of peace with Antipater; who being a subtile artificer, & wel vnderstanding their aptnesse to diuision, refused to harken to any generall composition, but willed euery City to deale apart for it selfe. The intent of his deuice was so apparent, that it was reiected; the Greekes choosing rather to abide the comming of their Assistants, whose vnreasonable carelesnes betraied the cause. Antipater and Craterus besieging & winning some townes in Thessalie; which the army of the Confederates wanted meanes & courage to relieue, wearied that Nation from attending any longer vpon other mens vnlikely hopes, with their owne assured and present calamity.

§. VI.

Of the peace granted to Athens by ANTIPATER. Of DEMOSTHENES his death.

THe Thessalians falling off, all the rest soone followed seuerally, and sued for peace; the gentle conditions giuen to the most forward, inuiting such as were slack. Only the Athenians and Ætolians held out. Little fauour could they hope for, hauing beene Authors of this tumult; and their feare was not great; the seate of the warre being farre from them. But the celeritie of Antipater confounded all their imaginations; who sate still at Athens, deuising vpon courses of prosecuting the Warre to come, which came to their dores, before their consultation could finde issue. He was ready to enter vpon their Frontiers; they had no abilitie to resist, and were as heartlesse as friendlesse. All that remained was to send Embassadors, desiring peace vpon some good termes: necessitie enforcing them to haue accepted euen the very worst. Phocion, with Demades the Orator, and Xenocrates the Philosopher, were chiefe of this Embassage; Phocion as the most Honorable; Demades as a strong Perswader; (both of them well respected by Antipater) and Xenocrates, as one admired for wisedome, grauitie of manners, and vertue; but all these ornaments consisting in speculation, and therefore of lesse regard, when their admiration was to cost much in reall effects.

Antipater calling to minde the pride of Leosthenes, required of the Athenians, that they should wholly submit themselues to his pleasure; which being (perforce) granted, he commanded them to defray the charges of the warre past, to pay a fine, and entertaine a Garrison. Further, he abrogated the popular estate, committing the gouernement of the Citie to those of most wealth, depriuing of the right of suffrage all such as wanted a conuenient proportion of riches.

About nine thousand they were, all men of good substance, to whom the administration of the Common-wealth was giuen; a number great enough to retaine the name and forme of a Democratie. But the rascall multitude of beggerly persons, accustomed to get their liuings out of the commō troubles, being now debarred from bearing offices and giuing their voices, cried out, that this was a meere Oligarchie, the violent vsurpation of a few incroaching vpon the publike right. These turbulent fellowes (of whom King Philip had been wont to say, That warre to them was peace, and peace warre) Antipater planted in Thrace, and gaue them lands to manure; leauing as few of them as he could to molest the quiet of Athens.

To the same end (yet withall for satisfying his owne suspitions and hatred) hee caused Demosthenes and Hyperides famous Orators, with some others to bee slaine. Had the death of these two, especially of Demosthenes, beene forborne, the rest of his proceedings in this action might well haue passed for very milde: whereas now all such, as either are delighted with the Orations of Demosthenes, or haue surrendred their iudgements to Authors iustly admiring him, as the most eloquent of all that euer did speake and write, condemne him vtterly, calling him a bloudy tyrant. Such grace and reputation doe the learned arts finde in all ciuill Nations, that the euill done to a man, famous in one of them, is able to blemish any action, how good soeuer otherwise it be, or honourably carried.

Demosthenes had taken Sanctuarie in the Temple of Neptune, in the Isle of Calauria; there did Archias (sent with Souldiers by Antipater for the purpose) finde him, and gently perswade him to leaue the place, but not so prevailing, hee threatned violence. Then Demosthenes, entreating a little respit as it had beene to write somewhat, secretly took poison, which he had kept for such a necessity, and so died; rather choosing to doe the last execution vpon himselfe, than to fall into the hands of such as hated him. Only this act of his (commendable, perhaps, in a Heathen man) argued some valour in him; who was otherwise too much a coward in battaile, how soeuer valiant in perswading to enterprises, wherein the way to very honourable ends was to be made through passages exceeding dangerous. Hee loued monie well, and had great summes giuen him by the Persian, to encourage him, in finding worke for the Macedonians at home. Neither did hee ill (me thinkes) in taking from the Persians which loued not his Countrie, great reward, for speaking such things as tended to his Countries good; which hee did not cease to procure, when the Persians were no longer able to giue him recompence. Such as in tender contemplation of his death can indure no honourable, though true, mention of Antipater, may (if they can) beleeue Lucian, who tells vs, That it was Antipaters purpose to haue done him great honour. Sure it is, that hee was a stedfast enemie to the Macedonians; therefore discretion required that he should be cut off.

The matters of Athens being thus ordered, the chiefe command was left in the hands of Phocion, a vertuous man, and louer of his Countrie, yet applying himselfe to the necessity of the times; by which commendations he had both at other times done the Citie much good, and now procured this peace, which (though grieuous to free-men, yet fauourable to the vanquished) hee endeuoured carefully to preserue.

How CRATERVS and ANTIPATER were drawne from their Ætolian Warres into Asia. The grounds of the first ciuill Warre betweene the Macedonian Lords.

SO Antipater with Craterus returned into Macedonia, where they strengthned their friendship with a new alliance; Craterus taking Phila, the Daughter of Antipater, to Wife.

Shortly after they went against the Ætolians, whose pouertie was not so easily danted, as the luxurious wealth of the more powerfull State of Athens had beene. Their Countrie was rough and mountainous, hauing many places of great fastnes, into which they conueied such of their goods as they most esteemed, and of their people, as were least fit for warre: with the rest they fortified the strongest of their Cities, and so abode the comming of the Macedonians, whom they manfully resisted. With great obstinacie did the Macedonians contend against the difficulties of the places, which the Ætolians made good as long as their victuals held out. But when Craterus had shut vp all passages, and vtterly debarred them of reliefe; then were they put to a miserable choice; either to descend from their strong holds, and fight vpon equall ground, with vnequall numbers; or to endure the miseries of hunger and cold, against which they could make no long resistance; or to yeeld themselues to the Macedonians: who incensed by the losse of many good Souldiers, were not like to leaue so stubborne enemies in places, which might giue confidence to rebellion. In cases of extremitie, much fineneſſe of wit apprehending all circumstances of danger commonly doth more hurt, than a blunt consideration of that only, which at the present is in hand. These Ætolians did not as yet want meat; but their enemies daily molested them: wherefore as yet they thought vpon nothing but fighting. Fortune was gracious to their courage. For such newes came out of Asia into the Macedonian campe, as made Antipater and Craterus thinke euery houre a moneth, till they had rid their hands of these Ætolians, giuing them whatsoeuer conditions they would aske: yet with purpose to call them to seuere account; yea, to roote them out of Greece by death, or by captiuitie, when once they should haue settled the affaires of Asia; as they hoped and desired. But of mens purposes God is the disposer: in whose high Counsell it was ordained, that this poore Nation should continue a troublesome barre to the proceedings of Macedon and Greece, and (when time had ripened the next Monarchie) an open gate to let the Roman Conquerors into those and other Prouinces. Likewise concerning the matters of Asia, the reformation intended by Antipater and Craterus, was so farre from taking effect, that it serued meerely as an introduction to all the ciuill warres ensuing.

The grounds of the Asiatique expedition, which did set the world in an vproare, were these. Antipater and Craterus were of Alexanders Captaines the mightiest in reputation: The one, in regard of his ancient precedencie, and the present rule which he bare in the parts of Europe. The other, as of all men the best beloued, and most respected, both of Alexander and of the whole Armie. Next vnto these had Perdiccas beene; whom the aduantage of his presence at the Kings death did make equall, or superiour, to either of these, if not to both together. The first intents of Perdiccas were, to haue consorted with these two, and to haue beene with them a third partner in the gouernement of all; to which purpose hee entertained the discourse of marriage with one of Antipaters Daughters. But feeling in short space the strength of that gale of winde which bore him vp, he began to take wing and soare quite another way. Aridæus was a very simple man, yet serued wel enough to weare the title of that Maiestie, whereof Perdiccas being Administrator, and hoping to become proprietarie, the practice was more seuere than had been in the daies of Alexander:

ander: the deſire to ſeeme terrible, being very familiar with weake Princes, and their ambitious Officers, who know no other meanes of preſeruing themſelues from contempt, and of giuing ſuch a fierie luſtre to their actions, as my dazell the eies of the beholders. How cruelly the poore Greekes in the higher Aſia were all put to the ſword; and how tyrannouſly the King and Princes of Cappadocia were crucified, hath alreadie beene ſhewed. The Piſidians were the next who felt the wrath of theſe counterfait Alexanders. One Citie of theirs was vtterly razed; the children ſold for ſlaues, and all the reſt maſſacred. The Iſaurians by this example growne deſperate, when after two or three daies triall they found themſelues vnable to continue the defence, lockt themſelues into their houſes, and ſet the Towne on fire, into the flame whereof the yong-men did throw themſelues, after that they had a while repelled the Macedonians from the wals.

Theſe exploits being performed, the Armie had no other worke than to ſift the aſhes of the burnt Citie for gold and ſiluer; but Perdiccas had buſineſſe of greater importance troubling his braines. Nothing was more contrarie to his ends, than to ſit ſtill without imploiment: letting his Souldiers grow idle about him, whileſt others grew great, and tooke deepe roote in their ſeuerall Prouinces. Hee purpoſed therefore to tranſport his forces into Europe, vnder pretence of bringing the King into Macedonia, the ſeate of his Anceſtors, and head of the Empire. The Kings preſence would make the offices of his Vice-roies (during the time) actually voide; Antipater with Craterus being once in caſe of priuate men, and onely Perdiccas holding authoritie, the match with Cleopatra might eaſily bee made. So ſhould greatneſſe meete with a good title; and what more could be wiſhed? Some impediment the power of Ptolomie might giue, who held Ægypt well fortified with men, but much better with loue of the people; yet if the buſineſſe proſpered in Macedonia, like enough it was that either Ptolomie would follow of himſelfe, or bee driuen to come to reaſon. Antigonus likewiſe then gouerning in Phrygia, a buſie-headed man, and ill affected to the ſide, was to bee looked into, and made away, for feare of further trouble. So thought Perdiccas, and was deceiued in ſo thinking. Antigonus was as good a man of warre, of as deepe a judgement, as high a ſpirit, and as great vndertaking, as any of Alexanders Captaines. His imploiments had beene leſſe than ſome of theirs, which made him alſo the leſſe reſpected. But his thoughts were as proud as theirs: for, he valued himſelfe by his owne worth, not by the opinions of other men; with carefull attention had hee watched Perdiccas, and ſounded the depth of his purpoſes, which it was now high time to diſcouer. For Perdiccas hauing with a jealous eye pried into the demeanour of Antigonus, and finding him no way fit for his turne, cauſed him to be charged with ſuch accuſations, as might ſuffice to take away his life, eſpecially by a Iudge that ſought his death. This denice Antigonus would not ſeeme to perceiue, but prepared himſelfe in ſhew to make anſwere, indeede, to make eſcape, which eaſily he did, putting himſelfe and his ſonne Demetrius aboord of ſome Athenian Gallies, that carried him to Antipater, laden with ſuch tidings, as finiſhed the Ætolian warre before mentioned.

As the comming of Antigonus made Craterus and Antipater manifeſtly perceiue their owne danger: ſo his flight gaue Perdiccas to vnderſtand that his intentions were laied open, and muſt now be juſtified by the ſword. Therefore hee prepared as faſt as he could, not only for defence, but (as hauing on his ſide the Kings name) to meet with them at home; who were nothing ſlack in prouiding to encounter him. Ptolomie being aduertiſed of theſe proceedings, and conſidering how neerely they concerned him, ſided with Antipater. To his gouernement of Ægypt hee had annexed the Dominion of Cyrene, not without conſent of the chiefe Citizens; and now in the middeſt of theſe garboiles he celebrated the funerall of Alexander with great ſolemnitie, purchaſing thereby to himſelfe much good will and many partakers, notwithſtanding the terrible report of the Kings Armie comming againſt him.

PERDICCAS his voyage into Ægypt, and his death.

PERDICCAS, vncertaine which way to bend his maine power, at length resolued to set vpon Ptolomie; leauing Eumenes to keepe to his vse, against Craterus and Antipater, the parts of Asia bordering vpon Europe.

It may seeme strange, that hee did not rather make head against those who were to come out of Greece with a great number, and of more able men than Ptolomie could bring. Perhaps he thought to make a quick end with Ptolomie; or beleeued that Craterus would not be readie for him soone enough. Sure it is that he tooke a bad course, and made it worse with ill handling.

Ptolomie by his sweet behauiour allured many to his partie, without helpe of any bad arts. Perdiccas contrariwise was full of insolencie, which neuer faileth to be rewarded with hatred; that is truely defined. An affection founded vpon opinion of an vniust contempt. The whole storie of his proceedings in Ægypt is not worth relating: for he did nothing of importance; but (as a wilfull man) tired his followers, and wasted them in hard enterprises without successe. His most forceable attempt was vpon a little Towne, called the Camels Wall: thither he marched by night, with more haste then good speed; for Ptolomie preuenting him, did put himselfe into the place, where behauing himselfe not only as a good Commander, but as a stout Souldier, hee gaue the foile to Perdiccas, causing him to retire with losse; after a vehement, but vaine, assault continued one whole day. The night following, Perdiccas made another journie, (which was his last) and came to the diuisions of Nilus, ouer against Memphis. There with much difficultie hee beganne to passe ouer his Armie into an Iland, where he meant to incampe. The current was strong, the water deepe, and hardly foordable. Wherefore he placed his Elephants aboue the passage, to breake the violence of the streame, and his horse-men beneath it; to take vp such as were carried away by swiftnesse of water. A great part of his Armie being arriued on the further banke, the channell beganne to waxe deepe; so that whereas the former companies had waded vp to the chinne, they who should haue followed could finde no footing. Whether this came by rising of the water, or flitting away of the ground; (the earth being broken with the feete of so many Men, Horse, and Elephants) no remedie there was, but such as had passed must repasse againe, as well as they might: for they were too weake for the enemie, and could not be relieued by their fellowes. With great confusion therefore they committed themselues to the Riuer, wherein aboue two thousand of them perished; a thousand were deuoured by Crocodiles; a miserable spectacle euen to such as were out of danger; such as were strong and could swimme, recouered the Campe; many were carried downe the streame, and driuen to the contrarie banke, whereby they fell into the hands of their enemies.

This misfortune exasperated the Souldiers against their Generall, giuing libertie to their tongues, which long time had concealed the euill thoughts of their hearts. While they were thus murmuring, newes came from Ptolomy, which did set them in an vp-rore. Ptolomie had not only shewed much compassion on those who fell into his hands aliue, but performed all rights of funerall to the dead carcases, which the Riuer had cast vpon his side; and finally, sent their bones and ashes to be interred by their Kinsmen or Friends. This did not onely moue the common Souldier, but made the Captaines fall to mutinie, thinking it vnreasonable to make warre vpon so vertuous and honorable a person, to fulfill the pleasure of a Lordly ambitious man, vsing them like slaues. The sedition growing strong wanted only a head, which it quickly found. Python was there, who inwardly hated Perdiccas, for the disgrace which hee had suffered by his procurement, after the victorie vpon the rebellious

Greekes.

Greekes. Python had liued in honourable place about Alexander; he was in the diuision of the Prouinces made Gouernour of Media; hee had followed Perdiccas, and being in all things (the Protectorship excepted) equall to him, had neuertheleſſe beene ſcornefully vſed by him, which now he requited. Drawing together a hundred of the Captaines, & a good part of the horſe, which conſiſted of the Gentrie, (the footmen hauing declared themſelues before) he entred the Tent of Perdiccas, where without further circumſtance they all ranne vpon him, and ſlew him. Such end had the proud miſ-gouerning authoritie of Perdiccas. Hee might haue liued as great as any, could he haue ſuffered any as great as himſelfe; yea, peraduenture maſter of all, had he not beene too maſterly ouer thoſe which were already his.

The next day Ptolomie came into the campe, where he was joyfully receiued; he excuſed himſelfe of things paſt, as not hauing beene Author, or giuen cauſe of the Warre, and was eaſily beleeued: the fauour of the Armie being ſuch toward him, that needs they would haue made him Protector in the roome of Perdiccas. But this hee refuſed. It was an office fit for one, that would ſeeke to increaſe his greatneſſe with his trouble. Ptolomie was well enough alreadie; wherefore, for his owne quiet he forbare to accept it, and for their well-deſeruing of him hee procured that honourable charge to Python, and to Arideus the Captaine, who hauing had ſome companies of Souldiers, to furniſh with their attendance the ſolemnities of Alexanders Funerals, did with them adhere to him againſt Perdiccas.

In the middeſt of theſe buſineſſes came newes of two great victories obtained by Eumenes; which newes, had they arriued two or three daies ſooner, had beene entertained with joyfull acclamations; and would haue giuen ſuch reputation to Perdiccas, as had cauſed both his priuate maligners to continue his open flatterers, and his open enemies to haue accepted any tolerable compoſition. But theſe good tidings comming in ill time, when death had ſtopped the eares which would haue giuen them wel-come, found bad acceptance, as ſhall be ſhewed hereafter.

Victories of EVMENES in the lower Aſia.

BEfore wee proceede in the relation of things, happening about the perſon of the King, it is meete that wee ſpeake of thoſe buſineſſes in the lower Aſia, which were handled by Eumenes with notable dexteritie, whileſt Perdiccas was occupied in the Ægyptian warres. Alcetas, the brother of Perdiccas, and Neoptolemus, had receiued command from Perdiccas to be aſſiſtant to Eumenes, and to follow his directions. But Alcetas made flat anſwere, That he would not; alleaging the backwardneſſe of his men to beare armes againſt ſo great a perſon as Antipater, and a man ſo much honoured as Craterus, Neoptolemus was content to make faire ſhew, but inwardly hee repined at the Precedencie giuen to Eumenes, as thinking himſelfe the better man. Eumenes diſcouering, through the counterfaited lookes of Neoptolemus, the miſchiefe lurking in his heart, wiſely diſſembled with him, in hope to winne him by gentle behauiour, and ſweet language, that commonly are loſt, when beſtowed vpon arrogant creatures. Yet the better to fortifie himſelfe, that hee might ſtand vpon his owne ſtrength, he raiſed out of the Countries vnder his juriſdiction, about ſixe thouſand horſe, giuing many priuiledges to ſuch as were ſeruiceable, & training them well vp. Not without great neede. For when vpon aduertiſement of the great preparations made by Craterus and Antipater (who had newly paſſed the Helleſpont) for the inuaſion of his Prouinces, hee willed Neoptolemus to come to him with all his power, Neoptolemus did (indeed) aduance, but in hoſtile manner, though vnprouoked, preſented him battaile. Neoptolemus had ſecretly couenanted with Antipater to lay open the way for him to the conqueſt of Aſia, which now intending to performe, he was shamefully disappointed. For though his foot-men, being all Macedonians, had much the better, and preuailed farre vpon Eumenes his battailes; yet were his horse driuen out of the field, and himselfe compelled, with a few of them, to runne away, leauing naked the backs of his Macedonian foot-men, to bee charged by Eumenes, who forced them in such wise, that casting downe their Pikes, they cried for mercie, and gladly tooke their oath to doe him faithfull seruice. Antipater and Craterus endeuored with many goodly promises to draw Eumenes into their societie, who contrariwise offered himselfe, as a meane of reconciliation, betweene Perdiccas and Craterus, whom he dearely loued; professing withall his hatred to Antipater, and constant faith to the cause which he had vndertaken to maintaine.

Whilest these negotiations were on foot, Neoptolemus came with his broken crue to Antipater, and his Associates, vilifying Eumenes, and calling him a Scribe (at which foolish railing they laught) but extolling the vertue of Craterus (as well hee might) with high commendations; assuring them, that if Craterus did but once appeare, or that his voice were but heard by any Macedonian in Eumenes his Campe, the victorie was wonne, for they would all forth-with reuolt vnto him. Earnestly therefore he desired them to giue him aide against Eumenes, and especially requested that Craterus might haue the leading of the Armie to be sent. Their owne affections did easily leade them to condescend to his motion; and good hope there was, that the reputation of Craterus might preuaile as much, as the force which hee drew along. For he had in the middest of Alexanders vanities, when others (imitating their King) betooke themselues to the Persian fashions of garments and customes, retained the ancient Macedonian forme of behauiour, and apparell; whereby hee became verie gracious with the common Souldiers, who beheld these new tricks of Asia, with discontented eies, as reprochfull and derogatorie to the manners of their native countrie. So Antipater tooke the way toward Cilicia, to hold Perdiccas at bay, and to joyne with Ptolomie. Craterus vsed great celeritie, to haue taken Eumenes reuelling (as he hoped) according to the common fashion of Captaines after a great victory. But hee had a warie and well aduised enemie to encounter, who kept good espiall vpon him, and with much wisedome fore-saw all that was to bee feared, and the meanes of preuention, which his courage did not faile to execute.

Eumenes was not ignorant, that Craterus was able to defeat him without battaile, yea without stroke; him therefore he feared more than the Armie following him: (yet the Armie following him was such, as much exceeded his owne in foot men, but was inferiour in horse-men) and thought it more vneasie to keepe the Macedonians from reuolting to him, than from knowing him. Hereupon hee tooke in hand a strange piece of worke, which desperation of all courses else taught him, and wise managing, prosperously accomplished. He gaue out reports, that Neoptolemus was returned with such companie as hee could gather together, and had gotten Pigres (a Captaine of no great estimation, who lay not farre off) to joyne with him. Hauing animated his men against Neoptolemus, whom hee knew to be despised and hated among them, (as hauing been vanquished by some of them, & forsaken others in plaine field, whilest they valiantly fought in his quarrell) hee tooke great care to keepe them from receiuing any intelligence of the enemies matters. Peremptorily he commanded, that no Messenger nor Trumpetter should be admitted; and not herewith satisfied, he placed against Craterus no one Macedonian, nor any other that much would haue regarded him had he been knowne: but Thracians, Cappadocians, and Persians, vnder the leading of such, as thought more highly of none, than of Perdiccas and himselfe. To these also he gaue in charge, that without speaking or hearkening to any word, they should runne vpon the enemie, and giue him no leisure to say or doe any thing, but fight. The directions which he gaue to others, he did not faile to execute in his owne person: but placing himself in the right wing of his battaile, opposite to Neoptolemus, who (as hee vnderstood) conducted the left wing on the contrarie side, he held the Macedonians arranged in good order, and readie to charge charge the enemie as soon as the distance would giue leaue. A rising piece of ground lay betweene them, which hauing ascended, the Armies discouered each other: but that of Eumenes euery way prepared for the fight, the other wearied with long iournies, which ouer-hastily they had made, seeking the deceitfull issue of friuolous hopes. Then was it high time for Craterus (hauing failed in surprising them as enemies) to discouer himselfe to his old friends and fellow-souldiers, of whom hee could see none. Phœnix a Tenidian, and Artabazus a Persian, had the leading of that side, who mindfull of their instructions, beganne to giue vpon him, with such countenance as told him his errour; which to redeeme, he bade his men fight and winne the day, and take the spoile to themselues. But the Beare whose skinne hee sels is not yet caught. The ground whereon the battaile was fought gaue most aduantage to the horse, who encountred very roughly on all parts: especially about Eumenes and Neoptolemus, who as soone as they had discouered one another, could not containe themselues, but with great rage met bodie to bodie, and letting loose their bridles, grappled so violently together, that their horses ran from vnder them, leauing both of them tumbling on the ground. Neoptolemus rose first vp, but Eumenes had his sword first drawne, where-with he houghed the other, causing him to fall downe and fight vpon one knee. In this conflict they receiued many wounds, but Neoptolemus giuing slight ones tooke such as were deadly, by which hee died in the place, and was there (being halfe-dead halfe-aliue) stripped by his mortall enemie, whose reuilings hee requited, lying euen at the last gaspe, with one wound in the groine, dangerous had it not wanted force. The death of Neoptolemus caused his followers to runne away vpon the spurre, and seeke shelter behind the battailes of their foote. They were nothing hotly pursued. For Eumenes pained himselfe to carrie succour to his left wing, which he suspected much to be distressed; but found accompanied with the same fortune, that had assisted him when he fought in person. Craterus had gallantly borne himselfe a while, and sustained the impression of Artabazus and Phœnix, with more courage than force; holding it nothing agreeable with his honour to retire and protract the fight, when he was charged by men of little estimation or note. Otherwise it is not vnlikely, that hee might haue either carried the day, or preserued himselfe to a better aduenture by gining ground, as the rest (when he and Neoptolemus were slaine) did. But whileſt hee sought to preserue his reputation, hee lost his life by the fall of his horse, or his falling from his horse, through force of a wound receiued; vpon which accident hee was trampled vnder foot by many that knew him not, and so perished vnknowne, till it was too late to know it. Eumenes comming to the place where he lay, made great lamentation, as hauing alwaies loued and honoured Craterus, of whose death hee was now become the instrument. The vanquished Armie entertained a Treatie of peace with Eumenes, making shew of willingnesse to become his followers; but their intent was only to refresh themselues, which (by his permission) hauing done, they stale away by night, and fled toward Antipater.

This battaile fought within ten daies of the former, wanne to Eumenes more reputation than good will: for his owne Souldiers took the death of Craterus heauily; and the Armies lying further off were inraged with the newes. But other matters there were which incensed men against him, besides the death of Craterus, whereof it manifestly appeared, that hee was as sorrie as any that pretended greater heauinesse. His Armie wanted pay. This was a great fault; which he wisely amended, by giuing to them the spoile of such Townes as were ill-effected to him. So he redeemed the loue of his owne men, who of their meere motion appointed vnto him a guard for defence of his person. Others were not so easie to be reconciled. They who had beene Traitors to Perdiccas, hated him for his faithfulnesse, as greatly, as they thought that he would hate them for their falshood; neither found they any fairer way of excusing their late reuolt, than by accusing and condemning the side which they had forsaken. Wherefore they proclaimed Eumenes a Traitor, and con-condemned him to die: but it was an easier matter to giue that sentence, than to put it in execution.

Quarrels betweene EVRYDICE the Queene, and PYTHON the Protector. PYTHON resignes his office, into which ANTIPATER is chosen.

PYTHON and Aridæus being chosen Protectors of King Aridæus, and the children of Alexander, tooke the way to Asia the lesse, conducting the Armie through Syria. Of these two, Python was the greater in reputation, yet farre too weake to sustaine so important a charge. For Eurydice, wife to King Aridæus, was come to her husband, a Ladie of a masculine spirit, well vnderstanding what she was or should bee, and thinking her selfe able to support the waight which Fortune had laied vpon her foolish husband, being due to her owne title. Her Mother Cyna, sister to Alexander by her Father King Philip, was married (as hath beene shewed) to Amyntas, who was right Heire to the Kingdome of Macedon, being the onely sonne of King Perdiccas, Philips elder brother.

This Cyna was a warlike woman; shee had led Armies, and (as a true Sister of Alexander) fighting hand to hand with Caria Queene of the Phrygians, a Virago like vnto her selfe, had slaine her. Shee brought vp this Eurydice in the same vnwomanly art of warre, who now among the Souldiers beganne to put in practice the rudiments of her education, to the small contentment of Python, that could not brooke her curious intermeddling in his charge. Whether it were so, that Python had some purpose to aduance the sonne of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdome; (as once he had fought to doe) or whether the Queene did suspect him of some such intent; or whether onely desire of rule caused her to quarrell with him; quarrell shee did, which disturbed the proceeding against Eumenes. The Armie having shaken off such a rank-rider as Perdiccas, would not afterward be reined with a twined threed. Python bearing himself vpon his office, took vpon him to giue directions in the kings name, which the Queene did oftentimes controll, vsing the same name, with more authoritie, and better liking of the Souldiers. Python, seeing this, would needes resigne his office, whether vpon wearinesse of the contentions daily growing, or on purpose to bring the Queene into enuie, it is vncertaine. Perhaps hee thought, that now being the farre worthiest man in the Campe, he should be intreated to retaine the place, and haue his authoritie confirmed, or (as might be) increased, were it but for want of a fit Successour. Eurydice was nothing sorrie at this course, for now she thought to manage the affaires of the Empire at her owne will, being freed from the troublesome assistance of a Protector. But the Souldiers disappointed both her and Python, of their contrarie expectations: choosing Antipater, the onely powerfull man of Alexanders Captaines, then liuing, into the roome of Python. Hereat the Queene fretted exceedingly, and beganne to deale earnestly with the Macedonians, that they should acknowledge no Lord saue onely the King their Soueraigne. Yet shee failed of her purpose, being hindred (as may seeme) by three things: the apparent weakenesse of her husband: the growth of Alexanders children, who (though borne of outlandish women) were bred in the Macedonian campe; and the mightinesse of Antipater, who commanding a great Armie neere at hand arriued in few daies at the campe, and enforced Eurydice to hold her selfe content. Antipater was of such power, that he needed not to worke by any close deuices, as Perdiccas had done; he had no concurrents, all the Gouernours of Prouinces that remained aliue, acknowledged him their better: yea, many of them he displaced out of hand, putting others in their roomes. This done, hee tooke the King, Queene, and Princes along with him into Macedonia, leauing Antigonus Generall of the Royall Armie: to whom for his good seruices done, and to be done against Eumenes, hee gaue the rule of Susiana, besides his former Prouinces, and committed into his hands the gouernment of Asia during that warre.

§. XI.

ANTIGONVS Lieutenant of Asia, winnes a battaile of EVMENES, and besiegeth him in Nora: He vanquisheth other followers of PERDICCAS.

HEre beginnes the greatnesse of Antigonus, whose power in few yeeres ouergrowing, the rest wanted little of spreading it self ouer the whole Monarchie. Hee was to make warre vpon Eumenes, Alcetas the brother, and Attalus the brother in-law to Perdiccas: worke enough to keepe his Armie imployed in the publike seruice, till such time as he might find occasion to make vse of it in his owne businesse. The first of these which he vndertooke was Eumenes, with whom Alcetas and Attalus refused to ioyne, hauing vnseasonably contended with him in time of common danger about the chief place. Eumenes had an Army strong in number, courage, and all needfull prouisions; but obedient only at discretion. Therefore Antigonus tried all waies of corrupting his Souldiers; tempting first the whole Armie with letters: which practice failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made shew as if he himselfe had scattered abroad those letters, to trie the faith of his men) he dealt apart with such Captaines, as hee thought most easie to be wonne. Of these Captaines one rebelled, breaking out too hastily before any helpe was neere him, yet looking so carelesly to himselfe, that he and his were surprised, when he thought his enemies farre off. Another follower of Eumenes (or rather of good fortune, which he thought now to be in company with Antigonus) kept his treacherie secret, reseruing it for the time of execution. Vpon confidence of the treason which this false man Apollonides had vndertaken, Antigonus presented battaile to Eumenes; in the heate whereof Apollonides, General of the horse to Eumenes, fled ouer to the contrary side, with such as he could get to follow him: but was closely followed by some, whose company he desired not. Eumenes, perceiuing the irrecouerable mischiefe which this traiterous practice brought vpon him, pursued the villain, and cut him off before he could thrust himself into the troupes of Antigonus, and boast of his treacherie. This was some comfort to Eumenes in the losse of that battaile, which disabled him vtterly to keepe the field, and left it very hard for him to make a safe retrait. Yet one thing he did which much amazed his enemies, and (though a matter of small importance) caused Antigonus himselfe to admire his high resolution. It was held no small part of the victorie to get possession of the dead bodies. Eumenes, whileft Antigonus held him in chace, turned out of the way, and fetching a compasse, returned to the place where the battaile had been fought; there he burned (according to the maner of the time) the bodies of his own men, and interred the bones and ashes of the Captaines, and common Souldiers, apart, raising vp heapes of earth as Mountaines ouer them, and so went his way. As this bold aduenture bred in the Macedonians, (returned to their campe) great admiration of his braue spirit: so the newes which Menander (who was set to looke vnto their carriages) brought and published among them, enticed them to loue him as their honourable friend. He had found Menander in an open Plaine, careleſſe, as after an assured victorie, and loaden with the spoyles of many Nations, the rewards of their long seruice; all which hee might haue taken: but fearing lest such a purchase should proue a heauie burthen to him, whose chiefe hope consisted in swift expedition, he gaue secret warning to Menander to flie to the mountaines, whileft he detained his men (vvhom authoritie could not haue restrained) by this sleight, setting them to baite their horses. The Macedonians extolled him for this courtesie, as a noble condemned him to die: but it was an easier matter to giue that sentence, than to put it in execution.

But the Souldiers disappointed both her and Python, of their contrarie expectations: choosing Antipater, the onely powerfull man of Alexanders Captaines, then liuing, into the roome of Python. Hereat the Queene fretted exceedingly, and beganne to deale earnestly with the Macedonians, that they should acknowledge no Lord saue onely the King their Soueraigne. Yet shee failed of her purpose, being hindred (as may seeme) by three things: the apparent weakenesse of her husband: the growth of Alexanders children, who (though borne of outlandish women) were bred in the Macedonian campe; and the mightinesse of Antipater, who commanding a great Armie neere at hand arriued in few daies at the campe, and enforced Eurydice to hold her selfe content. Antipater was of such power, that he needed not to worke by any close deuices, as Perdiccas had done: he had no concurrents, all the Gouernours of Prouinces that remained aliue, acknowledged him their better: yea, many of them he displaced out of hand, putting others in their roomes. This done, hee tooke the King, Queene, and Princes

along with him into Macedonia, leauing Antigonus Generall of the Royall Armie: to whom for his good ſeruices done, and to be done againſt Eumenes, hee gaue the rule of Suſiana, beſides his former Prouinces, and committed into his hands the gouernment of Aſia during that warre.

§. XI.

ANTIGONVS Lieutenant of Aſia, winnes a battaile of EVMENES, and beſiegeth him in Nora: He vanquiſheth other followers of PERDICCAS.

HEre beginnes the greatneſſe of Antigonus, whoſe power in few yeeres ouergrowing, the reſt wanted little of ſpreading it ſelf ouer the whole Monarchie. Hee was to make warre vpon Eumenes, Alcetus the brother, and Attalus the brother in-law to Perdiccas: worke enough to keepe his Armie imployed in the publike ſeruice, till ſuch time as he might find occaſion to make vſe of it in his owne buſineſſe. The firſt of theſe which he vndertooke was Eumenes, with whom Alcetus and Attalus refuſed to ioyne, hauing vnſeaſonably contended with him in time of common danger about the chief place. Eumenes had an Army ſtrong in number, courage, and all needfull prouiſions; but obedient only at diſcretion. Therefore Antigonus tried all waies of corrupting his Souldiers; tempting firſt the whole Armie with letters: which practice failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made ſhew as if he himſelfe had ſcattered abroad thoſe letters, to trie the faith of his men) he dealt apart with ſuch Captaines, as hee thought moſt eaſie to be wonne. Of theſe Captaines one rebelled, breaking out too haſtily before any helpe was neere him, yet looking ſo careleſly to himſelfe, that he and his were ſurpriſed, when he thought his enemies farre off. Another follower of Eumenes (or rather of good fortune, which he thought now to be in company with Antigonus) kept his treacherie ſecret, reſeruing it for the time of execution. Vpon confidence of the treaſon which this falſ man Apollonides had vndertaken, Antigonus preſented battaile to Eumenes; in the heate whereof Apollonides, General of the horſe to Eumenes, fled ouer to the contrary ſide, with ſuch as he could get to follow him: but was cloſely followed by ſome, whoſe company he deſired not. Eumenes, perceiuing the irrecouerable miſchiefe which this traiterous practice brought vpon him, purſued the villain, and cut him off before he could thruſt himſelf into the troupes of Antigonus, and boaſt of his treacherie. This was ſome comfort to Eumenes in the loſſe of that battaile, which diſabled him vtterly to keepe the field, and left it very hard for him to make a ſafe retrait. Yet one thing he did which much amazed his enemies, and (though a matter of ſmall importance) cauſed Antigonus himſelfe to admire his high reſolution. It was held no ſmall part of the victorie to get poſſeſſion of the dead bodies. Eumenes, whileſt Antigonus held him in chace, turned out of the way, and fetching a compaſſe, returned to the place where the battaile had been fought; there he burned (according to the maner of the time) the bodies of his own men, and interred the bones and aſhes of the Captaines, and common Souldiers, apart, raiſing vp heapes of earth as Mountaines ouer them, and ſo went his way. As this bold aduenture bred in the Macedonians, (returned to their campe) great admiration of his braue ſpirit: ſo the newes which Menander (who was ſet to looke vnto their carriages) brought and publiſhed among them, enticed them to loue him as their honourable friend. He had found Menander in an open Plaine, careleſſe, as after an aſſured victorie, and loaden with the ſpoyles of many Nations, the rewards of their long ſeruice; all which hee might haue taken: but fearing leſt ſuch a purchaſe ſhould proue a heauie burthen to him, whoſe chiefe hope conſiſted in ſwift expedition, he gaue ſecret warning to Menander to flie to the mountaines, whileſt he detained his men (vvhom authoritie could not haue reſtrained) by this ſleight, ſetting them to baite their horſes. The Macedonians extolled him for this courteſie, as a noble noble Gentleman, that had forborne when it lay in his power to strippe them out of al their wealth, and make their children slaues, and to rauish their wiues: but Antigonus told them, that he had not forborne to do this out of any good wil to them; but out of meere subtiltie had auoided those precious letters, which would haue hindered his speedie flight. He told them true. For Eumenes did not onely thinke all cariages to be ouer-burdensome, but the number of his men to be more troublesome than availeable in his intended course. Wherefore he sent them from him as fast as he could, wishing them to shift for themselues; and retaining onely fiue hundred horse, and two hundred foote. When he had wearied Antigonus awhile in following him vp and downe, he came to Nora: where againe, keeping no more about him, than necessity required to make good the place, he louingly dismissed all the rest. Nora was a little Fortresse in the borders of Lycaonia & Cappadocia, so strongly situated that it seemed impregnable, and so well victualed and stored with all necessaries, that it might hold out for many yeeres. Thither did Antigonus follow, him, with more desire to make him his friend, than to vanquish him in warre. To this purpose he entertained parlee with him, but in vaine. For whereas Antigonus offered him pardon, and his loue; Eumenes required restitution of his Prouinces, which could not be granted without Antipaters consent. Then was Nora closed vp; where Antigonus leauing sufficient strength for continuance of the siege, tooke his iournie into Pisidia against Alcetus and Attalus, with whom hee made short worke. He came vpon them vnexpected, and seized on passages, which wanted not men, but such a Captain as Eumenes, to haue defended them. Alcetus and Attalus, as they had beene too secure before his comming, so were they too aduenturous in fighting at the first sight, vpon all disaduantages: and their folly was attended with suitable euent. Attalus with many principall Captaines was taken; Alcetus fled to the Citie of Termessus, where the loue of the yonger sort was toward him so vehement, that stopping their eares against all perswasions of the ancient men, they needes would hazzard their liues and their Countrie in his defence. Yet this availed him nothing: For the Gouernours of the Towne hauing secretly compounded with Antigonus, caused the yong men to sally out; and vsing the time of aduantage, they with their seruants did set vpon Alcetus, who vnable to resist, slew himselfe. His dead body was conueied to Antigonus, and by him barbarously torne, was cast forth without burial. When Antigonus was gone, the yong men interred the carcasse with solemne funerals, hauing once beene minded to set on fire their owne towne in reuenge of his death. Such fauour had hee purchased with courteous liberalitie: but to make an able Generall, one vertue, how great soeuer, is insufficient.

§. XII.

PTOLOMIE winnes Syria and Phœnicia. The death of ANTIPATER.

WHileſt theſe things were in doing, the reſt of the Princes lay idle, rather ſeeking to enioy their Gouernments for the preſent, than to confirme or enlarge them. Onely Ptolomie looking abroad, wanne all Syria and Phœnicia: an action of great importance, but not remarkeable for any circumſtance in the managing. Hee ſent a Lieutenant thither with an Armie, who quickly tooke Laomedon priſoner, that ruled there by appointment of Antipater, and formerly of Perdiccas; but (as may ſeeme) without any great ſtrength of Souldiers, farre from aſſiſtants, and vainely relying vpon the authority which had giuen him that Prouince, and was now occupied with greater cares, than with ſeeking to maintaine him in his Office.

Antipater was old and ſickly, deſirous of reſt, and therefore contented to let Antigonus purſue the diſpatch of thoſe buſineſſes in Aſia. Hee had with him Polyſperchon, one of the moſt ancient of Alexanders Captaines, that had lately ſuppreſſed a dangerous inſurrection of the Ætolians, which Nation had ſtirred in the quarrell of Perdiccas, preuailing farre at the firſt, but ſoone loſing all that they had gained, whileſt Antipater was abroad in his Cilician expedition. In this Polyſperchon, Antipater did repoſe great confidence; ſo farre foorth, that (ſuſpecting the youth of his owne Sonne Caſſander of inſufficiencie in ſo great a charge) hee bequeathed vnto him on his death-bed the Gouernment of Macedon and Greece, together with his Office of Protectorſhip. So Antipater died, being foure-ſcore yeeres old, hauing alwaies trauailed in the great affaires of mightie Princes, with ſuch reputation, that Alexander in all his greatneſſe was iealous of him, and the ſucceſſours of Alexander did either quietly giue place vnto him, or were vnfortunate in making oppoſitions. In his priuate qualities he was a ſubtile man, temperate, frugall, and of a Philoſophicall behauiour, not vnlearned, as hauing beene Scholler to Ariſtotle, and written ſome Hiſtories. Hee had beene much moleſted by Olympias, Alexanders mother, whom after the death of her Sonne, hee compelled to abſtaine from comming into Macedonia, or entermeddling in matters of eſtate: yea, at his owne death he gaue eſpeciall direction, that no woman ſhould bee permitted to deale in the adminiſtration of the Empire. But this precept was ſoone forgotten; and yet, ere long, by ſorrowfull experience approued to haue been ſound and good.

§. XIII.

Of POLYSPERCHON who ſucceeded vnto ANTIPATER in the Protectorſhip. The inſurrection of CASSANDER againſt him.

POLYSPERCHON was very skilfull in the art of warre, hauing long time beene Apprentiſe in that occupation; other qualities, requiſite in ſo high an Office as he vnder-went, either Nature had not giuen to him, or Time had robbed him of them. He mannaged his buſines more formally, then wiſely, as a man of a ſecond wit, fitter to aſſiſt, than commaund in chiefe. At the firſt entrance vpon the ſtage, hee called to counſaile all his friends, wherein, for waightie conſiderations (as they who waighed not the contrary reaſons held them) the Queene Olympias was reuoked out of Epirus into Macedon, that the preſence of Alexanders mother might countenance and ſtrengthen their proceedings. For the condition of the times requiring, that the Gouernours of Prouinces abroad ſhould keepe greater Armies, than were needefull or eaſie to be retained about the perſon of the King in Macedonia; it ſeemed expedient, that the face of the Court ſhould be filled with all maieſtie, that might giue authoritie to the Iniunctions from thence proceeding, and by an awfull regard containe within the bounds of dutie ſuch as could not by force haue beene kept in order, being ſtrong, and lying too farre off.

Such care was taken for preuention of imaginarie dangers and out of ſight, whileſt preſent miſchiefe lay vnregarded in their boſomes. Caſſander, the Sonne of Antipater, was not able to diſcouer that great ſufficiencie in Polyſperchon, for which his father had repoſed in him ſo much confidence: neither could hee diſcerne ſuch oddes in the qualitie of himſelfe and Polyſperchon, as was in their fortune. Hee was left Captaine of one thouſand; which Office by practice of thoſe times was of more importance, than the title now ſeemes to implie. He ſhould thereby haue beene as Campe-maſter, or Lieutenant generall to the other: a place no way ſatisfying his ambition, that thought himſelfe the better man. Therefore hee began to examine his owne power, and compare with the forces likely to oppoſe him. All that had relied on his Father, were his owne aſſured, eſpecially ſuch as commanded the Garriſons beſtowed in the principall Cities of Greece. The like hope was of the Magiſtrates, and others of principall authoritie, in thoſe Common-weales, whoſe formes had beene corrected by Antipater, that they would follow the ſide, and draw in many partakers: it concerned theſe men in their owne particular to adhere vnto the Captains, by whom their faction was vp-held; and by whom the rascall multitude, couetous of regaining the tyrannous power which they had formerly exercised ouer the principall Citizens, were kept in order, obaying their betters perforce. Besides all these helpes, Cassander had the secret loue of Queene Euridice, who had in priuate rendered him such courtesie, as was due onely to her husband. But neither the Queenes fauour, nor all his other possibilities, gaue him confidence to breake out into open rebellion; becausse he saw Polysperchon much reuerenced among the Macedonians, and strong enough to suppresse him, before he could haue made head. Therefore he made shew of following his pleasures in the countrie, and calling many of his friends about him, vnder pretence of hunting, aduised with them vpon the safest course, and most free from all suspition. The necessitie was apparant of raising an Armie, before the businesse were set on foot; and to doe this, opportunitie presented him with faire meanes. Ptolomie had by fine force, without any commission, annexed Syria to his gouernement of Ægypt and Cyrene: this was too much either for the King to trust him with, or for him to part with. Antigonus vpon the first newes of Antipaters death, began to lay hold vpon all that hee could get, in such sort, that he manifestly discouered his intent of making himselfe Lord of all Asia. These two therefore stoode in neede of a ciuill Warre; which Cassander well noted, and presumed withall, That the friendship which had passed betweene his Father and them, would auaile him somewhat. Whereupon hee secretly dispatched messengers to them both; and within a little while conueied himselfe on a sudden ouer the Hellespont, that hee might in person aduance the businesse with greater speede. Much perswasion is needlesse in winning a man to what he desireth. Antigonus coueted nothing more, than to finde Polysperchon worke, by raising some commotion in Greece. Yet (as formalities must not be neglected) Cassander did very earnestly presse him, by the memory of his Father, and al requisite coniurations, to assist him in this enterprise; telling him, that Ptolomie was readie to declare for them, and vrging him to a speedie dispatch. Antigonus on the other side repaied him with the same coine; saying, That for his owne sake, and his dead Fathers, whom he had very dearely loued, hee would not faile to giue him all manner of succour. Hauing thus feasted one another with words, they were nothing slacke in preparing the common meanes, leading to their seuerall ends.

The vnworthie courses held by POLYSPERCHON, for the keeping downe of CASSANDER.

GReat necessitie there was of timely prouision. For Polysperchon needed no other instructions to informe him of Cassanders drift, than the newes of his departure. He was not ignorant of the ready disposition, which might be found in Antigonus and Ptolomie, to the strengthning of rebellion; and well hee knew that one principall hope of Cassander was reposed in the confidence of such as ruled in the Grecian Estate. Therefore (loning to work circumspectly) he called another Councel, wherein it was concluded, That the Popular forme of gouernment should be erected in al the Cities of Greece; the Garrisons withdrawne; and that all Magistrates and principall Men, into whose hands Antipater had committed the supreme authority, should forthwith bee either slaine or banished. This was a sure way to diminish the number of Cassanders friends, and to raise vp many enemies to him in all quarters. Yet hereby was disclosed both an vnthankefull nature in Polysperchon, and a factious malice in his adherents. For how could he be excused of extreme ingratitude, that for hatred of the Sonne went about to dishonour the Fathers actions, whose only bountie had inabled him to doe it? or what could bee said in their defence, who sought to destroy many worthie men, friends to the State, by whom the Greekes were held restrained from stirring against the Macedonians: and in opposition to their priuate Enemie, gaue the rule of things to base Companions, and such as naturally maligned the Empire? But as in mans bodie, through sinnewes newly issuing from one branch, a finger is more vexed by inflammation of his next Neighbour, than by any distemper in the contrarie hand: so in bodies politique, the humours of men, subdiuided in faction, are more inraged by the disagreeable qualities of such as curbe them in their neerest purposes, than they are exasperated by the generall opposition of such as are diuided from them in the maine trunke. Hereby it comes to passe, that contrarie religions are inuited to helpe against Neighbour Princes; bordering enemies drawne in, to the part in ciuill warres; and ancient hatred called to counsaile against iniurious friends. Of this fault Nature is not guiltie; shee hath taught the arme to offer it selfe vnto manifest losse in defence of the head: they are depraued affections, which render men sensible of their owne particular, and forgetfull of the more generall good, for which they were created.

The decree, whereby the Greekes were presented with a vaine shew of libertie, ranne vnder the Kings name; but so, as one might easily discerne, that Polysperchon had guided his pen. For the maine point was, That they should follow such directions, as Polysperchon gaue, and treate with him about all difficulties. In the rest it contained such a deale of kindnesse, as proceeding on a sudden from those who had kept them in hard subiection, might well appeare to haue some other root than the pretended good will; and was of it selfe too base and vnfit for a King to vse toward his conquered Subiects, and often-subdued Rebels.

§. XV.

Of the great commotions raised in Athens by POLYSPERCHONS decree. The death of PHOCION.

NEuertheleſſe the Athenians with immoderate ioy entertained this happie-seeming Proclamation, and sought how to put it in execution without further delay. But Nicanor, Captaine of the Garrison, which kept one of their Hauens, called Munychia, in the lower part of the Towne, would needes take longer time of deliberation, than was pleasing to their hastie desires.

Nicanor, as a trusty follower of Cassander, was by him shifted into the place, and Menillus (that was Captaine there before) discharged, when Antipater was newly dead. His comming to Athens was no way gratefull to the Citizens, who soone after hearing the newes of Antipaters death, cried out vpon Phocion, saying, That hee had sufficient intelligence of that accident, and might by aduertising them in due time, haue put into their hands a faire opportunity of thrusting out the Macedonians. But these exclamations argued no more than a desire to shake off the Macedonian yoke. Farre more grieuously would they haue beene offended, had they knowne the instructions, which Cassander had giuen to Nicanor, and his resolution to follow them. It was concluded, That he should not only retaine Munychia, any iniunction to the contrarie notwithstanding; but that hee should finde meanes to thrust some Companies into Pireus, and fortifie that also, which was the principall Hauen, against the high-Towne. How to accomplish this, he rather wanted some reasonable pretence, than good abilitie. But the Athenians were not long in giuing him sufficient cause to do that, which he would haue done without any cause giuen. They desired him to come vnto their Councell, assembled in the Pireus, there to consider of the Kings Proclamation: whither vpon Phocions word and safe conduct he came, and earnestly pressed them to hold with Cassander in the warre which was ready to breake forth. Contrariwise they vrged him first of all, to make them Masters of their owne, which how to vse, they might consult afterwards. Each of them refusing to condescend vnto the others demand; the Athenians (who did alwaies measure iustice by profit, yet seldome thriued by that course) practised with Dercyllus, a Captaine following Polysperchon, and then lying neere at hand, that he should enter into the Towne, and take Nicanor prisoner. But Phocion, who then gouerned in Athens, a man very vnlike to the rest of the Citizens, being nothing pleased with such a tricke of politique dishonestie, did quietly suffer him to depart and saue himselfe.

Nicanor hereupon beganne to deuise vpon taking Piræus; not as following now the proiect of Cassander, but prosecuting his owne iust reuenge. He leauied as many Souldiers as he could, and drew them closely into Munychia; which done, he issued into Piræus, tooke it, and intrenched himselfe therein, to the exceeding discomfort of the Athenians, who lately impatient of his keeping the one Hauen, saw him now Master of both. Alexander, the sonne of Polysperchon, came thither shortly after with an Armie. Then were the Citizens in great hope of recouering all, and addressed themselues vnto him; who made faire shewes, intending meere mischiefe, which they perceiued not, being blinded with the vaine Epistles of his Father, and of Olympias the old Queene. Olympias taking vpon her to command, before shee durst well aduenture to returne into Macedon, had peremptorily charged Nicanor to restore to the Athenians the places which hee held: but hee would first consider more of the matter. Polysperchon had further ordained, that the Isle of Samos should be rendred vnto them: a goodly offer, had it accorded with his power and meaning. He was (indeede) so farre from purposing to let them haue Samos, that as yet he did not throughly intend to let them haue themselues. The commoditie of their Hauens was such, as he would rather get into his owne hands, than leaue in theirs; yet rather wished in theirs, than in Cassanders. His sonne Alexander not ignorant of this, made faire shew to the Athenians, and spent much labour in communing with Nicanor, but suffered not them, for whom he seemed to labor, to intermeddle with the businesse. Hereupon the Citizens grew iealous, and the displeasure they conceiued against him they powred out vpon Phocion, depriuing him of his office. This was done with much tumult: banished men and strangers, thrusting themselues into the assembly of the Citizens, who distracted with sundry passions, growing out of their present misfortunes, thought euery one that best could inueigh against things past, a most likely man to finde some remedie for the euill threatning them. In this hurly burly was Alexander deuising how he might come to some good point of composition with Nicanor, and held much priuie conference with him; which he could not so secretly carrie, but that his negotiation was discouered, whereby the vp-rore in the Towne was so farre increased, that Phocion with many of his friends were accused, and driuen to seeke saueguard of their liues by flight. So they came to Alexander, who entertained them gently, and gaue them his letters of commendation to his Father, desiring him to take them into his protection.

Polysperchon was in the Countrie of Phocis, readie to enter with an Armie into Attica. Thither came Phocion with his Companions, hoping well that the letters which they brought, and their owne deserts, (hauing alwaies beene friends to the Macedonians, as farre as the good of their Countrie gaue leaue) should be enough to get patronage to their innocencie. Besides all this, Dinarchus a Corinthian, Polysperchons familiar friend, went along with them, (in an euill houre) who promised to himselfe and them great fauour, by meanes of his acquaintance. But Polysperchon was an vnstable man, very earnest in what he tooke in hand, yet, either for want of iudgement in following them, or of honestie in holding the best of them, easily changing his intended courses, and doing things by the halues, which made him commonly faile of good successe. For feare of Cassander, he had offered wonderfull kindnesse to the Athenians; this had caused them to loue him: out of their loue hee gathered hope of deceiuing them, which made him to change his minde, and seeke how how to get into his owne hands those keyes, with which Cassander held them fast lockt vp: finding himselfe disappointed of this purpose, and suspected as a false dishonourable man, hee stood wauering betweene the contrarie allurements of profit and reputation. To keepe the Athenians perforce at his deuotion, would indeede haue done well: but the effecting of this beganne to grow desperate; and many Townes of importance in Greece beganne to cast their eyes vpon his proceeding in that action. Wherefore hee thought it the wisest way to redeeme their good opinion, by giuing all contentment vnto the popular faction, which then was growne to be Master of that Citie. And in good time for this purpose were the Athenian Embassadours come, treading (as one may say) vpon Phocions heeles, whom they were sent to accuse. These had solemne audience giuen to them in the Kings presence, who was attended by many great Lords, and for ostentations sake was glorified with all exteriour shewes of majestie; yet all too little to change Aridæus into Alexander: for he did nothing there, but either laugh or chafe, as hee saw others do. For beginning of the businesse Polysperchon commanded that Dinarchus should be tortured and slaine. This was enough to testifie his hearty affection to the Commonaltie of Athens, in that he spared not his old acquaintance for their sake; whose Embassadours hee then bade to speake. When their errand was done, and answere to it made by the accused, who had no indifferent hearing, Phocion and the rest were pronounced guiltie of treason; but to giue sentence, and doe the execution vpon them, was (for Honours sake) referred vnto the Citie of Athens, because they were Burgesses. Then were they sent away to Athens, where the rascall multitude, not suffering them to speake for themselues, condemned them to die. So they perished being innocent. But the death of Phocion, a man very conspicuous, made the fortune of the rest to be of the lesse regard. Fiue and fortie times had hee beene chosen Gouernour of the Citie, neuer suing for the place, but sent for when hee was absent: so well was his integritie knowne, and so highly valued, euen of such as were no pretenders to the same vertue. Hee was a good Commander in Warre, wherein though his actions were not verie great, yet were they of good importance, and neuer vnfortunate. Neuer did the Citie repent of hauing followed his counsaile: nor any priuate man of hauing trusted his word. Philip of Macedon highly esteemed him; so, and much more did Alexander, who (besides other signes of his loue) sent him two hundred talents of siluer, and offered to bestow vpon him of foure Cities in Asia any one which hee would choose. But Phocion refused these and other gifts, howsoeuer importunately thrust vpon him; resting well contented with his honest pouertie: wherein he liued aboue fourescore yeeres, and then was compelled by the vnjust judgement of wicked men to drinke that poyson, which by just judgement of the righteous God, so infected the Citie of Athens, as from that day forwards it neuer brought forth any worthie man resembling the vertue of their Ancients.

§. XVI.

Of POLYSPERCHON his vaine expedition against CASSANDER.

NOt long after these things were done, Cassander with such forces as Antigonus lent him, entred into Piræus; which newes drew Polysperchon head-long into Attica, with a great Army, but so ill victualed, that he was faine to depart without any thing done. Onely hee had giuen some impediment to the enemie; who not contented with defending what he held, beganne to looke out, and make new purchases abroad. Finding therefore himselfe vnable to driue Cassander out of Athens, hee left his sonne Alexander, with such number of men, as exceeded not the proportion of victuals, to withstand his further incroching. The greatest part of his Armie he carried into Peloponnesus, to make the Countrie sure to himselfe, wherein Cassander had many Friends.

to

His doings in Peloponnesus were such, as they had beene in other parts of Greece. First, he beganne to fight with Edicts, restoring the Democratie, or Popular forme of gouernement. He commanded that the principall Citizens, that had by Antipater beene made Rulers, should be either slaine, or driuen into exile. This decree tooke immediate effect in most places: The vulgar sort being very ready to seale the Charter of their freedome and authoritie, with the bloud of those who had kept them in subjection. Yet many Cities there were, which delighted in the rule of the chiefe Citizens; and many which wished well to Cassander; especially they of Megalopolis, on whom Polysperchon meant to inflict an exemplarie punishment of disobedience to him, which he termed Rebellion. Megalopolis had in it fifteene thousand seruiceable men, well furnished of necessaries, and resolued to endure the worst. And neede there was of such resolution. For Polysperchon comming thither with all his power did so much, that he ouerthrew, by a Mine, three of their Bulwarks, and all the space of wall betweene them. But the Defendants manfully repelled the Macedonians which came vp to the breach; and at the same time with great labour they raised vp an inner wall, to beare out the next assault. The Assailants hauing failed to carrie the Towne at the first attempt, tooke much paine to cleare the ground, and make faire way for their Elephants, whose violence was likely to ouerthrow all that came in their way. But the townes-men perceiuing their drift, prepared boords driuen through with long nailes, which they vsed as gall-throps, bestowing them sleightly, couered with the points vpwards, in the way by which the beasts were to passe. Neither did they set any to encounter them in front, but appointed certaine light-armed men to beat vpon their sides with Arrowes and Darts, as they were instructed by some that had learned the manner of that fight in the Asian Warres. Of these prouisions they made happie vse in the next assault. For by them were the Elephants (wherein the enemie chiefly trusted) either sorely hurt, or driuen back vpon the Macedonians, whom they trampled vnder feet. Polysperchon came as ill furnisht for long abode to Megalopolis, as before to Athens. Therefore being neither able to dispatch the businesse quickly, nor to take such leisure as was requisite, hee forsooke the siege, with some losse, and much dishonour; leauing some part of his Armie to lie before the Towne for his credit.

After this hee sent Clitus, his Admirall, to Sea, to joyne with Aridæus that was come out of Phrygia, and to cut off all succour which might come to the enemy out of Asia. Cassander also sent his whole Fleet vnder Nicanor, who taking along with him some ships of Antigonus, came to the Propontis, where hee fought with Clitus, and was beaten. But Antigonus hearing of the ouer-throw, gathered together the ships that were escaped, and manning them very well, sent out Nicanor againe, assuring him of the victorie, as well he might. For hee sent out sufficient numbers of light-armed men, whom hee had caused to bee wafted ouer the Straights in small Vessels by night; these before day-light setting vpon Clitus, draue his men, that lay securely on the land, head-long into their ships; in which tumult Nicanor arriuing did assaile them so lustily, that few or none escaped him.

This losse at Sea, together with his bad successe by Land, brought Polysperchon into great contempt. He had a good facilitie in penning bloudy decrees, but when the execution was referred to his owne sword, he could finde the matter more difficult. Wherefore the Athenians, perceiuing that hee had left them to shift for themselues, and was not able to giue them protection against the enemie which lay in their bosomes, came to agreement with Cassander; accepting a Gouernour of his appointment; and restoring all things to the same state wherein Antipater had left them. The like inclination to the partie of Cassander, was found in very many Cities of Greece, which daily and willingly reuolted vnto him; as to an industrious man, and likely to preuaile in the end. Thus was the whole Countrie ſet in a combuſtion, vneaſie to be quenched; which preſented vnto Antigonus an opportunitie, that he neglected not, of making himſelfe Lord of Aſia.

§. XVII.

ANTIGONVS ſeekes to make himſelfe an abſolute Lord: and thereupon treates with EVMENES, who diſappointeth him. Phrygia and Lydia wonne by ANTIGONVS.

ANTIGONVS had in Antipaters life time a firme reſolution, to make vnto himſelfe the vtmoſt benefit that he might of the Armie committed to his charge. And in faire ſeaſon for aduancement of his purpoſes came the newes of Antipaters death; euen then, when all the buſineſſe in Piſidia was diſpatched, and no more imployment for the Armie remaining, ſaue onely the continuance of the ſiege of Nora; a ſmal thing of it ſelfe, but as hard as a greater matter; and requiring few men, but much time; when time of all things was moſt precious. Eumenes lay in that Fort of Nora, able to make the place good, and hoping that the mutabilitie, to which the preſent eſtate was manifeſtly ſubiect, would in continuance of ſome yeeres (which he might abide) worke more for him, than his enemies in that ſpace could worke againſt him. His moſt feare was, that for want of exerciſe in that narrow Caſtle, his men and horſes might grow ſickly and vnſeruiceable: which made him to practiſe many deuices of keeping them in health and luſtie. But when he had continued ſhut vp in this manner about a yeere, his hopes came to good paſſe, and he was eaſed of his cares by Antigonus himſelfe, whoſe forces held him beſieged.

Antigonus knowing the great ſufficiencie of Eumenes, and conſidering his fidelitie ſhewed vnto Perdiccas, thought that hee could not finde in all the world a fitter man than him, to imploy in managing thoſe high deſignes, wherein hee doubted not that hee ſhould bee withſtood by the mightieſt Princes of the Empire. Hee ſent therefore to Eumenes by one that was friend to them both, acquainting him with ſome part of his intent, and promiſing to make him a greater Lord than euer hee had beene, and the next man to himſelfe, if things fell out as he deſired: in regard whereof hee required onely his friendſhip, and thereupon ſent him an oath to take; which done, he might at his good pleaſure iſſue ſafely out of Nora, and enioy his perfect libertie. Eumenes peruſing the forme of the oath, perceiued the meaning of Antigonus; which was, rather to make him his follower than his fellow. For whereas, in a few words, it mentioned the King and Princes of the bloud, rather to keepe the Decorum, than vpon any loyall intent; the binding words and ſumme of all the reſt were ſuch, as tied him faſt onely to Antigonus, omitting all reſeruation of dutie to the King or any other. This he liked not, holding it vnſeemely to become a ſworne man to him, with whom hee had fought for the maſtrie, and being aſſured that his voluntarie aſſiſtance, which way ſoeuer he gaue, would be more acceptable, and farre more honourable, than the courſe propounded. Yet would hee not therefore breake off the negotiation, and waite for ſome better occaſion of inlargement, which might perhaps be long in comming: but ſeeming to bee well agreed with Antigonus, hee prepared to giue vp his Hold and depart. As for the oath it ſelfe, when he came to take it, he made ſhew of diſlike, in that it was not ſolemne enough for ſuch perſonages as they were, who could not be too ceremonious in teſtifying their Allegiance. The Macedonians which lay incamped before Nora, liked his words, and gaue him leaue to put in Olympias, and the children of Alexander, binding himſelfe to them and their adherents, as well as to Antigonus; and ſo he departed.

Antigonus had taken vpon him, as ſoone as hee came downe to the Sea-ſide, to remoue remoue some of the Gouernours of Prouinces, behauing himselfe according to the authoritie which hee had receiued of Antipater, to exercise in the time of warre. Neither did hee want sufficient pretence whereby to iustifie his proceedings. For if Polysperchon might lawfully hold the Protector-ship, which the old man doting on his death-bed bequeathed vnto him, as a legacie, without consent of the Princes or Souldiers; why might not he himselfe aswell retaine the Lieutenantship of Asia, that was granted vnto him for the generall good of the State, in presence of the whole Armie, by the King, and by Antipater, who had power to ordaine what should seeme conuenient whilest he liued, not to dispose of things that should happen after his death? To giue a faire colour to his ambition, this was enough: if any were not herewith satisfied, he had threescore thousand footmen, ten thousand horse, & thirtie Elephants in a readinesse to answere them.

The first that perceiued his drift, and prouided to resist him, was Aridæus Gouernour of Phrygia; who fortified the Townes of his owne Prouince, and sought to haue wonne Cyzicus, a faire Hauen Towne, and seated very conueniently for him, but was faine to goe away without it. Hereupon Antigonus tooke occasion to command him out of the Countrie. Aridæus was so farre from obeying him, that he sent forces to relieue Eumenes. Neuertheless finding that he was vnable of himselfe to make long resistance, he tooke such companies as hee could draw along with him, and so passed ouer into Europe, to complaine at the Court. The like fortune had Clitus, who ruled in Lydia, and sought the like remedy of his fortune, with some hope at the first (for both of them were entertained with very good words) which quickly vanished, and grew desperate, when they were beaten at Sea, as hath already been declared.

ANTIGONVS pursues EVMENES. EVMENES hauing authoritie from the Court, raiseth great Warre against ANTIGONVS in defence of the Royall house.

ANTIGONVS hauing thus gotten into his hands all, or most of Asia the lesse, was able to haue entred Macedon, and seized vpon the Court; which that he forbare to doe, it proceeded (as may seeme) for some of these reasons. It would haue bred as much jealousie in Cassander, as feare in Polysperchon, which might haue brought them to tearmes of reconciliation; It would aske more time then hee could spare; and the enuie which followed the Protector-ship was such, as he that had power enough without the Office, ought rather to shunne, then to pursue. Besides all this, it was manifest that Eumenes would not only refuse to take his part, but would make war vpon him in defence of the Royall house, to which it was found that Antigonus did not stand well-affected. Against him therefore hee bent his course, and with an Armie of twentie thousand foote, and foure thousand Horse, made great haste toward Cilicia, hoping to suppresse him before hee should bee able to make head.

Eumenes was one of those few that continued faithfull to their dead master, which being well knowne in the Court, hee had commission sent vnto him from thence to raise an Armie, and make warre vpon Antigonus, taking of the Kings treasure as much as hee should neede. Other letters also there were directed to all the Gouernours of Prouinces, requiring them to giue assistance to Eumenes, and bee ordered by his direction: especially to the Captaines of the olde Souldiers, called the Argyraspides, or siluer-sheelded bands, commandement was giuen to be at his appointment. He had of his old followers gathered together two thousand foote, and fiue hundred horse, before this authoritie was giuen him: but now he purposed with all the strength which he could make, to fight with Antigonus in defence of the Roiall bloud. Olympias had written to him, desiring him to bring help to her and her Nephew the sonne of Alexander; and in the meane time to giue her his aduice in that which Polysperchon required of her: for she was desirous to returne into Macedon, but suspected his ambition, as not contained within lawfull bounds. Eumenes therefore counselled her to remaine in Epirus, till such time as hee could bring the warre to a good issue; which done, he promised that his faith and care should not be wanting to the seede of Alexander.

Strange it is to consider, that in all the Empire scarce any one could be found among the Noble-men, in whom Alexanders mother, wiues, and children, might repose firme confidence, sauing onely this Eumenes, a stranger to the Macedonian bloud, borne at Cardia, a Citie of Thrace. His reputation was no more than his owne vertue had made it; his followers obeyed at their owne discretion; and compelled hee was to trauaile as farre as Persia, to gather together an Armie sufficient, to resist the enemies that pursued his heeles.

§. XIX.

How the Princes of Macedon stood affected mutually. OLYMPIAS takes ARIDEVS and EVRYDICE, whom shee cruelly puts to death.

NOw, forasmuch as in this present warre all the Rulers of the Prouinces did entermeddle; and great alterations happened, not onely in the parts of Asia, but Macedon it selfe, which brought a new face vnto the State, by the extirpation of the roiall house of Philip and Alexander: I hold it conuenient in this place, before we enter into the particulars of the warre it selfe, to shew briefly how the great ones did mutually stand affected; and by what passions they were drawne into those courses, which ouerthrew most of them, and out of their ruines built the greatnesse of a few: as likewise to what extremitie the fraction brake out in Macedon it selfe, about the maine controuersie of title to the Crowne, whereupon all other quarrels were or should haue beene depending.

Aridæus the King, being simple and fearefull, did onely what hee was bidden.

Polysperchon, desirous to continue long in Office, had a purpose to aduance the sonne of Alexander by Roxane to the Kingdome, and become Gouernour to a King of his owne making.

Eurydice the Queene discouering plainely this intent, and meaning nothing lesse than to let her husband serue as a Stale, keeping the throne warme till another were growne old enough to sit in it, grew acquainted with Cassander, who hated the memory of Alexander, and was therefore the fitter for her turne.

Cassander held fresh in minde the danger wherein his family had beene through Alexanders malice, together with the indignitie offered to himselfe by Alexander, who knocked his head against a wall for deriding one that adored him after the Persian manner. The displeasure hereof; and the pleasure which he tooke in the amorous Queene, made him to resolue, both to suppresse the linage which he hated, and to maintaine his beloued mistresse, either by supporting her weake husband, or by taking her to be his owne wife.

The rest of the Lords held it a thing indifferent who raigned ouer all, so as they might raigne in their seuerall Countries, and establish their authoritie in such wise, that it might not be taken from them.

Among

Among these, Ptolomie and Antigonus were well enough alreadie, if their ambition would haue suffered them to see it.

Pitho and Seleucus lying farre off, and being strong, had some good hope to encroach vpon their neighbours. Against these, Peucestes and some others with much adoe hardly made resistance, vntill such time as Eumenes came to them; who propounded to himselfe great matters which he liued not to accomplish.

Olympias the old Queene (as it is common with step-dames) hated the children of her husband by his other wiues. It was thought that shee had giuen poyson to Aridæus, which failing to take away his life, had much impaired both his bodie and wits. Now shee considering, that Eumenes was too full of businesse to come home so soone as she wished that he should; and that Cassander daily preuailed in Greece: thought it the best way to ioyne with Polysperchon, and set vp, as King, her Nephew Alexander, the sonne of Roxane, remouing Aridæus before Cassander were able to defend him. To this intent she procured men among her kindred in Epirus, and so tooke her way towards Polysperchon, who ioyning with her, entred into Macedon.

Eurydice hearing these newes, wrote very earnestly to Cassander, praying him to set aside all other businesse, and come to succour her. Shee her selfe by entreatie, gifts and promises, drew to her partie as many of the Macedonians as shee could, vntill shee thought her owne side strong enough; and then taking her husband with her, went boldly forth against Olympias, and the Traitor Polysperchon.

These two Queenes met armed, as if the matter should haue beene determined by their own hands, which ended without any stroke stricken, by the reuolt of those who followed Eurydice. For as soone as the Macedonians beheld Olympias; calling to mind her former Estate, and the victorious reignes of her husband and sonne, they refused to lift any weapon against her. Eurydice finding her selfe thus forsaken, fled towards Amphipolis, but was intercepted and made prisoner with her husband.

Olympias hauing obtained this victorie without bloud, thought that all things would succeed as easily, and that vpon the same considerations for which they had refused to beare Armes against her, the Macedonians would not sticke to maintaine her, whatsoeuer her proceedings were. Hauing therefore shut vp Aridæus and his wife in a close roome, where they could scarce turne round, shee fed them through a little hole, till after a while it came in her head, (for feare left the people should haue commiseration of him, that had raigned almost sixe yeeres and a halfe) to put them to death. So she deliuered Aridæus to some barbarous Thracians, who tooke away his life by cruell torments: to Eurydice she sent a sword, a halter, and a cup of poyson, willing her to choose the instrument of her owne death, who praying that the like presents might one day be sent to Olympias, yeelded her necke to the halter, hauing spent her last curses not in vaine. Nicanor the brother of Cassander, and a hundred the chiefe of his friends, did Olympias then choose out, all whom she commanded to be slaine. His brother Iolaus that was alreadie dead and buried, shee accused of poyson giuen to Alexander, & thereupon caused his Tombe to be throwne downe, and his bones to be scattered abroad. The Macedonians wondering at this furie, began to condemne themselues, and the folly of Polysperchon, who had, quite contrarie to Antipaters charge giuen on his death-bed, called this outragious woman to the gouernement of the Empire.

§. XX.

How CASSANDER was reuenged vpon OLYMPIAS.

† I.

The great expedition of CASSANDER. OLYMPIAS ſhuts her ſelfe into Pydna, where CASSANDER beſiegeth her. ÆACIDES King of Epirus, comming to ſuccour OLYMPIAS, is forſaken, and baniſhed by his owne Subiects.

CASSANDER at that time lay before Tegea, in Peloponneſus; whither when all theſe ill tidings were brought to him, hee neuer ſtaied to take the Citie, nor to giue order for the State of things in that Countrie, (though Alexander the ſonne of Polyſperchon were there with an Armie) but compounding with them of Tegea, hee willed his aſſociates to looke to themſelues as wel as they could, til his returne, and ſo in al haſte he tooke his iournie toward Macedon, carried headlong with the greedy deſire of inſt reuenge. The Ætolians had taken the Straights of Thermopylæ, in fauour of the Queene and Polyſperchon, to hinder his paſſage; but he, not willing to miſ-ſpend any time in dealing with them, got together as many ſhips as he could, great and ſmall, with which he tranſported his Army into Theſſaly. There he diuided his companies, appointing ſome vnder Callas, a ſubtile Captaine, to hold Polyſperchon buſied, who then lay incamped neere to Perhæbia; with the reſt he marched directly againſt Olympias. Shee, hauing once preuailed by the reſpect giuen to her dignitie, tooke more care how to appeare Maieſticall, than to make her ſelfe ſtrong. To this ende ſhe made a ſolemne progreſſe to Pydna, a Sea-towne, and well fenced, hauing in her companie all the flowre of the Court, eſpecially the great Ladies, among whom was Roxane, and her yong ſonne Alexander, heire to the great Alexander, by his grandmothers deſignement: who, during his minoritie, kept the Soueraigne power in her owne handes. But all this pompe ſerued to little vſe, againſt the violence of the enemie, that ſoone preſented himſelfe before the wals; onely it fed the beſieged with a vaine hope of ſuccour, that would from all partes arriue, to reſcue perſons of their qualitie. And hereof there ſoone appeared faire likelihood, which as ſoone vaniſhed, and went away in ſmoke.

For Æacides King of Epirus, made great haſte to bring ſuccour to Olympias, his coſen, with whom Deidamia his daughter was alſo ſhut vp. Neuertheleſſe, his Subiects were nothing forward in this expedition; but finding certaine paſſages taken in the way by Caſſanders men, they called vpon him to retire, and quit the enterpriſe. The Kings importunitie vrging them to proceed, and the obſtinate refuſal of the Army, brake out at length into ſuch termes, that when hee had raged in vaine againſt the multitude; his authority, with which he thought to haue preuailed vpon them, was by them taken from him, and he compelled to forſake his Kingdom, and to wander vp and downe in forraine Countries a baniſhed man, his people ioyning with the enemie, againſt whom he had led them forth to warre.

Pydna in the meane time was cloſed vp ſtraightly, both by Sea and Land, ſo that neither any could iſſue out of the Citie, nor any reliefe be conueied into it; but it held out as long as any food was left, no memorable ſeruice being done there, whilſt great actions were mannaged abroad.

†. II.

A continuation of OLYMPIAS her storie. POLYSPERCHON defeated. Extreme famine in Pydna. OLYMPIAS yeeldes to CASSANDER.

NOw, though order of time require it, that we should rehearse the doings of EVMENES and ANTIGONVS in this place, leauing OLYMPIAS yet a while to the bower of her destinie, which growes the faster vpon her, because shee may discerne it comming; yet that wee may not bee compelled to interrupt the course of our narration, by inserting her Tragedy in the midst of things, not manifestly coherent with it; wee will here (as elsewhere we haue done, and elsewhere must) continue to an ende one History, that we may not bee therewith distracted, when we shall come to the relation of another. All the hope of the besieged, remaining in Polysperchon, was in like maner disappointed, as their former trust had been, which was reposed in the succours of the Epirot. For Callas, who was sent against him, found the meanes to corrupt the greatest part of his Army with money, leauing him within a little while so slenderly accompanied, that hee was fit for no other businesse of warre, than a swift retrait. When famine had so farre preuailed in the city, that the horses were killed as a precious food, many mē feeding on the dead carcasses of their fellowes, and sawdust being giuen to the Elephants for prouender; some of the souldiers obtaining the Queenes leaue, (who could not denie it) others, without asking leaue, yeelded themselues to the enemy, & were by him gently relieued, and sent abroad into the Country. The newes of the Queenes affaires, dispersed by these men, did so affright her wil-willers, that such as had reserued themselues to the euent, came in apace, and submitted them to Cassander. At length, when the mortalitie was so great in the Towne, that the liuing were euen poysoned with the noysome sent of the dead; Olympias bethought her selfe of stealing away by Sea in a Galley that she had: wherewith her successe was as bad as in the rest. For God had appointed this Towne, by her chosen as a place of refuge, to be vnto her as a house of torment, and a Iaile, out of which shee should not be deliuered, but vnto an euill death. Being therefore vtterly broken with miseries, which daily afflicted her and the other Ladies, vnaccustomed to so wretched a kind of life, she offered composition, and with much labour hardly obtained of Cassander (who hauing fetcht her Gally out of the Hauen, accounted himselfe as good as master of her bodie) a graunt of her owne life. Immediately vpon her apprehension, Pella, the chiefe Citie of the Kingdome, was yeelded to Cassander. Amphipolis did stand out: for Aristonus, to whom Olympias had giuen charge of such forces as were left abroad in the Country, taking courage from the successe of some pettie seruices wherein hee had preuailed, began to promise himselfe great vnlikelihoods. But Olympias, to win Cassanders fauour, very earnestly required him vpon his faith to her, that he should giue it vp. He did so, and presently after was killed by his priuate enemies, that were set on by Cassander, who partly hated him vpon old respects, partly doubted him, as a man likely to seeke innouation.

†. III.

The death of OLYMPIAS, and her condition.

WHen Olympias had now heard sorrowfull tidings of all her friends, shee herselfe was called into question, and accused in an assembly of the Macedonians, for the murthers (they were so stiled in her affliction, which in time of prosperitie she called iustice) by her committed. There was shee, (being not heard nor called to speake) condemned to die. The suite was commenced and prosecuted ted againſt her, by the kindred of thoſe whom ſhe had ſlaine. But it was at Caſſanders inſtigation; who (to haſten the execution) ſent her word, that he would furniſh her, with a ſhip, and other neceſſaries, to ſaue her ſelfe by flight: which when ſhe refuſed, ſaying, that ſhee would plead for her ſelfe, and tell her owne tale; ſhe diſſembled no longer, but ſent vnto her ſuch men as hated her moſt, who tooke away her miſerable life. Shee was daughter, and ſiſter, vnto two Kings of Epirus; wife, and mother, vnto two the mightieſt Kings, of that, or many other ages; a ſtout Lady, and of vnreproueable chaſtitie, but her ambition was boundleſſe, her hatred vnappeaſable, and her furie in reuenge, moſt vnwomanly. Her peruerſe conditions made her huſband ſeeke other wiues and Concubines, which cauſed her to hate both him, and them. She was thought priuie to her husbands death; after which, very cruelly ſhe ſlew his late wife Cleopatra, hauing firſt murdered one of her two children in her armes, and with a beaſtly furie broiled the other aliue in fire, in a copper baſon. For theſe things, her ſonne Alexander (otherwiſe louing her wel) forbade her to meddle in the gouernement of Macedon. But God more ſeuere vnto cruell Tyrants, than only to hinder them of their wils, permitted her to liue & fulfill the reſt of her wickedneſſe; (which was his iuſtice vpon the adulteries of Philip, and the oppreſſion done by him and others) after all which, He rewarded her malice, by returning it vpon her owne head.

CASSANDER celebrates the funerall of ARIDEVS and EVRYDICE; and ſeekes to make himſelfe King of Macedon.

AFter her death, Caſſander gaue honourable buriall to Aridæus and Eurydice, among their Progenitors, Kings of Macedon. And looking further into his owne poſſibilities of greatneſſe, he married the Lady Theſſalonica, whom he had taken at Pydna, being the daughter of King Philip, by another of his wiues; that by her he might haue ſome title to the Crowne. For the ſame end he committed Roxane, and her yong ſonne, to cloſe priſon, remouing thereby ſome part of his impediment. And, the better to encreaſe his fame, and purchaſe loue, built a Citie, called by his owne name Caſſandria, that ſoone grew to be very great and powerfull. He reædified likewiſe Thebes in Greece, and reſtored it vnto the old inhabitants, after it had laine twentie yeeres waſte, being vtterly razed by Alexander. By theſe meanes, eſpecially by the reſtauration of Thebes, whereunto all Greece voluntarily contributed, he grew ſo ſtrong, that few remained enemies vnto him; and they, with much labour, hardly could reſiſt him. Leauing him therefore daily preuailing in Greece, we will returne to them, who contended in Aſia, for leſſe titles, but larger Prouinces, with greater forces.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the great Lordship which ANTIGONVS got in Asia.

The iourney of EVMENES into Persia. His wise dealing with those that ioyned with him.

EVMENES, hauing ioyned vnto his company the Argyraspides, made haste into the Easterne parts, to take possession of those Countries, according to his commission, and strengthen himselfe against Antigonus. Hee tooke his iourney through Cœlosyria and Phœnicia, hoping to reclaime those Prouinces, vsurped with the rest of Syria (as hath beene shewed) by Ptolomie, to the Kings obedience. But to effect this, his haste of his passing forward was too great, his Armie too little, and the readinesse of the people, to returne to their due obedience, none at all. Besides all which impediments, one inconuenience troubled him in all his proceedings, making them the lesse effectuall. The Captaines of the Argyraspides were so froward, that they scorned to repaire to him, and take his directions; and their fidelity was so vnsteadie, that he might haue more easily dealt with open Traitors. It was not expedient, that he, being Generall, should weaken his authority by courting them; neither lay it in his power to keepe them in order by compulsion. Therefore hee fained, that Alexander had appointed vnto him in a dreame, a place for their meeting, namely, in a rich pauilion, wherin an emptie throne was placed, as if Alexander himselfe had beene present at their consultations. Thus hee freed himselfe from their vaine pride; but of their faith he could haue no assurance. Yet when Ptolomie requested them, & Antigonus bribed them to forsake him, they continued (though not without considering of the matter) to take his part. So hee marched on, sending before him the Kings warrant; which Pytho & Seleucus refused to obey; not as reiecting the kings authority, but excepting against the person of Eumenes, as a man condemned to die by the Macedonian Armie, for the death of Craterus. Eumenes, knowing well that he was not to relye vpon their assistance, who stood otherwise affected then his affaires required, and were not to bee dealt with by perswasion, sought passage by strong hand, through the Countrie of Babylon, in such wise that Seleucus, hauing in vaine assaied to hinder him, by opening the sluces of Euphrates, was glad at length to grant him friendly way, as desirous to be ridde of him. Thus he came to Peucestes and the rest of the Easterne Lords, who were glad of his companie, because of the differences betweene Pytho, Seleucus, and themselues. Yet the contention about superioritie, grew verie hot among them; euery one finding matter enough, to feede his owne humour of selfe-worthinesse. But the former deuice of assembling in one pauilion, made all quiet; the conclusion euer being sure to follow that which Eumenes propounded, who was both wisest in giuing aduice, and best able to reward, by meanes of the authoritie giuen him, to take what he pleased of the Kings treasures. By these meanes he wonne to himselfe many of those, who had most power to doe good or hurt.

§. II.

§. II.

How ANTIGONVS, comming to set vpon EVMENES, was driuen off with losse.

ANTIGONVS, hearing that Eumenes lay in the Prouince of Susa, had an earnest desire to follow him, and driue him further from the Kings treasures, which were kept there. To which end, as soone as he had made himselfe strong enough, he remoued out of Mesopotamia, where he had wintered; and taking to him Pytho and Seleucus, with their men, hee marched directly against the enemies, with intent to giue them battaile. Eumenes had fortified the Castle of Susa and was retired backe toward Persia, keeping the Riuer of Tygris betweene him and his pursuers. The passages of the Riuer were wel guarded, and good espiall kept vpon Antigonus, to obserue which way he tooke. Before he came to Tygris it selfe, he was to passe ouer Coprates, a great Riuer, and not foordable, which he sought to doe by small vessels, whereof he had no great store. A great part of his Armie had gotten ouer, when Eumenes, who kept a bridge vpon Tygris, came with a thousand horse, and foure thousand foot, to see their demeanour: and finding them out of order, charged them, brake them, and draue them headlong back into Coprates, wherein most of them were drowned; verie few escaping with life, except foure thousand that yelded themselues prisoners, in sight of Antigonus, that was not able to relieue them. This losse made Antigonus glad to fall off; and the heat of that Countrie in the dog-daies, breeding diseases in his Army, by which many perished, caused him to remoue as farre as into Media. So he tooke Pithon with him; (leauing Seleucus to besiege the Castle of Susa) and seeking to go the neerest way, passed through sauage Nations, that continually vexing him with skirmishes, slew great numbers of his men, before he could arriue in Media, with his troupes that were quite heart-broken.

§. III.

Of EVMENES his cunning. A battaile betweene him and ANTIGONVS.

AFter his departure, Eumenes with his associates fell into consultation, about the remainder of their businesse. Faine hee would haue had them to enter vpon those Prouinces, which Antigonus had left behinde him; to which also the Captaines of the Argyraspides or Siuer-shields were very inclinable, as desiring to draw neerer to Greece. But Peucestes, and the rest, whose dominions lay in the high Countries, had more care of their owne particular Estates, and would needes march Eastward. These carried it; for the Armie was not strong enough to diuide it selfe into parts.

When they came into Persia, Peucestes, ruling there, feasted them royally, & sought by all meanes to win the Souldiers loue to himselfe. Eumenes perceiuing wherunto those doings tended, suffred him a while to keepe good cheare, till the time of warre drew neere. Then did he faine an Epistle, directed, as from Orontes Gouernor of Armenia, to Peucestes himselfe: The purport whereof was; that Olympias had vanquished Cassander, and sent ouer a great Armie vnder Polysperchon, to ioyne with Eumenes. These newes, as they filled the Campe with vaine ioy, so they wrought in all mens mindes a great willingnesse to obey Eumenes, by whom was the likeliest apparance of their preferment; wherein they dealt wisely, he being farre the most sufficient Commander, as they found soone after. For when Antigonus, comming out of Media, drew neere vnto them, Eumenes by some mischance was fallen sicke, and faine faine to be carried in a Litter; the Armie marched in very bad array, and was likely to haue beene forced to take battaile in that disorder. But Eumenes, when the rest of the Captaines were amazed, was carried about the Armie in his Litter, and vpon the sodaine did cast his men into so good forme, that Antigonus, perceiuing him a farre off, could not refraine from giuing him deserued commendations. Yet he did not cease to promise great rewards to the Captaines, and all sorts of men, if they would forsake Eumenes: which hopes deceiuing him, he came to the triall of a battaile. Eumenes had more Elephants than Antigonus; otherwise, he was inferiour in number both of horse and foote by a third part. The battaile was fought with variable successe, and great losse on both sides, continuing a great part of the day, and of the night following. Yet the victorie was vncertaine. For Eumenes could not force his men to lie farre from their carriages: by which meanes Antigonus (who had a more absolute command ouer his) incamping on the ground whereon they fought, had in his power the dead bodies; which was accounted the signe of victorie; for he buried his owne, and gaue leaue to his enemies craving it, to doe the like. But a greater signe of victorie had Eumenes. For he abode still in the same place, and not onely buried his men very honourably, at great leisure, but held the Countrie round about; whereas Antigonus was glad (hauing tarried but one day) to steale away by night, and returne into Media, from whence he came.

§. IIII.

Of diuers stratagems practised by ANTIGONVS, and EVMENES, one against the other.

THus did the Warre continue doubtfull, and was protracted to a greater length, each part hauing stout Souldiers, and skilfull Generals: but the side which had hitherto preuailed, being hindred by the equall authoritie of many, from pursuing all aduantages to the best. Antigonus grew dayly weaker in men and reputation, so that to repaire himselfe he could finde no way safer, then to put all to aduenture. Hee knew that his enemies lay in their wintering places, quartered farre asunder, so that if he could suddenly come among them, he was likely to put them in great distresse. Betweene him and them, the way was not long, being onely nine daies iourney, but very bad, through a rough drie wildernesse, hardly passable. Another way, fairer and leading through a Countrie well peopled, but requiring twentie fiue daies iourney, he forsooke, partly for the length, partly, and chiefely, because he would come vndiscouered. So therefore taking his iourney in the dead of Winter, he forbade vnto his men the vse of fire by night, because he would not haue them descried a farre off. This commandement had beene well obserued foure or fiue daies, when continuance of time (as commonly) breeding negligence, and the cold weather pinching them, they were bold to cherish themselues, being neere to their wayes ende. The light of these fires gaue notice of their comming; which being reported to Peucestes, and other Captaines, they were so astonished with the sodaine danger, that in all haste they betooke themselues to flight. But Eumenes, meeting with the newes, began to harten his affrighted companions, promising to make Antigonus march leisurely, and willing them to abide, and draw vp their men together. They could scarce beleeue him; yet they were content to be ruled, and did as hee appointed, who failed not in making his word good. Hee tooke with him some companies of the readiest men, wherewith hee occupied certaine toppes of mountaines, looking toward the Campe of Antigonus: there he chose a conuenient ground to incampe vpon, and made great store of fires in sundrie places, as if the whole Armie had beene present. This was a sorrowful spectacle to Antigonus who thought himselfe preuented of his purpose; and began to feare lest he should be compelled to fight, whilest his men were tired with a long and painefull journey. Therefore hee resolued to turne aside, and take the way to such places, as might better serue to refresh his Armie. This he did with great care and circumspection, at the first, as knowing how readie Eumenes would be vpon all aduantages. But after a while, considering that no enemie stirred about him, hee began to pause, and thinke in himselfe, that somewhat or other was not fallen out according to his opinion. To be the better informed in the matter, he caused some Inhabitants of that Desert to be taken, and brought before him; of whom he learned, that they had seene no other Armie than his thereabout, but onely a few men that kept fires on the hil-tops. It vexed him exceedingly to finde that he had been so deluded. Therfore he went against these troupes with great furie, meaning to take sharpe vengeance on them, for hauing so deceiued him. But by this time, sufficient strength was arriued there, which could not be forced without much businesse, and long stay. All the Armie was come, saue onely Eudamus, Captaine of the Elephants, who, besides those beasts, had no more than foure hundred horsemen in his company. Antigonus hearing of this supply comming to his enemies, sent aboue two thousand horse, and all his light-armed footmen, to cut it off by the way. Eudamus being fallen into this danger, was faine to place his Elephants round about his carriages, and so to defend himselfe as well as he could; for his horsemen, ouerlaied with multitudes, were quickly broken, and driuen to runne away vpon the spurre. Neither knew they, who sate vpon the Elephants, which way to turne them; for on all sides they receiued wounds, and were not able to requite them with the like. In this extremitie there appeared braue troupes of horse and foot, that came vnexpected to the rescue; and charging the assailants vpon the backe, draue them to seeke their owne safetie by speedy flight. These were sent by Eumenes; who though hee knew not what his aduersarie meant to doe, yet hee knew very well what was fittest for him to doe: and therefore, playing both games himselfe, prouided the remedie.

§. V.

The conspiracie of PEVCESTES and others, against EVMENES his life.

BY these meanes Eumenes wanne great honour, and was by the whole Armie acknowledged a most expert Generall, and well worthy of the chiefe command. But Peucestes, and the other Captaines, guiltie of their own much insufficiencie, were so transported with enuie, that they could now no longer contain their vile thoughts, but held communication, as vpon a necessarie point, how they might finde meanes to murder him.

Surely, it is great injustice to impute the mischiefe, contriued against worthy men, to their owne proud carriage, or some other ill deseruing: For, though it often happen, that small vices doe serue to counterpoyse great vertues; (the sense of euill being more quicke and lasting, than of good) yet hee shall bewray a very foolish malice, that, wanting other testimonie, will thinke it a part of wisedome, to finde good reason of the euils, done to vertuous men, which oftentimes haue no other cause than their vertue it selfe. Eumenes, among many excellent qualities, was noted to bee of singular courtesie, of a very sweet conuersation among his friends, and carefull by all gentle meanes to winne their loue, that seemed to beare him any secret ill affection. It was his meere vertue that ouerthrew him, which euen they that sought his life acknowledged. For they concluded that hee should not be slaine, before the battaile were fought with Antigonus, wherein they confessed that it stood best with their safety, to be gouerned by his directions. Of this treason, son, he was quickly aduertised by Eudamus, to whom he had done many pleasures, and by some others of whom he vsed to borrow money when hee needed not, to the end that they should be carefull of his good, for feare of losing their owne. Considering therefore, and discoursing with himself of the villanie intended against him, hee made his last will, and burnt all his writings that contained any matter of secret: which done, hee reuolued many things in his minde; being doubtfull what course were best to follow. All the Nobles of the Empire stood ill affected to the Royall bloud, excepting those which were with him, that were more in number, than in worth. How things at that time stood in Macedon and Greece, either he knew not, or, knowing the truth, knew nothing that might encourage him to seeke their helpe, that needed his. To make his owne peace with Antigonus, had beene against his faith to Olympias, and the Princes, that had committed this great power into his hands. For which cause also it may be thought, that hee forbare, either to lose the battaile willingly, or to flye into Cappadocia, and make shift for himselfe among his old friends. At length hee resolued to doe his best against the common enemie, and afterwards to looke to himselfe as well as he might.

§. VI.

The last battaile betweene ANTIGONVS and EVMENES.

THe Souldiers, especially those old bands of the Siluer-shields, finding Eumenes perplexed, and not knowing the cause, entreated him not to doubt of the victorie, but onely to bring them into the field, and set them in array; for the rest, they alone would take sufficient order. The like alacritie was generally found in the common Souldiers faces; but the chiefe Commanders were so mischieuously bent against him, that they could not endure to thinke vpon being beholding to him for the victorie. Yet he ordered the battaile so well, that, without their owne great fault, they could hardly faile of getting the vpper hand.

Before the Armies came to joyning, a horse-man from the side of Eumenes, proclaimed with a loud voice to the followers of Antigonus, That their wickednesse, in fighting against their owne fathers, would now bee punished, as it well deserued. This was not spoken in vaine. For the Siluer-shields were men of threescore or seuentie yeeres olde, strengthned more by continuall exercise, than decaied by age, and excelling in courage, as hauing passed through greater dangers, than any like to be presented in that fight. Therefore Antigonus his men (who had often been beaten by them, and were now to trie their last hope with these resolute warriours, the most Ancient and best regarded of all Alexanders Souldiers) grew very pensiue, and aduanced heauily, suspecting their owne cause, and fearing the threatnings vttered would proue true.

Antigonus was now againe farre the stronger in horse, which gaue him cause of great hope; the ground, on which they were to fight, being a plaine leuelled field. Placing therfore himselfe and his sonne Demetrius in his right wing, and committing the left wing to Pithon, hee did set forward couragiously against the enemies, that were readie to giue him a sharpe entertainment.

Eumenes tooke vnto him Peucestes, with the rest of the Lords, and stood in the left wing of his battaile, in the face of Antigonus, meaning both to preuent the Traitors, his Companions, of all meanes to make head against him on the sodaine, and (withall) to giue proofe of his owne valour, which perhaps he should no more doe, in the face of all his enemies. In the right wing, opposite vnto Pithon, hee bestowed the weakest of his horse and Elephants, vnder one Philip, an honest man, and (which was enough at such a time) obedient: commanding him to protract the fight fight, and make a leisurable retrait, expecting the euent of the other side.

So they joyned very fiercely; Antigonus, labouring to make himselfe master of all; Eumenes, to die an honourable death, or to winne such a victorie vpon his open enemies, as might giue him leisure and opportunitie to deale with his false friends.

The footmen of Antigonus, being, euen in their owne opinions, farre inferiour to those whom they must encounter, were at the first brunt presently defeated by the Siluer-shields, who slew aboue fiue thousand of them, losing of their owne, not one man. But in horse, Eumenes was so ouer-matched, that he could not repell Antigonus, who pressed him very hard, but was faine to stand wholly vpon defence. Yet his courage wrought so well by example, among his followers, that the enemie could not winne one foot of ground vpon him, vntill such time as Peucestes, with one thousand fiue hundred horse, withdrew himselfe out of the battaile, leauing his companions fighting to defend his backe.

Then did Eumenes desperately rush amongst his enemies, labouring to breake open the way vnto Antigonus himselfe. And though hee failed of his purpose; yet with great slaughter he did so beate vpon them, which came in his way, that the victorie hung a long time in suspence, vncertaine which way to incline.

The ground whereon they fought, being of a slight sandie mould, through the trampling of horses, men, and Elephants, did cast vp such a cloud of dust, as hindered the prospect, so that no man could see what was done a little from him. Antigonus finding this aduantage, dispatched away some companies of horse, that passed vndiscouered beyond Eumenes his battailes, and came to his carriages, which lay about halfe a mile from the place of fight, slenderly garded, (for that the whole body of the Armie lay betweene them and danger) and therefore easily taken. Had Peucestes retired himselfe no further than vnto the carriages, hee might not onely haue defended them, but peraduenture haue surprised those which came to surprise them, and so haue done as good a piece of seruice as a better man. But he was gotten somewhat further, to a place, where out of danger hee might expect the euent: and Eumenes was so ouer-laboured both in body and minde, that he could not giue an eye to euery place, being not well able to continue where he was.

It happened so, that the Elephants meeting together, those of Antigonus had the better hand; wherupon Eumenes, finding himself euery way ouer-charged, began to giue back, and withdrew himselfe and his companies in good order, to the other side of the battaile, where Philip (as hee was directed) had by fighting and retiring together, kept that wing from losse. The Antigonians had felt so much of Eumenes that day, that they were well contented to let him depart quietly, and wished not to see him come againe; as faine he would haue done.

The losse of the carriages was reported vnto him, as soone as he had any leisure to heare how things went: whereupon hee presently ordered his men for a fresh charge, and sent for Peucestes that was not farre off, requesting him to bring in his men, and renew the fight, whereby hee trusted, not onely to recouer their owne goods, but to enrich themselues with the spoiles of the enemies. Peucestes not only refused to joyne with him, but immediately withdrew himselfe into a safer place, where he might be further from such dangerous temptations.

By this, the night grew on; and both Armies, wearied with fighting, were desirous to returne into their Campes. Yet Antigonus conceiued hope of doing somewhat more; and therefore taking halfe his horsemen, hee waited vpon Eumenes a part of his way homewards, but found no opportunitie to offend him: the other halfe hee committed to Pithon, willing him to set vpon the Siluer-shields in their retrait; which yet he forbare to do, because it appeared too full of danger. So the battaile ended; wherein Antigonus had not so much the better in horse, as the worse in foote: but the spoile which hee got, by surprising his enemies carriages, made amends for all his other losses.

How EVMENES was betrayed to ANTIGONVS, and slaine.

EVMENES, comming into his Campe, and finding the Siluer-shields extremely discontented with their misfortune, beganne to cheere them vp, and put them in hope of recouering all with aduantage. For their braue demeanor that day had so crushed the enemy, that he had no power left, wherewith to abide them in open field, and was much lesse able to draw their Carts after him, through that great Wilderneſſe, ouer the high mountaines.

But these perswasions auailed nothing. Peucestes was gone; the other Captaines would needs returne into the high Countries; and the Soldiers had no desire either to flie or to fight, but onely to recouer their goods. Wherefore Teutamus, one of the two Captaines of the Siluer-shields, (who had in former times readily consented vnto traiterous motions, in hope of gaine, but was letted by his partner Antigenes) finding, as he thought, a fit occasion of making himselfe great, and winning the loue of those bands, dealt secretly with Antigonus, requesting him to restore vnto those old Souldiers their goods, which he had taken, being the onely reward of their seruices, in the warres of Philip and Alexander.

Antigonus, as a subtile man, knew very well, that they which requested more than they had reason to expect, would also, with a little entreatie, performe a great deale more than they promised; and therefore he louingly entertained the messengers, filling them with hopes of greater matters than they desired, if they would put Eumenes into his hands, by whom they were seduced to make warre against him. This answere pleased them so well, that they forthwith deuised how to deliuer him aliue. Wherefore comming about him, as at other times, to doe their dutie, and pretending more ioy of their victorie, than sorrow of their losse, which they said they would redeeme by another fight; in the middest of this goodly talk they leapt vpon him, caught hold of his sword, and bound him fast. So they haled him away; and stopping their eares against all perswasions, would not yeeld so far, as to looſen one of his hands and let him kill himselfe, but brought him aliue (that was their owne Generall, vnder whom they had obtained many victories) as it had beene in triumph, into the Campe of their enemies.

The presse of men, running out of the Campe to see him, was so great, that Antigonus was faine, to send a guard of horsemen and Elephants, to keep him from being smothered; whom he could not so dainely resolue, either to kill or saue. Very few they were that sued for his life; but of these, Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus was one; the rest were desirous to be rid of him quickly; thinking belike, that if he were saued, he would soon be the chiefe in reputation, for his great abilitie. So after long deliberation, Antigonus concluded, that it was the safest way, to put him to death; which intending to haue done by famine (perhaps because he would keep it awhile in his owne power, to reuerse the sentence, as desiring, if it might be, to haue him liue his friend) haste of other businesse made him doe it by the sword.

To this end came all the trauailes of that worthy generall Eumenes; who had with great wisedome, fidelitie, and patience laboured in vaine, to vphold the family which God had purposed to cast downe. He is reckoned among the notable examples of Fortunes mutabilitie; but more notable was his gouernment of himselfe, in all her changes. Aduersitie neuer lessened his courage, nor Prosperitie his circumspection. But all his vertue, industrie, and wit, were cast away, in leading an Armie, without full power, to keepe it in due obedience. Therefore it was not ill answered, by Gaspar de Collignie, Admiral of France in our dayes, to one that foretold his death, which ensued soone after in the massacre of Paris; That rather than to leade againe an Armie of Voluntaries, he would die a thousand times.

Antigonus

Antigonus himselfe gaue to the bodie of Eumenes honourable Funerall; and rewarded the Treason, wrought against him, with deserued vengeance. One chiefe Captaine of the Siluer-shields he burnt aliue; many of the other Captaines he slue; & to the whole multitude of the Siluer-shields, that had betraied so worthy a Commander, he appointed a Leader, that should carrie them into farre Countries, vnder pretence of warres; but with a priuy charge, to consume them all, as periured wretches, letting none of them returne aliue vnto his friends and kindred, or so much as once behold the Seas, that beate vpon the shoares of Greece and Macedon.

§. VIII.

How ANTIGONVS slew PITHON, and occupied MEDIA. How he remoued Gouernours of Prouinces, and made himselfe Lord of Persia, carrying away PEVCESTES.

THe two Armies being ioyned thus in one, were carried into Media, where they spent the rest of the Winter; the common Souldier idly; the principall men intentiuely bent vnto the businesse ensuing. Pithon began to consider his owne deseruings; for that the whole warre had beene chiefely maintained by the strength and riches of his Prouince. Besides, he thought himselfe as good a man as Antigonus, vnlesse it were in the Souldiers opinion, which he iudged easie to be purchased with gifts, and therefore spared not to assay them with great liberalitie. But in following this course, hee was driuen by necessitie to trust many, of whom he stumbled vpon some, that were vnsecret, and others, bearing him no sincere affection. Thus was his purpose discouered to Antigonus, who (nothing like to Pithon) dissembled his indignation, and rebuked the informers, as breeders of dissension betweene him, and his honourable friend; vnto whom hee meant to commit the Gouernment of all those Countries: his owne businesse calling him into the lower Asia. These reports, comming daily to his eares, did finely delude Pithon. By his greatnesse with Alexander; his authoritie in that Prouince where they lay, whereof he was Gouernour; and the loue of the souldiers which he had bought with money; he was strong enough to maintaine, euen an offensiue warre. But what needs had he to vse the sword, when hee was likely without contention, to obtaine more than his owne asking? Therefore he came as soone as he was sent for, to take his farewell of Antigonus, and to diuide the Prouinces with him, that meant nothing lesse than to yeeld to any such diuision. As soone as he came, he was taken, and accused, condemned to die, and slain out of hand. For Antigonus, hauing begunne with Eumenes his ancient friend, was not afterward restrained by any consideration of old acquaintance, from cutting down indifferently all that stood in his way: but swamme carelesly through the bloud, wherein at the first he doubtfully waded.

When this businesse was ended, he appointed a new Gouernour in Media, to order the Prouince, and a Captaine, to suppresse all commotions: thinking belike, that the power and authoritie, so diuided, would hardly agree in one against him, from whom both were deriued.

After this he marched into Persia, where he was entertained, as absolute Lord of Asia. There began he to shew how well he vnderstood his owne mightinesse. For he placed and displaced, at his pleasure, Gouernours in all Prouinces, leauing none in Office, that were not his owne creatures, excepting such as lay too farre off to be dislodged easily.

Peucestes, who ruled in Persia, thought with good cheere to redeeme old offences, but was deceiued, hauing to doe with one, that could not be taken with such baites: he was caried away, and feasted with goodly words of promise, that neuer tooke effect. Thus he, that enuied the vertue of his friend, was driuen to flatter (in vaine) the the fortune of his enemie; after which he liued a contemptible life, till hee died obscurely a man forgotten.

How SELEVCVS was chased out of Babylon, by ANTIGONVS. The great riches of ANTIGONVS.

SELEVCVS was the next in this visitation; one that had from time to time continued in the same tenor of good-will to Antigonus, and now gaue proofe of his heartie affection toward him, by making the Captaine of the Castle of Susa to meete him on the way, rendring vnto him that strong Peece, and all the treasures therein bestowed. This offer was so great, that Antigonus (though hauing in his hands the Keeper of the place) could hardly beleeue it; but vsed him with excessiue kindnesse, for feare so good a moode should change. In that Castle he found all the treasures of Alexander, with the Iewels of the Persian Kings, which, added to his former store of money, made vp twentie fiue thousand talents. Hauing all this, he might well account himselfe a happy man, if riches were sufficient to happinesse. But large dominion was the marke at which hee aimed; therefore hee proceeded, with intent to leaue no Country behind his back, that should not acknowledge him for Soueraigne Lord. Comming to Babylon, hee was entertained by Seleucus with all possible demonstration of loue, and honoured with presents, beseeming the Maiestie of a King. All this he accepted with great grauitie, as being due to him; and beganne to require an account of the reuenues of that Prouince. This demaund Seleucus held vnreasonable; saying, that it was not needfull for him to render vnto any man an account of that Prouince, which was giuen vnto him, in respect of his many good seruices to the State. But whether he spake reason or no, it sufficed, that Antigonus was powerfull; who vrged him daily to come to a reckoning. Manifest it was, that neither want of money, nor any other necessitie, moued Antigonus to presse him thus, but onely the desire to picke matter of quarrell against him, whereof it was likely that hee should find such issue, as Python and Peucestes had done. Therefore taking with him onely fiftie horse, he conueied himselfe away, and fled into Ptolomies Dominions; desiring him to protect him from the violence of such a man, as went about to oppresse all, that in former times had beene his betters, or at least his equals. Antigonus was glad of his flight; for now all those Countries were yeelded vnto him without battaile, whereas to fight with Seleucus for them hee wanted all pretence; and to kill him it was not his desire, hauing receiued many benefits of him, and those not intermixed, as commonly it happens, with any iniuries. Yet it is reported, that the Chaldeans brought a strange prophesie to Antigonus, bidding him looke well to himselfe, and know, that if Seleucus did escape his hands, hee should recouer Babylon, yea, winne all Asia, and kill Antigonus in battaile. Easie beleeuers may giue credit to this tale. Had it beene true, me thinkes, Antigonus rather should haue hanged those Chaldeans, for giuing him no warning till it was too late, than sent pursuers (as they say that hee did) after him, whom the destinies preserued for so great purposes.

When he had settled things at Babylon, he tooke his journie into Cilicia, where he wintred. There hee tooke vp ten thousand talents more of the Kings treasures, and casting his accounts, found his yeerely income to amount vnto eleuen thousand Talents.

CHAP. V.

Of the great ciuill Warre betweene ALEXANDERS Captaines: and how they assumed the name and state of Kings.

§. I.

The combination of PTOLOMIE, CASSANDER, and others, against ANTIGONVS. Their demands, and his answere.

HIS great riches, and the rest of his power, made Antigonus dreaded, enuied, and suspected, whereby he quickly was embarked in a new War. Ptolomie, Cassander, and Lysimachus, had priuily combined themselues together, intending to hinder his further growth, and bring him to more reason, than of his owne accord he seemed like to yeeld vnto. Of their practices he had some notice; the good entertainement giuen vnto Seleucus, giuing him sufficient cause of mistrust. Therefore he sent Embassadors to them seuerally, entreating them to continue firme in their loue toward him, that would be readie to requite them with the like. The cold answers which they made, occasioned his hasty preparation against the most forward of them, which was Ptolomie; it being likely that a good armie should preuaile more than a faire message. Therefore, as soone as the season of the yeere would permit, he tooke the way toward Syria, and was encountred by Embassage from them all. These told him, that their Lords did much reioyce at his victorie, obtained against Eumenes their common enemie, and the honor that he had therby gotten. In which war, forasmuch as they being his Confederates, must haue endured great losse, with hazzard of their whole estates, if the contrary faction had preuailed; they held it verie iust, that all should be partakers in the fruits of that voiage, wherin they had been all aduenturers. Wherefore they desired him, that making betweene them all an equall diuision of the treasures that were in his hands, (a thing easie to be done) he would also take some conuenient order for enlarging their Dominions, according to the rate of his new purchases. This might best bee to euery ones liking if hee would make ouer Cappadocia, with Lycia, to Cassander; and Phrygia, bordering vpon the Hellespont, to Lysimachus; for wheras his own Dominions were so much extended Eastward by his late victorie, he might wel spare some of those westerne Prouinces, to those that were seated in the West. As for Ptolomie, he would not craue any new addition, but rest contented within his owne Territories. Prouided alwaies, that Seleucus their common friend, and partner in the late warre, might be restored to his owne, out of which he had beene driuen so iniuriously, that all of them were forced to take it deeply to heart; requiring amends, with his friendly consent vnto their demands, which otherwise they must labour to obtaine with armed hands.

Antigonus knew, that after many losses receiued, hee should yet bee able to redeeme peace whensoeuer he listed, with these, or perhaps with easier conditions. Neither was he so weak, to giue away quietly any part of his strength into the hands of such bad friends, for feare only, lest it should bee taken from him perforce. Rather he hoped that he should be able to find them worke, more than enough to defend their owne. Therefore, he roundly answered the Embassadors, that it was no part of his meaning to communicate with other men the profit of that victorie, which he alone without other mens helpe had obtained. Though indeed they had already sufficiently gained by him, if they could see it, hauing by his meanes kept their gouernments, wherof they were like to be dispossessed by Polysperchon, and the counsell of estate in Macedon. But what maruaile was it, if they considered not how he had saued them, seeing one of them had forgotten the time, when comming to him as a fugitue, & begging succour, he was by his meere bountie relieued, and enabled to get all that he now held? Cassander did not (said he) in those daies command me to surrender Prouinces, and giue him his equall share of my treasures; but (for his Fathers sake) desired me to pittie him, and help him against his enemies: which I did; by lending him an Armie, and Fleet, on confidence whereof hee now presumes to threaten me. As for Seleucus, how can he complaine of wrong, that durst not stay to plead his right? I did vse him well; but his conscience told him that he had deserued ill: else he would not haue fled. Let them that so curiously search into my doings, consider well their owne, which some of them can hardly iustifie. I am now in the way to Syria, meaning to examine Ptolomies proceedings; and after him to deale with others, if they continue to prouoke me.

§. II.

The preparations and beginnings of the Warres.

WHen the Embassadors were dismissed with this answer, nothing was thought vpon but warre. Antigonus perceiuing that he should bee inuaded from Europe, as soone as hee were entred into Syria; left his Nephew Ptolomie to guard the Sea-coasts, and hinder Cassander from landing in Asia: giuing him also in charge, to driue out of Cappadocia some that were already sent ouer to molest him. Likewise he dispatched Messengers into Greece and Cyprus, not vnfurnished of monie, to draw friends to his side, and raise vp troubles to his enemies. Especially, he laboured to make himselfe the strongest by Sea; to which purpose he rather hastened, than foreslowed his iourney into Syria, that he might get possession of Mount Libanus, which affoorded many excellent commodities for building of a Nauie. Therefore, hauing erected Beacons, and laid post-horses throughout all Asia, to giue swift aduertisement of all occurrences, he inuaded Syria, that was not held against him by any power sufficient to maintaine the field.

Ptolomy lay in Ægypt, the strength and heart of his Dominion, where he was beloued and honoured of the people as their naturall Lord: his other Prouinces hee kept with a few Garrisons, better seruing to containe the people within obedience, than to confront a forraine enemie. So Antigonus tooke many Cities, and Places, of that Countrie, and beganne to set great numbers of Artificers on worke in making ships, which was one of his most earnest cares. In these businesses he consumed a yeere and three moneths; not idly. For he tooke Ioppe, and Gaza, which were yeelded vnto his discretion, and well vsed. The strong Citie of Tyrus held out long, but was compelled in the end, by famine, to render it selfe vpon composition, that Ptolomies Souldiers might depart with their Armes; which was permitted.

Ptolomie was not asleepe, whilest these things were in doing, though he kept himselfe within the bounds of Ægypt, as indeede it behoued him to doe. His forces were not able to stand against Antigonus in plaine field, but likely they were to increase, which made him willing to protract the time. Neuertheless by Sea (where his enemie was as yet vnready) he sent his Fleet into all quarters, whereof Seleucus had the chiefe command.

Seleucus passed with an hundred saile along the coast of Syria, in the full view of Antigonus, and his Armie, to their no little discomfort. He landed in Cyprus, which was then gouerned by many pettie Lords; of whom the greatest adhered to Ptolomie; the rest were, by the Factors of Antigonus, bought for him with gold, but now redeemed by the Ægyptian with sharpe steele.

The same commoditie of aide by Sea encouraged the President of Caria (called also alſo Caſſander, but not the ſonne of Antipater, howſoeuer by the painefull and learned writer Reinerus Reineccius, he is by ſome ouerſight, counted for the ſame) to declare for Ptolomie, and his Confederates, and buſily imploy in their quarrell all his forces, which he had hitherto kept in good neutralitie, and thereby enioyed reſt; but now he threwe himſelfe into dangerous warre, chooſing rather to vndergoe trouble at hand, than to fal vnder certaine ruine, though ſomewhat further diſtant, which would haue ouerwhelmed him, if Antigonus had beaten all the reſt.

§. III.

How each partie ſought to winne the aſſiſtance of Greece. ANTIGONVS his declaration againſt CASSANDER. ALEXANDER the ſonne of POLISPERCHON reuolteth from ANTIGONVS, who had ſet him vp.

IN the meane ſeaſon all care poſſible was taken on both ſides, to aſſure vnto them the people of Greece, whoſe aide which way ſoeuer it inclined was of great importance. Herein at the firſt, Antigonus ſped ſo well by large effuſion of his treaſure, that hee drew to him the Lacedæmonians, and other Peloponneſians, of whom hee waged eight thouſand, and cauſed Polyſperchon (who had a good while made hard ſhifts) to rowſe himſelfe againe, and taking vpon him the title of Captaine of Peloponneſus, to make head againſt Caſſander.

Theſe hopeful beginnings encouraged him to proceed further in the ſame kind. Wherefore to make Caſſander the more odious, hee called together both his owne Souldiers, and all the Greekes and Macedonians that were to bee found thereabouts. To theſe he declared, That Caſſander had very cruelly ſlain Olympias, mother to the great Alexander; and not herewith contented, had ſhut vp in cloſe priſon the poore Ladie Roxane, Alexanders wife, and his ſonne begotten on her bodie. That all this proceeded from a deſire to make himſelfe King ouer the Macedonians; which well appeared by his enforcing the Ladie Theſſalonica, Daughter to King Philip, a match vnfit for a man of no greater Parentage than he, to ioyne with him in marriage. That in meere deſpight of thoſe dead Princes, Philip, and Alexander, he had planted the Olynthians, rooted out by Philip, in a new Citie by him built, and called by his owne name Caſſandria; and had reedified the Citie of Thebes, which for the great treaſon of the inhabitants, was leuelled with the ground by the victorious hand of Alexander. For theſe reaſons hee required them to make a decree, that Caſſander ſhould reſtore to abſolute libertie the Ladie Roxane, and her ſonne; and ſhould yeeld obedience to the Lord Lieutenant Generall of the Empire (by which name Antigonus himſelfe was vnderſtood) or elſe ſhould be reputed a Traitor, and open Enemie to the State. Furthermore he propounded, that all the Cities of Greece ſhould be reſtored into freedome; this he did, not becauſe he was carefull of their good, but for the neede which he had of their aſſiſtance.

Theſe things being decreed, Antigonus was perſwaded, that not only the Greekes would adhere vnto him, as to their louing Patron, and fall off from Caſſander; but that the Rulers of Prouinces, who had hitherto ſuſpected him as a man regardfull of nothing, but his owne benefit, would correct their opinion, and thinke him the moſt faithfull of all others to the Royall bloud. But concerning his loyaltie to the yong Prince, the world was too wiſe to be deceiued with vaine ſhewes. His vndertaking for the libertie of the Greekes was more effectuall, and got eaſie beliefe, in regard of his preſent hatred to Caſſander. Yet herein alſo Ptolomie ſtroue to be as earneſt as he, making the like decree, in hope to winne to himſelfe that valiant Nation, which affoorded men farre more ſeruiceable in warre, than were to be found in any Prouince of the Empire.

And this indeede was the point, at which both ſides aimed. Wherein Antigonus thinking to make all ſure, deceiued himſelfe, not without great coſt. For he gaue to Alexander the sonne of Polysperchon fiue hundred talents, willing him to set the warre on foot in Peloponnesus, whereby it might appeare, that on his side was meant nothing else, than what was openly pretended.

In Peloponnesus; Cassanders men had, with much bloud-shed, grieuously afflicted the contrarie faction; and he himselfe perceiuing, that they were more easily spoiled as enemes, than retained as friends, thought it the best way, to make what vse he could of them, that were not long like to continue his. Finally, perceiuing that Alexander came furnished with plentie of gold, wherewith he was able, not only to winne the doubtfull, but to corrupt such as might seeme best assured: hee thought it a good part of wisedome, to surrender vpon faire conditions, that which he could not assure himselfe to hold any long time by force. Therefore he sent one to deale with Alexander, about the matters in controuersie; letting him know, that Antigonus was verie skilful in setting men together by the eares, not caring who preuailed, but only desiring to haue them wearie themselues, whilest he was busied elsewhere; that so at length he might finde opportunitie to set vpon the stronger. If therefore Alexander were so wise, as to keepe in his purse the fiue hundred Talents which he had, and without stroke stricken, to receiue the whole Lordship of Peloponnesus; it should be freely put into his hands by Cassander. Prouided, that hee should from thencefoorth renounce all confederacie made with Antigonus, and enter into a sure and faithfull league with Ptolomie, Cassander, and the rest of the Confederates. Otherwise, he might well perswade himselfe, that the Countrie which his Father could not keepe, when he was indeede the Lieutenant of the Empire, should not in haste be wonne by him, that was only the Factor of a proud iniurious man, so stiling himselfe, but not acknowledged by others.

Alexander had liued a while with Antigonus since the beginning of these wars; among whose followers it was not hard to discouer the intent, (which hee did not carrie verie secret) of making himselfe absolute Lord of all. Therefore he was soone entreated to accept so good an offer; and did not sticke to enter into that league, whereby he was to become a free Lord, and subiect vnto no mans controll.

Howbeit this his honour continued not long, ere he lost both it and his life together, by treason of the Sicyonians; who thinking thereby to haue made themselues free, were soone after vanquished in battaile by Cratesipolis, Alexanders wife, a discreet and valiant Ladie. Shee in reuenge of her husbands death, crucified thirtie of the Citizens taken in fight; and hauing by seuerity taught them obedience, did afterwards containe her Armie in good order, and gouerned those places that shee held, with the loue and commendation of her Subiects and Neighbours.

§. IIII.

The Ætolians rise against CASSANDER in fauour of ANTIGONVS, and are beaten. A fleet and land-armie of ANTIGONVS, vtterly defeated by PTOLOMIES Lieutenant. In what termes the warre stood at this time. ANTIGONVS drawes neerer to Greece.

ANTIGONVS, when he found, that with so much monie he had onely bought an enemie, beganne to raise troubles to Cassander and his other aduersaries in Greece, by stirring vp the Ætolians against them; Likewise he laboured to winne to his partie the Ilands in the Greeke Seas, by whose assistance he might be the better able to deale with Ptolomie, that greatly preuailed by reason of his strong fleet. But neither of these attempts had the successe which he expected. The Ætolians, a factious Nation, and alwaies enuying the greatnesse of their Neighbours, were often in commotion, but so, ſo, that commonly their gaines equalled not their loſſes. Caſſander wanne ſome of their owne Countrie; fortified the Acarnanians againſt them, and compelled Glaucias, King of the Illyrians, whom he vanquiſhed in battaile, to forſake their ſide, and binde himſelfe to beare no Armes againſt Caſſanders friends.

On the other ſide, as many pettie ſtands were drawne to ioyne with Antigonus: ſo the fleet of the Rhodians vnder Theodatus, who was Admirall to Antigonus, paſſing along the coaſt of Aſia towards Cyprus, with an Armie vnder conduct of Perilaus marching on the ſhore for mutuall aſſiſtance, was quite ouerthrowne by Ptolomies Nauie. Polyclytus, who in Ptolomies behalfe had been ſent into Peloponneſus againſt Alexander, finding no neede of his ſeruice in that Countrie, becauſe Alexander was come ouer to their ſide, returned homewards, and by the way heard of the courſe which theſe Antigonians held, whom he very cunningly ſurpriſed. Hee rode with his Fleet behinde a Cape, which the enemies were to double; his Land-forces he placed in ambuſh, whereinto Perilaus falling was taken priſoner, with many of his men, and many were ſlaine, making little reſiſtance. Theodatus the Admirall perceiuing this, made all haſte to helpe his fellowes that were on Land; but whileſt he with all his Fleet were intentiue only to that buſineſſe, Polyclytus appeared at their backs; who as ſoone as he perceiued their diſorder, haſtened about the Cape, and charging them behinde ſuffered not one of them to eſcape him. Theſe ill tidings cauſed Antigonus to deale with Ptolomie about ſome compoſition. Firſt, hee ſent Embaſſadors; afterwards they met in perſon. But Antigonus would not yeeld vnto the demands of Ptolomie: ſo the parlie was vaine.

Hitherto each part ſeemed to haue indifferently ſped in the Warre, and thereby to haue equall cauſe of hope and feare. This late victorie with the good ſucceſſe of his affaires in Cyprus, did ſeeme to make amends to Ptolomie for his loſſes in Syria. Likewiſe the reuolt of Alexander from Antigonus did equall the Confederacy, made betweene the Ætolians and him; as alſo thoſe pettie skirmiſhes, that had beene in Aſia the leſſe, to Antigonus his aduantage, were ſufficiently recompenſed by others of like regard, but aduerſe to him; and by the troubles brought vpon his eſtates in thoſe parts by the two Caſſanders.

Contrariwiſe, Antigonus valued the loſſe of his men, monie, and ſhips, no otherwiſe than as the paring of his nailes, that were left long enough, and would eaſily grow againe; but the enlargement of his Territorie by addition of Syria, he prized at a higher rate, as if thereby he had fed vpon a limbe of Ptolomie his enemie, and ſtrengthened the body of his owne Empire. Concerning other accidents, whereof the good were hitherto ſufficient to counterpoize the bad, he meant to proceed as occaſion ſhould direct, which commonly is not long wanting to them, that want no monie.

That which moſt moleſted him was the attempts of his enemies vpon Aſia the leſſe; wherein though as yet they had gotten little, yet had he cauſe to feare, leſt the people being tyed vnto him by no bond of allegeance, might vpon ſmall occaſion reuolt from him, to men of as honourable reputation as he himſelfe. To preuent this, and to be neerer to Greece, he held it expedient for him to be there in perſon, where his affaries did ſeeme to proſper the worſe, by reaſon of his abſence. Therefore he left part of his Armie in Syria, vnder his ſonne Demetrius, to whom being then but two and twenty yeeres old, he appointed many ancient Captaines as aſſiſtants, or rather as Directors: the reſt he carried with him into Phrygia, where he meant to winter.

How LYSIMACHVS and CASSANDER vanquished some enemies, raised against them by ANTIGONVS. The good successe of ANTIGONVS in Asia and Greece: with the rebellion of many Cities against CASSANDER.

THe comming of Antigonus into those parts, wrought a great alteration in the processe of his businesse thereabouts. For his enemies had short leisure to thinke vpon molesting him in Asia: they themselues were held ouer-hardly to their owne worke on Europe side. Seuthes a King of the Thracians, ioyning with some Townes that rebelled against Lysimachus, brought also the bordering Scythians into the quarrell. All these relyed vpon Antigonus, who was to helpe them with monie, and other aide. The Ætolians likewise tooke courage, and rose against Cassander, hauing Æacides, lately restored to the Kingdome of Epirus, their assistant. But Lysimachus gaue vnto his Rebels no time to confirme themselues. Hee sodainely presented himselfe before two of the Cities that had rebelled, and compelled them by feare to returne to their dutie. He fought a battaile with the Scythians, and wilde Thracians, and draue them out of the Countrie. Finally, he ouercame Seuthes; and following the heate of his victorie, slew Pausanias in battaile, whom Antigonus had sent ouer with an Armie; and all his men he did either put to ransome, or fill vp with them his owne Bands. The like successe had Philip, Cassanders Lieutenant, against the Ætolians. For he wasted their Countrie; fought with the Epirotes, that came to helpe them; and after the victorie, fought againe with their forces ioyned in one, ouerthrowing them, and killing Æacides that vnfortunate King. Finally, hee draue the Ætolians out of most of their Countrie, and forced them to seek their safetie among the wild Mountaines. Of the Epirotes he sent as prisoners to Cassander, the principall authors of the Kings restitution, and of the present Warre.

Yet these actions required some time, and wearied Antigonus his aduersaries with painefull trauaile; after which they remained onely sauers. Antigonus himselfe at faire leisure, wanne all Caria the whilest, and sent Armies into Peloponnesus, and other parts of Greece, bestowing libertie vpon all the Cities he tooke out of Cassanders hands. The whole Countrie of Peloponnesus (excepting Sicyon and Corinth) with the Ile of Eubœa, and many places of the firme Land, were by these meanes wonne to be his in true and vehement affection, ready to do or suffer any thing for him that had made so euident a demonstration of his readinesse, to giue them the libertie indeede, which others promised in idle words. Many States desirous of the same benefit, would faine haue shewed their good will; but they were kept in by Cassanders Garrisons, who was too wise to trust them loose. Therefore Antigonus made shew as if he would passe ouer into Macedon: by which terror he forced Cassander to repaire thither in al haste, with the best of his strength, leauing many good Townes of Greece so weakely guarded, that well they might take courage to helpe themselues, if any forraine succour appeared. The aide which they desired was not long wanting. The Lieutenants of Antigonus, taking the aduantage of Cassanders departure, entred the Countrie; draue his Garrisons out of diuers Cities; forced the Gouernour of Athens to enter into league with their Lord; wanne the Citadell of Thebes, and set the people at libertie. This last action was somewhat remarkable. For Thebes had not long before beene raised out of her old ruines by the meere power of Cassander; of which act he was accused by Antigonus, as if it had beene some hainous crime. Yet now the same Antigonus winneth the Citie, and the loue of the Inhabitants, onely by expelling him that was their Founder. So much are men readier to thanke the Increaser, than the Author of their good; and rather to looke forward vpon those hopes, which vainely they extend beyond all measure, than backward vpon their miſerable nullitie, that held them vncapable of being any thing.

§. VI.

Victories of PTOLOMIE by Sea. A great battaile at Gaza, which PTOLOMIE and SELEVCVS wanne, againſt DEMETRIVS the Sonne of ANTIGONVS.

AS the preſence or neerenes of Antigonus gaue life to his affaires in the lower Aſia, and Greece; ſo the deſignes of his enemies, taking aduantage of his abſence, ruined the very foundations of thoſe great works in the Eaſterne parts, wherewith in the yeere preceding he had ouertopped them. The Iſle of Cyprus, whoſe Princes wauered betweene contrarie affections, inclining one while to Antigonus, another while faintly regarding their couenant with Ptolomie, was viſited by an Ægyptian fleet, wherewith Ptolomie, in his owne perſon, eaſily reduced them to a more ſettled order, putting ſome to death, carrying others away priſoners, and leauing a Lieutenant of his own appointment, Gouernour of the whole Countrie. With the ſame fleet he ranne alongſt the Sea-coaſts, waſting a great part of Caria and Cilicia, with the ſpoiles of which he enriched his followers, and returned loden to Cyprus. Demetrius the ſonne of Antigonus, hearing frequent reports of the miſeries, wherewith his Fathers ſubjects were oppreſſed, made all haſte out of Syria to the reſcue, taking only his Horſe and light-armed foot with him, becauſe the buſineſſe required expedition. But in vaine did he tire himſelfe and his followers, in haſtie ſeeking of one, that by lanching out into the deepe, could in a few minutes delude the labour of ſo many daies, if neede had ſo required. Anſwerable to the vanitie of this expedition was the ſucceſſe. For Ptolomie was gone, before Demetrius came into Cilicia. Neither was it certaine, whether hauing lightened his ſhips of their burthen in Cyprus, hee would returne vpon thoſe maritime Countries; or make toward Syria, where his comming was expected. Hee was indeede gone into Ægypt, and there with Seleucus was deſcribing a royall Armie, which he leuied with all conuenient ſpeed, for the recouerie of Syria. This was more than Demetrius knew. Therfore hee was faine to chooſe out of vncertainties the moſt likelihood, and returne the way that hee came, with all his companies, which were fitter for ſeruice in the open field, than to be beſtowed in Garriſons among the Cilicians. He had ſcarce refreſhed his Men and Horſes in Syria, when the newes arriued of Ptolomies comming with a puiſſant Armie, to giue him battaile. Hereupon he called to counſaile his principall friends, who aduiſed him to giue way to the time, & expect ſome better opportunity in the future: being a yong man, and weakely furniſhed with meanes to reſiſt ſuch ancient and famous Generals, as Ptolomie and Seleucus. This counſaile ſeemed rather to proceede from the cold temper of thoſe aged men that gaue it, than from any neceſſity growing out of the preſent buſineſſe. For Demetrius conſidering himſelfe to be the ſonne of Antigonus, and now Generall of his Fathers Armie, thought his owne title waightie enough to bee laid in ballance againſt the bare names of thoſe two great Commanders. Neither found he much reaſon that ſhould moue him to diſtruſt his forces, as inſufficient. His men were better exerciſed than the enemies, and promiſed as much as could be required. Therefore perſwading himſelfe, that ſuch oddes of number, and of great fame, would rather ſerue to adorne his victorie, than hinder him in obtaining it, he reſolued to put the matter to triall, without expecting the aduantage of more help. So animating his Soldiers with hope of ſpoile and rewards, he abode the comming of the Enemies at Gaza, with purpoſe to encounter them, as ſoone as they had finiſhed their wearieſome journie ouer the Deſarts of Arabia.

Ptolomie

Ptolomie and Seleucus issuing out of so rich a Prouince, as Ægypt, came so well prouided of all necessaries, that their Armie felt not any great grieuance of the euill way, when battaile was presented them, which confidently they vndertooke. In all things else they had the ods of Demetrius; of Elephants they were vtterly vnprouided. But how to deale with those beasts they were not ignorant. They had prepared a kinde of Palisado, fastened together with chaines, and sharpened in such manner, that the Elephants could not seeke to breake vpon it, without receiuing much hurt. The rest of their forces, which (besides that they had aduantage in multitude) were heartened with many fortunate seruices, by them performed that yeere, whilest the enemies had wearied themselues, either with vaine iournies, or long and dulling expectation, they disposed in such order, as best answered to the forme, wherein Demetrius was embattailed. The fight beganne, and was maintained with equall courage, for a long time, each part striuing more to winne honour, than to satisfie any other passion, as hauing little cause of hatred, or reuenge. But after some continuance, the greater number holding better out, the error of Demetrius, who vpon no necessitie would needs fight a battaile with disaduantage, beganne to appeare by his losses. Hee had committed himselfe to Fortune, hauing more to lose by her then he could get: but in this fight shee was idle, and left all to be decided by strong hands; vnlesse it may be said, that the terror brought vpon his men, by the losse of his Elephants, was bad luck. Those beasts were in that kinde of warre hardly to be resisted on plaine ground, and therefore at the first they made great spoile amongst Ptolomies men. Afterward seeking to breake through the Palisado, they were sorely hurt, and euery one of them taken. This disaster caused the Horsemen of Demetrius to faint. They had laboured hard, and preuailed little, till now perceiuing that all must lie vpon their hands, who were ill able to make their owne places good, they beganne to shrinke, and many of them to prouide for their safetie by timely flight, which example the rest quickly followed. When Demetrius had strouen so long in vaine to make his men abide, that hee himselfe was likely to be lost; he was faine to giue place to the stronger, making a violent retrait as farre as to Azotus, which was about thirtie miles from the place of battaile. A great part of his carriages was in Gaza, whither some of his company turned aside, hoping to saue such goods, as in haste they could pack vp. This fooliish couetousnes was their destruction, and the losse of the Towne. For whilest they forgetfull of the danger, had filled the streets with sumpter Horses, & cloied vp the gates, thronging, some to get in and fetch, others, to carrie out what they had alreadie loden, Ptolomies Armie brake in without resistance, taking them with their goods and the Citie altogether.

This victorie restored vnto Ptolomie the best part of Syria, a Prouince more easie in those times to get, than to keepe; and opened the way vnto all the greatnesse of Seleucus. For betweene Gaza and Phœnicia no place offered resistance. In Cœlosyria and Phœnicia, some townes held out a while, but were soone taken in by Ptolomie. Among these were the great Cities of Tyrus and Sidon; of which Sidon was giuen vp by the Inhabitants; Tyrus by the Garrison, falling to mutinie against their Captaine; who trusting to the strength of it, had made great vaunts, but was pardoned by Ptolomie, and honourably entertained, in respect of his fidelitie.

How SELEVCVS recouered Babylon, and made himſelfe Lord of many Countries in the higheſt Aſia. The ÆRA of the Kingdome of the Greekes, which beganne with the Dominion of SELEVCVS.

WHile Ptolomie followed his buſineſſe with ſuch proſperitie, Seleucus tooke leaue of him, and went vp to Babylon, to trie his owne fortune; which hee found ſo fauourable, that recouering firſt his owne Prouince, hee became at length maſter of the better part of Alexanders purchaſes.

This expedition of Seleucus was very ſtrange, and full of vnlikelihoods. His traine conſiſted of no more then eight hundred foote, and two hundred horſe, a number too ſmall to haue been placed as Garriſon, in ſome one of thoſe maine great Cities, againſt which he carried it into the higher Aſia. But little force is needfull, to make way into ſtrong places, for him that alreadie ſtands poſſeſſed of their hearts which dwell within the walls. The name of Seleucus was enough; whom the Babylonians had found ſo good a Gouernour, that none of them would finde courage to reſiſt him; but left that worke to Antigonus his owne men, wiſhing them ill to ſpeede. Some of the Macedonians that were in thoſe Countries, had the like affection; others made a countenance of warre, which by eaſie compulſion they left off, and followed new Enſignes. This added courage to the people, who came in apace, and ſubmitted themſelues ioyfully to Seleucus. In a defection ſo generall, it was not a ſafe courſe for the Antigonians, to thruſt themſelues into the Townes of moſt importance: for euery man of them ſhould haue been troubled with daily enemies, in his owne lodging. It remained that they ſhould iſſue forth into the field, and trie the matter by fight. But the treaſon of one principall man, who reuolted to the enemie, with more then a thouſand Souldiers following him, ſo diſmaied the reſt, that they did no more than ſeeke to make good one ſtrong place, wherein were kept the Hoſtages and Priſoners, that Antigonus held for his ſecuritie in thoſe quarters. This Caſtle, belike, they had not fortified in times of leiſure, againſt dangers, that were not then apparent. Seleucus quickly tooke it; and ſo got the entire poſſeſsion of Meſopotamia and Babylon.

Antigonus had beſtowed in Media and Perſia, forces conuenient for defence of thoſe Prouinces, that were the vtmoſt of his Dominion. In the Countries about Euphrates he had not done the like: for his owne great Armie lay betweene them and all enemies. Therefore when the victorie at Gaza had opened vnto Seleucus the way into thoſe parts; hee found little impediment in the reſt of his buſineſſe. Hauing now gotten what he ſought; it behoued him to ſeeke how he might keepe his gettings: for his owne forces were too ſmall, and his friends were ill able to lend him any more. That which his friends could not doe for him; his enemies did. Nicanor, to whom Antigonus had committed his Armie in Media, ioyning vnto himſelfe, out of Perſia and other Countries, all needfull helpe came with ten thouſand foote, and ſeuen thouſand horſe, either to ſaue all from being loſt, or to driue Seleucus out of that which he had wonne.

Againſt this power, Seleucus had only foure hundred horſe, and ſomewhat aboue three thouſand foot, wherewith to oppoſe himſelfe: his large conqueſt of vnwarlike Nations hauing yeelded him many louing ſubiects, but few ſouldiers. Therefore when his enemies were neere to the Riuer of Tigris, hee withdrew himſelfe from the place where his reſiſtance was expected, into certaine mariſhes not farre off; where he lay ſecretly waiting for ſome aduantage. Nicanor thought that hee had beene fled, and was the leſſe carefull in fortifying his campe. In recompence of this vaine ſecuritie, his campe was taken by ſurpriſe, the firſt night of his arriuall; the the Satrapa, or Lieutenant of Persia, together with sundry of the Captaines, were slaine, he himselfe was driuen to flee for his life into the Desarts; and the whole Armie yeelded vnto Seleucus: whose gentle demeanour, after the victorie, drew all Media, Susiana, and the Neighbour Prouinces, to acknowledge him their Lord without any further stroke stricken.

This victorie of Seleucus gaue beginning vnto the new stile, of The Kingdome of the Greekes, an accompt much vsed by the Iewes, Chaldæans, Syrians, and other Nations in those parts. I will not make any long disputation about the first yeere of this Æra. The authoritie of that great Astrologer Ptolomie, from which there is no appeale, makes it plaine, that the fiue hundred and nineteenth yeere of NABONASSAR, was the fourescore and two yeere of this accompt. Other inference hereupon is needlesse, than that note of the learned GAVRICVS, That the first of these yeeres was reckoned compleat, at Babylon, together with the end of foure hundred thirtie and eight yeeres after NABONASSAR. With the obseruation of the Saturne, recorded by Ptolomie, agrees (as it ought) the calculation of Bunting; finding the same Planet to haue beene so placed in the signe of Virgo, as the Chaldæans had obserued it, in the same yeere; which was from Nabonassar the fiue hundred and nineteenth; from Seleucus the fourescore and two yeere; and the last of the hundred thirtie and seuenth Olympiad. These obseruations of the Celestiall bodies, are the surest markes of time: from which he that wilfully varies, is inexcusable. As for such occurrences in Historie, and the yeeres of succeeding Princes (that are not seldome ambiguous, by reason of vnremembred fractions) if they seem to be here-against, it is not greatly materiall. Yet thus much is worthy of note; that these yeeres of the Greekes were not reckoned in all Countries from one beginning; as plainely appeares in the difference of one yeere, that is found betweene actions, related by the seuerall Authors of the two Bookes of the Machabees, who follow diuers accompts. Hee that shall adhere to the time defined by Ptolomie, may apply the other supputations thereunto, as being no farther from it, than a yeeres distance.

§. VIII.

How PTOLOMIE lost all that he had wonne in Syria. What the causes were of the quiet obedience, performed vnto the Macedonians, by those that had beene subiect vnto the Persian Empire. Of diuers petie enterprizes, taken in hand by ANTIGONVS and DEMETRIVS, with ill successe.

IN a happy houre did Seleucus aduenture, to goe vp to Babylon, with so few men as his friend could then well spare: for had he staied longer vpon hope of getting more Soldiers, Ptolomie could haue spared him none at all. Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus, hauing lost the battaile at Gaza, receiued from Ptolomie all his owne goods, his Pages, and Seruants, in free gift, and therewithall a courteous message, to this effect: That no personall hatred was the ground of this Warre, which hee and his Confederates held with Antigonus; but onely termes of honour, wherein they would seeke to right themselues after such manner, that other friendly Offices, without reference to the quarrell, should not be forgotten.

This Noble dealing of Ptolomie, did kindle in Demetrius an earnest desire of requiting him, with some as braue liberalitie. Which to effect, he gathered together the remainder of his broken troups; drew as many as could be spared, out of the Garrisons in Cilicia, or other Prouinces thereabouts, and aduertising his Father of his misfortune, besought him to send a new supply, wherewith he might redeeme his honour lost. Antigonus, vpon the first newes of this ouerthrow, had said,

That

That the victory which Ptolomie wanne vpon a beardleſſe Boy, ſhould bee taken from him by bearded men: yet vpon deſire that his ſonne, whom hee tenderly loued, ſhould amend his owne reputation. He was content to make a ſtand in Phrygia. Ptolomie hearing of Demetrius his preparations, did neuertheleſſe follow his owne buſineſſe in Cœloſyria; thinking it enough, to ſend part of his Armie vnder Cilles his Lieutenant, againſt the remnant of thoſe, that had beene alreadie vanquiſhed, when their forces were entire. This peraduenture would haue beene ſufficient: had not Cilles too much vndervalued the power of ſuch an Enemie. Hee thought that this yong Gallant, hauing lately ſaued his life by flight, would now be more carefull of hauing a faire way at his back, than aduenturous in ſetting further forward, then vrgent reaſon ſhould prouoke him. In this confidence he paſſed on without al feare; as one that were already Maſter of the field, and ſhould meete with none, that would iſſue out of their places of ſtrength, to make reſiſtance. When Demetrius was informed of this careleſſe march; he tooke the lighteſt of his Armie, and made his iournie with ſuch diligence, one whole night, that early in the morning, hee came vpon Cilles vnexpected, and was on the ſuddaine, without any battaile, Maſter of his Campe: taking him aliue, with his Souldiers, and their carriages all at once.

This exploit ſerued not onely to repaire the credit of Demetrius, which his loſſe at Gaza had almoſt ruined: but further it enabled him, to recompence the bountie of Ptolomie, with equal fauor, in reſtoring to him Cilles, with many other of his friends, accompanied with rich preſents. But neither was Ptolomie ſo weakned by this loſſe, nor Demetrius ſo emboldened by his victorie, that any matter of conſequence thervpon enſued. For Demetrius feared the comming of Ptolomie; and therefore hee fortified himſelfe in places of aduantage: Ptolomie on the other ſide was loth to engage himſelfe in an enterpriſe, wherein he might perceiue, that if the comming of Antigonus found him entangled, he ſhould either bee driuen to make a ſhamefull retrait, or a dangerous aduenture of his whole eſtate, in hope of not much more than alreadie he poſſeſſed.

Antigonus, indeede, was nothing ſlow in his way towards Syria; whither hee made all haſte, not ſo much to relieue his ſonne, as to embrace him. For hee rejoyced exceedingly, that the yong man had ſo well acquitted himſelfe, and being left to his owne aduice, performed the office of a good Commander. Wherefore to increaſe the reputation of this late victorie, he brought ſuch forces, as might ſerue to re-conquer all Syria: meaning, that the honour of all, ſhould be referred vnto the good foundation, layed by his ſonne; whom from this time forwards, he imploied in matters of greateſt importance.

Ptolomie had now leſſe reaſon, to encounter with Antigonus, than before his comming to haue aſſailed the Campe of Demetrius. Yet he made it a matter of conſultation; as if he had dared more than he meant. But all his Captaines aduiſed him to retire into Ægypt; alleaging many good arguments, to that purpoſe: which they might well perceiue to be agreeable to his owne intent, by his propounding that courſe; not without remembrance of the good ſucceſſe againſt Perdiccas, in the like defenſiue warre. So he departed out of Syria, preſeruing his honour; as being rather led by mature deliberation, than any ſuddaine paſsion of feare: and hee departed at faire leiſure, not onely carrying his treaſures along with him, but ſtaying to diſmantle ſome principall Cities, that he thought moſt likely to trouble him in the future. All the Countrie that hee left at his back, fell preſently to Antigonus, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by pieces: ſo eaſie was it in thoſe times, for the Captaine of a ſtrong Armie, to make himſelfe Lord of a great Prouince.

We may iuſtly wonder, that theſe Kingdomes of Syria, Media, Babylon, and many other Nations, (which the victorie of Alexander had ouer-runne, with ſo haſtie a courſe, as gaue him not leiſure to take any good view of them) were ſo eaſily held not onely by himſelfe, but by the Captaines of his Armie after him. The hot contentions tentions for superioritie betweene the King of Israel, and those of Damascus; betweene Ægypt, and Babylon; Babylon, and Nineue; the Persians, and many Countries; argue a more manly temper, to haue once beene in those people; which are now so patient of a forraigne yoke, that like Sheepe or Oxen, they suffer themselues to be distributed, fought for, wonne, lost, and againe recouered, by contentious Masters; as if they had no title to their owne heads, but were borne to follow the fortune of the Macedonians. This will appeare the more strange, if wee shall consider, how the seuerall States of Greece (many of which had neuer possessed so large Dominion, as might cause their Spirits to swell beyond their abilitie) did greedily embrace all occasions of libertie: and how these proud Conquerours were glad to offer it, desiring to haue them rather friends than seruants, for feare of further inconuenience.

It must therefore be noted, that most of these Countries had alwaies beene subject vnto the rule of Kings, or pettie Lords, whom the Babylonians and Persians long since had rooted out, & held them in such bōdage, that few of them knew any other Law, than the command of forraigne Masters. This had vtterly taken from them al remembrance of home-borne Princes, & incorporated them into the great body of the Persian Empire: so that wanting within themselues all soueraigne power, or high authoritie, the life & spirit of euery Estate; they lay as dead, and were bereaued of motion, when that Kingdome fell, whereof they lately had beene members.

Why the Persian Satrapæ, or Princes of that Empire, did not when Darius was taken from them, as the Macedonian Captaines, after the death of Alexander, striue to lay hold vpon those Prouinces, which had many ages beene subject vnto them, and scarce foure yeeres in quiet possession of their enemies; or why at least they contended not (when the terrible name of that great Conquerour did cease to affright them) to get their shares among his followers, if not wholly to dispossesse them of their new purchases: it is a question, wherein, who is not satisfied, may find no lesse reason to suspect the Historie, than authoritie to confirme it. For we seldome reade, that any small Kingdome, preuailing against a farre greater, hath made so entire a conquest, in the compasse of ten yeeres, as left vnto the vanquished no hope of recouerie, nor meanes to rebell; especially when such disorders, or rather vtter confusion hath ensued, by the furie of ciuill warre among the Victors.

The cause why the Macedonians held so quietly the Persian Empire, is well set downe by Machiauell; and concernes all other Kingdomes, that are subject vnto the like forme of Gouernement: the summe whereof is this. Whersoeuer the Prince doth hold all his Subjects vnder the condition of slaues; there is the conquest easie, and soone assured: Where ancient Nobilitie is had in due regard, there is it hard to winne all, and harder to keepe that which is wonne. Examples of this are the Turkish Empire, and the Kingdome of France. If any Inuader should preuaile so farre vpon Turkie, that the great Sultan and his Children (for brethren hee vseth not to suffer aliue) were taken or slaine: the whole Empire would quickly bee wonne, and easily kept, without any danger of rebellion. For the Bassaes, how great soeuer they may seeme, are meere slaues; neither is there in all that large Dominion, any one man, whose personall regard could get the people to follow him in such an attempt, where in hope of priuate gaine, should not counteruaile all apparent matter of feare. Contrariwise, in France, it were not enough for him that would make a conquest, to get into his hands the King and his Children; though hee further got the better part of the Countrie, and were by farre the strongest in the field. For, besides the Princes of the Royall bloud, there are in that Kingdome store of great men; who are mightie in their seuerall Countries, and hauing certaine Royalties and Principalities of their owne; are able to raise Warre, in all quarters of the Realme; whereunto the remembrance of their owne ancient Families, and long continued Nobilitie, will alwaies stirre vp and inflame them, so that vntill euery one piece were wonne, and euery one (an endlesse work) of the chiefe Nobilitie, brought vnder or destroyed, the victorie were not compleat, nor well assured. It is true, that such power of the Nobilitie, doth often-times make way for an Inuader; to whom the discontentments of a few can easily make a faire entrance. But such assistants are not so easily kept, as they are gotten: for they looke to bee satisfied at full, in all their demands; and hauing what they would, they soone returne to their old allegeance, vpon condition to keepe what they haue, vnlesse they be daily hired with new rewards: wherein it is hard to please one man, without offending another as good as himselfe. The Turke, on the other side, needes not to feare any perill, that might arise from the discontented spirits of his principall men. The greatest mischiefe that any of them could worke against him, were the betraying of some frontier Towne, or the wilfull losse of a battaile: which done, the Traitor hath spent his sting, and must either flie to the enemie, whereby he loseth all that he formerly did hold, or else, in hope of doing some further harme, he must aduenture to excuse himselfe vnto his Master, who seldome forgiues the Captaine, that hath not striuen by desperate valour against misfortune. As for making head, or arming their followers against the great Sultan, and so ioyning themselues vnto any Inuader; it is a matter not to be doubted: for none of them haue any followers or dependants at all, other than such, as are subiect vnto them, by vertue of their Offices and Commissions. Now as this base condition of the principall men, doth leaue vnto them no meanes, whereby to oppose themselues against the flourishing estate of their Prince; so would it weaken both their power and their courage in giuing him assistance, if aduersitie should make him stand in neede of them. For there is scarce any one among the Turkes Bassies, or prouinciall Gouernours, that knowes either from whence hee was brought, or from whom descended, nor any one among them, that by the losse and vtter ruine of the Turkish Empire, can lose any foot of his proper inheritance, and it is the proper inheritance of the subiect, which is also a Kingdome vnto him, which makes him fight with an armed heart against the Conquerer, who hath no other deuice painted on his Ensigne, than the picture of slaucrie.

As is the Turkish Empire, so was the Persian, voide of libertie in the Subiects, and vtterly destitute of other Nobilitie, than such as depended vpon meere fauour of the Prince. Some indeede there were of the Royall bloud, and others, descended from the Princes that ioyned with Darius, the Sonne of Hystaspes, in oppressing the Magi: these were men of reputation in Persia; but their reputation consisted only in their Pedigree, and their safetie in not medling with affaires of State, which made them little esteemed. In what small account these Persian Princes were held, it may appeare by this, that the Kings Vncles, Cousin Germans, and Brethren, were called by the Kings, Their Slaues, and so did stile themselues, in speaking vnto these great Monarchs. That vpon euery light occasion of displeasure they were handled as Slaues; it is easie to be discerned, in that example of cruelties, practised by Xerxes vpon his owne brother Masistes, which hath beene formerly noted, in place more conuenient. As for the Satrapæ, or Gouernours of the Prouinces, it is needlesse to cite examples, prouing them to haue beene meere slaues: it may suffice, that their heads were taken from them at the Kings will; that is, at the will of those Women and Eunuches, by whom the King was gouerned.

To this want of Nobilitie in Persia, may be added the generall want of libertie conuenient among the people: a matter no lesse auailable, in making easie and sure the conquest of a Nation, then is the cause assigned by Machiauel. For as Æsope his Asse did not care to runne from the enemies, because it was not possible, that they should loade him with heauier burthens, then his Master caused him daily to beare: so the Nations, that endure the worst vnder their owne Princes, are not greatly fearefull of a forraigne yoke; Nor will be hastie to shake it off, if by experience they finde it more light, then was that whereunto they had bee nelog accusto-accustomed. This was it that made the Gascoignes beare such faithfull affection to the Kings of England; for that they gouerned more mildly than the French: this enlarged the Venetian iurisdiction in Lumbardie; for the Townes that they wanne, they wanne out of the hands of Tyrannous oppressors: and this did cause the Macedonians, with other Nations, that had beene subiect vnto the posteritie of Alexanders followers, to serue the Romans patiently, if not willingly; for that by them they were eased of many burthens, which had beene imposed vpon them by their owne Kings.

So that of this tamenesse, which we finde in those that had beene subiects of the Persian Kings, the reasons are apparent. Yet some of these there were, that could not so easily be contained in good order by the Macedonians: for they had not indeede beene absolutely conquered by the Persian. Such were the Sogdians, Bactrians, and other Nations about the Caspian Sea. Such also were the Arabians bordering vpon Syria: against whom Antigonus sent part of his Armie; thinking therwith to bring them vnder; or rather to get a rich bootie. The Captaine that hee sent, fell vpon the Nabatheans, at such time as they were busied in a great Mart, wherein they traded with the more remote Arabians, for Myrrhe, Frankincense, and other such commodities. All or most of these rich wares, together with fiue hundred talents of siluer, and many prisoners, the Macedonians laid hold vpon: for their comming was suddaine, and vnexpected. But ere they could recouer Syria, the Nabatheans ouertooke them, and finding them wearie with long marches, made such a slaughter, that of foure thousand foote, and sixe hundred horse, onely fiftie horse escaped. To reuenge this losse, Demetrius was set out with a greater power: yet all in vaine; for he was not resisted by any Armie, but by the naturall defence of a vast Wildernesse, lacke of water, and of all things necessarie. Therefore he was glad to make peace with them; wherein he lost not much honour: for they craued it, and gaue him presents. Returning from the Nabatheans, hee viewed the Lake Asphaltites, whence he conceiued hope of great profit that might be raised, by gathering the Sulphure. With this good husbandrie of his sonne, Antigonus was well pleased; and appointed men to the worke: but they were slaine by the Arabians, and so that hope vanished.

These pettie enterprises, with the ill successe accompanying them, had much impaired the good aduantage against Ptolomie: when the newes of Seleucus his victories in the high Countries, marred all together. For neither was the losse of those great and wealthy Prouinces, a matter to be neglected, neither was it safe to transport the warre into the parts beyond Euphrates, whereby Syria and the lower Asia should haue beene exposed, to the danger of ill-affected Neighbours. A middle course was thought the best; and Demetrius, with fifteene thousand foot and three thousand horse, was sent against Seleucus. These forces being sent away, Antigonus did nothing, and his sonne did lesse. For Seleucus was then in Media; his Lieutenants about Babylon withdrew themselues from necessitie of fight; some places they fortified and kept; Demetrius could hold nothing that he got, without setting in Garrison more men then he could spare; neither did he get much; and therefore was faine to set out the brauerie of his expedition, by burning and spoiling the Countrie; which he did thereby the more alienate, and as it were acknowledge to belong vnto his enemie, who thenceforth held it as his owne assured.

Antigonus had laid vpon his sonne a peremptorie commandement, to returne vnto him at a time prefixed: reasonably thinking (as may seeme) that in such an vnsettled state of things, either the Warre might bee ended, by the furie of the first brunt; or else it would bee vaine to striue against all difficulties likely to arise, where want of necessaries should frustrate the valour, that by length of time was like to become lesse terrible to the Enemie. Demetrius therefore leauing behind him fiue thousand foote, and a thousand horse, rather to make shew of continuing the warre, than to effect much, where himselfe, with greater forces could doe little more then nothing, forsooke the enterprise, and went backe to his Father.

A generall peace made and broken. How all the house of ALEXANDER was destroyed.

THese ambitious heads, hauing thus wearied themselues with vneffectuall trauaile, in seeking to get more then any one of them could hold; were contented at length to come to an agreement: wherein it was concluded, that each of them should hold quietly, that which at the present he had in possession. As no priuate hatred, but meere desire of Empire had moued them to enter into the warre; so was it no friendly reconciliation, but onely a dulnesse growing vpon the slow aduancement of their seueral hopes, that made them willing to breathe a while, till occasion might better serue to fight againe.

Besides that maine point, Of retaining the Prouinces which euery one held, there were two Articles of the peace, that gaue a faire, but a false colour, to the businesse: That the sonne of ALEXANDER by ROXANE, should be made King, when hee came to full age; and, That all the Estates of Greece should be set at liberty. The aduancement of yong Alexander to his Fathers Kingdome, seemes to haue beene a matter, forceably extorted from Antigonus; in whom was discouered a purpose, to make himselfe Lord of all. But this, indeede, more neerely touched Cassander. For in his custodie was the yong Prince and his Mother: neither did he keepe them in sort answerable to their degree; but as close prisoners, taken in that warre, wherein they had seene the old Queene Olympias taken and murdered, that sought to haue put them in possession of the Empire. The mutuall hatred and feare betweene them, rooted in these grounds, of iniuries done, and reuenge expected; vpon this conclusion of peace, grew vp faster than any time before, in the heart of Cassander: who saw the Macedonians turne their fauourable expectation, towards the sonne of their late renowned King.

All this, either little concerned Antigonus; or tended greatly to his good. The yong Prince must first haue possession of Macedon: whereby Cassander should be reduced to his poore office, of Captaine ouer a thousand men, if not left in worse case. As for them that held Prouinces abroad, they might either doe as they had done vnder Aridæus; or better, as being better acquainted with their owne strength. He in the meane time, by his readinesse to acknowledge the true Heire, had freed himself from that ill-fauoured imputation, of seeking to make himselfe Lord of all that Alexander had gotten.

The like aduantage had he in that Article, of restoring the Greekes to their libertie. This libertie had hitherto beene the subiect of much idle discourse: but it neuer tooke effect. Antigonus held scarse any Towne of theirs, Cassander occupied most of the Countrie: which if hee should set free; hee must be a poore Prince; if not, there was matter enough of quarrell against him, as against a Disturber of the common peace.

In the meane season, the Countries lying betweene Euphrates and the Greeke seas, together with a great Armie, and monie enough to entertaine a greater, might serue to hold vp the credit of Antigonus, and to raise his hopes, as high as euer they had beene.

With much disaduantage doe many men contend, against one that is equall to them all in puissance, Cassanders friends had left him in an ill case; but he could not doe withall: for where euery one mans helpe is necessarie to the warre, there may any one make his owne peace; but no one can stand out alone, when all the rest are wearie. The best was, that hee knew all their affections: which tended to no such end as the becomming Subiects vnto any man; much lesse to the sonne of an Asiatique woman, of whom they had long since refused to heare mention. Therefore he tooke a short course, and caused both the child & his Mother to be slaine: freeing thereby himselfe in a trice, from the dangerous necessitie of yeelding vp his gouernement, which he must haue done when the child had come to age. Roxane was a Ladie of singular beautie, which was perhaps the cause, why Perdiccas desired to haue her sonne, being as yet vnborne, proclaimed Heire to the great Alexander. Immediatly vpon the death of Alexander, she had vsed the fauour (if it were not loue) of Perdiccas, to the satisfying of her own bloudy malice, vpon Statira, the Daughter of King Darius; whom Alexander had likewise married according to the custome of those Countries, wherein pluralitie of wiues is held no crime. For hauing by a counterfait letter, in Alexanders name, gotten this poore Lady into her hands, shee did, by assistance of Perdiccas, murder her and her Sister, and threw their bodies into a Well, causing it to be filled vp with earth. But now, by Gods iust vengeance, were she and her sonne made away, in the like secret fashion; euen at such time, as the neere approaching hope of a great Empire had made her life, after a wearisome imprisonment, grow dearer vnto her than it was before.

The fact of Cassander was not so much detested in outward shew; as inwardly it was pleasing vnto all the rest of the Princes. For now they held themselues free Lords, of all that they had vnder them; fearing none other change of their estates, than such as might arise by chance of warre; wherein euery one perswaded himselfe of successe, rather better than worse. Hereupon all of them (except Lysimachus and Seleucus, that had worke enough at home) beganne to rowze themselues: as if now the time were come, for each man to improue his owne stock. Antigonus his Lieutenants were busie in Peloponnesus, and about Hellespont: while their Master was carefull in following other, and some greater matters that were more secretly to be handled. He pretended the libertie of Greece: yet did the same argument minister vnto Ptolomie, matter of quarrell, against both him and Cassander; Ptolomie complaining (as if he had taken the matter deeply to heart) that Antigonus had put Garrisons into some Townes, which ought, in faire dealing to be set at libertie. Vnder colour of redressing this enormitie, he sent an Armie into Cilicia; where he wan foure Townes, and soone after lost them, without much labour of his owne or his Enemies.

After this, putting to Sea with a strong Fleet, hee ranne along the coast of Asia, winning many places: and in that voiage allured vnto him a nephew of Antigonus (a good Commander, but discontented with the ill requitall of his seruices) whom finding shortly, as false to himselfe as he had beene to his owne Vncle, he was faine to put to death. But in doing these things, his desire to set the Greekes at libertie, appeared not so plaine, as he wished that it should: for their case was no way bettered, by his molesting Antigonus in Asia. Therefore to get the loue of that valiant Nation, He made at the last an expedition into Greece it selfe: where hauing set free some little Ilands, and landed in Peloponnesus, he raised so great an expectation of finishing the long desired worke, that Cratesipolis, the Widdow of Alexander, Polysperchons sonne, gaue vp into his hands the Townes of Sicyon and Corinth.

Ptolomie had conceiued a vaine beliefe, that the Greekes emboldened by his countenance and assistance, would all of them take heart, and rise vp in armes: whereby with little labour, their libertie might be gotten; and hee be acknowledged as Author of this immortall benefit. But long seruitude had wel-neere extinguished the ancient valour of that Nation: and their ill fortune, in many likely attempts to recouer freedome, had ſo tired their ſpirits, that they would no more ſtirre in purſuit thereof; but ſate idly ſtill, as wiſhing it to fall into their mouthes.

The Lacedæmonians, about theſe times, beganne to fortifie their Towne with walls; truſting no longer in their vertue (for both it, and the diſcipline that vpheld it were too much impaired) that had been a wall to their Towne and Territorie.

The Athenians were become as humble ſeruants, as they had been, in times paſt, inſolent Maſters: erecting as many ſtatuaes in honor of Demetrius Phalereus, as there were daies in the yeere. This Demetrius was now their Gouernour; and hee gouerned them with much moderation: but in ſpight of their hearts, as being ſet ouer them by Caſſander. By this baſe temper of the principall Cities, it is eaſie to gather, how the reſt of the Countrie ſtood affected. Ptolomie could not get them, to ſet their helping hands, to their owne good; and to furniſh him with the promiſed ſupplies of monie and victualls. Credible it is, that he had a true meaning to deliuer them from thraldome; as iudging the commoditie that would ariſe by annexing them to his partie, a matter of more weight, than the loſſe that Caſſander ſhould receiue thereby, who could hardly retaine them, if once Antigonus tooke the worke in hand. But when he found ſuch difficultie in the buſineſſe, hee changed his purpoſe: and renewing his former friendſhip with Caſſander, he retained Sicyon, and Corinth in his owne poſſeſſion.

Before the comming of Ptolomie into Greece, Caſſander had beene held occupied with very much worke. For (beſides his paines taken in warres among barbarous Princes) hee found meanes to allure vnto himſelfe, the Lieutenants of Antigonus, that were in Peloponneſus, and about Helleſpont: making his own aduantage, of their diſcontentments. By the like skilfull practice, Hee freed himſelfe from a greater danger: and made thoſe murders which he had committed ſeeme the leſſe odious, by teaching his enemies to doe the like. Old Polyſperchon, that had made ſo great a ſtirre in the raigne of Aridæus, did after the death of Roxane and her Child, enter againe vpon the Stage: leading in his hand another ſonne of the great Alexander, and meaning to place him in his Fathers Throne.

The name of this yong Prince was Hercules: hee was begotten on Barſine, the Daughter of Artabazus a Perſian; but had beene leſſe eſteemed than the ſonne of Roxane, either for that his Mother was helde no better than a Concubine, or elſe perhaps, in regard of the fauour which Perdiccas, and after him Olympias, did beare vnto Roxane. At this time, the death of his brother had moued ſuch compaſſion, and regard of his being Alexanders only liuing child, had procured vnto him ſuch good will, that the demand which Polyſperchon made in his behalfe, was deemed very iuſt and honourable. There were indeede more hearts then hands, that ioyned with this yong Prince: yet wanted he not ſufficient ſtrength of hands, if the heart of him that leaſt ought, had not beene moſt falſe. Caſſander had raiſed an Armie, to withſtand his entrie into Macedon: but little truſt could hee repoſe in that Armie, whoſe wiſhes he perceiued to be with Hercules. Therefore hee aſſaied Polyſperchon himſelfe with gifts and promiſes; wherewith at length he preuailed ſo farre, that the old Vilaine was contented to murder his Pupill, chooſing rather with many curſes, and foule diſhonour, to take the offered Lordſhip of Peloponneſus, and Commander of an Armie; than to purchaſe a Noble fame with dangerous trauaile, in maintaining his faith, vnto both his dead and liuing Soueraignes.

Antigonus had not all this while beene aſleepe; though his loſſes were hitherto the chiefe witneſſes, of his hauing beene a ſtirrer in theſe commotions, He thought it enough for him at the preſent, to retaine his owne: and therefore tooke order for the recouerie of thoſe places, which Ptolomie had taken paines to winne. As for the reſt, it no way grieued him, to ſee Caſſander incurre the generall hatred of men by committing thoſe murders, of which the profit was like to redound vnto him that was the moſt powerfull: or to ſee Polyſperchon and Ptolomie ſweat, in a buſie warre against Cassander. If they would haue continued their quarrels, he could well haue affoorded them leisure, and haue thought the time well spent, in beholding their contentions. For hee was throughly perswaded, that when the rest had wearied themselues in vaine with long strife, his armies and treasures, wherein he exceeded them all, would bring all vnder. According to these haughtie conceipts, he demeaned himselfe among his followers; looking big vpon them, and like a King before his time. This was it that caused so many of them, to reuolt from him: but it was no great losse to be forsaken by those that looked with enuious eyes vpon that fortune whereon their owne should haue depended. Against this enuie of his owne men, and the malice of others, Antigonus busily sought a remedie, such as was like to giue him a goodly title to the whole Empire.

Cleopatra, Sister vnto the great Alexander, lay for the most part in Sardes; whom he had a great desire to take to wife. This his desire was not without good hope: for howsoeuer shee discouered much willingnesse thereunto, yet was shee in his power, and might therefore be entreated, were it onely for feare of being enforced. But it was not his purpose, to get her by compulsiue meanes: either because his fancie being an old man, was not ouer-violent; or rather because his ambition, whereunto all his affections had reference, could haue made small vse of her, by doing such apparent wrong. Shee had beene married vnto Alexander King of Epirus, after whose death shee came to her brother in Asia; hoping, belike, to finde a new husband in his Campe. But neither any of those braue Captaines, that were, in times following, so hot in loue with her, durst then aspire vnto her mariage: nor did her brother, full of other cares, trouble himselfe with prouiding her of an husband. Shee therefore, being a lustie widdw, suffered her bloud, so farre to preuaile against her honour, that shee supplied the want of an husband by entertainment of Parramours. Alexander hearing of this, turned it to a ieft: saying, that shee was his sister, and must be allowed this libertie, as her portion of the Empire. When by his death, the Empire lay in a manner voide, and the portion due to her therein, grew, in mens opinion, greater than it had beene: then did many seeke to obtaine her, while she her selfe desired only a proper man, with whom she might lead a merrie life. To this purpose did shee inuite Leonatus vnto her; who made great haste; but was cut off by death, ere he came to her presence. Now at the last, after long tarrying, shee had her choise of all the great Commanders: Antigonus, Ptolomie, Lysimachus, and Cassander, being all her earnest wooers. All these (Antigonus excepted) had wiues already, Ptolomie had many wiues, and many Concubines, whom he respected as much as his wiues, being noted of too much dotage in that kinde. This hindred not his sute: peraduenture it aduanced it, by giuing to Cleopatra, some hope of mutuall toleration. To him therefore she bequeathed her selfe, and was taking her iournie from Sardes towards him; when Antigonus his Deputie in that Citie, made her to stay, vntill his Masters further pleasure should be knowne. Antigonus had now a Wolfe by the eares: he neither could well hold her, nor durst let her goe. Shee would not be his wife; he had none honest pretence to force her; and to keepe her prisoner, had beene the way by which he might haue incurred a generall hatred, lasting perhaps beyond her life; as the course taken by Cassander against Roxane (a Ladie lesse respected than Alexanders owne sister) did well testifie. Therefore he thought it the wisest way to procure her death: for to let any other enioy the commoditie of so faire a title to the Kingdome, it was no part of his meaning. To this purpose he sent instructions to the Gouernour of Sardes; willing him in any case to doe it secretly. So the fact was committed, and certaine women about her put in trust with the murder: which women afterwards were put to death, as mischieuous conspirers against the life of that good Ladie. So was Antigonus freed from blame, at the least, in his owne opinion: but the world was lesse foolish, than to be so deluded. How the murther was detected, wee need not aske: for seldome is that bloudie crime vnreuealed; and neuer so ill smothered, as when great persons are the Authors.

Thus was the whole race of Philip and Alexander the Great extinguished, and it was extinguished by the hands of such as thought vpon nothing lesse than the execution of Gods justice, due vnto the crueltie of these powerfull, but mercilesse Princes. Wherefore the ambitious frames, erected by these Tyrants, vpon so wicked foundations of innocent bloud, were soone after cast downe, ouer-whelming themselues or their children, with the ruines, as the sequele will declare.

How DEMETRIVS, the sonne of ANTIGONVS, gaue libertie to Athens, expelling the Garrisons of CASSANDER out of those parts. The immoderate honors decreed by the Athenians to ANTIGONVS and DEMETRIVS.

NOne being left aliue, that had any title to the Kingdome; it stood with good reason, that they which were Lords of the Prouinces, acknowledging no Superior, should freely professe themselues Kings in name, as they were already in substance. Yet had this name ill beseemed the weaker, while the strongest of all did forbeare it: neither seemed it conuenient in the judgement of Antigonus, to crowne his last action with such a title, as if he had attained vnto greatnesse by that foule murder, the infamie whereof he was carefull how to discharge from his owne head. He purposed therefore to vndertake a plausible enterprise, euen the libertie of Greece: whereby it was apparent, that he might get such honour as would not onely drowne all bad reports, but make him be thought equall to any name of royaltie, whereof in seeming modestie, hee was not couetous. To this purpose, hee deliuered a strong Armie, with a Nauie of two hundred and fiftie saile, and fiue thousand talents of siluer, vnto Demetrius his sonne: willing him to beginne at Athens, and thence to proceed, in setting all the Countrie free.

Demetrius came to Athens before he was expected: so that without resistance he entred the Hauen; it being thought that a fleet of Ptolomie, Cassanders good friend, had beene arriued. But when it was knowne, both who he was, and what was the cause of his comming; the joy of the Citizens brake out into loud acclamations; Demetrius Phalereus forsooke the Towne, and withdrew himselfe to Thebes, vnder safe conduct; onely the Garrison in Munychia stroue to make good that piece, which after a while was wonne vpon them by force. During the siege of Munychia, Demetrius went to Megara; whence he expelled the Garrison of Cassander, and so restored the Citie to libertie.

I thinke it not impertinent, sometimes to relate such accidents, as may seeme no better than meere trifles: for euen by trifles, are the qualities of great Persons as well disclosed, as by their great actions; because in matters of importance, they commonly straine themselues, to the obseruance of generall commended rules; in lesser things they follow the current of their owne Natures. The Ladie Cratesipolis lay in Patras, and had a great desire to see Demetrius; hoping, belike, that she might, by his meanes, better her estate, and recouer her Townes of Sycion and Corinth, detained by Ptolomie, to whose Lieutenant, in those places, Demetrius before his departure out of Greece, offered monie for the surrender of them. Yet the onely businesse pretended was loue. He being aduertised hereof, left his forces in the Countrie of Megara, and taking a companie of his lightest armed, for guard of his person, made a long journie to meete with her. This troupe also, hee caused to lodge a great great way from his Tent, that none might see her when she came. As closely as the businesse was carried, some of his enemies had gotten knowledge of it; whereby they conceiued good hope, that the diligence of a very few men, might ouerthrow all the great preparations of Antigonus; and bring him to any termes of reason, by taking his deare sonne prisoner. Their project fell but a little short of the effect. For they came so suddainly vpon him, that hee had no better shift, than to muffle himselfe in an old cloake, and creepe away disguised; leauing them to ransack his Tent. There was in this Prince a strange medly of conditions; especially an extreme dissolutenesse in wanton pleasures, and a painefull industrie in matter of warre. He was of a most amiable countenance, a gentle nature, and a good wit; excellent in deuising Engines of warre, and curious in working them with his own hands. He knew better how to reforme his bad fortune, then how to rule his good. For aduersitie made his valour more actiue: prosperitie stupified him with an ouerweening, wherin he thought, that he might doe what he listed. His fortune was as changeable, as were his qualities: turning often round, like the picture of her wheele, till shee had wound vp the threed of his life, in such manner as followeth to be shewed.

Returning to his Campe, and finishing his businesse at Megara; hee resolued no longer to attend the issue of a siege, to assaile Munychia by force, that so hee might accomplish the libertie of Athens: which, vntill it was fully wrought out, he refused to enter into the Citie. Munychia was strongly fortified: yet by continuance of the assault, the multitude without, through help of their Engines that scoured the wals, preuailed vpon the resolution of those that lay within it, and wanne the place in two daies. The walls, and all the defences of that piece against the Citie, were leuelled with the ground, & so was it freely put into the Citizens hands, to whom withall was giuen their libertie, with promise to aide them in maintaining it.

The fame of this action was lowder, than of any other victory, gotten by Demetrius with greater skill and industrie. For the Athenians, hauing forgotten how to employ their hands, laboured to make vp that defect with their tongues: conuerting to base flatterie, that eloquence of theirs, which the vertues of their Ancestors had suted vnto more manly arguments.

They decreed, vnto Antigonus and Demetrius, the name of Kings; they consecrated the place, in which Demetrius leaped from his Chariot, when he entred their Citie, and built there an Altar, calling it of DEMETRIVS the a-lighter; they called them by the Names of the gods their sauiours, ordaining that euery yeere, there should be chosen a Priest of these gods; and further, that such as were employed by their State, in dealing with either of these two Princes, should not be called Embassadors, but Theori, or Consulters with the gods; like as were they, whom they sent vnto the Oracle of Iupiter or Apollo.

It were a friuolous diligence, to rehearse all their flatteries; these being so grosse. Hereby they not onely corrupted the yong Prince; but made that acclamation, which best would haue pleased the old man, to bee of no vse. For hee could not handsomely take vpon him the name of King, as imposed by the Athenians; vnlesse hee would seeme to approue their vanitie, in loading him with more than humane honors. Yet was hee so tickled, with this their fine handling him, that when their Theori, or Consulters came shortly after, desiring him to relieue them with Corne, and Timber to build ships; he gaue them almost a hundred thousand quarters of wheat, and matter sufficient to make a hundred Gallies. So gracious was his first Oracle: or rather, so weake is great power in resisting the assaults of flatterie.

§. XI.

§. XI.

The great victorie of DEMETRIVS againſt PTOLOMIE in Cyprus. How ANTIGONVS and DEMETRIVS tooke vpon them the ſtile of Kings; wherein others followed their example.

FRom this glorious worke, Antigonus called away Demetrius, vnto a buſineſſe of greater difficultie: meaning to imploy his ſeruice againſt Ptolomie in Cyprus. Before his departure out of Greece, he was willed to eſtabliſh a generall Counſaile, that ſhould treat of matters, concerning the common good of the Countrie. About the ſame time, Antigonus withdrew his owne Garriſon out of Imbros, committing their liberty entire, into the peoples hands: whereby it might appeare, that as he would not permit any other to oppreſſe the Greekes, ſo would he be farre from doing it himſelfe. This was enough, to hold his reputation high, among theſe new purchaſed friends: it followed, that hee ſhould conuert his forces, to the winning of ground vpon his Enemies.

A pittifull Tragedie had lately hapned in Cyprus; through the indiſcretion of Menelaus, Ptolomies brother, and his Lieutenant in that Iſle. Nicocles, King of Paphos, was entred into ſome practice with Antigonus: yet not ſo farre that he thought himſelfe paſt excuſe; by which confidence, hee was perhaps, the more eaſily detected. To cut off this negotiation, & the falſe-hearted King of Paphos at one blow, Menelaus was ſent thither: who ſurrounding Nicocles his houſe with Souldiers, required in Ptolomies name, to haue him yelded to the death. Nicocles offered to cleere himſelfe; but Menelaus told him, that die he muſt, and bade him come forth quietly. This deſperate neceſſitie cauſed the vnhappie King to rid himſelfe of life: and his death ſtrooke ſuch an impreſſion into his wife, that ſhe not onely ſlew her ſelfe, but perſwaded the wiues of her husbands brethren, to doe the like. Alſo thoſe brethren of Nicocles, vnto whom Ptolomie had intended no ill, being amazed with the ſuddainenеſſe of this calamitie, did ſhut vp the Palace, and ſetting it on fire, conſumed it, with all that was in it, and themſelues together.

Whatſoeuer the crime objected was; Nicocles periſhed as a man innocent, becauſe he was not ſuffered to make his anſwere. Of this ſad accident, though Menelaus deſerued the blame, for his rigorous proceeding: yet is it to be thought, that much diſlike fell alſo vpon Ptolomie: as men that are grieued, caſt an ill affection, euen vpon thoſe, that gaue the fartheſt remoued occaſion.

Not long after this, Demetrius came into Cyprus, with a power ſufficient, againſt any oppoſition that Ptolomie was like to make. The Cypriots did little or nothing againſt him: either becauſe they had ſmall ſtrength, or for that they held it a matter indifferent, whom they acknowledged as their Lord, being ſure that they ſhould not themſelues haue the rule of their owne Countrie. Menelaus therefore, out of his Garriſons, drew forth an Armie, and fought with Demetrius. But hee was beaten, and driuen to ſaue himſelfe within the walls of Salamis; where he was ſo hardly beſieged, that without ſtrong ſuccour hee had no likelihood to make good the place, much leſſe to retaine poſſeſsion of the whole Iland. His greateſt helpe at the preſent, was the fidelitie of his Souldiers; whom no rewards could winne from him, nor good vſage (when any of them were taken priſoners, and inrolled in the enemies bands) keepe from returning to him, with the firſt opportunitie. Moſt of them were Mercinaries: but all their goods were in Ægypt, which was enough to keepe them faithfull. Yet could not this their reſolution haue ſtood long, againſt the ods of number, which Demetrius had of men as reſolute, and againſt his terrible Engines of batterie, if Ptolomie had not haſted to the reſcue.

Ptolomie brought with him, a hundred and fortie Gallies, beſides two hundred

ſhips of burden, for tranſporting his Armie and Carriages. This fleet made a terrible ſhew, when it was deſcried a farre; though more than halfe of it, was vnfit for ſeruice, in fight at Sea. Wherfore to make the opinion of his forces the more dreadfull, Ptolomie ſent vnto Demetrius, a threatning meſſage: willing him to be gone, vnleſſe hee would bee ouer-whelmed with multitudes, and trampled to death in a throng. But this yong Gallant repaied him with words of as much brauerie, promiſing to let him eſcape, vpon condition, that hee ſhould withdraw his Garriſons out of Sicyon and Corinth.

Demetrius had no more then one hundred and eighteene Gallies; but they were, for the moſt part, greater than thoſe of Ptolomie; better ſtored, with weapons fit for that ſeruice; and very well furniſhed with Engines in the prowes, to beat vpon the Enemie. Neuertheleſſe he ſtood in great doubt of threeſcore Gallies that lay in the Hauen of Salamis, leſt Menelaus with them ſhould ſet vpon his back: in which caſe, it was likely that all ſhould goe very ill with him. Againſt this miſchiefe, hee beſtowed ten of his owne Gallies in the mouth of that Hauen, to keepe Menelaus from iſſuing forth, and ſetting his horſe-men on the ſhore, to giue what aſsiſtance they could, he with the reſt of his fleet, puts to Sea againſt Ptolomie.

The fight began early in the morning, and continued long, with doubtfull ſucceſſe. The Generals were not ranged oppoſite one to the other; but held each of them the left wing of his owne fleet. Each of them preuailed againſt the ſquadron wherewith hee encountred; but the ſucceſſe of Demetrius was to better purpoſe. For his victorie in one part was ſuch, as cauſed others to fall out of order, and finally draue all to betake themſelues vnto ſpeedie flight. As for Ptolomie, he was faine to leaue his aduantage vpon the enemie in one part of the fight, that hee might relieue and animate thoſe of his owne which needed him in another. Wherein hee found his loſſe ouer-great to be repaired, by contending any longer againſt the fortune of that day; and therefore he laboured only to ſaue himſelfe, in hope of better euent, that might follow ſome other time.

There fell out in this battaile no vnuſuall accident; yet was the victorie greater then could haue beene expected. The occaſions whereof were, partly the great skill in Sea-ſeruices, which the Greekes and Phœnicians, that were with Demetrius, had, aboue thoſe which followed Ptolomie: partly the good furniture of the Ships, wherin conſiſted no leſſe, than in the qualitie of thoſe with whom they were manned. Further, wee may reaſonably judge, that the two hundred ſhips of burthen, carying the ſtrength of Ptolomies Armie, did not more encourage his owne men, and terrifie his enemies the day before the fight; than breede in each part the contrary affections, when in the beginning of the fight, they fell off, and ſtood aloofe. For though it were fitting, that they ſhould ſo doe; yet a multitude, prepoſſeſſed with vaine conceipts, will commonly apprehend very ſlight occaſions, to thinke themſelues abandoned. Beſides all this, the expectation, that Menelaus iſſuing with his fleet out of Salamis, ſhould charge the enemies in ſterne, was vtterly fruſtrate. Hee was kept in perforce, by the ten ſhips appointed to barre vp the mouth of the Hauen: which they manfully performed, as great neceſſitie required.

Such diſappointment of expectation, doth much abate the courage of men in fight; eſpecially of the aſſailants: whereas on the contrarie, they that finde ſome part of their feares vaine, doe eaſily gather hopefull ſpirits, and conceiue an opinion of their owne abilitie to doe more than they had thought vpon, out of their not ſuffering the harme that they had imagined.

Whatſoeuer the cauſes of this victorie were, the fruit was very great. For Ptolomie had no more than eight Gallies that accompanied him in his flight: all the reſt of his fleet was either taken, or ſunk. Neither did Menelaus any longer ſtriue againſt the violence of Fortune; but yeelded vp all that hee held in Cyprus, together with his Armie, conſiſting of twelue thouſand foote, and a thouſand and two hundred horſe, horſe, and thoſe Gallies in the Hauen of Salamis. The ſame deiection of Spirit was found in the common Souldier, as well that was taken at Sea, as that had ſerued the Egyptian by Land: none of them repoſing any more confidence in Ptolomie, but willingly becomming followers of a new Lord, whoſe Armie they now increaſed.

It was generally beleeued, that much more depended on the euent of this fight, than the Ile of Cyprus; for which they contended. Wherefore the common expectation was great; eſpecially Antigonus, whom it moſt concerned, was deeply perplexed with cares, thinking euery day a yeere, till hee were aduertiſed of the iſſue. In this moode Ariſtodemus found him, a notable flatterer, whom Demetrius had honoured, with the Meſſage of theſe good newes. Ariſtodemus had bethought himſelfe of a trick, whereby to double the welcome of his ioyfull errand: He cauſed his ſhips to ride at Anchor, a good diſtance from the ſhore; hee himſelfe landed in a Cock-boat, which he ſent immediately backe to the ſhip; and ſo all alone, he went forward, looking very ſadly that no part of his tidings might appeare in his countenance. Report of his arriuall (for it was not knowne where he had been) came preſently to Antigonus, who ſent Meſſenger after Meſſenger, to meet him on the way, and bring ſpeedie word how all went. But neither any anſwere, nor ſo much of a looke, as might intimate the purport of his errand, could bee wonne from this demure Gentleman. Thus marched he faire and ſoftly forward, with a great throng at his heeles (that ſerued well to ſet out his Pageant) vntill he came in ſight of Antigonus; who could not containe himſelfe, but went downe to meet him at the Gate, and heare the newes. Then did Ariſtodemus, vpon the ſuddaine, with a high voice ſalute Antigonus by the name of King; vttering the greatneſſe of the victorie (with as much pompe, as before he had couered it with ſilence) in the hearing of all the people; who with loud acclamations, gaue that name of King, both to Antigonus, and to his ſonne Demetrius. Antigonus, in requitall of the long ſuſpence, wherein Ariſtodemus had held him, ſaid that it ſhould alſo be long ere hee receiued his reward. But the title of King, together with the Diademe, which his friends did ſet on his head, he could not wiſh a fairer occaſion to aſſume: wherefore he readily accepted them, and ſent the like to his ſonne.

When it was once noiſed abroad, that Antigonus and Demetrius called themſelues Kings; it was not long ere their fellowes were readie to follow the good example. Ptolomie his friends would by no meanes endure, that their Lord ſhould be thought a man deiected for the loſſe of a fleet: therefore they ſaluted him alſo King. Lyſimachus in Thrace had boldneſſe enough, to put the Diademe about his owne head. Seleucus had, before this time, among the Barbarous people, taken vpon him as King: but now he vſed the ſtile indifferently, as well among the Greekes and Macedonians, as in dealing with others. Onely Caſſander held himſelfe contented with his owne name: whereby howſoeuer he might ſhaddow his pride, he no way leſſened the fame of his crueltie, againſt his Maſters houſe. But the name which he forbore, his ſonnes, after him, were bold to vſurpe, though with ill ſucceſſe, as wil appeare, when they ſhall enter vpon the Stage; whereon theſe old Tragedians, vnder new habits, as no longer now the ſame perſons, beginne to play their parts, with bigger lookes, and more boiſterous actions, not with greater grace and iudgement, than in the Scenes alreadie paſt.

CHAP. VI.

Of the warres betweene the Kings of Ægypt, Asia, Macedon, Thrace, and others: vntill all ALEXANDERS Princes were consumed.

§. I.

The Expedition of ANTIGONVS against Ægypt, with ill successe.

ALL the rest of these Kings had taken that name vpon them, an imitation of Antigonus himselfe, as beseeming his greatnesse: which was such as gaue him hope to swallow them vp, together with their new titles. Being not ignorant of his owne strength, hee resolued to single out Ptolomie, and make him an example to others: who should hardly be able to stand, when the greatest of them was fallen. To this purpose hee prepared an Armie of eighteene thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, with foure-score and three Elephants: as likewise a fleet of a hundred and fiftie Gallies, and a hundred ships of burden. The Land-forces hee commanded in person: of the Naule Demetrius was Admirall.

When all was readie for the iourney, the Sea-men aduised him to stay yet eight dayes longer, and expect the setting of the Pleiades. But his hastie desire to preuent all preparations for resistance that Ptolomie should make, reiected this counsaile; imputing it rather to their feare than skill: wherefore he departed from Antigonia (a Towne which he had built in Syria, and called after his owne name, that was soone changed into Seleucia, by his mortall Enemie) and came to Gaza; where hee met with his fleet. The neerer that he drew to Ægypt, the more haste hee made: thinking by celeritie to preuaile more then by his great power. He caused his Souldiers to carrie ten daies prouision of victuals; and had many Camels loaden with all necessaries for passing the Desarts, ouer which he marched with no small toile, though he met with no resistance. At Mount Cassius, which is neere adioyning to Nilus, he saw his Fleet, riding at Anchor, not farre from the shore; in ill case, and many ships wanting. It had beene sorely beaten with foule weather, wherein some were lost, others driuen back to Gaza, or scattered elsewhere into such creeks as they could recouer: Demetrius himselfe, with the best and strongest vessels, did so long beat it vp against the winde, that all his fresh water was spent; in which extremitie, he and all his must haue perished, had not the tempest ceased when it did, and Antigonus appeared in sight, from whom these ouer-wearied, thirsty and Sea-beaten Souldiers receiued reliefe; After these painefull trauailes there followed a Warre no lesse painefull than to little purpose; for Ptolomie had so fortified all the passages vpon the Riuer of Nilus, as he assured himselfe either to ende the warre there, or if his guards should happen to be forst, yet could it not be done, but so much to the weakning of the Assailants, as he should afterward, with a second Armie (which he held entire) entertaine the Inuader vpon aduantage enough. All that Antigonus sought, was to come to blowes speedily: Ptolomie on the contrarie, to beat Antigonus by the belly. It is true that Nilus gaue him water enough, but wood hee had none to warme it, and while Antigonus assaulted the Rampiers raised vpon the Riuer in vaine vaine, Ptolomie aſſaied the faith of his Souldiers with good ſucceſſe, for with great gifts, and greater promiſes, he ferried them ouer ſo faſt, as had not Antigonus thruſt ſome aſſured Regiments, vpon the paſſages next the enemie, and in the meane while taken a reſolution to returne, Ptolomie had turned him out of Ægypt, ill attended.

Some of them indeede he laid hands on, in the way of their eſcape, and thoſe hee put to death with extreme torments; but in all likelihood with the ſame ill ſucceſſe that Perdiccas had formerly done, when he inuaded Ægypt: had he not readily remoued his Armie further off, from the noiſe of their entertainement, that had alreadie beene wonne from him. To preuent therefore as well the preſent danger of his ſtay, as the ſhame following a forſt retrait, hee ſecretly practized the aduice of his Councell, vpon whom the burden muſt be laid of his entrance, and leauing Ægypt.

It is indeede leſſe predudiciall in ſuch like caſes, that errours, diſhonours, and loſſes, be laid on Councellours and Captaines, than on Kings, on the Directed, than on the Director: for the honour and reputation of a Prince is farre more precious, than that of a Vaſſall. Charles the fift, as many other Princes haue done, laide the loſſe and diſhonour he receiued in the inuaſion of France, by the way of Prouince, to Antonie de Leua, whether iuſtly or no, I know not; but howſoeuer all the Hiſtorians of that time agree, that the ſorrow therof coſt that braue Captaine his life. Certainely to giue any violent aduice in doubtfull enterpriſes, is rather a teſtimonie of louc, than of wiſedome, in the giuer; for the ill ſucceſſe is alwaies caſt vpon the Councell, the good neuer wants a Father, though a falſe one, to acknowledge it. Yet I haue ſometime knowne it, that great commanders, who are for the preſent in place of Kings, haue not only beene diſſwaded, but held in a kinde by ſtrong hand, from hazarding their owne perſons, and yet haue thoſe kinde of Mutiners neuer beene called to a Marſhalls Court.

§ II.

How the Citie of Rhodes was beſieged by DEMETRIVS.

THis departure of Antigonus left behinde it many dead carcaſſes, and a great deale of ioy in Ægypt. Ptolomie held a ſolemne feaſt, and ſent Meſſengers abroad, loaden with glad newes, to Seleucus, Lyſimachus, and Caſſander, his Confederates: ſtrongly encouraging all that ſide with the report of this his late felicitie, though it appeared but in a defenſiue warre. Antigonus on the contrarie flattered himſelfe with another interpretation, calling the ioyes of his enemies for witneſſes of his owne greatneſſe, ſeeing they aroſe but from ſo litle things: his enemies being but bare ſauers by the laſt bargaine, and himſelfe, as he ſuppoſed, hauing loſt but a little time, and no part of his honour in the late retrait. Howſoeuer it were, yet he meant to follow his affaires henceforth in another faſhion, for that which he could not cleaue a-ſunder by great blowes, he purpoſed by little & little to pare off, by cutting off the branches firſt, to fell the Tree it ſelfe with the more facilitie. To effect which, hee reſolued (leauing the great ones to grow awhile) to roote vp the Dependants of his Enemies: Dependants, whom the forenamed Confederates ſhould be forſt, either to relieue, or to looſe; and hereby he doubted not, to draw them into the field, where the aduantage of power, and of all other warlike prouiſions, promiſed him victorie.

At this time the Cities of Rhodes was very mightie, being well gouerned, and hauing long held it ſelfe in good Neutralitie, it drew the better part of all the trade of those parts, and thereby a great deale of riches to it selfe, to maintaine which, and to increase it, it furnished and kept on the Seas a Fleet of well armed ships, by which it not only beat off all Pyrates and pettie Theeues, but the reputation of their strength was thereby so much increased, as all the neighbour Princes sought their alliance and confederacie.

In this so dangerous a time (in which they must either refuse all that sought them, and so stand friendlesse and apart, or ioyne themselues to some one; and thereby forgoe the peace, by which their greatnesse had growne) their affections carried them to the Ægyptian: both because the greatest part of their trade lay that way, as also for that Antigonus his disposition, greatnes, & neighbourhood was fearfull vnto them. This affection of theirs, with some other passages, more apparent; gaue argument of quarrel to Antigonus, who began to declare himselfe against them by pettie iniuries, of taking some of their ships, with such other grieuances, while he made a more waightie preparation, to pursue the warre against them, openly & strongly. All things soone after ordered according to the greatnesse of the enterprise, hee employed his sonne Demetrius against them in their owne Iland, who brought such terrour vpon the Citizens, that laying aside all respect of friendship and honour, they offered him their assistance, and seruice against whomsoeuer. Demetrius, who knew from whence this change came, and that the alteration was perswaded by feare, and not by loue; raised his demands to an intolerable height, requiring a hundred Hostages to be deliuered him, and libertie to lodge in their Port as many ships of warre as himselfe pleased. These conditions more properly to be imposed vpon a State alreadie conquered, then on those who as yet had heard of nothing but a constrained assistance, restored vnto the Rhodians their lost courage, and made them resolue to defend their libertie to the last man: this taught them to infranchise all their able bond-men, and wisely rather to make them their fellow-Citizens, than to make themselues fellow-slaues with them.

Demetrius hauing refused the faire conditions offered, (as the Rhodians the fearefull ones propounded vnto them) makes preparation for a long siege, and finding no appearance to carrie the place in furie, he set in hand with his Engines of batterie; in the inuention and vse of which, he neuer shewed himselfe a greater Artisan, than in this warre. But in conclusion, after the Citizens had sustained all the assaults giuen them for a whole yeere, after many braue sallies out of the Towne, and the famine which they endured within the Towne, which had proued farre more extreme, if Ptolomie had not with many hazards relieued them, Demetrius by mediation of the Grecian Embassadors, gaue ouer the siege; a hundred Hostages they gaue him for performance of the peace made, but with exception of all the Magistrates and officers of the Citie.

Hereunto Demetrius was brought by the vsuall policie of warre, and state: for while with the flowre of all his fathers forces, he lay before Rhodes, Cassander recouered many of those places in Greece, which Demetrius had formerly taken from him; neither did Cassander make the warre as in former times, by practice and surprise, but by a strong and well compounded armie, which hee himselfe led as farre as into Attica, and therewith greatly distressed and indangered Athens it selfe. On the other side (though with lesse successe) did Polysperchon inuade Peloponnesus. These dangerous vndertakings vpon Greece, aduised the Athenians and Ætolians to dispatch their Embassadours towards Demetrius, and aduised Demetrius, rather to abandon the enterprise of Rhodes, than to abandon the great honour which he had formerly gotten, by setting all Greece at libertie.

Demetrius was no sooner out of the Iland, then that the Rodians erected statues in honour of Lysimachus, & Cassander, but for Ptolomie, whom they most affected, and from whom they receiued their most reliefe, they cõsulted with the Oracle of Iupiter, whether it were not lawfull to call him a God. The Priests which attended in the Temple

Temple of Hammon, gaue the same faire answere for Ptolomie, which they had formerly done for Alexander his Master, for as Alexander consulted the Oracle with an Armie at his heeles; so was Ptolomie at this time Lord of the soile: and yet was this a farre more cleanly creation, than that done by the Athenians, who Deified Antigonus and Demetrius, by decree of the people. A mad age it was, when so many of Alexanders Captaines could not content themselues with the stile of Kings, but that they would needes be called gods.

§. III.

How DEMETRIVS preuailed in Greece. CASSANDER desires peace of ANTIGONVS, and cannot obtaine it. Great preparations of warre against ANTIGONVS.

DEMETRIVS comming with a strong Fleet and Armie into Greece; quickly draue Cassander out of Attica; and pursuing his fortune, chased him beyond the straits of Thermopylæ. Herein his reputation did much auaile him; which was so great, that sixe thousand of his enemies Souldiers reuolted vnto him. So partly by the greatnesse of his name, partly by force, he recouered in short space al that Cassander held in those straits, and giuing libertie vnto the people, he bestowed vpon the Athenians those peeces, which had beene fortified against them, to blocke them vp. Then went he into Peloponnesus, where he found the like, or more easie successe: for hee suddainely tooke Argos, Corinth, Sicyon, and the most of the Countrie, bestowing libertie vpon such as needed it. The Towne of Sicyon hee transiated by consent of the Citizens, from the old seat into another place. and called it after his own name Demetrias. This done, he betook himselfe to his pleasure: At the Isthmian games, he caused himselfe to be proclaimed Captaine Generall of Greece, as Philip and Alexander had been in former times: whereupon (as if he were now become as great as Alexander) he despised all others, making it a matter of iest, that any, saue himselfe or his father, should vsurpe the name of King. But in his behauiour hee was so farre vnlike to a King, that in all the time of his leisure, hee deserued none other name then of a drunken Palliard. Yet were the Athenians as readie as euer to deuise new honours for him: among which they made one decree, that whatsoeuer King Demetrius should command, ought to bee held sacred with the gods, and iust with Men.

All Greece being now at the disposition of Antigonus, Cassander stood in great feare, lest the warre should fall heauily vpon him in Macedon: which to auoide, he knew no better way, then to make peace with his enemies betimes. And to that purpose hee sent Embassadors; but had no better answere from Antigonus, then that he should submit his whole estate to his discretion. This proud demand made him looke about him, and labour hard in soliciting his friends, both to assist him, and take heede to themselues; neither found hee them slow in apprehending the common Danger: for Lysimachus knew, that if once Cassander had lost Macedon, Demetrius would soone be Master of Thrace. Neither were Ptolomie and Seleucus ignorant of that, which was like to befall them, if Antigonus were suffered to put himselfe in quiet possession of those Prouinces in Europe. Wherefore it was agreed, that with ioynt forces they should all together set vpon the common Enemie.

Hereof Antigonus had notice: but scorned all their preparations, saying, That hee would as easily scatter them, as a flocke of Birds are driuen away with a stone. With these conceipts hee pleased himselfe, and no way hindred the proceedings of his Enemies. He lay at that time in his Towne of Antigonia (a name that it must shortly loose) where he was carefully prouiding to set out some stately game and Pageants, in ostentation of his glorie. But thither was brought vnto him the tumultuous newes of Lysimachus his victories about Hellespont. For Cassander had committed vnto Lysimachus part of his forces, wherewith to passe ouer into Asia, while himself with the rest should oppose Demetrius on Europe side. So Lysimachus passing the Hellespont, beganne to make hot warre vpon the subiects of Antigonus; getting some of the Cities in those parts, to ioyne with him, by faire meanes; winning others by force, and wasting the Countrie round about.

To represse this vnexpected boldnesse, Antigonus made hastie iournies, and came soone enough to recouer his losses, but not strong enough to driue Lysimachus home, or compell him to come to battaile. Lysimachus waited for the comming of Seleucus; keeping himselfe the whilest from necessitie of fighting. But Babylon was farre off; and Seleucus his preparations were too great to be soone in a readinesse. The Winter also did hinder his iourney: which inforced them on both sides to rest in some quiet, without performing any matter of importance. This delay of debating the quarrell in open field, held all those Nations in a great suspence, and bred much expectation. Yet might all haue come to nothing, had not Antigonus beene so froward, that hee refused to yeelde vnto any peaceable conditions. At length Seleucus drew neere with a mighty Armie of his owne (for hee had gathered strength in that long time of leisure, which Antigonus had giuen him) and with great aide from Ptolomie, that was ioyned with his forces.

To helpe in this needfull case, Demetrius was called ouer into Asia by his Fathers letters: which he readily obeied. Before his departrue out of Greece, he made peace with Cassander, vpon reasonable termes: to the end he might not be driuen to leaue any part of his Armie for defence of the Countrie; and that his iournie might bee without any such blemish of reputation, as if he had abandoned his Dependants: for one Article of the peace was, That all the Cities of Greece should be at libertie. Cassander was glad to be so rid of an Enemy, that was too strong for him. Yet would this league haue done him little good, if things had fallen out contrariwise then they did in Asia; seeing the ratification thereof was referred vnto Antigonus. It sufficed, that for the present, euery one found meanes to cleare himselfe of all incumbrances elsewhere, to the end that each might freely apply himselfe to the triall of the maine controuersie in Asia.

SELEVCVS, with his sonne Antiochus, ioyning with Lysimachus, compounded a great Armie, which was (all considered) not inferiour to that of the Enemie. In greatnesse of name (that helpeth much in all warres, but especially in the Ciuill) they were rather vnanswerable, than equall to their aduersaries: for Antigonus had of long time kept them vnder with a mastering spirit, and had beene reputed a King indeede, when the rest were held but Vsurpers of the title. Likewise Demetrius was generally acknowledged a braue Commander, hauing giuen proofe of his worth in many great seruices of all kinds, and inriched the Art of war with many inuentions, which euen his enemies, & particularly Lysimachus, did much admire. Seleucus, who had sometimes flattered Antigonus, and fearfully stolen away from him to saue his life; with yong Antiochus, a Prince not heard of before this iournie; and Lysimachus, that had liued long in a corner, hardly keeping his owne from the wilde Thracians; wanted much in reputation, of that which was yeelded to their opposites: yet so, that as ancient Captaines vnder Philip and Alexander, two of them were held worthie enough, to receiue any benefit that fortune might giue, and the third a Prince of great hope, whereof he now came to make experience.

The Souldiers, on both ſides, were for the moſt part hardie and well exerciſed: many of them hauing ſerued vnder Alexander; though of thoſe old Companies, the long ſpace of two and twentie yeeres had conſumed the greateſt number. But concerning their affections; the followers of Seleucus were eaſily perſwaded, that in this battaile they muſt either get the vpper hand, or put in extreme danger all that belonged vnto the Confederate Princes: whereas Antigonus his men could diſcerne no other neceſſitie of fighting, than the obſtinate qualitie of their Lord, that needes would be Maſter of all. Antigonus had about three-ſcore and ten thouſand foot, ten thouſand horſe, and three-ſcore and fifteen Elephants. His enemies were ſixe thouſand ſhort of him in number of their foot; in horſe they had the ods of fiue hundred; of Elephants they had foure hundred, and a hundred and twentie armed Chariots of warre; which helps, though they little had auailed the Perſians; yet were they not to be deſpiſed, in the hands of a good Captaine.

Antigonus himſelfe, either troubled with the vnexpected greatneſſe of his enemies forces, or preſaging little good like to enſue, grew very penſiue, communing much in priuate with his ſonne whom he commended to the Armie as his Succeſſor: whereas in former times he had neuer been ſo iocund; as towards the houre of battaile, nor had beene accuſtomed to make his ſonne, or any other, priuie to his counſaile, before it required execution. Other tokens of bad lucke, either foregoing the fight, or afterwards deuiſed, I hold it needleſſe to recount: Diana of Epheſus dwelt neere to the place of battaile, a buſie Goddeſſe in many great fights, and therefore likely to haue been thruſt into the fable, if any matter, neerly reſembling a miracle, had chanced.

It is eaſie to beleeue, that theſe two ſo gallant Armies, containing well-neere all the ſtrength of Alexanders whole Empire, performed a notable fight, being led by ſuch worthie Commanders, and whom the iſſue thereof did highly concerne. Yet are few of the particulars recorded: an eaſie loſſe in regard of the much variety, wherewith euery ſtorie aboundeth in this kinde. The moſt memorable things in the battaile, were theſe: Demetrius with his beſt force of horſe, charged valiantly vpon yong Antiochus; whom when hee had broken, and put to flight, hee was ſo tranſported with the heat of his good ſucceſſe, that he neuer gaue ouer his purſuit, but left his Father naked, and loſt thereby both him, and the victorie. For when Seleucus perceiued this aduantage, he enterpoſed his Elephants, between Demetrius and the Phalanx of Antigonus: and with many troups of horſe offering to breake vpon the enemies battaile, whereſoeuer it lay moſt open, he did ſo terrifie the Antigonians, that a great part of them rather choſe to reuolt from their Lord, whilſt they were fairely inuited, than to ſuſtaine the furie of ſo dangerous an impreſſion. This cowardize or rather treaſon of ſome, diſcouraged others; and finally, caſt them all into flight; expoſing their Generall to the laſt end of his deſtinies. Antigonus was then foure-ſcore yeeres old, very fat and vnweildy, ſo that he was vnapt for flight, if his high ſpirit could haue entertained any thought thereof. Hee had about him ſome of his moſt truſtie followers, and as many others as hee could hold together. When one that perceiued a great troupe making towards his perſon told him, Sir King, yonder companie meanes to charge you; he anſwered, Well may they; for who defends me? but anon DEMETRIVS will relieue vs. Thus expecting, to the very laſt, that his ſonne ſhould come to the reſcue, he receiued ſo many Darts into his body, as tooke away his lately ambitious, but then fearefull hopes, together with his troubleſome life.

His great abilitie in matter of Armes, together with his vnſatiable deſire of Empire, haue ſufficiently appeared in the whole Volume of his action. Hee was more feared by his enemies, than loued by his friends; as one that could not moderate his fortune, but vsed insolence towards all alike, as if it had beene some vertue neerest representing a Kingly Maiestie. This was the cause that so many of his followers reuolted to his enemies; and finally, that a great part of his Armie forsooke him in his last necessitie. For those Kings and Princes that call all the carefull indeuours of their Vassalls, onely dutie and debt; and are more apt to punish the least offences, than to reward the greatest seruices: shall finde themselues vpon the first change of fortune, (seeing it is loue only that staies by aduersitie) not only the most friendlesse, but euen the most contemptible, and despised of all other. This Antigonus found true in part, while he liued; in part he left it to be verified vpon his son.

§. V.

How DEMETRIVS forsaken by the Athenians after his ouerthrow, was reconciled to SELEVCVS and PTOLOMIE, beginning a new fortune, and shortly entring into new quarrells.

FOr Demetrius, at his returne, from the idle pursuit of yong Antiochus, finding all quite lost, was glad to saue himselfe, with foure thousand horse and fiue thousand foot, by a speedy retrait vnto Ephesus, whence hee made great haste towards Athens, as to the place, that for his sake would suffer any extremity. But whileſt he was in the middest of his course thither, the Athenian Embassadours met him with a decree of the people, which was, that none of the Kings should be admitted into their Citie. These were Embassadours, not Theori, or Consulters with the Oracle. It was a shamelesse ingratitude in the Athenians, to reward their Benefactor, in his miserie, with such a decree: neither did any part of his calamitie more afflict the vnfortunate Prince, than to see his aduersitie despised by those whom he had thought his surest friends. Yet was he faine to giue good words. For he had left many of his ships in their Hauen, of which he now stood in great neede, and therefore was faine to speake them faire, that sometimes had grosly flattered him. But he shall liue to teach them their old language, and speake vnto them in another tune. When he had gotten his ships, he sailed to the Isthmus, where he found nothing but matter of discomfort. His Garrisons were euery where broken vp; the Souldiers hauing betaken themselues to his enemies pay. So that he was King only of a small Armie and Fleet, without monie or meanes wherewith to sustaine him and his followers any long time. All the rest or the greatest part of his Fathers large Dominion, was now in diuiding among the Conquerers, and those few places which as yet held for him (hauing not perchance heard the worst of what had happened) he no way knew how to relieue, for to put himselfe into the field on that side of the Sea, he had no power, and to incloſe himselfe in any of them, how strong soeuer, were but to impriſon his fortune, and his hopes, or therein indeede to burie himselfe and his estate: Hee therefore creeping thorow those bushes that had fewest briers, fell vpon a corner of Lysimachus his Kingdome, whereof he gaue all the spoile, that was gotten, to his Souldiers, his owne losses hauing beene too great to be repaied againe by small prizes.

In the meane while the Confederate Princes had wherewithall to busie themselues, in the partition of those Prouinces, of which their late victorie had made them Lords, wherein Seleucus had a notable aduantage by being present, and Master of the field, for neither Ptolomie, nor Cassander were at the ouerthrow giuen, hauing only sent certaine troupes to re-inforce the Armie which Seleucus led, who tooke hold of a part of Asia the lesse and all Syria, being no otherwise deuided from his owne Territorie, than by the Riuer of Euphrates. For there had not any order beene taken by the Confederates, for the diuision of all those Lands: because they did not expect so prosperous an issue of that warre, which they made onely in their their owne common defence. It was therefore lawfull for Seleucus, to make the best benefit that he could of the victory, at which, neuertheleſſe others did repine, and though they neither could nor durſt accuſe him of ill dealing for the preſent, yet ſeeing the ouer-greatneſſe of Seleucus brought no leſſe danger to the reſt of the new Kings, than that of Antigonus had done, they conſulted vpon the ſame reaſon of ſtate as before, how to oppoſe it in time. Neither was Seleucus ignorant of what they had determined, for he read it in the Law vniuerſall of Kingdoms and States, needing no other intelligence. Hereupon they forget friendſhip on all ſides, and cure themſelues of all vnprofitable paſſion, the hatred of each to other, and their loues being laid on the one ſide, againſt their profits on the other, were found ſo farre too light, as Seleucus, who had to day ſlaine Antigonus the father, and driuen Demetrius the ſonne out of Aſia, ſought to morrow how to match himſelfe with Stratonica, Demetrius his daughter, and ſo by Demetrius to ſerue his turne againſt Lyſimachus.

The ſtorie of this Stratonica, with whom young Antiochus, the ſonne of Seleucus fell ſo paſſionately in loue, and ſo diſtempered, as Seleucus his father, to ſaue his ſonnes life, gaue her (though ſhe were his wife) vnto him, and how his paſſion was diſcouered by his pulſe, is generally noted by all Writers. But neither did this aliance betweene Seleucus and Demetrius; betweene Ptolomie and Lyſimachus; betweene Demetrius and Caſſander; betweene Demetrius and Ptolomie; though for the preſent it brought him againe into the rancke of Kings; otherwiſe tye any of them to each other, than the marriages betweene Chriſtian Kings haue done in later times, namely betweene the Auſtrians, the Aragonians, the French, and other Princes; neither haue the Leagues of thoſe elder times beene found more faithfull, then thoſe of the ſame later times haue beene; as in the ſtories of Charles the eighth of France, and of Charles the Emperour, of Francis the firſt, and of the Kings of Naples, Dukes of Millan and others, the Reader may obſerue: betweene whom from the yeere of our Lord, One thouſand, foure hundred, ninetie and fiue, when Charles the eighth vndertooke the Conqueſt of Naples, to the yeere one thouſand fiue hundred fiftie and eight, when Henrie the ſecond died, the Hiſtories of thoſe times tell vs, that all the bonds, either by the bed or by the booke, either by weddings, or Sacramentall Oathes, had neither faithfull purpoſe nor performance. Yet did Demetrius reape this profit by giuing his daughter to his enemie Seleucus, that he recouered Cilicia from Pliſtarchus, the brother of Caſſander; who had gotten it as his ſhare in the diuiſion of Antigonus his poſſeſſions: for the Intruder was not ſtrong enough to holde it by his proper forces from him, that entred vpon it as a lawfull Heire, neither would Seleucus lend him any helpe, as by the rule of Confederacie he ſhould haue done againſt the common enemie. So Pliſtarchus with very angry complaint, as well againſt Seleucus as Demetrius, went vnto Caſſander; whither Phila, their ſiſter, followed him ſhortly, to pacifie them both, and keepe all quiet; being ſent for that purpoſe by Demetrius her husband, that was not ſtrong enough to deale with Caſſander, and therefore glad to make vſe of that bond of aliance betwixt them, whereof in his owne proſperitie, he neuer tooke notice to the others good. About the ſame time he tooke to wife a daughter of Ptolomie (pluralitie of wiues being familiar with theſe Macedonians, that had learned it in their Eaſterne conqueſts) and ſo was he by two marriages rather freed from two enemies, then ſtrengthened with two friends, for neither of them wiſhed him any good, otherwiſe then might ſeeme to aduance their owne ambitious deſires.

Seleucus and Ptolomie could both of them haue beene contented better, that Demetrius, with helpe of their countenance, ſhould ſeeke his fortune ſomwhat further off, than ſettle his eſtate vnder their noſes. Particularly, Seleucus thought that Cilicia lay very fitly for himſelfe: and Ptolomie had a great appetite (which yet he concealed a while) to the Iſle of Cyprus. Now whether it were ſo, that Seleucus would faine haue ſet his new father in law vpon the neck of Lyſimachus; or whether hee were indeede greedie of the bargaine, he offered to buy of Demetrius for ready monie, his late purchase of Cilicia. Hereunto Demetrius would not harken, but meant to keepe as much Land as hee could, hauing already found in Cilicia twelue thousand talents of his fathers treasure, that would serue him to make sport a while. This refusall so displeased Seleucus, that in angrie termes he demanded the Citie of Tyre and Sidon, to bee surrendred vnto him; which were the only places in Syria, that had not followed the fortune of the late great battaile. In stead of giuing them vp, Demetrius tooke present order to haue them better manned; and spake it stoutly, That were hee ouer-come a thousand times, yet would hee not hire Seleucus to become his sonne in law. In this quarrell Seleucus was generally reprehended, as one of a malignant disposition, that would breake friendship with his father-in-law for two Townes, from whom he had already taken more then well hee knew how to gouerne. But the fire consumed it selfe in words, which had it fastned vpon armes, like it is that the weaker should haue found friends out of enuie to the stronger.

How DEMETRIVS wanne the Citie of Athens, and preuailed in Greece, but lost in Asia. Of troubles in Macedon following the death of CASSANDER.

IN the meane while, the Athenians not knowing how to vse the libertie, which Demetrius had bestowed on them, were fallen by sedition, vnder the tyrannie of Lachares. Through which alteration their distempered Citie was so weakned, that it seemed ill able to keepe off the punishment due to their late ingratitude. This aduantage hastened him, whom they had once called their God and Sauiour, to present himselfe vnto them, in the habit of a reuenging furie. Hee brought against them all the force that he could wel spare from other emploiments, which were at that time perhaps the more, because his doubtfull Easterne friends, were vnwilling to giue impediment to any businesse, that might entangle him in Greece. His first enterprise in Athens had ill successe; a great part of his fleet perishing in a tempest. But he soone repaired the losse; and (after some victories in Peloponnesus, where hee wanne diuers Townes that had fallen from him) returning to the enterprize, wasted the Countrie of Attica, and cut off all relefe from the Citie, both by Land and Sea.

Athens was not able to feede the great multitude within it, any long time: for it stood in a barren soile, and wanted now the command of those Ilands, and places abroad, from whence it was wont to be stored with victualls; being also destitute of meanes to keepe such a Nauie, as might bring in supply, or dare to doe any thing at Sea, against that of Demetrius. Yet was there some hope of succour from Ptolomie, who (trusting thereby to winne the loue of Greece) had loaden a hundred and fiftie ships with corne, and sent them to relecue the hungrie Citie. But these hundred and fiftie were vnable to deale with three hundred good fighting ships, which Demetrius had; rather they feared to become a prey to him, and therefore hasted them away betimes, as hauing done enough, in aduenturing to come so neere, that they might be discried. This brake the heart of the people; among whom the famine was so extreme, that a Father and his Sonne did fight for a dead Mouse, which dropped downe betweene them from the house top. Wherefore they sent Embassadours to yeeld vp the Towne, and craue pardon, hauing so farre offended, that out of desperation, they made it a capitall offence, to propose any motion of peace. Yet were they faine to abolish this decree: rather because they knew not what else to doe, then because they hoped to be forgiuen.

Demetrius, contented with the honour of the victorie, did not only forbeare to take away the liues of these vnthankefull men; which they had submitted vnto his mercie; mercie; but out of his liberalitie gaue them foode, and placed in Office amongſt them ſuch as were moſt acceptable to the people. Neuertheleſſe hee was growne wiſer then to truſt them ſo farre as he had done in times paſt. And therefore, when (among other flattering acclamations) they bade him take their Hauens, and diſpoſe of them at his pleaſure; he was ready to lay hold vpon the word, and leaue a ſure Garriſon within their walls, to keepe them honeſt perforce. After this he went into Peloponneſus, vanquiſhed the Lacedæmonians in two battailes, and was in very faire poſſibilitie to take their citie: when the dangerous news called him in all haſte, of Lyſimachus and Ptolomie; that preuailed faſter vpon him elſewhere, than himſelfe did vpon his enemies in Greece. Lyſimachus had wonne many Townes in Aſia; Ptolomie had gotten all the Iſle of Cyprus, except the Citie of Salamis, wherein Demetrius had left his Children & Mother, that were ſtraightly beſieged. Whileſt he was bethinking himſelfe which way to turne his forces, a notable piece of buſineſſe offered it ſelfe, which thruſt all other cares out of his head.
